His taste is cultivated to the highest excess and his execution is so exquisitely finished, graceful and refined that it sometimes appears to encroach upon the energy of his performance. The quality of bravura which for its inherent allurement is as a sine qua non for other violinists, is by Mr. Kneisel cast into the shade and rendered less perceptibly at his command than it really is, owing to the predominating influence of his ever-scrupulous refinement and unrelenting loyalty.

While this is true there are apparently no technical difficulties that he can not master with the greatest ease, and his success with the concerto that he performed last evening, aside from his making the work itself perfectly clear and intelligible to the auditor without the slightest deviation from its beauty of form and expression, was also characterized by an inherent brilliancy that Mr. Kneisel has seldom equalled here. In brief he executed the exceedingly difficult concerto with such precision, assurance and calmness and at the same time with a self-effacement that enabled him to add to his interpretation of the composer, a sympathetic instinct and poetic appreciation, that he might easily have driven to despair some of the most skilful artists in orchestra who have studied the violin all their lives.

At the conclusion of his performance Mr. Kneisel was heartily eulogized in the prolonged applause of the audience and was made the recipient of several floral tributes including an elegant basket of flowers the very choice offering of his admiring pupils.

Following the concerto was a symphonic poem composed by F. B. Busoni. It would seem disrespectful to a musician, pianist and composer so deservedly esteemed as Mr. Busoni to attempt to pass final judgment, after a single hearing of a work so elaborate and so profoundly conceived as this symphonic tone poem.

The orchestration of the poem is apparently its noblest feature, and is marvellously ingenious. The opening bars contain some very clever canonic imitations, but wherein the tone poem as a whole is the logical development of a single poetic idea, it would seem impossible upon a first acquaintance with it to state. Considerable of it indeed would appear to be nothing more or less than an orchestral delirium; and seemingly contains much sound and fury signifying nothing more indeed than the possible pain and agony which might have incited the composer to write the work at a time when he would appear to have been a fit subject for a country doctor.

The concert had two overtures, namely "Manfred," by Schumann and "Oberon," by Weber. Few overtures have so powerfully influenced composers as "Oberon." It was the happy remark of one of Weber's biographer's that through "Oberon" Weber became the father of all the musical elves, the naiads and mermaids. Thus also may be have invited Mendelssohn to write his "Midsummer Night's Dream," the "Melusina" and "Hebrides;" and it is more than possible that "Oberon" may have suggested to Bennett his "Naiads" and to Wagner his "Rhine Daughters." Oberon was literally Weber's Swan Song. After the opera was first performed on the ninth of April, 1826, in London, the composer, who for some time had been in ill health, cetertained but the single thought that he must go home and die among his people. "Der Freischutz" was to be performed for Weber's benefit on June 6, but on the second of that month (1826), he wrote his last letter, which ended thus: "God bless and preserve you in health. Would that I were with you"—this to his wife. On the morning of the 6th, writer his son and biographer, "Sir George Smart's servant knocked at his chamber door. No answer came. He knocked again and louder. . . . It was then resolved to force the door. All was still within. The watch which the last movement of the great hand which had written Freichutz Enryanthe and Oberon had wound up, alone ticked with painful distinctness. The bed curtains were torn back. There lay the beloved master, dead." Yes, Oberon was Weber's "Swan Song."

The orchestral playing throughout the concert was fairly if not quite on a par with the orchestra's well known standard.

Heutige „Demokrat"
hat ein
Beiblatt.
Stadt Philadelphia.
Samstag, 15. April 1893.

Der neue Dirigent des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters.

Boston, Mass., 14. April. Der berühmte Wiener Kapellmeister Hans Richter, welcher künftig an der Spitze des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters stehen wird, wurde am 4. April 1843 zu Raab in Ungarn geboren, trat 1853 als Chorknabe in die Wiener Hofkapelle, studirte darauf 1860—1865 im Conservatorium der Musikfreunde Klavier und Composition und wurde 1868 auf Empfehlung Richard Wagner's, bei dem er ein Jahr lang in der Schweiz geweilt hatte, zum Chordirektor an der Münchener Oper ernannt. Im Jahre 1870 leitete er die erste Aufführung des „Lohengrin" in Brüssel, wurde 1871—1875 Kapellmeister am Nationaltheater zu Budapest und nachdem er 1875 ein großes Orchester-Konzert zu Wien mit außerordentlichem Erfolge dirigirt hatte, als Nachfolger Dessoffs Kapellmeister der Hofoper und zugleich Dirigent der Philharmonischen Konzerte in Wien. 1878 erhielt er die zweite Kapellmeisterstelle der Hofkapelle. Er dirigirte 1876 die Nibelungenaufführungen in Baireuth und 1877 abwechselnd mit Wagner die Wagner-Konzerte in London. Seit 1879 veranstaltete er jährlich Orchester-Konzerte in den Hauptstädten Großbritanniens.

MONDAY, APRIL 17, 1893.

The Twenty-second Concert of the Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the twenty-second concert of the Symphony Orchestra was as follows:

Overture, "Manfred" ..... Schumann
Concerto for violin, D-major ..... Brahms
Symphonic Tone Poem (Manuscript) ..... Busoni
Overture, Oberon ..... Weber

Mr. Kneisel was the violinist.

Mr. Busoni's orchestral poem is dedicated to Mr. Nikisch.

It calls for a modern orchestra that includes harp, double-bassoon, bass-clarinet, English horn, gong, cymbals, xylophone and drums in plenty.

And yet, with all these instruments, Mr. Busoni does not succeed in catching one effect.

He is alert, he is eager; he deliberately makes great preparations, so that the hearer sees him laying trains of gunpowder for the future explosions; or, again, he hopes to catch the hearer napping, and startle him by an unexpected discharge of orchestral artillery.

But try as he may; let him use silence or the xylophone, or let him set everything going at full speed; lo, there is no effect, except that the hearer, however well-disposed, is disturbed and dismayed.

The poem is said to be "purely fanciful," "absolutely free."

The hearer therefore enjoys the privilege of discovering things in the music.

The hearer is first introduced to Spenser's darksome cave, where he finds

"That cursed man, low sitting on the ground,
Musing full sadly in his sullein mind."

The scene changes and the curtain rises on the earthquake at Lisbon.

There is a funeral march in honor of the engulfed.

The mourning is dispelled by the advance of the Chinese army arrayed in all the glorious panoply of war.

Again we are in Europe, and the sun rises on the battle of Austerlitz. After the realistic description of the battle, there are groans for the defeated, lamentation for the slain, and cheers for the little Man in Gray.

But now the hearer becomes confused; the music is wilder and is thrown from the stage in spasmodic jets.

There are suggestions of the blowing up of Hell Gate and an audible aurora borealis.

And there is a final return to the cave in the first scene.

***

Mr. Busoni is a pianist of remarkable ability. No one in this country to-day is in certain respects his superior, and in other certain respects he is superior to his colleagues.

He has orchestral technique as well as the technique of the pianist.

But when he wrote this orchestral poem he had nothing to say.

And so he wrote many notes for many instruments.

A little simplicity would have been more to the purpose.

One melody of power or beauty would have been grateful.

A logical sentence firmly knit would have pleased more than this rhapsody, punctuated solely by dashes, exclamation points and points of interrogation.

***

The feature of the concert was Mr. Kneisel's fine performance of the concerto. There might have been a more marked display of power in the last movement, and nowhere in the performance was there a revelation of temperament. But the playing of Mr. Kneisel was pure, accurate, chaste and full of noble serenity. He deserved the enthusiastic welcome; he deserved the hearty applause that followed each movement; for he is an artist whose chief aim is to glorify the chosen composer, and he devotes himself body and soul to the task.

***

The overtures were played with dramatic power, and the concert was of reasonable length.

***

The next concert will be devoted to selections from the works of Wagner. Miss Kaschoska, Mrs. Nikisch, Miss Leimer and Mr. Meyn will sing.

PHILIP HALE.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, APRIL 16, 1893.

Boston Symphony Season Soon to End.

Mr. Nikisch presented but one novelty at the Symphony concert yesterday, works by Schumann, Brahms and Weber making up the principal portion of the programme. The new composition was a symphonic tone poem in MS. by the talented composer and pianist, Mr. F. B. Busoni, dedicated to Mr. Nikisch.

The piece is a fanciful work, without any title to indicate the musical picture the author wished to present. The scoring is brilliant, tumultuous at times, and calls into play all of the instruments of the orchestra. Some of the effects are Wagnerian in the forte passages, and might well typify the tortures of a guilty soul in inferno.

As a piece of orchestration it must be ranked highly, for the color and variety of the different phrases and themes are ever changing and effective, but as a coherent, descriptive work it fails to fully satisfy the auditor.

It was played with vigor and confidence by the orchestra and evidently in harmony with the ideas of the composer.

Mr. Kneisel's performance of the Brahm's concerto was the gem of the evening, and he renewed his success of three seasons ago when he first played the piece in this city.

His glides, trills and double chords were notably true, and his introduced cadenza was most delicately played.

The whole interpretation was seemingly without a blemish, and the accomplished artist was several times summoned to the platform at the close of the number to bow his acknowledgments.

Schumann's "Manfred" overture and Weber's "Oberon" completed the programme. The tremendous orchestral crash in the latter piece was given with the proper force and aroused the usual astonishment among the spectators.

This week a Wagner programme will be given, with Miss Felicia Kaschoska, Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, Miss Louise Leimer and Mr. Heinrick Meyn as soloists.

[141]

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XXIII., NO. 106.

SUNDAY, APRIL 16, 1893.

The Symphony Concert, Soloist Mr. Franz Kneisel.

Director Nikisch is certainly to be commended for giving his Symphony concert programmes of the present season an up-to-date character, and whatever ill-success has attended his efforts in this direction cannot be attributed to him so much as to the composers of the present day, from whose works he has been obliged to select contributions.

Last evening he brought forward, as among the novelties of the season, the "Symphonic Tone Poem," by F. B. Busoni, which is dedicated to Director Nikisch, and was given its first performance in public on this occasion.

Mr. Busoni will be recalled with much pleasure as the pianist who has made such a favorable record for himself, both in recitals and with the Symphony orchestra the present season, and it is disappointing that he should appear at such a disadvantage in this, his first, contribution in the way of a large work of a symphonic character. Mr. Busoni is evidently a thorough student of the modern orchestra, and in his "Poem" he has not been satisfied with less than a full complement of all the instruments known in the grand orchestra of today.

It is somewhat to be regretted that he has used such large means to such small ends, for he has been successful only in saying the most inconsequential things in the most magnificent way. He is evidently familiar with the compositions of the writers of the past and present, and has succeeded in showing most catholic taste in choosing his models to be followed in this composition.

The composition appeared to meet with favor by those who appreciate music from a scientific standpoint, and it certainly commands approval as the work of an able musician, however much it is lacking in evidences of Mr. Busoni's genius as a composer.

The appearance of Mr. Franz Kneisel as the soloist of the concert was a most enjoyable event, and this talented musician has seldom had a more pronounced evidence of his personal and professional popularity in Boston than that given him on this occasion. He played the Brahms' concerto in D major as his contribution to the programme, and gave a masterly performance of its movements that won him a grand demonstration at the end of the work, in which both audience and orchestra joined with great unanimity. The programme was begun with a very pleasing performance of Schumann's overture to "Manfred" and ended with a remarkably brilliant performance of Weber's overture to "Oberon."

HANS RICHTER.

A Vienna Correspondent Chats with Him.

He Talks Freely for Herald Readers—His Motives for Accepting the Boston Engagement—His Popularity with the Vienna Public—Some Local Impressions Given in Interviews.

[BY CABLE TO THE SUNDAY HERALD.]

VIENNA, April 15, 1893. When I received cable instructions from Boston today to call upon Hans Richter and have a chat with him about his plans for going to America, I mentally congratulated myself upon being associated with his favorite paper here, and felt that the request made could be easily complied with.

I called at his pleasant residence this afternoon at the hour he is usually to be found at home, and confidently sent in my card with my jurnalistic position here duly inscribed upon it. To my surprise it was returned with a message of regret that a previous engagement would prevent my reception. My Viennese pride was touched, but my early American training came to my rescue, and pencilling under my Vienna address, "Correspondent BOSTON HERALD," I requested its return to the great conductor.

It Proved an Inspiration, for presently the servant returned with a smiling face, and assured me that if I would wait a moment I would be most heartily welcome to any service I desired.

HERR HANS RICHTER.

My entrance to Richter's room was accompanied by a most hearty greeting, and it was evident to me that the HERALD of Boston was well known to Richter. I quickly found that he had been besieged by my associates of the Vienna press, and had been compelled to be courteously reticent toward all callers. He, however, expressed himself as entirely willing to speak to me for publication in America.

He is well-known for his immense energy in all that he undertakes, and when once decided upon a given course he is [illegible] American. The knowledge of this peculiarity has set all Vienna talking about Richter's plan of going to America since it has been known that he signed his contract with Mr. Higginson on Thursday, and his duties to the opera and the government have been widely discussed in all art circles here. I called his attention to the publication in today's paper of a statement that his contract with the opera house has four more years to run, and that he cannot retire until its expiration.

This did not appear to affect him in any way, and he simply reiterated his statement that he should fulfil his contract with Mr. Higginson to the letter.

He told me that

His Boston Contract

calls for his direction of two concerts each week, beginning in the early part of next October, and his duties under his new contract will, he thinks, be a great relief after those he has been subjected to here.

The two reasons which have led him to accept Mr. Higginson's contract are, first, a feeling that it will give him a relief from the overwork now imposed upon him here, which he feels the need of; and, second, what I am satisfied is a thorough and sincere admiration for and sympathy with the American people and American ideas.

Financially he is so situated that whatever money inducement has been held out by Mr. Higginson would have little or no influence upon his action in the matter.

When I ventured to suggest that he might find obstacles to carrying out his plans from his official associations he scowled in the way all who have ever played under him will readily remember, and said that he should carry out his contract with Mr. Higginson at any cost. He added, with a smile, that when once in America he expected he should quickly become thoroughly identified with its people, manners and ideas. For a resident of Vienna this is an approach to heresy, for Vienna is the world in the popular belief here. Richter told me that his plans had not been changed regarding his Chicago concerts as a part of the series associated with the exposition there. He will leave here early in June, and return immediately after his short stay in Chicago, to prepare to take his wife and family to Boston, in which city he expects to be established permanently by the middle of next September.

It is difficult for me to convey to the HERALD readers the Consternation in Art Circles

here over this intended departure of Richter. It will be apparent from the facts that he directs the choral church service at the Imperial Chapel, is first director at the Grand Opera and conductor of the Philharmonic Society that he is thoroughly identified with Vienna art life. It does not appear to be realized here that all these duties make demands upon such a man that even his great energy is not at all times sufficient to carry him through them all.

From a pecuniary standpoint, although I am not at liberty to quote figures, I can say that the two concerts each week will give a much better return to Richter than all his engagements here.

Tomorrow Richter directs for the last time here the ninth symphony, and the excitement over the event is widespread. A grand ovation awaits him upon his appearance at the conductor's desk, and he will be made to realize once more how large a place he holds in the hearts of the Vienna musical public.

I am satisfied that Wilhelm Gericke, the former director of the Boston orchestra, has had not a little to do with the decision of Richter in regard to Mr. Higginson's contract, and I should not be surprised if it was largely due to his influence that Boston is to have the services of the greatest orchestral conductor now in Europe.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 16.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme for last night's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, was: Overture, "Manfred," Schumann; Concerto for Violin, in D, Brahms; Symphonic Tone Poem (MS.), F. B. Busoni (first time), and Overture, "Oberon," Weber. The soloist was Mr. Franz Kneisel. The novelty of the evening, Mr. Busoni's work, was the most extraordinary composition that has ever been performed at these concerts. Why it should have been performed baffles understanding; why it should have been written is still more perplexing. It is abundant in ingenious and novel instrumental combinations, some of which are rich and beautiful in effect; but we must frankly confess that we found it impossible to detect what the music meant. If ever a musical work imperatively needed a minute description of its meaning printed on the programme, surely this is the very work. To us it seemed no more than a wild charivari, beginning in nothing particular, going nowhere, and leading to nothing but confusion. It says nothing intelligible and nothing that appears worth the saying. To us this tone poem seemed to depict a full-fledged Dakota cyclone roaring through a wholesale tin-ware establishment, destroying two or three dynamite factories with wildly explosive results, and causing the collapse of a six-story crockery warehouse. In other words it is nothing but noise, and hideous noise for the most part, as well. The audience listened to it in almost dazed astonishment, meekly applauded it when it was over, and then drew a breath of relief. Mr. Kneisel played the Brahms concerto with his familiar purity of taste and finish of style. He was received with prolonged enthusiasm, and, at the end of each movement, was stormily applauded, and twice recalled. The programme for the next concert will be devoted wholly to Wagner, with Miss F. Kaschoska, Mrs. A. Nikisch, Miss L. Leimer and Mr. H. Meyn as soloists.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 16, 1893.

TWENTY-SECOND SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The symphony concert last evening had perhaps its most gratifying feature in the performance of Brahm's concerto for violin in D major. To perform a work of such magnitude as this concerto it is absolutely essential to possess just such earnestness, artistic sincerity and technical mastery as are the never failing auxiliaries of Mr. Kneisel's art; and last evening he was not only in his element so far as the distinguishing and all important characteristics of his virtuosal ability were concerned, but he was more than ever successful in individualizing himself himself with the composer. If anything his performance of the great work was throughout so eminently sincere and refined, that he perhaps excited a less appreciative degree of interest than has frequently attended the performances of men whose general attainments have been below his standard; but, in this connection, it is well to bear in mind that our concertmeister's feeling for his art is conspicuously more like that of a musician than a virtuoso. While far from being deficient in the virtuosity, so essential to the making of a really great player, Mr. Kneisel's ideas of musical interpretation are much too lofty and too sacred to admit of his being rated as a mere perfomer or a violin gymnast.

His taste is cultivated to the highest excess and his execution is so exquisitely finished, graceful and refined that it sometimes appears to encroach upon the energy of his performance. The quality of bravura which for its inherent allurement is as a sine qua non for other violinists, is by Mr. Kneisel cast into the shade and rendered less perceptibly at his command than it really is, owing to the predominating influence of his ever-scrupulous refinement and unrelenting loyalty.

While this is true there are apparently no technical difficulties that he can not master with the greatest ease, and his success with the concerto that he performed last evening, aside from his making the work itself perfectly clear and intelligible to the auditor without the slightest deviation from its beauty of form and expression, was also characterized by an inherent brilliancy that Mr. Kneisel has seldom equalled here. In brief he executed the exceedingly difficult concerto with such precision, assurance and calmness and at the same time with a self-effacement that enabled him to add to his interpretation of the composer, a sympathetic instinct and poetic appreciation, that he might easily have driven to despair some of the most skilful artists in orchestra who have studied the violin all their lives.

At the conclusion of his performance Mr. Kneisel was heartily eulogized in the prolonged applause of the audience and was made the recipient of several floral tributes including an elegant basket of flowers the very choice offering of his admiring pupils.

Following the concerto was a symphonic poem composed by F. B. Busoni. It would seem disrespectful to a musician, pianist and composer so deservedly esteemed as Mr. Busoni to attempt to pass final judgment. after a single hearing of a work so elaborate and so profoundly conceived as this symphonic tone poem.

The orchestration of the poem is apparently its noblest feature, and is marvellously ingenious. The opening bars contain some very clever canonic imitations, but wherein the tone poem as a whole is the logical development of a single poetic idea, it would seem impossible upon a first acquaintance with it to state. Considerable of it indeed would appear to be nothing more or less than an orchestral delirium; and seemingly contains much sound and fury signifying nothing more indeed than the possible pain and agony which might have incited the composer to write the work at a time when he would appear to have been a fit subject for a country doctor.

The concert had two overtures, namely "Manfred," by Schumann and "Oberon," by Weber. Few overtures have so powerfully influenced composerf as "Oberon." It was the happy remark of one of Weber's biographer's that through "Oberon" Weber became the father of all the musical elves, the naiads and mermaids. Thus also may be have invited Mendelssohn to write his "Midsummer Night's Dream," the "Melusina" and "Hebrides;" and it is more than possible that "Oberon" may have suggested to Bennett his "Naiads" and to Wagner his "Rhine Daughters." Oberon was literally Weber's Swan Song. After the opera was first performed on the ninth of April, 1826, in London, the composer, who for some time had been in ill health, eetertained but the single thought that he must go home and die among his people. "Der Freischutz" was to be performed for Weber's benefit on June 6, but on the second of that month (1826), he wrote his last letter, which ended thus: "God bless and preserve you in health. Would that I were with you"—this to his wife. On the morning of the 6th, writer his son and biographer, "Sir George Smart's servant knocked at his chamber door. No answer came. He knocked again and louder. . . . It was then resolved to force the door. All was still within. The watch which the last movement of the great hand which had written Freichutz Enryanthe and Oberon had wound up, alone ticked with painful distinctness. The bed curtains were torn back. There lay the beloved master, dead." Yes, Oberon was Weber's "Swan Song."

The orchestral playing throughout the concert was fairly if not quite on a par with the orchestra's well known standard.

Heutige „Demokrat"

hat ein

Beiblatt.

Stadt Philadelphia.

Samstag, 15. April 1893.

Der neue Dirigent des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters.

Boston, Mass., 14. April. Der berühmte Wiener Kapellmeister Hans Richter, welcher künftig an der Spitze des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters stehen wird, wurde am 4. April 1843 zu Raab in Ungarn geboren, trat 1853 als Chorknabe in die Wiener Hofkapelle, studirte darauf 1860—1865 im Conservatorium der Musikfreunde Klavier und Composition und wurde 1868 auf Empfehlung Richard Wagner's, bei dem er ein Jahr lang in der Schweiz geweilt hatte, zum Chordirektor an der Münchener Oper ernannt. Im Jahre 1870 leitete er die erste Aufführung des „Lohengrin" in Brüssel, wurde 1871—1875 Kapellmeister am Nationaltheater zu Budapest und nachdem er 1875 ein großes Orchester-Konzert zu Wien mit außerordentlichem Erfolge dirigirt hatte, als Nachfolger Dessoffs Kapellmeister der Hofoper und zugleich Dirigent der Philharmonischen Konzerte in Wien. 1878 erhielt er die zweite Kapellmeisterstelle der Hofkapelle. Er dirigirte 1876 die Nibelungenaufführungen in Baireuth und 1877 abwechselnd mit Wagner die Wagner-Konzerte in London. Seit 1879 veranstaltete er jährlich Orchester-Konzerte in den Hauptstädten Großbritanniens.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY, APRIL 17, 1893.

The Twenty-second Concert of the Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the twenty-second concert of the Symphony Orchestra was as follows:

Overture, "Manfred".....Schumann
Concerto for violin, D major.....Brahms
Symphonic Tone Poem (Manuscript).....Busoni
Overture, Oberon.....Weber

Mr. Kneisel was the violinist.

Mr. Busoni's orchestral poem is dedicated to Mr. Nikisch.

It calls for a modern orchestra that includes harp, double-bassoon, bass-clarinet, English horn, gong, cymbals, xylophone and drums in plenty.

And yet, with all these instruments, Mr. Busoni does not succeed in catching one effect.

He is alert, he is eager; he deliberately makes great preparations, so that the hearer sees him laying trains of gunpowder for the future explosions; or, again, he hopes to catch the hearer napping, and startle him by an unexpected discharge of orchestral artillery.

But try as he may: let him use silence or the xylophone, or let him set everything going at full speed: lo, there is no effect, except that the hearer, however well-disposed, is disturbed and dismayed.

The poem is said to be "purely fanciful," "absolutely free."

The hearer therefore enjoys the privilege of discovering things in the music.

The hearer is first introduced to Spenser's darksome cave, where he finds

"That cursed man, low sitting on the ground,
Musing full sadly in his sullein mind."

The scene changes and the curtain rises on the earthquake at Lisbon.

There is a funeral march in honor of the engulfed.

The mourning is dispelled by the advance of the Chinese army arrayed in all the glorious panoply of war.

Again we are in Europe, and the sun rises on the battle of Austerlitz. After the realistic description of the battle, there are groans for the defeated, lamentation for the slain, and cheers for the little Man in Gray.

But now the hearer becomes confused; the music is wilder and is thrown from the stage in spasmodic jets.

There are suggestions of the blowing up of Hell Gate and an audible aurora borealis.

And there is a final return to the cave in the first scene.

***

Mr. Busoni is a pianist of remarkable ability. No one in this country to-day is in certain respects his superior, and in other certain respects he is superior to his colleagues.

He has orchestral technique as well as the technique of the pianist.

But when he wrote this orchestral poem he had nothing to say.

And so he wrote many notes for many instruments.

A little simplicity would have been more to the purpose.

One melody of power or beauty would have been grateful.

A logical sentence firmly knit would have pleased more than this rhapsody, punctuated solely by dashes, exclamation points and points of interrogation.

***

The feature of the concert was Mr. Kneisel's fine performance of the concerto. There might have been a more marked display of power in the last movement, and nowhere in the performance was there a revelation of temperament. But the playing of Mr. Kneisel was pure, accurate, chaste and full of noble serenity. He deserved the enthusiastic welcome; he deserved the hearty applause that followed each movement; for he is an artist whose chief aim is to glorify the chosen composer, and he devotes himself body and soul to the task.

***

The overtures were played with dramatic power, and the concert was of reasonable length.

***

The next concert will be devoted to selections from the works of Wagner. Miss Kaschoska, Mrs. Nikisch, Miss Leimer and Mr. Meyn will sing.

PHILIP HALE.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, APRIL 16, 1893.

Boston Symphony Season Soon to End.

Mr. Nikisch presented but one novelty at the Symphony concert yesterday, works by Schumann, Brahms and Weber making up the principal portion of the programme. The new composition was a symphonic tone poem in MS. by the talented composer and pianist, Mr. F. B. Busoni, dedicated to Mr. Nikisch.

The piece is a fanciful work, without any title to indicate the musical picture the author wished to present. The scoring is brilliant, tumultuous at times, and calls into play all of the instruments of the orchestra. Some of the effects are Wagnerian in the forte passages, and might well typify the tortures of a guilty soul in inferno.

As a piece of orchestration it must be ranked highly, for the color and variety of the different phrases and themes are ever changing and effective, but as a coherent, descriptive work it fails to fully satisfy the auditor.

It was played with vigor and confidence by the orchestra and evidently in harmony with the ideas of the composer.

Mr. Kneisel's performance of the Brahm's concerto was the gem of the evening, and he renewed his success of three seasons ago when he first played the piece in this city.

His glides, trills and double chords were notably true, and his introduced cadenza was most delicately played.

The whole interpretation was seemingly without a blemish, and the accomplished artist was several times summoned to the platform at the close of the number to bow his acknowledgments.

Schumann's "Manfred" overture and Weber's "Oberon" completed the programme. The tremendous orchestral crash in the latter piece was given with the proper force and aroused the usual astonishment among the spectators.

This week a Wagner programme will be given, with Miss Felicia Kaschoska, Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, Miss Louise Leimer and Mr. Heinrick Meyn as soloists.

[14]

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 17, 1893.

The Symphony Concert.

The overture to Manfred is the most powerful of its school, and as a portrayal of soul-conflict can only be compared with Wagner's "Faust" overture, but is superior to that work in that here we find the feminine element in vivid contrast with the masculine, the tender theme of Astarte being in beautiful contrast with the dark broodings of Manfred, while Wagner has given us the self-torture of Faust, but purposely omitted reference to Marguerite, in his overture.

The performance was a good one but the depth of Manfred is not as apt to be appreciated by the general public as the glitter of a "Carnaval Romaine," or the theatrical touches of a "Freischuetz" overture, and the applause was not as hearty as deserved. One may especially praise the trumpets which have exceptionally difficult and important work to do and did it excellently. Strange warnings of death and disaster, are those weird trumpet tones.

Mr. Franz Kneisel was the soloist, and he received a welcome of which he may be proud. He at once proceeded to justify this by a wonderfully dignified and impressive performance of Brahms' violin concerto.

To compare the last violin solo given in these concerts (a sugary confection by Raff) with this noble work was, if not likening Hyperion to a Satyr, at least to compare a giant with a fop. Yet the strength of the work seems to lie in its first movement, and some of the subsequent matter comes as an anticlimax.

Mr. Kneisel has not the breadth of tone of a Joachim or the abandon and passion of a Sarasate, but he has a surety equal to even these masters. In some of his work refinement replaces ardor, and intellectuality compensates for an occasional lack of fire. It was, all in all, a pure, artistic, and satisfying performance. The climax of technical excellence was attained in the cadenza of the first movement, composed by Mr. Kneisel himself, which presented the acme of double-stopping, almost continuous trilling, and ended with brilliant chromatic work. The second movement charmed by the delicacy with which the principal subject was played, and here one may conjoin the oboe player (M. Sautet) with Mr. Kneisel in speaking of the perfection of the movement; his performance was without flaw. The last movement had no tangible fault, but it scarcely attained the high level of the first one. Mr. Kneisel deserved the great applause which followed the end of the work, and the recalls were many and accompanied with floral tributes.

Now followed a tonal labyrinth by Feruccio B. Busoni. It was called a Symphonic Tone-poem, and it reminded strongly of the style of the orchestral rhapsodies in which Liszt has indulged. It began with a moan in the deepest woodwind and continued in the atmosphere of agony and conflict to the very end. Yet the writer received the impression that there was some beauty in it, and some coherent ideas somewhere, if he could have had the opportunity to have studied it. The wild boldness of it all made it comparable to a Turner painting of the latest epoch. Every possible tone-color was there; the Glockenspiel, which has been supposed to be an instrument of sweetness, came in during the most tempestuous passages, and there were military phrases for trumpets and drums; the trombones gave a series of phrases which alternated with ferocious rushes on the strings, and there were spasmodic moments of sweetness that seemed to suggest the apotheosis of something or other. One can only echo the words of Southey's Young Peterkin, "Now tell us what 'twas all about," and rely upon the composer for a solution of the tangle of tones. Such a work, by a man of proved genius, is a strong argument for a return to more definite forms; it would be unfortunate to have the Wagnerian spirit (so glorious when combined with words and portraying a definite idea) attempt to seize upon the symphony. Bruckner led the attack upon the instrumental forms, waving the Wagnerian banner, and one is seldom troubled with his symphonies nowadays; one may remonstrate against Mr. Busoni charging with the same "forlorn hope."

With Weber's "Oberon" overture the concert ended. Mr. Nikisch gives Weber his full due, and is as dramatic and theatrical as any could desire. The introduction, nevertheless, seemed somewhat overdrawn. The rest of the work, however, was of the utmost brilliancy, and its verve and dash call for great commendation.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

BOSTON POST.
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.
MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 17, 1893.

At the twenty-second Symphony concert Saturday evening in Music Hall, Mr. Franz Kneisel was the soloist, and his well-merited popularity was shown by the warm welcome accorded him. His selection on the programme was Brahms's concerto in D major, which he rendered most artistically. His tone is large and sympathetic, and his bowing firm and unerring. At the conclusion he responded to several recalls and bowed his acknowledgment. The novelty on the evening's programme was a manuscript "Symphonic Tone Poem" by F. B. Busoni and dedicated to Mr. Nikisch. The whole composition goes on in one uninterrupted flow, but the themes are ever changing. It has no title to suggest that it illustrates any especial subject, and as a whole is disappointing, but as a piece of orchestration it ranks highly, and shows Mr. Busoni as a master of modern orchestra. The remainder of the programme was devoted to Schumann's overture, "Manfred," and Weber's overture, "Oberon." Next week there will be a Wagner programme with Miss Felicia Kaschoska, Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, Miss Louise Leimer and Mr. Heinrich Meyn as soloists.

HERR RICHTER'S PLANS.

The Herald man in Vienna cables his paper the result of an interview with Hans Richter, who is to succeed Nikisch as director of the Symphony Orchestra.

The knowledge of his peculiarity of great activity and readiness to make up his mind quickly has set Vienna talking about Richter's plan of going to America since it has been known that he signed his contract with Mr. Higginson on Thursday, and his duties to the opera and the government have been widely discussed in all art circles here. His attention was called to the publication of a statement that his contract with the opera house has four more years to run, and that he cannot retire until its expiration.

This did not appear to affect him in any way, and he simply reiterated his statement that he should fulfil his contract with Mr. Higginson to the letter. His Boston contract calls for his direction of two concerts each week, beginning in the early part of next October, and his duties under his new contract will, he thinks, be a great relief after those he has been subjected to here.

The two reasons which have led him to accept Mr. Higginson's contract are, first, a feeling that it will give him a relief from the overwork now imposed upon him here, which he feels the need of; and, second, a thorough and sincere admiration for and sympathy with the American people and American ideas.

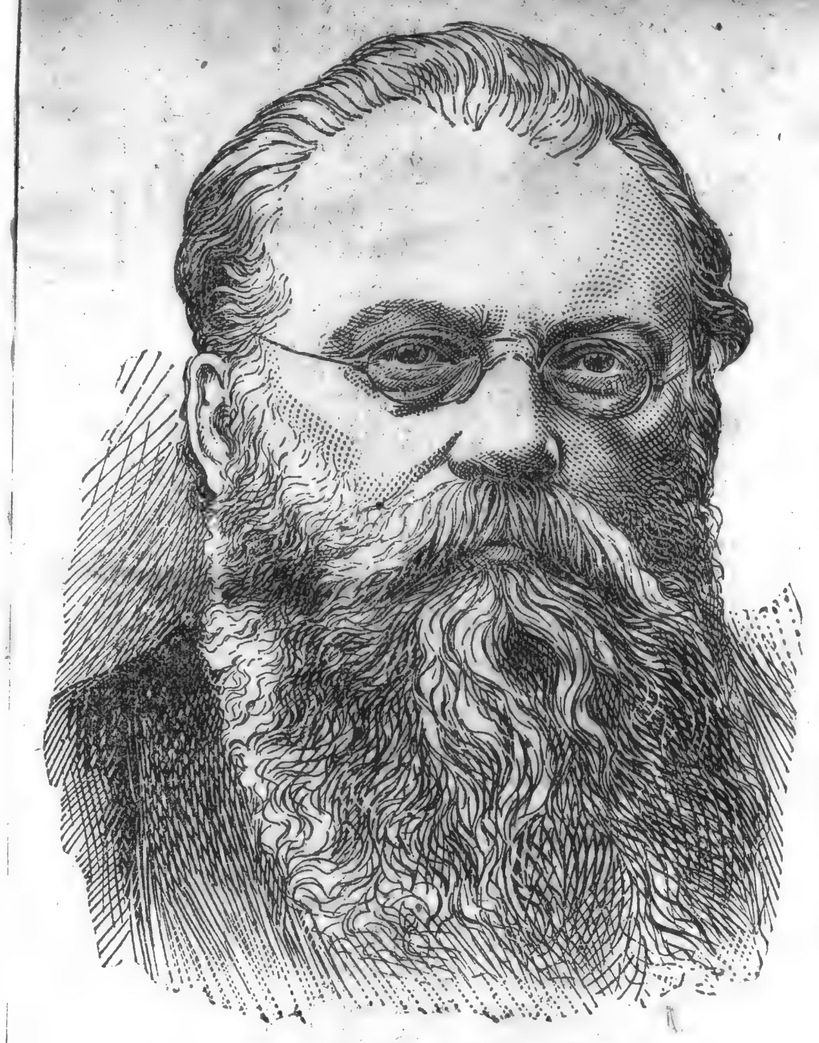
Financially he is so situated that whatever money inducement has been held out by Mr. Higginson would have little or no influence upon his action in the matter.

He said with a smile that when once in America he expected that he should quickly become thoroughly identified with its people, manners and ideas. For a resident of Vienna this is an approach to heresy, for Vienna is the world in the popular belief here. Richter said his plans had not been changed regarding his Chicago concerts as a part of the series associated with the exposition there. He will leave here early in June, and return immediately after his short stay in Chicago, to prepare to take his wife and family to Boston, in which city he expects to be established permanently by the middle of next September.

From a pecuniary standpoint it is said that the two concerts each week will give a much better return to Richter than all his engagements here.

Boston Daily Globe.
MONDAY, APRIL 17.

THE NEW SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR.



DR. HANS RICHTER.

[FROM HIS LATEST PHOTOGRAPH.]

In the cable report of an interview had with Hans Richter, the renowned musical conductor, in Vienna, on Saturday, the great musician is said to intend to take up his permanent abode in Boston about the middle of September.

He signed the contract with Mr. Higginson for conducting the Boston Symphony concerts, on Thursday, and will leave Vienna for America about the middle of June, and after a short stay in Chicago will return to Vienna in time to bring his wife to Boston by September.

Yesterday he directed for the last time the ninth Symphony in Vienna, and the ovation which he received left no room for doubt as to the place which he holds in the hearts of the music lovers of that city.

He stated that his principal reasons for coming to Boston were the desire to get some relief from the work now imposed on him, which is of a very exacting character, and secondly his admiration for the American people and sympathy with American ideas.

His Boston contract calls for his direction of two concerts each week, beginning in the early part of October, and this he looks at in the nature of a relaxation, after the hard work which he has been performing now for such a long time.

It will, in addition, be a much better engagement from a financial point of view than that which he is at present carrying out in Vienna. This, however, would of itself hardly have been sufficient inducement for him to come to Boston, as he is so situated financially that a money consideration would have little or no influence upon his action.

He directs the choral church service at the imperial chapel, is first director at the Grand Opera and conductor of the Philharmonic Society.

There is very widespread regret felt at his approaching departure among the art circles of Vienna.

The Salem Daily Gazette.
WEDNESDAY, APRIL 12, 1893.

THEY PLAYED SUPERBLY.

Splendid Concert in Cadet Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The fifth concert in the Oratorio Course was given last evening in the Cadet Armory by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Schroeder and Mr. Kneisel were the soloists and Mr. Nikisch conducted.

The orchestra played superbly. As we have already stated, it has no superior and for delicacy and perfection of ensemble playing, refinement and evenness of grading and shading, and richness and depth of tone without being blatant in the brass or wood wind or rasping in the strings this concert was an illustration of finished and most artistic orchestral work.

They certainly played as well as we have ever heard them and left no opening for criticism or any opportunity for disappointment. The brass section was of fine quality and nicely graded to the balance of the orchestra, not even in the wildest Wagner bursts was there a preponderence of it, yet it was of sufficient breadth to be most effective.

The oboes, clarinets and flutes which are so essential, but which usually in their theme entrances are so apt to stand out prominently often harshly, were all carefully toned down and beautifully played. The greatest beauty of the orchestra, however, lay in the string section, and here it is that one sees the great strength of the band.

The other sections must necessarily be as finished as possible, but in a great measure this lays with procuring the best possible talent in the various instruments. This is of course true with the strings, but in addition comes that nicety, delicacy, perfection of tone and finished playing only acquired by much constrant playing together.

For so large a section to play ensemble as a unit is an art, and in conjunction with its other splendid sections gives a result that is the highest and best.

The program was an extremely interesting one, and opened with that most descriptive overture to Tannhæuser, which is a sort of symphonic poem in its vividness of coloring and thematic handling.

Wagner is the master in this school of writing, all his works fairly glowing with it, and this overture as it now is played is in its intensity something more than a mere prelude to the opera for which it stands. Its rendition was perfect.

Next came St.—Saens concerto for violoncello with orchestra in A minor, played by Mr. Schroeder, who presented this beautiful and highly colored concerto in its best light. It abounds in wonderful passages for the cello that he played exquisitely.

The Suite for Strings in E major by Arthur Foote, is a delicious bit of writing, and was as correspondingly well given, the Gavotte movement being very sprightly and fanciful in its treatment.

The selections from that funny and grotesque opera of Wagner's "Die Meistersinger" were capitally done and were very effective, the absurd entrance of the Meistersingers being very enjoyable owing to Wagner's clever and satirical treatment of their time honored and precise themes all being built by rule and founded on the strictest forms and styles.

Handel's Largo went especially well, we never remember hearing it better. Mr. Kneisel played the solo part beautifully, and the violins took it up in unison in a most vigorous and inspiring fashion.

One missed the row of players standing up in front, a custom always pleasantly remembered, but it was quite as effective musically without it, whatever may have been lost æsthetically by association.

Beethoven's Fifth symphony made an admirable ending to this charming concert. This symphony is one of the most enjoyable of the nine, in that it shows so much breadth of genius and beauty, and is of such lasting interest.

While not offering the variety of the Pastorale, (the Sixth), impressiveness of the seventh or greatness of the ninth, it is one that on a single hearing carries with it much to be remembered, and is a good type of a Beethoven symphony—that on a single hearing is sure to make itself felt, and is only strengthened on its repetitions.

It was played faultlessly, and was a capital finish for such an excellent program. Certainly we owe the Oratorio Society a sincere vote of thanks for their efforts in bringing this organization to Salem, and it is to be earnestly hoped that we may be afforded opportunities of hearing them here again next year, and in years to come.

As many of us are unable to attend the Symphony in Boston from reasons that are at once understood, such opportunities like last evening are gladly welcomed as was shown by the large audience in attendance.

THE SALEM NEWS
WEDNESDAY, APRIL 12, 1893.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Large and Fashionable Audience at Cadet Hall.

Successful Event in Oratorio Course.

Fondest Expectations of Patrons Were Realized.

The concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, being the fifth of the Oratorio course, was given last evening before a large and fashionable audience at Cadet armory and was a performance long to be remembered, being absolutely faultless, and beyond criticism. The programme, although at first sight it might be considered a little long, did not prove so, and was well contrasted and highly interesting throughout, introducing many of the more popular numbers of their immense library of classical music. The ever welcome and stirring overture "Tannhauser" opened the programme at seven minutes of 8 o'clock and held the large audience in perfect subjection from the first introductory horn notes with the seductive string phases following to the reiteration of the same theme at the close by the full brass section, accompanied by the whole orchestra. It was as fine performance as has ever been given this splendid work.

The next of the orchestral numbers which demanded the attention of the listeners was a serenade written by Arthur Foote, a former Salem boy, but now conspicuous in musical circles in Boston and elsewhere. It was certainly a very rhythmic and pleasing composition, showing some effective handling of the strings in its scoring, and closing with a strong gavotte movement. It was well received.

The performance of the familiar Handel Largo, which followed, was a revelation, and introduced some fine solo violin playing by Franz Kneisel, accompanied by Heinrich Schuecker on the harp in a most finished manner. Both artists were applauded generously. The Wagner number from "The Mastersingers" made a fitting contrast to this part of the programme, and introduced many characteristic Wagnerian chords and effects.

But the great effort of the evening was yet to come—the Beethoven C minor symphony, being considered the most popular of the nine great master works of this composer. Here in the various movements were displayed perfect precision and strength, constantly interspersed with fine tone colorings and beautiful string effects, closing with a brilliant allegro movement, leaving nothing to be desired. The Andante Con Moto was of all the movements the most delightful.

Alwin Schroeder, violoncellist, was soloist of the evening, and in his hands the 'cello seemed an almost animate object, producing a most delightful tone and showing a masterly execution. His number was a concerto by Saint Saens, a charming composition and introducing a fine melody, accompanied by muted strings playing a sort of minuet movement.

Taken all in all, the playing of the orchestra, under the splendid leadership of Arthur Nikisch, rather excelled the splendid performance of the New York Symphony early in the season, under the direction of Walter Damrosch. And the oratorio course management is to be once more commended for the enterprise displayed in bringing this superb band of musicians to Salem.

---

[142]

...ston Transcript

MONDAY, APRIL 17, 1893.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the twenty-second Symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Schumann: Overture to "Manfred," Opus 115.
Brahms: Concerto for violin, in D major, Opus 77.
Busoni: Symphonic Tone Poem (MS.).
Weber: Overture to "Oberon."
Mr. Franz Kneisel was the violinist.

The ever-beautiful "Manfred" overture, with its divine second theme, was admirably played. Mr. Ferruccio B. Busoni's tone-poem is a novelty in more senses than one; it is both new and novel. As a piece of orchestration, of the most astounding and often wondrously beautiful orchestral coloring, it may seek its fellow; even Gilson's "La Mer" does not attain to such a pitch of magical beauty of clang-tint. It seems as if Mr. Busoni had at one fell swoop exhausted the capabilities of the modern orchestra. But when we pass beyond color and get to form, then we must own to being thoroughly baffled by this tone-poem. We have listened to it, we have studied the score, but we must admit that it seems to us more nearly formless than any composition we ever saw. It does not so much give the impression of a work in a new, hitherto untried form as it does of a work that really has no musical form at all. Still it is pleasant to listen to, if you can make up your mind in the beginning to give up all attempts to understand it musically; to us it is a series of physically delightful sounds. The orchestra played it wonderfully well. Weber's "Oberon" overture, coming immediately after it as it did, shone with redoubled brilliancy by its definiteness of musical purpose and clearness of expression. Is there any other single passage in all orchestral music as brilliant as the first phrase in the Allegro of this overture? No doubt there may be, but it is hard to believe it. The orchestra covered itself with glory in the performance.

After this, the third hearing of Brahms's violin concerto here, the work impresses one as distinctly noble, beautiful and full of power. Yet, with all its beauty, it has a rather fateful sound, as of one more voice proclaiming the approaching end of the violin concerto as a current form of musical composition. That writing an extended work for solo violin and orchestra should demand a certain amount of self-abnegation in the composer of the present day is already an ill-boding symptom; that even a composer of Brahm's classical bent should find this self-abnegation more than he is willing to exercise, and should thus transfer a considerable share of it to the solo performer's shoulders is a still graver symptom. Here are three long movements, each one of them in a nowadays exceptionally pure form; and one hardly finds more than three or four passages in the whole work which do not carry the conviction that the composer, in his heart of hearts, would have preferred to have the solo instrument out of the way, so that he could make play with his orchestra. Except when he exercises the most conscientious self-control, his orchestra throws the solo violin into the shade; you can almost hear his sigh of relief at the beginning of a tutti, or in places where he answers a phrase of the violin with this or that orchestral combination. The soul and spirit of the solo instrument is not in him; he finds it not an inspiration, but a shackle. To ask him to give it the commanding prominence it should have in a concerto is asking more than he can find in his heart to do; he does his best, but perfunctorily and joylessly; in doing it he has to keep back much of what is best in him. And the solo player has to bear the rest of the burden, in finding himself almost constantly in the shade, in having to play purely ornamental passages that do not adorn, or in trying to do things on his own poor fourstrings that it would really take an orchestra to do well and effectively. In very truth the effective writing of violin concertos is diametrically opposed to the instinctive musical spirit of our day. The concerto for a wind instrument is already dead past the hope of resurrection; the knell of the 'cello concerto is even now sounding; the violin concerto will go next! The pianoforte concerto will doubtless live on longer but its end also will come—it is predestined. One can say to it, as Richelieu said to de Baradas, "Behind thee looms the headsman!"

Mr. Kneisel's playing of the work was simply masterly from beginning to end; in fineness and totality of conception, in quantity of personal force, in perfection of execution, it was admirable at every point. To call it highly effective would, however, be saying too much; we do not believe that the solo violin part in this otherwise admirable concerto possibly can be made effective. Mr. Kneisel played his own cadenza in the first movement; a most effective and musicianly piece of writing, in which certain exceedingly beautiful and novel effects of tone-color are especially to be noted. His performance aroused the utmost enthusiasm, which it thoroughly merited.

The next programme is wholly devoted to excerpts from the works of Richard Wagner, and is as follows—Overture to "Rienzi;" introduction and scene 1 from "Das Rheingold;" Siegfried's passage through the fire ("Siegfried," act iii., scene 2), Daybreak and Siegfried's Voyage up the Rhine ("Götterdämerung," prologue); Siegfried's Dead-march ("Götterdämerung," act iii., scene 2); Brünhilde's dying speech over Siegfried's body ("Götterdämerung," act iii., scene 3). Miss Felicia Kaschoska, Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, Miss Louise Leimer, and Mr. Heinrich Meyn will be the singers.

[143]

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, APRIL 19, 1893.

Telephone - - - - 1253-18th.

The program of the twenty-second concert of the Symphony orchestra was as follows:

Overture, "Manfred".....Schumann
Concerto for violin, D major.....Brahms
Symphonic Tone Form (Manuscript). (First time.).....Busoni
Overture, "Oberon".....Weber

The feature of the concert was the admirable performance by Mr. Kneisel of the Brahms concerto. One might have demanded more strength and fire in the last movement, but Mr. Kneisel's performance, all in all, was rare fiddling.

Mr. Busoni's orchestral poem is scored for full orchestra including harp, gong and xylophone. It is dedicated to Mr. Nikisch.

The poem is without form and void. There are no themes of marked originality or beauty. There are no effective combinations of themes. There are no effects in any way, in spite of the boisterous attempts of the composer. Although the instrumentation shows a thoroughly trained hand, there are no sensuous or serene tonal moods. There are abrupt contrasts; there are tremendous explosions; there is fury in plenty. Ideas, however, are few and far between.

Mr. Busoni supplied no text, but, according to Mr. B. E. Woolf, "this tone poem seemed to depict a full fledged Dakota cyclone roaring through a wholesale tinware establishment, destroying two or three dynamite factories with wildly explosive results, and causing the collapse of a six story crockery warehouse."

* * *

It was stated late last night that Mr. Hans Richter will surely be the successor of Mr. Arthur Nikisch. This statement is said to have been made by Mr. Henry L. Higginson. The news is welcome to the great majority of the music lovers of the town, although some fear that seekers after musical novelties will hereafter be obliged to visit New York.

HANS RICHTER COMING.

THIS is indeed news of tremendous musical significance. There seems to be little doubt about it, although the final contract has not yet been signed. Hans Richter, the greatest of living conductors, greatest in the sense of versatility, all schools being alike familiar to him, director of the Royal Opera in Vienna, will come to this country to take command of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which position the present incumbent, Arthur Nikisch, has just resigned. Richter is a tremendous force in music in Europe, and his advent here cannot fail being of the greatest import to musical memory. While other conductors are specialists, this Hungarian is an eclectic. His personality is powerful and his practical knowledge of the orchestra—for he plays many instruments, his long and varied experience and superb musical temperament, really rank him as the greatest conductor alive. So at least he is regarded in Europe. That he will find a remarkably trained and sympathetic organization in Boston's famous band goes without saying.

HANS RICHTER.

Hans was born on April 4, 1843, at Raab, in Hungary, where his father was capellmeister of the cathedral. His mother, Mrs. Richter von Innffeld, formerly a distinguished soprano singer, afterward taught singing in Vienna.

At an early age he joined the choir of the court chapel in Vienna, and in 1859 entered the Conservatorium. He was with Wagner at Lucerne in 1867, and there made the first fair copy of the score of "Die Meistersinger." He accepted the post of conductor of the Hof und National Theatre, Munich, in 1868; he afterward visited Paris and Brussels, where he produced "Lohengrin" in 1870; he became chief conductor of the National Theatre at Pesth in 1871; and in 1876 succeeded Herbeck as director of the Court Opera Theatre. He directed all the rehearsals and performances of the Bayreuth festival in 1876. He conducted important orchestral concerts in London in the summers of 1879, 1880 and 1881, which excited much attention, chiefly for his knowledge of the scores of Beethoven's symphonies and other large works, which he conducted without book.

Apropos of Richter the "London Musical Times" says: "In a recent number of the 'Guide Musical' appeared some very interesting anecdotic reminiscences of Wagner, communicated to a contributor by Dr. Hans Richter. The famous conductor, it will be remembered, after fulfilling a long engagement as a horn player in the band of the Kärnthnerthor Theatre in Vienna, was recommended by Esser to Wagner, then in need of a copyist, and proceeded to Triebschen, near Lucerne, where he spent upward of a year (October, 1866, December, 1867) under his roof, and made the first fair copy of the "Meistersinger." Of his early experiences, Dr. Richter speaks as follows:

I was installed in a room on the upper story of the villa, and during the first three months of my sojourn lived there absolutely alone, taking even my meals in solitude. Wagner's study was just under my room, and there he worked, as a rule, all the morning without interruption. He was then engaged on the "Meistersinger," and when he had finished a page of the score he used to bring it to me himself, often with the ink still wet; and I, in my turn, set to work to copy it immediately.

In the afternoon, after the mid-day meal, which was regularly served at 1 o'clock, I was with equal regularity expected to accompany Wagner on his walk, which always lasted several hours. On these walks Wagner generally appeared to be deeply absorbed and did not speak. I imagine that he was still engaged in composition. However, he insisted that I should always accompany him. At that time I was still extremely shy and reserved, with little experience of the ways of society; but as these walks were to a certain extent part of my duty, I fancied that it was obligatory upon me to entertain the master who strode silently by my side. Goodness knows what tortures I underwent in my efforts to find subjects likely to interest him! I positively trembled as I started the dialogue on the spur of the moment. One day, shortly after my arrival—it was, I think, our second or third walk—I thought I had hit upon a capital subject, and ventured to sound Wagner upon his own works. "Can you tell me, Herr Wagner, which opera you prefer, 'Tannhäuser' or 'Tristan'?" Wagner burst into a loud fit of laughter and replied, "How can you ask me such a silly question?" That was all his answer, and the conversation ended there! From that day I never ventured to break silence, unless Wagner gave me the lead, so that our walks became more silent than ever.

Finally, on Christmas Day, after I had been nearly three months in his house, I was invited for the first time and presented to Madame Cosima Wagner. From that day onward I was treated like one of the household, and dined every day and spent every evening in the family circle. Every evening Wagner used to read aloud. At that date the stories of Hoffmann were in great favor, and Wagner read them incomparably, with the utmost animation.

In this connection, I remember that when "Tristan" was first put in rehearsal at Vienna in 1862, Wagner came one day to read his poem to the artists, in order to enable them to enter into the spirit of the work. Some of them afterwards declared that if Wagner had devoted himself to the histrionic career he would certainly have become the most remarkable actor of his time. He accompanied his reading with a wealth of gesture and of facial play which, to quote the words of one of the artists of the Burg Theatre, while betraying his complete ignorance of the tricks of the trade, nevertheless revealed an extraordinary talent in diction and representation.

I have mentioned that Wagner's workroom, where he was engaged on the score of the "Meistersinger," was exactly underneath the room which I occupied in his house. During the thirteen months which I spent at Triebschen, I can positively state that I never once heard the sound of the piano in his room. This shows that when composing or noting down his ideas he was never in the habit of trying how it would sound on the piano.

In reply to a question whether Wagner ever consulted him on the use of the different instruments, Dr. Richter replied with a smile:

No. On this point Wagner had no need of advice. He was better informed than anyone else. On one single occasion, however, he came up to my room with a page of his score still unblotted, and pointing out a passage, said: "Do you think that this phrase can be performed on the horn at so rapid a tempo? Isn't it too difficult?" The passage in question is in the finale of the second act of "The Meistersinger," where the horn takes up the theme of Beckmesser's Serenade. I examined the passage and reassured him immediately: "Certainly it can be played, but it will sound very queer and nasal." "Capital!" cried Wagner, "that's exactly what I meant it to be. It is sure to have a comic effect." And accordingly I had to take my horn and play the passage over several times, each quicker than the last. Wagner was overjoyed; the effect was exactly what he had intended.

I had brought my horn with me from Vienna, and in the summer evenings I used to take a boat and row off to a little islet opposite the villa, where, ensconced in the long grass and undergrowth, I would play on my favorite instrument till I was out of breath. Next day Wagner would question me: "I say, Richter, what were you playing yesterday evening?" "Well, meister," I would reply, "it was a passage from the 'Meistersinger,'" and Wagner would smile and appear delighted.

Soon a regular legend grew up on the banks of the lake about this horn which every evening used to waken the echoes of the little islet. People heard the sounds, but could not see the performer, and used to rack their brains guessing where the music came from. At last an Englishman, more enterprising than the rest, determined one evening to solve the mystery. I was playing away as usual, absorbed in one of the most beautiful passages, when suddenly I saw the reeds divide and a boat appeared with the son of Albion therein. When he saw me he exclaimed: "At last, I have found you! You then have been playing the wonderful music. Let me thank you, sir, for the pleasure you have given me on so many evenings."

Fifteen years after this incident I was at Oxford, where the University had conferred on me the honorary degree of doctor, and after the ceremony an imposing personage came up to salute me. It was none other than the Englishman of the island, who had since become one of the most

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, APRIL 17, 1893.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the twenty-second Symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Schumann: Overture to "Manfred," Opus 115.
Brahms: Concerto for violin, in D major, Opus 77.
Busoni: Symphonic Tone Poem (MS.).
Weber: Overture to "Oberon."
Mr. Franz Kneizel was the violinist.

The ever-beautiful "Manfred" overture, with its divine second theme, was admirably played. Mr. Ferruccio B. Busoni's tone-poem is a novelty in more senses than one; it is both new and novel. As a piece of orchestration, of the most astounding and often wondrously beautiful orchestral coloring, it may seek its fellow; even Gilson's "La Mer" does not attain to such a pitch of magical beauty of clang-tint. It seems as if Mr. Busoni had at one fell swoop exhausted the capabilities of the modern orchestra. But when we pass beyond color and get to form, then we must own to being thoroughly baffled by this tone-poem. We have listened to it, we have studied the score, but we must admit that it seems to us more nearly formless than any composition we ever saw. It does not so much give the impression of a work in a new, hitherto untried form as it does of a work that really has no musical form at all. Still it is pleasant to listen to, if you can make up your mind in the beginning to give up all attempts to understand it musically; to us it is a series of physically delightful sounds. The orchestra played it wonderfully well. Weber's "Oberon" overture, coming immediately after it as it did, shone with redoubled brilliancy by its definiteness of musical purpose and clearness of expression. Is there any other single passage in all orchestral music as brilliant as the first phrase in the Allegro of this overture? No doubt there may be, but it is hard to believe it. The orchestra covered itself with glory in the performance.

After this, the third, hearing of Brahms's violin concerto here, the work impresses one as distinctly noble, beautiful and full of power. Yet, with all its beauty, it has a rather fateful sound, as of one more voice proclaiming the approaching end of the violin concerto as a current form of musical composition. That writing an extended work for solo violin and orchestra should demand a certain amount of self-abnegation in the composer of the present day is already an ill-boding symptom; that even a composer of Brahm's classical bent should find this self-abnegation more than he is willing to exercise, and should thus transfer a considerable share of it to the solo performer's shoulders is a still graver symptom. Here are three long movements, each one of them in a nowadays exceptionally pure form; and one hardly finds more than three or four passages in the whole work which do not carry the conviction that the composer, in his heart of hearts, would have preferred to have the solo instrument out of the way, so that he could make play with his orchestra. Except when he exercises the most conscientious self-control, his orchestra throws the solo violin into the shade: you can almost hear his sigh of relief at the beginning of a tutti, or in places where he answers a phrase of the violin with this or that orchestral combination. The soul and spirit of the solo instrument is not in him; he finds it not an inspiration, but a shackle. To ask him to give it the commanding prominence it should have in a concerto is asking more than he can find in his heart to do; he does his best, but perfunctorily and joylessly; in doing it he has to keep back much of what is best in him. And the solo player has to bear the rest of the burden, in finding himself almost constantly in the shade, in having to play purely ornamental passages that do not adorn, or in trying to do things on his own poor fourstrings that it would really take an orchestra to do well and effectively. In very truth the effective writing of violin concertos is diametrically opposed to the instinctive musical spirit of our day. The concerto for a wind instrument is already dead past the hope of resurrection; the knell of the 'cello concerto is even now sounding; the violin concerto will go next! The pianoforte concerto will doubtless live on longer but its end also will come—it is predestined. One can say to it, as Richelieu said to de Baradas, "Behind thee looms the headsman!"

Mr. Kneisel's playing of the work was simply masterly from beginning to end; in fineness and totality of conception, in quantity of personal force, in perfection of execution, it was admirable at every point. To call it highly effective would, however, be saying too much; we do not believe that the solo violin part in this otherwise admirable concerto possibly can be made effective. Mr. Kneisel played his own cadenza in the first movement; a most effective and musicianly piece of writing, in which certain exceedingly beautiful and novel effects of tone-color are especially to be noted. His performance aroused the utmost enthusiasm, which it thoroughly merited.

The next programme is wholly devoted to excerpts from the works of Richard Wagner, and is as follows—Overture to "Rienzi;" introduction and scene 1 from "Das Rheingold;" Siegfried's passage through the fire ("Siegfried," act iii., scene 2), Daybreak and Siegfried's Voyage up the Rhine ("Götterdämerung," prologue); Siegfried's Dead-march ("Götterdämerung," act iii., scene 2); Brünhilde's dying speech over Siegfried's body ("Götterdämerung," act iii., scene 3). Miss Felicia Kaschoska, Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, Miss Louise Leimer, and Mr. Heinrich Meyn will be the singers.

[143]

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, APRIL 19, 1893.

Telephone - - - - 1253-18th.

The program of the twenty-second concert of the Symphony orchestra was as follows:

Overture, "Manfred".....Schumann
Concerto for violin, D major.....Brahms
Symphonic Tone Form (Manuscript). (First time.).....Busoni
Overture, "Oberon".....Weber

The feature of the concert was the admirable performance by Mr. Kneisel of the Brahms concerto. One might have demanded more strength and fire in the last movement, but Mr. Kneisel's performance, all in all, was rare fiddling.

Mr. Busoni's orchestral poem is scored for full orchestra including harp, gong and xylophone. It is dedicated to Mr. Nikisch.

The poem is without form and void. There are no themes of marked originality or beauty. There are no effective combinations of themes. There are no effects in any way, in spite of the boisterous attempts of the composer. Although the instrumentation shows a thoroughly trained hand, there are no sensuous or serene tonal moods. There are abrupt contrasts; there are tremendous explosions; there is fury in plenty. Ideas, however, are few and far between.

Mr. Busoni supplied no text, but, according to Mr. B. E. Woolf, "this tone poem seemed to depict a full fledged Dakota cyclone roaring through a wholesale tinware establishment, destroying two or three dynamite factories with wildly explosive results, and causing the collapse of a six story crockery warehouse."

* * *

It was stated late last night that Mr. Hans Richter will surely be the successor of Mr. Arthur Nikisch. This statement is said to have been made by Mr. Henry L. Higginson. The news is welcome to the great majority of the music lovers of the town, although some fear that seekers after musical novelties will hereafter be obliged to visit New York.

HANS RICHTER COMING.

THIS is indeed news of tremendous musical significance. There seems to be little doubt about it, although the final contract has not yet been signed. Hans Richter, the greatest of living conductors, greatest in the sense of versatility, all schools being alike familiar to him, director of the Royal Opera in Vienna, will come to this country to take command of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which position the present incumbent, Arthur Nikisch, has just resigned. Richter is a tremendous force in music in Europe, and his advent here cannot fail being of the greatest import to musical memory. While other conductors are specialists, this Hungarian is an eclectic. His personality is powerful and his practical knowledge of the orchestra—for he plays many instruments, his long and varied experience and superb musical temperament, really rank him as the greatest conductor alive. So at least he is regarded in Europe. That he will find a remarkably trained and sympathetic organization in Boston's famous band goes without saying.

HANS RICHTER.

Hans was born on April 4, 1843, at Raab, in Hungary, where his father was capellmeister of the cathedral. His mother, Mrs. Richter von Innfeld, formerly a distinguished soprano singer, afterward taught singing in Vienna.

At an early age he joined the choir of the court chapel in Vienna, and in 1859 entered the Conservatorium. He was with Wagner at Lucerne in 1867, and there made the first fair copy of the score of "Die Meistersinger." He accepted the post of conductor of the Hof und National Theatre, Munich, in 1868; he afterward visited Paris and Brussels, where he produced "Lohengrin" in 1870; he became chief conductor of the National Theatre at Pesth in 1871; and in 1876 succeeded Herbeck as director of the Court Opera Theatre. He directed all the rehearsals and performances of the Bayreuth festival in 1876. He conducted important orchestral concerts in London in the summers of 1879, 1880 and 1881, which excited much attention, chiefly for his knowledge of the scores of Beethoven's symphonies and other large works, which he conducted without book.

Apropos of Richter the "London Musical Times" says: "In a recent number of the 'Guide Musical' appeared some very interesting anecdotic reminiscences of Wagner, communicated to a contributor by Dr. Hans Richter. The famous conductor, it will be remembered, after fulfilling a long engagement as a horn player in the band of the Kärnthnerthor Theatre in Vienna, was recommended by Esser to Wagner, then in need of a copyist, and proceeded to Triebschen, near Lucerne, where he spent upward of a year (October, 1866, December, 1867) under his roof, and made the first fair copy of the "Meistersinger." Of his early experiences, Dr. Richter speaks as follows:

I was installed in a room on the upper story of the villa, and during the first three months of my sojourn lived there absolutely alone, taking even my meals in solitude. Wagner's study was just under my room, and there he worked, as a rule, all the morning without interruption. He was then engaged on the "Meistersinger," and when he had finished a page of the score he used to bring it to me himself, often with the ink still wet; and I, in my turn, set to work to copy it immediately.

In the afternoon, after the mid-day meal, which was regularly served at 1 o'clock, I was with equal regularity expected to accompany Wagner on his walk, which always lasted several hours. On these walks Wagner generally appeared to be deeply absorbed and did not speak. I imagine that he was still engaged in composition. However, he insisted that I should always accompany him. At that time I was still extremely shy and reserved, with little experience of the ways of society; but as these walks were to a certain extent part of my duty, I fancied that it was obligatory upon me to entertain the master who strode silently by my side. Goodness knows what tortures I underwent in my efforts to find subjects likely to interest him! I positively trembled as I started the dialogue on the spur of the moment. One day, shortly after my arrival—it was, I think, our second or third walk—I thought I had hit upon a capital subject, and ventured to sound Wagner upon his own works. "Can you tell me, Herr Wagner, which opera you prefer, 'Tannhäuser' or 'Tristan'?" Wagner burst into a loud fit of laughter and replied, "How can you ask me such a silly question?" That was all his answer, and the conversation ended there! From that day I never ventured to break silence, unless Wagner gave me the lead, so that our walks became more silent than ever.

Finally, on Christmas Day, after I had been nearly three months in his house, I was invited for the first time and presented to Madame Cosima Wagner. From that day onward I was treated like one of the household, and dined every day and spent every evening in the family circle. Every evening Wagner used to read aloud. At that date the stories of Hoffmann were in great favor, and Wagner read them incomparably, with the utmost animation.

In this connection, I remember that when "Tristan" was first put in rehearsal at Vienna in 1862, Wagner came one day to read his poem to the artists, in order to enable them to enter into the spirit of the work. Some of them afterwards declared that if Wagner had devoted himself to the histrionic career he would certainly have become the most remarkable actor of his time. He accompanied his reading with a wealth of gesture and of facial play which, to quote the words of one of the artists of the Burg Theatre, while betraying his complete ignorance of the tricks of the trade, nevertheless revealed an extraordinary talent in diction and representation.

I have mentioned that Wagner's workroom, where he was engaged on the score of the "Meistersinger," was exactly underneath the room which I occupied in his house. During the thirteen months which I spent at Triebschen, I can positively state that I never once heard the sound of the piano in his room. This shows that when composing or noting down his ideas he was never in the habit of trying how it would sound on the piano.

In reply to a question whether Wagner ever consulted him on the use of the different instruments, Dr. Richter replied with a smile:

No. On this point Wagner had no need of advice. He was better informed than anyone else. On one single occasion, however, he came up to my room with a page of his score still unblotted, and pointing out a passage, said: "Do you think that this phrase can be performed on the horn at so rapid a tempo? Isn't it too difficult?" The passage in question is in the finale of the second act of "The Meistersinger," where the horn takes up the theme of Beckmesser's Serenade. I examined the passage and reassured him immediately: "Certainly it can be played, but it will sound very queer and nasal." "Capital!" cried Wagner, "that's exactly what I meant it to be. It is sure to have a comic effect." And accordingly I had to take my horn and play the passage over several times, each quicker than the last. Wagner was overjoyed; the effect was exactly what he had intended.

I had brought my horn with me from Vienna, and in the summer evenings I used to take a boat and row off to a little islet opposite the villa, where, ensconced in the long grass and undergrowth, I would play on my favorite instrument till I was out of breath. Next day Wagner would question me: "I say, Richter, what were you playing yesterday evening?" "Well, meister," I would reply, "it was a passage from the 'Meistersinger,'" and Wagner would smile and appear delighted.

Soon a regular legend grew up on the banks of the lake about this horn which every evening used to waken the echoes of the little islet. People heard the sounds, but could not see the performer, and used to rack their brains guessing where the music came from. At last an Englishman, more enterprising than the rest, determined one evening to solve the mystery. I was playing away as usual, absorbed in one of the most beautiful passages, when suddenly I saw the reeds divide and a boat appeared with the son of Albion therein. When he saw me he exclaimed: "At last, I have found you! You then have been playing the wonderful music. Let me thank you, sir, for the pleasure you have given me on so many evenings."

Fifteen years after this incident I was at Oxford, where the University had conferred on me the honorary degree of doctor, and after the ceremony an imposing personage came up to salute me. It was none other than the Englishman of the island, who had since become one of the most distinguished professors of the University. We shook hands cordially, and as he recalled to me the circumstances of our first meeting, he spoke of the pleasant memories associated with it. "Well," replied I, "it was indeed an experience worth remembering; for you can boast that you were unquestionably the first to hear selections from the 'Meistersinger.'"

WORLD'S COLUMBIAN EXPOSITION.

BUREAU OF MUSIC.

BULLETIN OF CONCERTS TO AUGUST 1.

Corrected to April 15, 1893.

May 2, Tuesday.....Inaugural concert, Music Hall. Overture, "Consecration of the House," Beethoven; concerto for piano, Paderewski; symphony in B minor, unfinished, Schubert; piano solos; prelude, "Die Meistersinger," Wagner. Pianist, Mr. Ignace J. Paderewski.

May 3, Wednesday....Orchestra concert, Music Hall. Symphony, "Heroic," allegro con brio; Marche Funèbre, Beethoven; concerto for piano, Schumann; symphonic variations, Dvorák; piano solos; overture, "Romeo and Juliet," Tschaikowsky. Pianist, Mr. Ignace J. Paderewski.

NOTE—By invitation of the musical directors Mr. Paderewski has delayed his return to Europe in order to participate in the opening concerts of the Exposition.

May 5, Friday.....Orchestral concert, Music Hall. Schubert program. Entr'act from "Rosamunde;" song cyclus; symphony in C major.

May 9, Tuesday.....Orchestra concert, Music Hall. Brahms' program. (Brahms born May 7, 1833.) Serenade, op. 16; song cyclus; symphony No. 4 in E minor.

May 12, Friday.....Orchestral concert, Music Hall. Beethoven program. Overture, "Egmont;" triple concerto for piano, violin and violoncello; symphony No. 5 in C minor. Soloists, Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler, Mr. Max Bendix, Mr. Bruno Steindl.

May 15, Monday.....Boston Symphony Orchestra, Music Hall.

May 16, Tuesday.....Boston Symphony Orchestra, Music Hall.

May 19, Friday.....New York Symphony Orchestra, Music Hall.

May 20, Saturday.....New York Symphony Orchestra, Music Hall,

May 22, Monday.....Kneisel String Quartet, Recital Hall.

May 22, Monday.....Inaugural concert, Festival Hall. Wagner program. (Wagner born May 22, 1813.) Selections from "Tannhäuser," "Tristan and Isolde" and "Die Götterdämmerung." Soloist, Amalia Materna.

May 23, Tuesday.....Kneisel String Quartet, Recital Hall.

May 23, Tuesday.....Orchestral concert, Music Hall. Program will include concerto for piano and work for orchestra, by E. A. MacDowell. Pianist, Mr. E. A. MacDowell.

May 24, Wednesday...Kneisel String Quartet, Recital Hall.

May 24, Wednesday...Mendelssohn's "Elijah," by Chicago Apollo Club, Festival Hall. Soprano, Lillian Nordica; alto, Christine Nielson Dreier; bass, Mr. Plunket Greene; tenor, Mr. Whitney Mockridge.

May 25, Thursday.....Kneisel String Quartet, Recital Hall.

NOTE.—The Kneisel String Quartet program will include a new "Sonata Tragique" for piano and violin, by E. A. MacDowell, and a quartet for piano and strings, by Arthur Foote. Pianists, Mr. MacDowell and Mr. Foote.

May 25, Thursday....Haydn's "Creation," by Chicago Columbian Chorus, Festival Hall. Soprano, Lillian Nordica; bass, Mr. Plunket Greene; tenor, Mr. C. A. Knorr.

May 26, Friday.....Exposition Children's Chorus, 1,400 voices, Festival Hall.

May 26, Friday.....Orchestral concert, Music Hall. Raff program. (Raff born May 27, 1822.) Program will include concerto for piano.

May 27, Saturday.....Wagner concert, Festival Hall. Soloist, Amalia Materna.

May 30, Tuesday.....Orchestral concert, Music Hall.

June 9, Friday.....Orchestral concert, Music Hall. Schumann program. (Schumann, born June 8, 1810.)

June 12, Monday.....Max Bendix String Quartet, Recital Hall.

June 13, Tuesday.....Max Bendix String Quartet, Recital Hall

June 14, Wednesday...Händel's "The Messiah," by Chicago Apollo Club. Festival Hall.

June 16, Friday.....Bach's "St. Matthew Passion," by Chicago Apollo Club. Festival Hall.

June 20, Tuesday.....Concert by St. Paul and Minneapolis Choral Associations, S. A. Baldwin, conductor, Music Hall.

June 21, Wednesday, June 22, Thursday, June 23, Friday.....Festival by First Section of Representative Choral Societies of the Western States. Three concerts in Festival Hall; massed chorus of 1,500; orchestra of 200; organ and eminent soloists.

PROGRAM.

21. "Utrecht Jubilate," Handel. "Saint Paul," first part, Mendelssohn.
22. "A Stronghold Sure," Bach. Selections from "Lohengrin," Wagner.
23. "Judas Maccabæus," Selections, Händel. "Requiem Mass," Selections, Berlioz.

June 24, Saturday.....Performance in Music Hall of Brahms' "A German Requiem," by Cincinnati Festival Association Chorus, Conductor Theodore Thomas.

June 21, Wednesday, June 22, Thursday, June 23, Friday, June 24, Saturday..Session of representative Women Amateur Musical Clubs of the country, Music Hall.

June 27, Tuesday, Concert by Arion Society, of Brooklyn, N. Y., Arthur Claassen, conductor, Music Hall.

June 28, Wednesday...Händel's "The Messiah," by Chicago Apollo Club, Festival Hall.

June 30, Friday.....Bach's "St. Matthew Passion," by Chicago Apollo Club, Festival Hall.

July 7, Friday, July 8, Saturday, July 10, Monday....Concerts by New York Liederkranz, Conductor Heinrich Zöllner, Music Hall.

July 11, Tuesday, Concert by Cleveland Vocal Society, Conductor Alfred Arthur, Music Hall.

July 12, Wednesday, July 13, Thursday, July 14, Friday.....Festival by Second Section of Representative Choral Societies of the Western States. Three concerts in Festival Hall; massed chorus of 1,500; orchestra of 200; organ and eminent soloists.

PROGRAM.

12. "Utrecht Jubilate," Handel. "Saint Paul," First Part, Mendelssohn.
13. "A Stronghold Sure," Bach. Selections, Wagner.
14. "Judas Maccabæus," Selections, Handel. "Requiem Mass," Selections, Berlioz.

NOTE.—For the Festivals, June 21 to 23, July 12 to 14, and for both performances of "The Messiah" and the "St. Matthew Passion," Edward Lloyd, tenor, of London, has been engaged.

July 15, Saturday.....Concert by Junger Maennerchor, Philadelphia, Music Hall.

July 20, Thursday, July 21, Friday, July 22, Saturday...Festival by American Union of Swedish Societies, Festival Hall.

July 27, Thursday, July 28, Friday.....Festival by United Scandinavian Societies, Festival Hall.

Following the festival in July of the second section of representative Western choral societies there will be given in Music Hall symphony concerts, including the ninth of Beethoven, and in Festival Hall Wagner concerts conducted by Hans Richter.

September Mr. Camille Saint-Saëns, of Paris, and Dr. A. C. Mackenzie, of London, will be the guests of the Exposition during this month. Concerts under the direction of Dr. Mackenzie will be given during a period of two weeks from Monday, September 11. The programs will include a first performance of his new oratorio, "Bethlehem." Soloists already engaged for this event are Nordica, soprano, and Ben Davies, tenor.

Concerts under the direction of Mr. Saint-Saëns will continue during three weeks from Monday, September 25. The program will include choral and orchestra works. Mr. Saint-Saëns will also take part in chamber music concerts and will also give organ recitals.

NOTE.—The above list represents that portion of the special musical demonstrations for which dates are absolutely fixed. Regular musical features of the entire Exposition period include semi-weekly orchestral concerts in Music Hall, daily popular orchestral concerts in Festival Hall and organ recitals. The daily popular orchestral concerts, free to the public, will begin Tuesday, May 2.

THEODORE THOMAS, Musical Director.

ANNOUNCEMENT.

The musical features of the ceremonies opening the Exposition on May 1 include "Columbus March and Hymn," by Prof. John K. Paine; "In Praise of God," Beethoven, and "Hallelujah Chorus," Händel. The composers to be represented on the program dedicating the Women's Building of the Exposition are: Ingeborg von Bronsart, of Weimar, Germany, march for orchestra; Miss Frances Ellicott, of London, England, dramatic overture; Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, of Boston, Mass., "Jubilate," for mixed voices and orchestra, written for the occasion. A chorus of 1,500 voices, orchestra and military bands will participate in the ceremonies opening the Exposition. A mixed chorus of 300 and orchestra will take part in the program dedicating the Women's Building. The exercises will be held in Music Hall.

More Richter News.

BOSTON, April 16.

A CABLE dispatch from Vienna says that musical circles are agitated over the engagement of Hans Richter by Col. Henry L. Higginson, who has for years backed the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Richter said to a Boston correspondent on Saturday that he should fulfill his contract with Colonel Higginson, signed last Thursday. He said that his Boston contract is that he shall direct two concerts each week, beginning in the early part of next October, and his duties under his new contract will be, he thinks, a great relief after those he has been subjected to here.

The two reasons which have led him to accept Mr. Higginson's offer are, first, a feeling that it will give him a relief from the overwork now imposed upon him at Vienna, which he stands in need of; and second, thorough and sincere admiration for and sympathy with Americans and American ideas. Financially he is so situated that whatever money inducement has been held out by Colonel Higginson would have little or no influence upon his action in the matter. When the correspondent ventured to suggest that he might find obstacles to carrying out his plans from his official associations, he scowled in the way all who have ever played under him will readily remember, and said that he should carry out his contract with Mr. Higginson at any cost. He added, with a smile, that when once in America he expected he should quickly become thoroughly identified with its people, manners and ideas.

Mr. Richter said to the correspondent that his plans had not been changed regarding his Chicago concerts, as a part of the Exposition series. He will leave Vienna early in June and return immediately after a short stay in Chicago to prepare to take his wife and family to Boston, in which city he expects to be established permanently by the middle of next September.

The consternation in art circles in Vienna over Mr. Richter's proposed departure will be apparent from the fact that he directs the choral church service at the Imperial

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCIII, NO. 111.

FRIDAY, APRIL 21, 1893.

HERR RICHTER'S CONTRACT.

His Resignation Is Officially Refused.

He Persists in His Determination to Come to Boston—Vienna Art Circles Greatly Excited—Action of the Opera Directors Formally Announced on Wednesday.

[BY CABLE TO THE BOSTON HERALD.]

VIENNA, April 20, 1893. The musical public of Vienna was startled by an announcement in the official gazette yesterday of the action of the directors of the Grand Opera House, of which Hans Richter is the first musical director, in regard to his contract with them as governing board.

It is in the nature of an official communication which refuses peremptorily to release Herr Richter from his contract and decline to accept his resignation.

His contract continues four years longer, and the action of the directors puts Herr Richter in an embarrassing position.

Speculation is rife here as to what action the directors and the government will take toward Herr Richter. He has, however, left no chance for any question as to his own action, as he boldly asserts his determination to comply with the terms of his Boston contract as cabled on Saturday last.

The outcome of the action of the directors is awaited with intense interest here.

Boston Daily Globe.

FRIDAY, APRIL 21.

RICHTER REFUSED A RELEASE.

Intendant of the Imperial Opera Will Hold Him to His Contract Unless the Emperor Interferes.

VIENNA, April 20.—The intendant of the Imperial Opera refuses to release from his contract Hans Richter, who has been called to replace Arthur Nikisch as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra. Richter's contract will not expire for several years. He may be able to obtain a release from Emperor Franz Joseph.

Boston Journal.

FRIDAY, APRIL 21, 1893.

RICHTER CANNOT COME.

That Is, Unless the Emperor Will Personally Release Him.

VIENNA, April 20. The Intendant of the Imperial Opera refuses to release from his contract Hans Richter, who has been called to replace Arthur Nikisch as Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Richter's contract will not expire for several years. He may be able to obtain a release from Emperor Franz Joseph.

[144]

distinguished professors of the University. We shook hands cordially, and as he [illegible]d to me the circumstances of our first meeting, he spoke [illegible] pleasant memories associated with it. "Well," replied I, "it was indeed an experience worth remembering; for you can boast that you were unquestionably the first to hear selections from the 'Meistersinger.'"

WORLD'S COLUMBIAN EXPOSITION.

BUREAU OF MUSIC.

BULLETIN OF CONCERTS TO AUGUST 1.

Corrected to April 1, 1893.

May 2, Tuesday. ....Inaugural concert, Music Hall. Overture, "Consecration of the House," Beethoven; concerto for piano, Paderewski; symphony in B minor, Schubert; piano solos; [illegible] "Die Meistersinger," Wagner. Pianist, Mr. Ignace J. Paderewski.

May 3, Wednesday....Orchestral concert, Music Hall. Symphony, "eroic," allegro con brio; Marche Funèbre, Beethoven; concerto for piano, Schumann; symphonic variations, Dvorák; piano solos; overture, "Romeo and Juliet," Tschaikowsky. Pianist, Mr. Ignace J. Paderewski.

NOTE — By invitation of the musical directors Mr. Paderewski has delayed his return to Europe in order to participate in the opening concerts of the Exposition.

May [illegible]....Orchestral concert, Music Hall. Schubert program. Entr'act from "Rosamunde;" song cycles; symphony in C major.

May 9, Tuesday.....Orchestra concert, Music Hall. Brahms' program. (Brahms born May [illegible], 1833.) Serenade, op. 16; song cycles; symphony No. 4 in E minor.

May 12, Friday.....Orchestral concert, Music Hall. Beethoven program. Overture, "Egmont;" triple concerto for piano, violin and violoncello; symphony No. 5 in C minor. Soloists, Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler, Mr. Max Bendix, Mr. Bruno Steindl.

May 15, Monday.....Boston Symphony Orchestra, Music Hall.

May 16, Tuesday.....Boston Symphony Orchestra, Music Hall.

May 19, Friday.....New York Symphony Orchestra, Music Hall.

May 20, Saturday.....New York Symphony Orchestra, Music Hall,

May 22, Monday.....Kneisel String Quartet, Recital Hall.

May 22, Monday.....Inaugural concert, Festival Hall. Wagner program. (Wagner born May 22, 1813.) Selections from "Tannhäuser" and "Tristan und Isolde" and "Die Götterdämmerung." Soloist, Amalia Materna.

May 23, Tuesday.....Kneisel String Quartet, Recital Hall.

May 23, Tuesday.....Orchestral concert, Music Hall. Program will include concerto for piano and work for orchestra, by E. A. MacDowell. Pianist, Mr. E. A. MacDowell.

May 24, Wednesday...Kneisel String Quartet, Recital Hall.

May 24, Wednesday...Mendelssohn's "Elijah," by Chicago Apollo Club, Festival Hall. Soprano, Lillian Nordica; [illegible], Christine Nielson Dreier; bass, Mr. Plunket Greene, tenor, Mr. [illegible] Mockridge.

May 25, Thursday....Kneisel String Quartet, Recital Hall.

NOTE.—The Kneisel String Quartet program will include a new "Sonata Tragique" for piano and violin, by E. A. MacDowell, and a quartet for piano and [illegible], by Arthur Foote. Pianists, Mr. MacDowell and Mr. Foote.

May 25, Thursday...Haydn's "Creation," by Chicago Columbia Chorus, Festival Hall. Soprano, Lillian Nordica; bass, Mr. Plunket Greene; tenor, Mr. C. A. Knorr.

May 26, Friday.....Exposition Children's Chorus, 1,400 voices, Festival Hall.

May 26, Friday.....Orchestral concert, Music Hall. Raff program. (Raff born May 27, 1822.) Program will include concerto for piano.

May 27, Saturday...Wagner concert, Festival Hall. Soloist, Amalia Materna.

May 30, Tuesday.....Orchestral concert, Music Hall.

[illegible] 9, Friday.....Orchestral concert, Music Hall. Schumann program. (Schumann, born June [illegible], 1810.)

June 12, Monday .....Max Bendix String Quartet, Recital Hall.

June 13, Tuesday.....Max Bendix String Quartet, Recital Hall

June 14, Wednesday...Händel's "The Messiah," by Chicago Apollo Club. Festival Hall.

June 16, Friday.....Bach's "St. Matthew Passion," by Chicago Apollo Club. Festival Hall.

June 20, Tuesday.....Concert by St. Paul and Minneapolis Choral Associations, S. A. Baldwin, conductor, Music Hall.

June 21, Wednesday, June 22, Thursday.. June 23, Friday.....
Festival by First Section of Representative Choral Societies of the Western States. Three concerts in Festival Hall; massed chorus of 1,500; orchestra of 200; organ and eminent soloists.

PROGRAM.

21. "Utrecht Jubilate," Handel. "Saint Paul," first part, Mendelssohn.
22. "A Stronghold Sure," Bach. Selections from "Lohengrin," Wagner.
23. "Judas Maccabæus," Selections, Händel. "Requiem Mass," Selections, Berlioz.

June 24, Saturday.....Performance in Music Hall of Brahms' "A German Requiem," by Cincinnati Festival Association Chorus, Conductor Theodore Thomas.

June 21, Wednesday. June 22, Thursday.. June 23, Friday..... June 24, Saturday ..
Session of representative Women Amateur Musical Clubs of the country, Music Hall.

June 27, Tuesday, Concert by Arion Society, of Brooklyn, N. Y., Arthur Claassen, conductor, Music Hall.

June 28, Wednesday...Händel's "The Messiah," by Chicago Apollo Club, Festival Hall.

June 30, Friday.....Bach's "St. Matthew Passion," by Chicago Apollo Club, Festival Hall.

July 7, Friday ..... July 8, Saturday... July 10, Monday.... July 11, Tuesday, Concerts by New York Liederkranz, Conductor Heinrich Zöllner, Music Hall.

Concert by Cleveland Vocal Society, Conductor Alfred Arthur, Music Hall.

July 12, Wednesday July 13, Thursday... July 14, Friday .....
Festival by Second Section of Representative Choral Societies of the Western States. Three concerts in Festival Hall; massed chorus of 1,500; orchestra of 200; organ and eminent soloists.

PROGRAM.

12. "Utrecht Jubilate," Handel. "Saint Paul," First Part, Mendelssohn.
13. "A Stronghold Sure," Bach. Selections, Wagner.
14. "Judas Maccabæus," Selections, Handel. "Requiem Mass." Selections, Berlioz.

NOTE.—For the Festivals, June 21 to 23, July 12 to 14, and for both performances of "The Messiah" and the "St. Matthew Passion," Edward Lloyd, tenor, of London, has been engaged.

July 15, Saturday.....Concert by Junger Maennerchor, Philadelphia, Music Hall.

July 20, Thursday... July 21, Friday ..... July 22, Saturday...
Festival by American Union of Swedish Societies, Festival Hall.

July 27, Thursday... July 28, Friday.....
Festival by United Scandinavian Societies, Festival Hall.

Following the festival in July of the second section of representative Western choral societies there will be given in Music Hall symphony concerts, including the ninth of Beethoven, and in Festival Hall Wagner concerts conducted by Hans Richter.

September Mr. Camille Saint-Saëns, of Paris, and Dr. A. C. Mackenzie, of London, will be the guests of the Exposition during this month. Concerts under the direction of Dr. Mackenzie will be given during a period of two weeks from Monday, September 11. The programs will include a first performance of his new oratorio, "Bethlehem." Soloists already engaged for this event are Nordica, soprano, and Ben Davies, tenor.

Concerts under the direction of Mr. Saint-Saëns will continue during three weeks from Monday, September 25. The program will include choral and orchestra works. Mr. Saint-Saëns will also take part in chamber music concerts and will also give organ recitals.

NOTE.—The above list represents that portion of the special musical demonstrations for which dates are absolutely fixed. Regular musical features of the entire Exposition period include semi-weekly orchestral concerts in Music Hall, daily popular orchestral concerts in Festival Hall and organ recitals. The daily popular orchestral concerts, free to the public, will begin Tuesday, May 2.

THEODORE THOMAS, Musical Director.

ANNOUNCEMENT.

The musical features of the ceremonies opening the Exposition on May 1 include "Columbus March and Hymn," by Prof. John K. Paine; "In Praise of God," Beethoven, and "Hallelujah Chorus," Händel. The composers to be represented on the program dedicating the Women's Building of the Exposition are: Ingeborg von Bronsart, of Weimar, Germany, march for orchestra; Miss Frances Ellicott, of London, England, dramatic overture; Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, of Boston, Mass., "Jubilate," for mixed voices and orchestra, written for the occasion. A chorus of 1,500 voices, orchestra and military bands will participate in the ceremonies opening the Exposition. A mixed chorus of 300 and orchestra will take part in the program dedicating the Women's Building. The exercises will be held in Music Hall.

More Richter News.

BOSTON, April 16.

A CABLE dispatch from Vienna says that musical circles are agitated over the engagement of Hans Richter by Col. Henry L. Higginson, who has for years backed the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Richter said to a Boston correspondent on Saturday that he should fulfill his contract with Colonel Higginson, signed last Thursday. He said that his Boston contract is that he shall direct two concerts each week, beginning in the early part of next October, and his duties under his new contract will be, he thinks, a great relief after those he has been subjected to here.

The two reasons which have led him to accept Mr. Higginson's offer are, first, a feeling that it will give him a relief from the overwork now imposed upon him at Vienna, which he stands in need of; and second, thorough and sincere admiration for and sympathy with Americans and American ideas. Financially he is so situated that whatever money inducement has been held out by Colonel Higginson would have little or no influence upon his action in the matter. When the correspondent ventured to suggest that he might find obstacles to carrying out his plans from his official associations, he scowled in the way all who have ever played under him will readily remember, and said that he should carry out his contract with Mr. Higginson at any cost. He added, with a smile, that when once in America he expected he should quickly become thoroughly identified with its people, manners and ideas.

Mr. Richter said to the correspondent that his plans had not been changed regarding his Chicago concerts, as a part of the Exposition series. He will leave Vienna early in June and return immediately after a short stay in Chicago to prepare to take his wife and family to Boston, in which city he expects to be established permanently by the middle of next September.

The consternation in art circles in Vienna over Mr. Richter's proposed departure will be apparent from the fact that he directs the choral church service at the Imperial

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCIII, NO. 111.

FRIDAY, APRIL 21, 1893.

HERR RICHTER'S CONTRACT.

His Resignation Is Officially Refused.

He Persists in His Determination to Come to Boston—Vienna Art Circles Greatly Excited—Action of the Opera Directors Formally Announced on Wednesday.

[BY CABLE TO THE BOSTON HERALD.]

VIENNA, April 20, 1893. The musical public of Vienna was startled by an announcement in the official gazette yesterday of the action of the directors of the Grand Opera House, of which Hans Richter is the first musical director, in regard to his contract with them as governing board.

It is in the nature of an official communication which refuses peremptorily to release Herr Richter from his contract and decline to accept his resignation.

His contract continues four years longer, and the action of the directors puts Herr Richter in an embarrassing position.

Speculation is rife here as to what action the directors and the government will take toward Herr Richter. He has, however, left no chance for any question as to his own action, as he boldly asserts his determination to comply with the terms of his Boston contract as cabled on Saturday last.

The outcome of the action of the directors is awaited with intense interest here.

Boston Daily Globe.

FRIDAY, APRIL 21.

RICHTER REFUSED A RELEASE.

Intendant of the Imperial Opera Will Hold Him to His Contract Unless the Emperor Interferes.

VIENNA, April 20.—The intendant of the Imperial Opera refuses to release from his contract Hans Richter, who has been called to replace Arthur Nikish as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra. Richter's contract will not expire for several years. He may be able to obtain a release from Emperor Franz Joseph.

Boston Journal.

FRIDAY, APRIL 21, 1893.

RICHTER CANNOT COME.

That is, Unless the Emperor Will Personally Release Him.

VIENNA, April 20. The Intendant of the Imperial Opera refuses to release from his contract Hans Richter, who has been called to replace Arthur Nikisch as Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Richter's contract will not expire for several years. He may be able to obtain a release from Emperor Franz Joseph.

[144]

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, APRIL 22, 1893.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Readings of the "Manfred" and "Oberon" overtures, excellent in technique, clear in intention and fine in spirit began and ended the twenty-second Symphony concert. Between these were placed two other numbers. The one was Brahms's D-major violin concerto, of which the solo part was taken by Mr. Kneisel, who delivered it with that perfect purity of tone, elegance of phrase, grace and elaboration of art and refinement of sentiment which have won him his eminent place among the violinists of the country. If one sometimes wishes for greater volume of sound or more ardor of rendering, one is quick to put the wish aside, lest these should be bought at the sacrifice of some grain of the limpidity, beauty and symmetry of his style. The fashion of the concerto admits an original cadenza, and Mr. Kneisel supplied one which was marvelously well constructed for displaying virtuosity and for preserving a proper correspondence between itself and the main work. The other number was a "Symphonic Tone Poem," played from the manuscript of its composer, Mr. F. B. Busoni. Symphonic it certainly is not, unless in size and in extent of scoring, for it has no asserted themes and no thematic development. A study in the possibilities of orchestral tones and colors, it is unquestionably; but whether or not that be a poem which rambles on aimlessly through mazes of clever and agreeable combination, may be doubted. The work displays an almost exhaustive knowledge of the scheme and possibility of instruments, and the different families and individuals are added, subtracted, divided and apparently multiplied into almost endless modulations and effects. Mr. Busoni may say that his title protects him and that he only desired what could be made of the many-voiced modern band, with its ponderous basses, its harp, its bells, cymbals and big drums. But conceding this, one cannot help asking if it be worth while to take so much trouble to work and frame a mere sampler, and if Mr. Nikisch could not have found something better—even of domestic fabrication, if that were necessary—to occupy the place. Mr. Kneisel was heard with delight, and recalled several times impulsively and strongly; Mr. Busoni's piece fell flat, and was followed by silence. A Wagner programme is announced for tonight, and the vocal parts will be undertaken by Miss Kaschoska, Miss Leimer, Mrs. Nikisch and Mr. Meyn.

LE MONDE

MONTREAL, 19 AVRIL

La Boston Symphony Orchestra

L'Académie de Musique sera le théâtre d'un grand concert le 1er mai. C'est le fameux Boston Symphony Orchestra qui le donnera. C'est la première fois que ce corps de 70 artistes paraîtra à Montréal.

Paderewiski ne craint pas de comparer cet orchestre à celui du Conservatoire de Paris.

Avec l'orchestre paraissent Mme Kaschoska et le célèbre Alvin Schrœder.

Le programme sera long, varié et contiendra nombre de partitions qui ont fait accourir en foule les dilettanti aux concerts donnés à Boston et à New-York.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.
SATURDAY MORNING, APRIL 22, '93.

NOT COMING.

Hans Richter Cancels His Boston Engagement

TO SUCCEED MR. NIKISCH.

He Has Cabled to This City to That Effect, and the Symphony Orchestra Is Without a Leader.

VIENNA, April 21.—Hans Richter has cabled to Boston that he has decided to remain in this city, and therefore must cancel his engagement to replace Arthur Nikisch as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Boston Journal.

TEN PAGES.

SATURDAY, APRIL 22, 1893.

HANS RICHTER NOT COMING.

VIENNA, April 21. Hans Richter has cabled to Boston that he has decided to remain in this city, and therefore must cancel his engagement to replace Arthur Nikisch as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCIII, NO. 112.

SATURDAY, APRIL 22, 1893.

VIENNA LOVES HERR RICHTER.

And It Will Have Him for the Term of His Contract.

The Eminent Musician Greatly Regrets That He Cannot Come to Boston—The Emperor Will Not Release Him and He Will Not Break His Contract.

[BY CABLE TO THE BOSTON HERALD.]

VIENNA, April 21, 1893. I have just seen Hans Richter. He is filled with the deepest regret at his inability to accept the leadership of Boston's famous Symphony orchestra, but tells me that he sees no way out of the difficulty; he must stay in Vienna four years longer, as Emperor Francis Joseph himself has said that he shall not be released. Herr Richter adds that he cannot go to Boston as one who broke his contract.

With regard to the Chicago concerts no decision has been arrived at, but it is certain that the authorities will make it easy for Richter now that he has made up his mind to stay.

I have learned that the Boston contract contained a clause stipulating that it was not to be valid unless Richter obtained his release from the Vienna engagement. As this cannot be brought about, the Boston contract is, of course, inoperative.

Boston Daily Globe.

SATURDAY, APRIL 22.

HANS RICHTER WILL NOT COME.

He Cables to Boston That He Has Decided Not to Replace Arthur Nikisch as Conductor of the Symphonies.

VIENNA, April 21.—Hans Richter has cabled to Boston that he has decided to remain in this city, and therefore must cancel his engagement to replace Arthur Nikisch as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.

SATURDAY MORNING, APRIL 22, 1893.

RICHTER CANNOT COME.

SO THE GREAT ORCHESTRAL LEADER CABLES THIS CITY.

The Symphony Orchestra Must Look Elsewhere for a Conductor.

VIENNA, April 21. — Hans Richter has cabled to Boston that he has decided to remain in this city, and therefore must cancel his engagement to replace Arthur Nikisch as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

BOSTON HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, APRIL 22,

So Richter is really coming! The rumor, I notice, was first mentioned in the columns of this paper, regardless of the fact that a daily is claiming great credit for first discovering it two days after its publication here, and probably that length of time after copying it. But everybody wants to be first and makes great claims to it whenever anything happens. As I did not announce it I am out of the race.

Mr. Higginson denied that Richter had been engaged, and no doubt it was so, for he was not engaged until more than a week later. But the statement that Richter by coming here would lose the pension which was so nearly within his grasp most effectually settled the rumor for the time being. However, it is probable that he can save enough from his $10,000 salary while here to more than make up for the loss of his pension after his return.

I note one peculiar thing about an interview with him recently published, which is to the effect that one of the reasons for his coming is that he will get a relief from the overwork to which he has been subjected in Vienna. As Nikisch gave as his reason for resigning here that he would get a relief from overwork by going abroad again, it seems as though somebody is liable to be mistaken.

Richter announces that he expects to settle here in Boston with his family, and that he will quickly become thoroughly identified with our people, customs, manners and ideas. This is the proper spirit, and on the other hand it is fair to say, and I think none will disagree, that Boston will extend to him a hearty welcome and make him feel at home among us.

Certainly it will be a big thing for Boston musically. It will give us the foremost conductor of the world, and we now have the five leading composers of America in E. A. MacDowell, Prof. Paine, George Chadwick, Arthur Foote and Horatio Parker. If we only had a few more eminent soloists now, instrumental and vocal, Boston would be undoubtedly pre-eminent. We have some, of course, but "it takes more than one swallow to make a spring."

WAGNER AND RICHTER.

THE CONDUCTOR'S REMINISCENCES OF THE COMPOSER.

IN VIEW OF THE PROBABLE coming to Boston of Dr. Hans Richter the following incidents of his acquaintance with Wagner, as told to a contributor to the "Guide Musical," will be of interest. The famous conductor, it will be remembered, after fulfilling a long engagement as a horn player at the Kärtnerthor Theater in Vienna, was recommended by Esser to Wagner, then in need of a copyist, and proceeded to Triebschen, near Lucerne, where he spent upward of a year (October, 1866—December, 1867) under his roof and made the first fair copy of the "Meistersinger." Of his early experiences Dr. Richter speaks as follows:—"I was installed in a room on the upper story of the villa, and during the first three months of my sojourn lived there absolutely alone, taking even my meals in solitude. Wagner's study was just under my room, and there he worked, as a rule, all the morning without interruption. He was then engaged on the 'Meistersinger,' and when he had finished a page of the score he used to bring it to me himself, often with the ink still wet, and I, in my turn, set to work to copy it immediately.

"In the afternoon, after the midday meal, which was regularly served at one o'clock, I was with equal regularity expected to accompany Wagner on his walk, which always lasted several hours. On these walks Wagner generally appeared to be deeply absorbed and did not speak. I imagine that he was still engaged in composition. However, he insisted that I should always accompany him. At that time I was still extremely shy and reserved, with little experience of the ways of society, but as these walks were to a certain extent part of my duty I fancied that it was obligatory upon me to entertain the master who strode silently by my side. Goodness knows what tortures I underwent in my efforts to find subjects likely to interest him. I positively trembled as I started the dialogue on the spur of the moment. One day, shortly after my arrival—it was, I think, our second or third walk—I thought I had hit upon a capital subject and ventured to sound Wagner upon his own works. 'Can you tell me, Herr Wagner, which opera you prefer, "Tannhaeuser" or "Tristan?"' Wagner burst into a loud fit of laughter, and replied, 'How can you ask me such a silly question?' That was all his answer, and the conversation ended there. From that day I never ventured to break silence unless Wagner gave me the lead, so that our walks became more silent than ever."

Being asked whether Wagner ever consulted him on the use of the different instruments, Dr. Richter replied:—

"No. On this point Wagner had no need of advice. He was better informed than any one else. On one single occasion, however, he came up to my room with a page of his score, still unblotted, and pointing out a passage, said:—'Do you think this phrase can be performed on the horn at so rapid a tempo? Isn't it too difficult?' The passage in question is in the finale of the second act of the 'Meistersinger,' where the horn takes up the theme of Beckmesser's 'Serenade.' I examined the passage and reassured him immediately. 'Certainly it can be played, but it will sound very queer and nasal.' 'Capital!' cried Wagner; 'that's exactly what I meant it to be. It is sure to have a comic effect.' And accordingly I had to take my horn and play the passage over several times. Wagner was overjoyed; the effect was exactly what he had intended. I had brought my horn with me from Vienna and in the summer evenings I used to take a boat and row off to a little islet opposite the villa, where, ensconced in the long grass and undergrowth, I would play on my favorite instrument till I was out of breath. Next day Wagner would question me:—

"'I say, Richter, what were you playing yesterday evening?'

"'Well, Meister,' I would reply, 'it was a passage from the "Meistersinger,"' and Wagner would smile and appear delighted.

"Finally, on Christmas Day, after I had been nearly three months in his house, I was invited for the first time and presented to Mme. Cosima Wagner. From that day onward I was treated like one of the household and dined every day and spent every evening in the family circle. Every evening Wagner used to read aloud. At that date the stories of Hoffman were in great favor, and Wagner read them incomparably with the utmost animation. In this connection I remember that when 'Tristan' was first put in rehearsal at Vienna in 1862 Wagner came one day to read his poem to the artists in order to enable them to enter into the spirit of the work. Some of them afterward declared that if Wagner had devoted himself to the histrionic career he would certainly have become the most remarkable actor of his time. He accompanied his reading with a wealth of gesture and of facial play which, to quote the words of the artists of the Burg Theater, while betraying his complete ignorance of the tricks of the trade, nevertheless revealed an extraordinary talent for diction and representation. I have mentioned that Wagner's workroom, where he was engaged on the score of the 'Meistersinger,' was exactly underneath the room which I occupied in his house. During the thirteen months which I spent at Triebschen I can positively state that I never once heard the sound of the piano in his room. This shows that when composing or noting down his ideas he was never in the habit of trying how it would sound on the pianoforte."

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, APRIL 23, 1893.

HANS RICHTER COMING.

[From the Musical Courier.]

This is indeed news of tremendous musical significance. There seems to be little doubt about it, although the final contract has not yet been signed. Hans Richter, the greatest of living conductors, greatest in the sense of versatility, all schools being alike familiar to him, director of the Royal Opera in Vienna, will come to this country to take command of the Boston Symphony orchestra, which position the present incumbent, Arthur Nikisch, has just resigned.

Richter is a tremendous force in music in Europe, and his advent here cannot fail being of the greatest import to musical memory. While other conductors are specialists, this Hungarian is an eclectic. His personality is powerful and his practical knowledge of the orchestra—for he plays many instruments, his long and varied experience and superb musical temperament, really rank him as the greatest conductor alive. So at least he is regarded in Europe. That he will find a remarkably trained and sympathetic organization in Boston's famous band goes without saying.

Hans was born on April 4, 1843, at Raab, in Hungary, where his father was capellmeister of the cathedral. His mother, Mrs. Richter von Innfeld, formerly a distinguished soprano singer, afterward taught singing in Vienna.

At an early age he joined the choir of the court chapel in Vienna, and in 1859 entered the Conservatorium. He was with Wagner at Lucerne in 1867, and there made the first fair copy of the score of "Die Meistersinger." He accepted the post of conductor of the Hof und National theatre, Munich, in 1868; he afterward visited Paris and Brussels, where he produced "Lohengrin" in 1870; he became chief conductor of the National theatre at Pesth in 1871; and in 1876 succeeded Herbeck as director of the Court Opera theatre. He directed all the rehearsals and performances of the Bayreuth festival in 1876. He conducted important orchestral concerts in London in the summers of 1879, 1880 and 1881, which excited much attention, chiefly for his knowledge of the scores of Beethoven's symphonies and other large works, which he conducted without book.

[145]

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, APRIL 22, 1893.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Readings of the "Manfred" and "Oberon" overtures, excellent in technique, clear in intention and fine in spirit began and ended the twenty-second Symphony concert. Between these were placed two other numbers. The one was Brahms's D-major violin concerto, of which the solo part was taken by Mr. Kneisel, who delivered it with that perfect purity of tone, elegance of phrase, grace and elaboration of art and refinement of sentiment which have won him his eminent place among the violinists of the country. If one sometimes wishes for greater volume of sound or more ardor of rendering, one is quick to put the wish aside, lest these should be bought at the sacrifice of some grain of the limpidity, beauty and symmetry of his style. The fashion of the concerto admits an original cadenza, and Mr. Kneisel supplied one which was marvellously well constructed for displaying virtuosity and for preserving a proper correspondence between itself and the main work. The other number was a "Symphonic Tone Poem," played from the manuscript of its composer, Mr. F. B. Busoni. Symphonic it certainly is not, unless in size and in extent of scoring, for it has no asserted themes and no thematic development. A study in the possibilities of orchestral tones and colors, it is unquestionably; but whether or not that be a poem which rambles on aimlessly through mazes of clever and agreeable combination, may be doubted. The work displays an almost exhaustive knowledge of the scheme and possibility of instruments, and the different families and individuals are added, subtracted, divided and apparently multiplied into almost endless modulations and effects. Mr. Busoni may say that his title protects him and that he only desired what could be made of the many-voiced modern band, with its ponderous basses, its harp, its bells, cymbals and big drums. But conceding this, one cannot help asking if it be worth while to take so much trouble to work and frame a mere sampler, and if Mr. Nikisch could not have found something better—even of domestic fabrication, if that were necessary—to occupy the place. Mr. Kneisel was heard with delight, and recalled several times impulsively and strongly; Mr. Busoni's piece fell flat, and was followed by silence. A Wagner programme is announced for tonight, and the vocal parts will be undertaken by Miss Kaschoska, Miss Leimer, Mrs. Nikisch and Mr. Meyn.

LE MONDE

MONTREAL, 19 AVRIL

La Boston Symphony Orchestra

L'Académie de Musique sera le théâtre d'un grand concert le 1er mai. C'est le fameux Boston Symphony Orchestra qui le donnera. C'est la première fois que ce corps de 70 artistes paraîtra à Montréal.

Paderewiski ne craint pas de comparer cet orchestre à celui du Conservatoire de Paris.

Avec l'orchestre paraissent Mme Kaschoska et le célèbre Alvin Schrœder.

Le programme sera long, varié et contiendra nombre de partitions qui ont fait accourir en foule les dilettanti aux concerts donnés à Boston et à New-York.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

SATURDAY MORNING, APRIL 22, '93.

NOT COMING.

Hans Richter Cancels His Boston Engagement

TO SUCCEED MR. NIKISCH.

He Has Cabled to This City to That Effect, and the Symphony Orchestra Is Without a Leader.

VIENNA, April 21.—Hans Richter has cabled to Boston that he has decided to remain in this city, and therefore must cancel his engagement to replace Arthur Nikisch as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Boston Journal.

TEN PAGES.

SATURDAY, APRIL 22, 1893.

HANS RICHTER NOT COMING.

VIENNA, April 21. Hans Richter has cabled to Boston that he has decided to remain in this city, and therefore must cancel his engagement to replace Arthur Nikisch as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCIII, NO. 112.

SATURDAY, APRIL 22, 1893.

VIENNA LOVES HERR RICHTER.

And It Will Have Him for the Term of His Contract.

The Eminent Musician Greatly Regrets That He Cannot Come to Boston—The Emperor Will Not Release Him and He Will Not Break His Contract.

[BY CABLE TO THE BOSTON HERALD.]

VIENNA, April 21, 1893. I have just seen Hans Richter. He is filled with the deepest regret at his inability to accept the leadership of Boston's famous Symphony orchestra, but tells me that he sees no way out of the difficulty; he must stay in Vienna four years longer, as Emperor Francis Joseph himself has said that he shall not be released. Herr Richter adds that he cannot go to Boston as one who broke his contract.

With regard to the Chicago concerts no decision has been arrived at, but it is certain that the authorities will make it easy for Richter now that he has made up his mind to stay.

I have learned that the Boston contract contained a clause stipulating that it was not to be valid unless Richter obtained his release from the Vienna engagement. As this cannot be brought about, the Boston contract is, of course, inoperative.

Boston Daily Globe.

SATURDAY, APRIL 22.

HANS RICHTER WILL NOT COME.

He Cables to Boston That He Has Decided Not to Replace Arthur Nikisch as Conductor of the Symphonies.

VIENNA, April 21.—Hans Richter has cabled to Boston that he has decided to remain in this city, and therefore must cancel his engagement to replace Arthur Nikisch as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

SATURDAY MORNING, APRIL 22, 1893.

RICHTER CANNOT COME.

SO THE GREAT ORCHESTRAL LEADER CABLES THIS CITY.

The Symphony Orchestra Must Look Elsewhere for a Conductor.

VIENNA, April 21.—Hans Richter has cabled to Boston that he has decided to remain in this city, and therefore must cancel his engagement to replace Arthur Nikisch as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

BOSTON HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, APRIL 22,

So Richter is really coming? The rumor, I notice, was first mentioned in the columns of this paper, regardless of the fact that a daily is claiming great credit for first discovering it two days after its publication here, and probably that length of time after copying it. But everybody wants to be first and makes great claims to it whenever anything happens. As I did not announce it I am out of the race.

Mr. Higginson denied that Richter had been engaged, and no doubt it was so, for he was not engaged until more than a week later. But the statement that Richter by coming here would lose the pension which was so nearly within his grasp most effectually settled the rumor for the time being. However, it is probable that he can save enough from his $10,000 salary while here to more than make up for the loss of his pension after his return.

I note one peculiar thing about an interview with him recently published, which is to the effect that one of the reasons for his coming is that he will get a relief from the overwork to which he has been subjected in Vienna. As Nikisch gave as his reason for resigning here that he would get a relief from overwork by going abroad again, it seems as though somebody is liable to be mistaken.

Richter announces that he expects to settle here in Boston with his family, and that he will quickly become thoroughly identified with our people, customs, manners and ideas. This is the proper spirit, and on the other hand it is fair to say, and I think none will disagree, that Boston will extend to him a hearty welcome and make him feel at home among us.

Certainly it will be a big thing for Boston musically. It will give us the foremost conductor of the world, and we now have the five leading composers of America in E. A. MacDowell, Prof. Paine, George Chadwick, Arthur Foote and Horatio Parker. If we only had a few more eminent soloists now, instrumental and vocal, Boston would be undoubtedly pre-eminent. We have some, of course, but "it takes more than one swallow to make a spring."

WAGNER AND RICHTER.

THE CONDUCTOR'S REMINISCENCES OF THE COMPOSER.

IN VIEW OF THE PROBABLE coming to Boston of Dr. Hans Richter the following incidents of his acquaintance with Wagner, as told to a contributor to the "Guide Musical," will be of interest. The famous conductor, it will be remembered, after fulfilling a long engagement as a horn player at the Kärtnerthor Theater in Vienna, was recommended by Esser to Wagner, then in need of a copyist, and proceeded to Triebschen, near Lucerne, where he spent upward of a year (October, 1866—December, 1867) under his roof and made the first fair copy of the "Meistersinger." Of his early experiences Dr. Richter speaks as follows:—"I was installed in a room on the upper story of the villa, and during the first three months of my sojourn lived there absolutely alone, taking even my meals in solitude. Wagner's study was just under my room, and there he worked, as a rule, all the morning without interruption. He was then engaged on the 'Meistersinger,' and when he had finished a page of the score he used to bring it to me himself, often with the ink still wet, and I, in my turn, set to work to copy it immediately.

"In the afternoon, after the midday meal, which was regularly served at one o'clock, I was with equal regularity expected to accompany Wagner on his walk, which always lasted several hours. On these walks Wagner generally appeared to be deeply absorbed and did not speak. I imagine that he was still engaged in composition. However, he insisted that I should always accompany him. At that time I was still extremely shy and reserved, with little experience of the ways of society, but as these walks were to a certain extent part of my duty I fancied that it was obligatory upon me to entertain the master who strode silently by my side. Goodness knows what tortures I underwent in my efforts to find subjects likely to interest him. I positively trembled as I started the dialogue on the spur of the moment. One day, shortly after my arrival—it was, I think, our second or third walk—I thought I had hit upon a capital subject and ventured to sound Wagner upon his own works. 'Can you tell me, Herr Wagner, which opera you prefer, "Tannhaeuser" or "Tristan?"' Wagner burst into a loud fit of laughter, and replied, 'How can you ask me such a silly question?' That was all his answer, and the conversation ended there. From that day I never ventured to break silence unless Wagner gave me the lead, so that our walks became more silent than ever."

Being asked whether Wagner ever consulted him on the use of the different instruments, Dr. Richter replied:—

"No. On this point Wagner had no need of advice. He was better informed than any one else. On one single occasion, however, he came up to my room with a page of his score, still unblotted, and pointing out a passage, said:—'Do you think this phrase can be performed on the horn at so rapid a tempo? Isn't it too difficult?' The passage in question is in the finale of the second act of the 'Meistersinger,' where the horn takes up the theme of Beckmesser's 'Serenade.' I examined the passage and reassured him immediately. 'Certainly it can be played, but it will sound very queer and nasal.' 'Capital!' cried Wagner; 'that's exactly what I meant it to be. It is sure to have a comic effect.' And accordingly I had to take my horn and play the passage over several times. Wagner was overjoyed; the effect was exactly what he had intended. I had brought my horn with me from Vienna and in the summer evenings I used to take a boat and row off to a little islet opposite the villa, where, ensconced in the long grass and undergrowth, I would play on my favorite instrument till I was out of breath. Next day Wagner would question me:—

"'I say, Richter, what were you playiug yesterday evening?'

"'Well, Meister,' I would reply, 'it was a passage from the "Meistersinger,"' and Wagner would smile and appear delighted.

"Finally, on Christmas Day, after I had been nearly three months in his house, I was invited for the first time and presented to Mme. Cosima Wagner. From that day onward I was treated like one of the household and dined every day and spent every evening in the family circle. Every evening Wagner used to read aloud. At that date the stories of Hoffman were in great favor, and Wagner read them incomparably with the utmost animation. In this connection I remember that when 'Tristan' was first put in rehearsal at Vienna in 1862 Wagner came one day to read his poem to the artists in order to enable them to enter into the spirit of the work. Some of them afterward declared that if Wagner had devoted himself to the histrionic career he would certainly have become the most remarkable actor of his time. He accompanied his reading with a wealth of gesture and of facial play which, to quote the words of the artists of the Burg Theater, while betraying his complete ignorance of the tricks of the trade, nevertheless revealed an extraordinary talent for diction and representation. I have mentioned that Wagner's workroom, where he was engaged on the score of the 'Meistersinger,' was exactly underneath the room which I occupied in his house. During the thirteen months which I spent at Triebschen I can positively state that I never once heard the sound of the piano in his room. This shows that when composing or noting down his ideas he was never in the habit of trying how it would sound on the pianoforte."

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, APRIL 23, 1893.

HANS RICHTER COMING.

[From the Musical Courier.]

This is indeed news of tremendous musical significance. There seems to be little doubt about it, although the final contract has not yet been signed. Hans Richter, the greatest of living conductors, greatest in the sense of versatility, all schools being alike familiar to him, director of the Royal Opera in Vienna, will come to this country to take command of the Boston Symphony orchestra, which position the present incumbent, Arthur Nikisch, has just resigned.

Richter is a tremendous force in music in Europe, and his advent here cannot fail being of the greatest import to musical memory. While other conductors are specialists, this Hungarian is an eclectic. His personality is powerful and his practical knowledge of the orchestra—for he plays many instruments, his long and varied experience and superb musical temperament, really rank him as the greatest conductor alive. So at least he is regarded in Europe. That he will find a remarkably trained and sympathetic organization in Boston's famous band goes without saying.

Hans was born on April 4, 1843, at Raab, in Hungary, where his father was capellmeister of the cathedral. His mother, Mrs. Richter von Innfeld, formerly a distinguished soprano singer, afterward taught singing in Vienna.

At an early age he joined the choir of the court chapel in Vienna, and in 1859 entered the Conservatorium. He was with Wagner at Lucerne in 1867, and there made the first fair copy of the score of "Die Meistersinger." He accepted the post of conductor of the Hof und National theatre, Munich, in 1868; he afterward visited Paris and Brussels, where he produced "Lohengrin" in 1870; he became chief conductor of the National theatre at Pesth in 1871; and in 1876 succeeded Herbeck as director of the Court Opera theatre. He directed all the rehearsals and performances of the Bayreuth festival in 1876. He conducted important orchestral concerts in London in the summers of 1879, 1880 and 1881, which excited much attention, chiefly for his knowledge of the scores of Beethoven's symphonies and other large works, which he conducted without book.

[145]

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 23, 1893.

TWENTY-THIRD CONCERT BY THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

No symphony concert was given in Music Hall last evening, but instead a Richard Wagner programme was performed by the orchestra, with Miss Felicia Kaschoska, Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, Miss Louise Leimer and Mr. Henrich Meyn as soloists. The works chosen were the overture to Rienzi in D major; prelude to Act III, Dance of Apprentices, March of the Mastersingers, and Homage to Hans Sach, from the Master-singers of Nuremberg; Prelude and First Scene from Das Rheingold (the Rheindaughters and Alberich) Woglinde,—Miss Kaschoska; Wellgunde,—Mrs. Nikisch; Flosshilde,—Miss Leimer; and Alberich,—Mr. Meyn; Siegfried passing through the fire, from "Siegfried," Act III; Scene 2, and Morning Dawn, also Siegfried's Voyage Up the Rhine, from Gotterdaemmerung, Act III, Scene 2; Bruennhilde's speech over Siegfried's body, from Gotterdaemmerung, Act III, Scene III.

The artistic necessity of interpolating this repertoire in a course of symphony concerts, and devoting the entire evening to a composer who was confessedly incapable of composing even a respectable symphony, and who ignominiously failed in his attempt in this line—the precise raison d'etre of this Wagnerian intrusion was by no means apparent. Perhaps the very worst feature of the concert was the first scene from "Das Rheingold," which is probably as insincere as charlatanic a piece of writing as ever emanated from a composer's pen. No wonder that Richard Wagner's so-called art work as it manifests itself in his latest manner has been renounced and denounced by nearly every composer and musician of world renowned importance, including Brahms and Rheinberger. Wagner, the composer of the beautiful overtures to Rienzi and Tannhauser, of the prelude to the third actof the master singers, etc., was well nigh pre-eminently a man of genius. As the hireling of King Ludwig the vile, the great composer preferred to develop into a musical monstrosity of the rankest kind.

Of the performances last evening, it is a pleasure to acknowledge that conductor Nikisch was in his element and that it was again in evidence that as a conductor of dramatic music, pure and simple, he has but few peers.

Of the soloists, Mrs. Nikisch was at a cruel disadvantage and both she and Miss Louise Leimer, who has a very uninteresting voice were manifestly overweighted by the technical difficulties of the first scene fsom Das Rheingold. Miss Kraschoska with her charming voice sang admirably, and Mr. Meyn's singing was characterized by an uncommonly broad and pure style. The orchestral playing throughout the concert was simply noble.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 23.

The Symphony Concert.

Last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was devoted wholly to Wagner. The programme was: Overture, "Rienzi;" Prelude to Act III. of "The Mastersingers;" Prelude and first scene from "The Rhinegold;" "Passing through the Fire," from "Siegfried," and "Morning Dawn and Siegfried's Voyage;" Siegfried's Funeral March, and Brunhilde's Dying Speech, from "The Twilight of the Gods." In the Rhinegold scene, the singers were Miss Felicia Kaschoska, Mrs. A. Nickish, Miss Louise Leimer and Mr. H. Meyn. Brunhilde's Lament was sung by Miss Kaschoska. It was a long and rather monotonous, not to say wearisome, programme. Again was it emphasized that Wagner's music needs the scenic surroundings and the stage action for which it was written, to make it effective in the hearing. The "Rienzi" overture was given with splendid brilliancy and vigor, and in its climax with immense effectiveness. It is in music of this operatic nature that the conductor is always at home, and his reading of the overture was one of his genuine successes of the season. Both conductor and orchestra were at their very best through the concert. The singing in "The Rhinegold" was not always as tuneful as it might have been, but it was never lacking in energy or clearness. The singers have little else to do than to shout. Style, color and expression were wholly out of the question. That is all in the orchestra, and if the singers make themselves heard, they do nearly all that is required of them. Miss Kaschoska has a large and admirable voice, and she sings with ease and fire. In the Brunhilde scene she declaimed her music finely. We should like to hear her when she is called upon to do something more than scream, for she made it plain that she is an artist of excellent gifts. The audience was large and enthusiastic, but its warmest and most prolonged applause was called forth by the "Rienzi" overture. For the next and last concert of the season, the programme is: Symphony, No. 1, in D-minor, Mozart; unfinished Symphony, Schubert; "Eroica" Symphony, Beethoven.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 24, 1893.

The twenty-third symphony concert in Music Hall last Saturday was styled a Wagner programme, all the selections being from that great composer, and included overture to "Rienzi," prelude to Act III. from "The Meistersingers of Nuremberg," the dance of the apprentices, march of the meistersingers and homage to Hans Sachs; prelude and first scene from "Das Reingold," selection from "Siegfried," act three, and "Gotterdammerung" prologue, arranged by Hans Richter, also from the same opera Siegfried's funeral march and Bruennhilde's dying speech over Siegfried's body. The orchestra did some highly creditable work, assisted by the following vocal soloists: Miss Felicia Kaschoska, Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, Miss Louise Leimar, Mr. Henrich Meyer, who did some excellent work and interpreted the scenes with intelligence and expression and were heartily applauded. The next and last rehearsal and concert will take place next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

[146]

Boston Journal.

FIFTY PAGES.

MONDAY, APRIL 24, 1893.

The Twenty-third Concert of the Symphony Orchestra.

The Opinions of Many Sages Concerning German Singers.

A Pleasing Unanimity of a Cloud of Witnesses.

The programme of the 23d Symphony concert was made up of selections from the works of Wagner. It was as follows:

Overture, "Rienzi."
Prelude to Act III., Dance of Apprentices, March of the Master-singers, and Homage to Hans Sachs, from "The Master-singers of Nuremberg."
Prelude and first scene from "Das Rheingold."
(The Rhine-daughters and Alberich.)
Woglinde.....Miss Felicia Kaschoska.
Wellgunde.....Mrs. Arthur Nikisch.
Flosshilde.....Miss Louise Leimer.
Alberich.....Mr. Heinrich Meyn.
Siegfried Passing through the Fire, from "Siegfried," Act III., Scene 2, and Morning Dawn, and Siegfried's Voyage up the Rhine, from "Gœtterdæmmerung," Prologue.
(Arranged by Hans Richter.)
Siegfried's Funeral March, from "Gœtterdæmmerung." Act III., Scene 2.
Bruennhilde's Dying Speech over Siegfried's Body, from "Gœtterdæmmerung," Act III., Scene 3.
Bruennhilde.....Miss Kaschoska.

***

These numbers were applauded heartily by a large audience.

The performance of the instrumental numbers was brilliant and the applause was well deserved.

***

Wagner in his later years rejected "Rienzi." His most devoted disciples do not speak of this "error of youth," or they condemn it as the abomination of desolation mentioned by the Hebrew prophet.

In truth the overture is a vulgar thing.

Its pomp smells of sawdust; its glory is the glory of paint and tinsel.

This circus-overture provoked, Saturday evening, a scene of tumultuous joy.

***

The Wagner of early years was anxious for the proper and peculiar performance of his music-dramas.

The Wagner of later years was anxious for the performance of his works, even on the concert stage, without scenic accessories.

Hence these excerpts for concert use.

Hence this wearisome concert arrangement of the prelude and first scene from "Das Rheingold."

In a concert arrangement the famous pedal is without force or meaning.

The Rhine Daughters swim only in the imagination of the hearer; their concert dress is hardly suitable for aquatic frolics.

For they are on the concert stage, not in a stage aquarium.

They shriek out spasmodically "Weia! Waga! Wallala weila weia!"

When they are tired of this amusement they refresh themselves by remarking in a loud voice, "Lalaleia! Lalei! Heia! Haha!"

They also exclaim "Heiahahei!"

Thus they bear their part in the exhibition of Wagnerian dramatic truth.

***

When the operas of Wagner were prepared for performance in Italy Wagner insisted that they should be sung in Italian.

He believed that opera should be sung in the language of the country of the performance.

We are obliged in a symphony concert to listen to the German language.

The German language is the fashionable speech of our concert halls.

The Germans did not invent the sonata or the cantata, the symphony or the madrigal, the opera or the oratorio.

The Netherlanders and the Italians rejoiced in musical masterpieces before music was cultivated intelligently in Germany.

It is, however, the popular impression in this city that music was invented by the Germans and will die with that people.

***

Our own singers, born here and known to us, give pleasure in strange lands to foreign audiences.

We import for our own use German declaimers, who, too often, are known in their own country as "veterans of song."

Now, a veteran of song is not unlike an "old war-horse of Democracy:" he is cheered frantically when he appears on the platform, but no one really listens to him, for he is apt to mumble, by reason of age and dental imperfections.

***

And what, pray, is the sentence pronounced by many judges of different nations and of different centuries on German singers, even when they are young and fresh, on the German tongue and on German vocal art?

***

The characteristics of German singing have remained unchanged from the beginning.

Hearken unto Tacitus:

"Amongst them, too, are found that kind of verses, by the recital of which (by them called Barding) they inspire bravery; nay, by such chanting itself they divine the success of the approaching fight.

"Nor does what they utter so much seem to be singing, as the voice and exertion of valor.

"They chiefly study a tone fierce and harsh, with a broken and unequal murmur; and therefore apply their shields to their mouths when the voice may, by rebounding, swell with greater fullness and force."

***

Centuries ago Johannes Diacornus, the biographer of Gregory, complained of the inability of the Germans to sing the Gregorian song in its purity.

"Their rough voices, roaring like thunder, do not lend themselves to agreeable modulation, because their hoarse throats, accustomed to strong drink, do not allow that suppleness which pleasing melodies require, so that their horror-inspiring voices bring forth tones which sound like the rumbling of a freight wagon going down hill."

***

Charles V., Emperor and King of Spain, used to say that he would address women in Italian; to men he would speak French; to his horses German; but that if he were to speak to God he would employ the Spanish language.

This monarch smiled when Petrus Rovzius, the poet, said to John Langus, as they all sat merrily at meat, "The Germans don't speak, but they thunder; and it is my opinion that God made use of their language when he thundered forth the sentence of condemnation on Adam."

***

It was James Howel who wrote concerning German: "A full-mouthed Language she is, and pronounc'd with that strength as if one had Bones in his Tongue instead of Nerfs."

***

Frederick the Great, to whom all loyal Germans still point with pride, loved dearly the mellifluous voices of Italians, and exclaimed that he would rather listen to an air whinnied by his horse than have a German prima donna in his opera house.

Weber [illegible] part in "Oberon," [illegible] singers who took had excellent voices, sang with expression and had been skillfully trained in the Italian school.

***

Schopenhauer claims that the truly national characteristic of the Germans is "heaviness."

"Heaviness is conspicuous in their gait; in their manner of being and acting; in their talk, set speech, literature, fashion of understanding and reflecting; and above all in their style."

***

Let Karl August Alfred, Freiherr von Wolzogen take the witness stand.

He was Intendant of the Court Theatre in Schwerin.

He wrote on musical subjects.

By an irony of Fate, his son Hans turned out to be a fanatical worshiper of Wagner; and he wrote pamphlets that serve as a Baedeker to the traveler through the mist enveloped region where Wagner sits onthroned.

The following extracts are from the elder Wolzogen's "Life of Wilhelmine Schroeder-Devrient":

"The Schroeder-Devrient never found leisure for the acquisition of the very A—B—C of song, and no one can ever be a fully equipped singer, in spite of all supplementary exertion, unless he is absolute master of his organ, before he applies it to dramatic use.

"Least of all can a German be such a singer unless he was born with an extraordinary talent, and unless he has studied to an extraordinary degree.

"For, alas, it is impossible to deny the fact that of all the cultured people of Europe, the Germans, a deeply musical folk, show remarkably little aptitude for singing; and they show a want of vocal taste that puts them below the English even, a nation that occupies in the eyes of the world an especially low place in every artistic particular, although this opinion can not now be entertained with fairness.

"We often hear that we Germans have invented for our own use, a peculiar style which does not admit of comparison with that of the Italian or the Frenchman. This is a good-natured illusion of people who are wholly ignorant in the matter. The truth is that the genuine vocal instinct is foreign to us, and so are niceties of expression; the only instance to the contrary is the delivery of our songs, a delivery that is a compromise between singing and declamation.

"What we are pleased to call 'our style' is nothing but a naive condition of natural, untrained singing.

"Art is cosmopolitan; true art must please the intelligent in London and Paris, Rome and St. Petersburg, as well as in Vienna and Berlin.

"That which does not withstand such a test may live on provincial applause, or the applause of a coterie, but it does not deserve the attention of a serious man."

***

This extract from the same book calls for deep consideration in these days:

"Whoever has voice enough to shout lustily so that the walls rock, and has not sufficient patience or artistic spirit to learn in a decent manner the use of the instrument, will be a 'dramatic singer,' if the voice is a soprano; an 'heroic tenor,' if the voice is tenor."

***

And what did Gustav Roger, the great tenor, say of German singers?

"German singers have subordinated everything to the voice, not in the intelligent variety of nimbre, but in the uniform force of emission.

"In this country, where philosophy has so often left the earth to lose itself in the clouds, the art of song has stuck to matter.

"The Germans say they worship art. It is possible: but it seems to me that they abandon the god and adore the temple; and this is the fault of the singers, not the fault of the public."

***

Wagner himself did not condemn beautiful singing, even in the Italian sense, except where it was opposed to dramatic truth.

He regarded the question of nationality in vocal art.

In his "Ueber Schauspieler und Saenger" he recognized the fact that the German language is at war with bel canto.

It is not surprising then that he dedicated the volume to the memory of the Schroeder-Devrient, who was, indeed, a "dramatic singer," in Wolzogen's meaning of the phrase.

Neither Berlioz nor Chorley could endure the singing of the Schroeder-Devrient.

Berlioz admitted that she was "dramatic," but he hastened to add that she sang flat whenever she could not force a tone; that her ornaments were in very bad taste; that she interpolated in her song spoken phrases and interjections of execrable effects.

Berlioz compared her to an actor in a Parisian vaudeville: "This way of singing is the most anti-musical and the most trivial that one can point out to beginners to avoid."

Now, Wagner admired the singing of the Schroeder-Devrient.

***

Surely did Vernon Lee have the German school in mind when she wrote these bitter words, words that are bitter and true:

"Let him or her be effective; act with impetuosity, declaim with vehemence, shriek and yell passionately, if he or she have dramatic instinct; or force upper tones, or bellow lower ones, or gabble off shapeless roulades, if he or she have strong lungs or a flexible throat; any of these means will lead to distinction, and they are qualities, whether dramatic or vocal, which require little tuition and less practice; above all, which entirely dispense with the mere knowledge that such a thing as an art of singing has ever existed or can ever exist."

***

It is possible that the Germans, who look askew at the frivolities of other nations, shudder at the instance of Sempronia, the tool of Cataline to foment the rebellion, who, according to Sallust, was taught to sing more finely than became a virtuous woman.

***

Their arrogance, however, leads them to prefer their song for its "feeling," for its "intellectuality," and when they are criticised even gently or timidly, they cry out against the ignorance or the childishness of the accusers.

How different was the conduct of Anaximander, the philosopher.

It is said that as he was singing the boys used to ridicule him, upon which he only remarked, "We must learn to sing better for their sakes."

PHILIP HALE.

Boston Daily Globe.

MONDAY, APRIL 24.

WHY RICHTER WON'T COME

Boston's Symphony Must Wait a Few Years Yet.

Enthusiastic Austrians Won't Hear of Leader's Departure.

Disappointed, as He Wants to Make America His Home of Adoption.

A despatch from Vienna, giving the reasons why Herr Richter cannot come to Boston as conductor of the Symphony orchestra, says:

The affair has been attended by long and intricate negotiations. Repeated efforts have been made during some years past to induce Herr Richter to permanently leave Austria. On credible information it can be stated that, among other invitations, he has had a standing offer from the Boston Symphony orchestra ever since Mr. Higginson brought that superb organization into existence.

Finally, Herr Richter yielded to the inducements held out to him, and thought he saw his way clear to the acceptance of a transatlantic engagement. But when the news of his desire to go to Boston leaked out in Vienna last week, there was great consternation among the Austrian public. The authorities were intensely annoyed, and there is good reason to believe that the Emperor himself offered strenuous objections to Herr Richter's proposed departure from his post.

Jealousy, both professional and national, had long been operative to Herr Richter's discomfort. On the one hand were those who, for personal reasons, resented the deserved honors everywhere heaped upon the greatest orchestral conductor of the times, and who were not averse to employing court means to prevent him from acquiring fortune and further fame.

When the news got abroad that he actually had decided to go to Boston, and to leave Vienna this spring, the forces of personal jealousy and national pride combined to discourage his design and to turn him back. Every sort of pressure was put upon the directors of the Imperial Opera to induce them to insist absolutely on the letter of the contract, which still has four years to run.

The matter was the topic of the day in Vienna, and was discussed with all the eagerness of a political crisis. Richter's house was besieged by journalists, but to none of them would he grant an audience. His refusals were due not only to his well-known natural shyness, but also to the fact that he feared lest an utterance on his part would prejudice the directors of the Opera, intensify public feeling and offend the Emperor.

The present complications irritate him and he feels keenly disappointed. He had set his heart on going to America.

On Saturday of last week, when the Vienna public really thought he would go to Boston, they crowded the great hall where it was supposed he was making his last appearance at the Philharmonic concerts in the city. He conducted Beethoven's ninth symphony. The emotions of the moment overmastered the excited thousands and they gave him a superb ovation. The huge audience stood and cheered the great leader. They were wild with enthusiasm. They piled the stage high with flowers.

He is forced to remain, and Vienna again turns out to greet him. Nevertheless, Vienna has been hard upon him. He has in charge the music of the Emperor's chapel concerts, the Philharmonic society's concerts, and the direction of the orchestra of the Imperial Opera. These exacting duties, all combined, yield him a yearly income of less than six months' direction of the Boston Symphony concerts alone would bring to him.

It may surprise many to learn that from the Imperial Austrian Opera this eminent man only receives $2000 a year, though of course his other labors at least double this income. Richter gives occasional concerts in London and elsewhere, but these make too heavy a demand upon him when added to his regular labors.

But the fact is that Richter's ambition is to abandon all work except the conducting of a grand symphony orchestra. In this his forte lies, and the Boston position would be supremely congenial to his tastes and talents. Under his control the Boston orchestra would unquestionably become the finest in the world.

It is still Richter's hope to lead that orchestra some day. It is his settled intention to live in America and become an American. He makes no concealment of this deep-seated wish. When he is free to go he will be in the prime of his strength.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 23, 1893.

TWENTY-THIRD CONCERT BY THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

No symphony concert was given in Music Hall last evening, but instead a Richard Wagner programme was performed by the orchestra, with Miss Felicia Kaschoska, Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, Miss Louise Leimer and Mr. Henrich Meyn as soloists. The works chosen were the overture to Rienzi in D major; prelude to Act III, Dance of Apprentices, March of the Mastersingers, and Homage to Hans Sach, from the Master-singers of Nuremberg; Prelude and First Scene from Das Rheingold (the Rheindaughters and Alberich) Woglinde,—Miss Kaschoska; Wellgunde,—Mrs. Nikisch; Flosshilde,—Miss Leimer; and Alberich,—Mr. Meyn; Siegfried passing through the fire, from "Siegfried," Act III; Scene 2, and Morning Dawn, also Siegfried's Voyage Up the Rhine, from Gotterdaemmerung, Act III, Scene 2; Bruennhilde's speech over Siegfried's body, from Gotterdaemmerung, Act III, Scene III.

The artistic necessity of interpolating this repertoire in a course of symphony concerts, and devoting the entire evening to a composer who was confessedly incapable of composing even a respectable symphony, and who ignominiously failed in his attempt in this line—the precise raison d'etre of this Wagnerian intrusion was by no means apparent. Perhaps the very worst feature of the concert was the first scene from "Das Rheingold," which is probably as insincere as charlatanic a piece of writing as ever emanated from a composer's pen. No wonder that Richard Wagner's so-called art work as it manifests itself in his latest manner has been renounced and denounced by nearly every composer and musician of world renowned importance, including Brahms and Rheinberger. Wagner, the composer of the beautiful overtures to Rienzi and Tannhauser, of the prelude to the third actof the master singers, etc., was well nigh pre-eminently a man of genuis. As the hireling of King Ludwig the vile, the great composer preferred to develop into a musical monstrosity of the rankest kind.

Of the performances last evening, it is a pleasure to acknowledge that conductor Nikisch was in his element and that it was again in evidence that as a conductor of dramatic music, pure and simple, he has but few peers.

Of the soloists, Mrs. Nikisch was at a cruel disadvantage and both she and Miss Louise Leimer, who has a very uninteresting voice were manifestly overweighted by the technical difficulties of the first scene fsom Das Rheingold. Miss Kraschoska with her charming voice sang admirably, and Mr. Meyn's singing was characterized by an uncommonly broad and pure style. The orchestral playing throughout the concert was simply noble.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 23.

The Symphony Concert.

Last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was devoted wholly to Wagner. The programme was: Overture, "Rienzi;" Prelude to Act III. of "The Mastersingers;" Prelude and first scene from "The Rhinegold;" "Passing through the Fire," from "Siegfried," and "Morning Dawn and Siegfried's Voyage;" Siegfried's Funeral March, and Brunhilde's Dying Speech, from "The Twilight of the Gods." In the Rhinegold scene, the singers were Miss Felicia Kaschoska, Mrs. A. Nickish, Miss Louise Leimer and Mr. H. Meyn. Brunhilde's Lament was sung by Miss Kaschoska. It was a long and rather monotous, not to say wearisome, programme. Again was it emphasized that Wagner's music needs the scenic surroundings and the stage action for which it was written, to make it effective in the hearing. The "Rienzi" overture was given with splendid brilliancy and vigor, and in its climax with immense effectiveness. It is in music of this operatic nature that the conductor is always at home, and his reading of the overture was one of his genuine successes of the season. Both conductor and orchestra were at their very best through the concert. The singing in "The Rhinegold" was not always as tuneful as it might have been, but it was never lacking in energy or clearness. The singers have little else to do than to shout. Style, color and expression were wholly out of the question. That is all in the orchestra, and if the singers make themselves heard, they do nearly all that is required of them. Miss Kaschoska has a large and admirable voice, and she sings with ease and fire. In the Brunhilde scene she declaimed her music finely. We should like to hear her when she is called upon to do something more than scream, for she made it plain that she is an artist of excellent gifts. The audience was large and enthusiastic, but its warmest and most prolonged applause was called forth by the "Rienzi" overture. For the next and last concert of the season, the programme is: Symphony, No. 1, in D-minor, Mozart; unfinished Symphony, Schubert; "Eroica" Symphony, Beethoven.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 24, 1893.

The twenty-third symphony concert in Music Hall last Saturday was styled a Wagner programme, all the selections being from that great composer, and included overture to "Rienzi," prelude to Act III. from "The Meistersingers of Nuremberg," the dance of the apprentices, march of the meistersingers and homage to Hans Sachs; prelude and first scene from "Das Reingold," selection from "Siegfried," act three, and "Gotterdammerung" prologue, arranged by Hans Richter, also from the same opera Siegfried's funeral march and Bruennhilde's dying speech over Siegfried's body The orchestra did some highly creditable work, assisted by the following vocal soloists: Miss Felicia Kaschoska, Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, Miss Louise Leimar, Mr. Henrich Meyer, who did some excellent work and interpreted the scenes with intelligence and expression and were heartily applauded. The next and last rehearsal and concert will take place next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

[146]

Boston Journal.

FIFTY PAGES.

MONDAY, APRIL 24, 1893.

The Twenty-third Concert of the Symphony Orchestra.

The Opinions of Many Sages Concerning German Singers.

A Pleasing Unanimity of a Cloud of Witnesses.

The programme of the 23d Symphony concert was made up of selections from the works of Wagner. It was as follows:

Overture, "Rienzi."
Prelude to Act III., Dance of Apprentices, March of the Master-singers, and Homage to Hans Sachs, from "The Master-singers of Nuremberg."
Prelude and first scene from "Das Rheingold."
(The Rhine-daughters and Alberich.)
Woglinde.....Miss Felicia Kaschoska.
Wellgunde.....Mrs. Arthur Nikisch.
Flosshilde.....Miss Louise Leimer.
Alberich.....Mr. Heinrich Meyn.
Siegfried Passing through the Fire, from "Siegfried," Act III., Scene 2, and Morning Dawn, and Siegfried's Voyage up the Rhine, from "Gœtterdæmmerung," Prologue.
(Arranged by Hans Richter.)
Siegfried's Funeral March, from "Gœtterdæmmerung." Act III., Scene 2.
Bruennhilde's Dying Speech over Siegfried's Body, from "Gœtterdæmmerung," Act III., Scene 3.
Bruennhilde.....Miss Kaschoska.

***

These numbers were applauded heartily by a large audience.

The performance of the instrumental numbers was brilliant and the applause was well deserved.

***

Wagner in his later years rejected "Rienzi." His most devoted disciples do not speak of this "error of youth," or they condemn it as the abomination of desolation mentioned by the Hebrew prophet.

In truth the overture is a vulgar thing.

Its pomp smells of sawdust; its glory is the glory of paint and tinsel.

This circus-overture provoked, Saturday evening, a scene of tumultuous joy.

***

The Wagner of early years was anxious for the proper and peculiar performance of his music-dramas.

The Wagner of later years was anxious for the performance of his works, even on the concert stage, without scenic accessories.

Hence these excerpts for concert use.

Hence this wearisome concert arrangement of the prelude and first scene from "Das Rheingold."

In a concert arrangement the famous pedal is without force or meaning.

The Rhine Daughters swim only in the imagination of the hearer; their concert dress is hardly suitable for aquatic frolics.

For they are on the concert stage, not in a stage aquarium.

They shriek out spasmodically "Weia! Waga! Wallala weila weia!"

When they are tired of this amusement they refresh themtelves by remarking in a loud voice, "Lalaleia! Lalei! Heia! Haha!"

They also exclaim "Heiahahei!"

Thus they bear their part in the exhibition of Wagnerian dramatic truth.

***

When the operas of Wagner were prepared for performance in Italy Wagner insisted that they should be sung in Italian.

He believed that opera should be sung in the language of the country of the performance.

We are obliged in a symphony concert to listen to the German language.

The German language is the fashionable speech of our concert halls.

The Germans did not invent the sonata or the cantata, the symphony or the madrigal, the opera or the oratorio.

The Netherlanders and the Italians rejoiced in musical masterpieces before music was cultivated intelligently in Germany.

It is, however, the popular impression in this city that music was invented by the Germans and will die with that people.

***

Our own singers, born here and known to us, give pleasure in strange lands to foreign audiences.

We import for our own use German declaimers, who, too often, are known in their own country as "veterans of song."

Now, a veteran of song is not unlike an "old war-horse of Democracy;" he is cheered frantically when he appears on the platform, but no one really listens to him, for he is apt to mumble, by reason of age and dental imperfections.

***

And what, pray, is the sentence pronounced by many judges of different nations and of different centuries on German singers, even when they are young and fresh, on the German tongue and on German vocal art?

***

The characteristics of German singing have remained unchanged from the beginning.

Hearken unto Tacitus:

"Amongst them, too, are found that kind of verses, by the recital of which (by them called Barding) they inspire bravery; nay, by such chanting itself they divine the success of the approaching fight.

"Nor does what they utter so much seem to be singing, as the voice and exertion of valor.

"They chiefly study a tone fierce and harsh, with a broken and unequal murmur: and therefore apply their shields to their mouths when the voice may, by rebounding, swell with greater fullness and force."

***

Centuries ago Johannnes Diacornus, the biographer of Gregory, complained of the inability of the Germans to sing the Gregorian song in its purity.

"Their rough voices, roaring like thunder, do not lend themselves to agreeable modulation, because their hoarse throats, accustomed to strong drink, do not allow that suppleness which pleasing melodies require, so that their horror-inspiring voices bring forth tones which sound like the rumbling of a freight wagon going down hill."

***

Charles V., Emperor and King of Spain, used to say that he would address women in Italian; to men he would speak French; to his horses German; but that if he were to speak to God he would employ the Spanish language.

This monarch smiled when Petrus Royzius, the poet, said to John Langus, as they all sat merrily at meat, "The Germans don't speak, but they thunder; and it is my opinion that God made use of their language when he thundered forth the sentence of condemnation on Adam."

***

It was James Howel who wrote concerning German: "A full-mouthed Language she is, and pronounc'd with that strength as if one had Bones in his Tongue instead of Nerfs."

***

Frederick the Great, to whom all loyal Germans still point with pride, loved dearly the mellifluous voices of Italians, and exclaimed that he would rather listen to an air whinnied by his horse than have a German prima donna in his opera house.

Weber praised heartily the singers who took part in "Oberon," London, 1826, because they had excellent voices, sang with expression and had been skillfully trained in the Italian school.

***

Schopenhauer claims that the truly national characteristic of the Germans is "heaviness." "Heaviness is conspicuous in their gait; in their manner of being and acting; in their talk, set speech, literature, fashion of understanding and reflecting; and above all in their style."

***

Let Karl August Alfred, Freiherr von Wolzogen take the witness stand.

He was Intendant of the Court Theatre in Schwerin.

He wrote on musical subjects.

By an irony of Fate, his son Hans turned out to be a fanatical worshiper of Wagner; and he wrote pamphlets that serve as a Baedeker to the traveler through the mist enveloped region where Wagner sits enthroned.

The following extracts are from the elder Wolzogen's "Life of Wilhelmine Schroeder-Devrient":

"The Schroeder-Devrient never found leisure for the acquisition of the very A—B—C of song, and no one can ever be a fully equipped singer, in spite of all supplementary exertion, unless he is absolute master of his organ, before he applies it to dramatic use.

"Least of all can a German be such a singer unless he was born with an extraordinary talent, and unless he has studied to an extraordinary degree.

"For, alas, it is impossible to deny the fact that of all the cultured people of Europe, the Germans, a deeply musical folk, show remarkably little aptitude for singing; and they show a want of vocal taste that puts them below the English even, a nation that occupies in the eyes of the world an especially low place in every artistic particular, although this opinion can not now be entertained with fairness.

"We often hear that we Germans have invented, for our own use, a peculiar style which does not admit of comparison with that of the Italian or the Frenchman. This is a good-natured illusion of people who are wholly ignorant in the matter. The truth is that the genuine vocal instinct is foreign to us, and so are niceties of expression: the only instance to the contrary is the delivery of our songs, a delivery that is a compromise between singing and declamation.

"What we are pleased to call 'our style' is nothing but a naive condition of natural, untrained singing.

"Art is cosmopolitan; true art must please the intelligent in London and Paris, Rome and St. Petersburg, as well as in Vienna and Berlin.

"That which does not withstand such a test may live on provincial applause, or the applause of a coterie, but it does not deserve the attention of a serious man."

***

This extract from the same book calls for deep consideration in these days:

"Whoever has voice enough to shout lustily so that the walls rock, and has not sufficient patience or artistic spirit to learn in a decent manner the use of the instrument, will be a 'dramatic singer,' if the voice is a soprano; an 'heroic tenor,' if the voice is tenor."

***

And what did Gustav Roger, the great tenor, say of German singers?

"German singers have subordinated everything to the voice, not in the intelligent variety of timbre, but in the uniform force of emission.

"In this country, where philosophy has so often left the earth to lose itself in the clouds, the art of song has stuck to matter.

"The Germans say they worship art. It is possible: but it seems to me that they abandon the god and adore the temple; and this is the fault of the singers, not the fault of the public."

***

Wagner himself did not condemn beautiful singing, even in the Italian sense, except where it was opposed to dramatic truth.

He regarded the question of nationality in vocal art.

In his "Deber Schausdieler und Saenger" he recognized the fact that the German language is at war with bel canto.

It is not surprising then that he dedicated the volume to the memory of the Schroeder-Devrient, who was, indeed, a "dramatic singer," in Wolzogen's meaning of the phrase.

Neither Berlioz nor Chorley could endure the singing of the Schroeder-Devrient.

Berlioz admitted that she was "dramatic," but he hastened to add that she sang flat whenever she could not force a tone; that her ornaments were in very bad taste; that she interpolated in her song spoken phrases and interjections of execrable effects.

Berlioz compared her to an actor in a Parisian vaudeville: "This way of singing is the most anti-musical and the most trivial that one can point out to beginners to avoid."

Now, Wagner admired the singing of the Schroeder-Devrient.

***

Surely did Vernon Lee have the German school in mind when she wrote these bitter words, words that are bitter and true:

"Let him or her be effective; act with impetuosity, declaim with vehemence, shriek and yell passionately, if he or she have dramatic instinct; or force upper tones, or bellow lower ones, or gabble off shapeless roulades, if he or she have strong lungs or a flexible throat; any of these means will lead to distinction, and they are qualities, whether dramatic or vocal, which require little tuition and less practice; above all, which entirely dispense with the mere knowledge that such a thing as an art of singing has ever existed or can ever exist."

***

It is possible that the Germans, who look askew at the frivolities of other nations, shudder at the instance of Sempronia, the tool of Cataline to foment the rebellion, who, according to Sallust, was taught to sing more finely than became a virtuous woman.

***

Their arrogance, however, leads them to prefer their song for its "feeling," for its "intellectuality," and when they are criticised even gently or timidly, they cry out against the ignorance or the childishness of the accusers.

How different was the conduct of Anaximander, the philosopher.

It is said that as he was singing the boys used to ridicule him, upon which he only remarked, "We must learn to sing better for their sakes."

PHILIP HALE.

Boston Daily Globe.

MONDAY, APRIL 24.

WHY RICHTER WON'T COME

Boston's Symphony Must Wait a Few Years Yet.

Enthusiastic Austrians Won't Hear of Leader's Departure.

Disappointed, as He Wants to Make America His Home of Adoption.

A despatch from Vienna, giving the reasons why Herr Richter cannot come to Boston as conductor of the Symphony orchestra, says:

The affair has been attended by long and intricate negotiations. Repeated efforts have been made during some years past to induce Herr Richter to permanently leave Austria. On credible information it can be stated that, among other invitations, he has had a standing offer from the Boston Symphony orchestra ever since Mr. Higginson brought that superb organization into existence.

Finally, Herr Richter yielded to the inducements held out to him, and thought he saw his way clear to the acceptance of a transatlantic engagement. But when the news of his desire to go to Boston leaked out in Vienna last week, there was great consternation among the Austrian public. The authorities were intensely annoyed, and there is good reason to believe that the Emperor himself offered strenuous objections to Herr Richter's proposed departure from his post.

Jealousy, both professional and national, had long been operative to Herr Richter's discomfort On the one hand were those who, for personal reasons, resented the deserved honors everywhere heaped upon the greatest orchestral conductor of the times, and who were not averse to employing court means to prevent him from acquiring fortune and further fame.

When the news got abroad that he actually had decided to go to Boston, and to leave Vienna this spring, the forces of personal jealousy and national pride combined to discourage his design and to turn him back. Every sort of pressure was put upon the directors of the Imperial Opera to induce them to insist absolutely on the letter of the contract, which still has four years to run.

The matter was the topic of the day in Vienna, and was discussed with all the eagerness of a political crisis. Richter's house was besieged by journalists, but to none of them would he grant an audience. His refusals were due not only to his well-known natural shyness, but also to the fact that he feared lest an utterance on his part would prejudice the directors of the Opera, intensify public feeling and offend the Emperor.

The present complications irritate him and he feels keenly disappointed. He had set his heart on going to America.

On Saturday of last week, when the Vienna public really thought he would go to Boston, they crowded the great hall where it was supposed he was making his last appearance at the Philharmonic concerts in the city. He conducted Beethoven's ninth symphony. The emotions of the moment overmastered the excited thousands and they gave him a superb ovation. The huge audience stood and cheered the great leader. They were wild with enthusiasm. They piled the stage high with flowers.

He is forced to remain, and Vienna again turns out to greet him. Nevertheless, Vienna has been hard upon him. He has in charge the music of the Emperor's chapel concerts, the Philharmonic society's concerts, and the direction of the orchestra of the Imperial Opera. These exacting duties, all combined, yield him a yearly income of less than six months' direction of the Boston Symphony concerts alone would bring to him.

It may surprise many to learn that from the Imperial Austrian Opera this eminent man only receives $2000 a year, though of course his other labors at least double this income. Richter gives occasional concerts in London and elsewhere, but these make too heavy a demand upon him when added to his regular labors.

But the fact is that Richter's ambition is to abandon all work except the conducting of a grand symphony orchestra. In this his forte lies, and the Boston position would be supremely congenial to his tastes and talents. Under his control the Boston orchestra would unquestionably become the finest in the world.

It is still Richter's hope to lead that orchestra some day. It is his settled intention to live in America and become an American. He makes no concealment of this deep-seated wish. When he is free to go he will be in the prime of his strength.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCIII., NO. 113.

SUNDAY, APRIL 23, 1893.

WHY RICHTER CANNOT COME.

The Great Conductor's Personal Statement to the Herald.

His Greatest Ambition Is to Lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but the Vienna Public Will Not Allow Him to Depart from There Until the Expiration of His Contract.

[BY CABLE TO THE SUNDAY HERALD.]

LONDON, April 22, 1893. Hans Richter sends a personal statement to the BOSTON HERALD confirming yesterday's rumor from Vienna to the effect that he is not to be allowed to leave the Austrian capital within four years. Coming on the heels of his declaration to the HERALD correspondent a week ago, this sudden change must read strangely to those not acquainted with the circumstances and history of the case.

The affair has been attended by long and intricate negotiations. Repeated efforts have been made during some years past to induce Herr Richter to permanently leave Austria. On credible information It can be stated that, among other invitations, he has had a standing offer from the Boston Symphony orchestra ever since Mr. Higginson brought that superb organization into existence.

Finally, Herr Richter yielded to the inducements held out to him, and thought he saw his way clear to the acceptance of a transatlantic engagement. But when the news of his desire to go to Boston leaked out in Vienna last week, there was great consternation among the Austrian public. The authorities were intensely annoyed, and there is good reason to believe that the Emperor himself offered strenuous objection to Herr Richter's proposed departure from his post.

And besides, jealousy, both professional and national, had long been operative to Herr Richter's discomfort. On the one hand were those who, for personal reasons, resented the deserved honors everywhere heaped upon the greatest orchestral conductor of the times, and who were not adverse to employing court means to prevent him from acquiring fortune and further fame.

On the other hand, there were the Viennese people, proud in the possession of Richter's genius, and not relishing the idea of any other city claiming him.

When the news got abroad that he actually had decided to go to Boston, and to leave Vienna this spring, the forces of personal jealousy and national pride combined to discourage his design and to turn him back. Every sort of pressure was put upon the directors of the Imperial Opera to induce them to insist absolutely on the letter of the contract, which still has four years to run.

The matter was the topic of the day in Vienna, and was discussed with all the eagerness of a political crisis.

Richter's House Was Besieged

by journalists, but to none of them would he grant an audience. His refusals were due not only to his well known natural shyness, but also to the fact that he feared lest any utterance on his part would prejudice the directors of the opera, intensify public feeling and offend the Emperor.

Finally, after much persuasion by his most intimate and trusted friends, he consented to be interviewed by a HERALD correspondent. The result of that interview was cabled to last Sunday's paper. His words then were most emphatically that he would go to Boston at any cost.

Those who know Hans Richter know well that when he makes up his mind to do a thing he usually is capable of carrying everything before him. But in this case the circumstances were such that the obstacles were too strong for him to surmount. When he talked with the HERALD correspondent one week ago, he gave reason to suppose that he would break with Vienna if the authorities continued to oppose him.

Since then he has been made to see that such a step would cost him too much in the end. It would render it impossible for him to return to Vienna for all time to come and would, perhaps, involve others as well as himself in unpleasant consequences. Then, too, Hans Richter's word has always been regarded as equally as good as his bond. When the first hot flush of gratification at receiving a call to take charge of the greatest of transatlantic orchestras had subsided, he began to realize that for him to wilfully break his contract and desert the highest musical position in Europe would not heighten his credit either at home or abroad.

So to ay ne says he must stay in Vienna. "They will not let me go," he adds, "but I shall come to you four years hence."

The present complications irritate him, and he feels keenly disappointed. He had set his heart on going to America.

On Saturday of last week, when the Vienna public really thought he would go to Boston, they crowded the great hall where it was supposed he was making his last appearance at

The Philharmonic Concerts

in the city. He conducted Beethoven's ninth symphony. The emotions of the moment overmastered the excited thousands, and they gave him a superb ovation. The huge audience stood and cheered the great leader. They were wild with enthusiasm. They piled the stage high with flowers.

Yet Richter came home from this triumph and said to the HERALD correspondent: "Yes, I shall go to Boston; you may say that."

But today he is forced to remain, and Vienna again turns out to greet him. Nevertheless, Vienna has been hard upon him. He has in charge the music of the Emperor's chapel concerts, the Philharmonic society's concerts, and the direction of the orchestra of the Imperial opera. These exacting duties, all combined, yield him a yearly income of less than six months' direction of the Boston Symphony concerts alone would bring to him.

It may surprise the readers of the HERALD to learn that from the Imperial Austrian opera this eminent man only receives $2000 a year, though, of course, his other labors at least double this income. Richter gives occasional concerts in London and elsewhere, but these make too heavy a demand upon him when added to his regular

But the fact is that Richter's ambition is to abandon all work except the conducting of a grand symphony orchestra. In this his forte lies, and the Boston position would be supremely congenial to his tastes and talents. Under his control the Boston orchestra would unquestionably become the finest in the world.

It is still Richter's hope to lead that orchestra some day. It is his settled intention to live in America and become an American. He makes no concealment of this deep-seated wish. When he is free to go he will be in the prime of his strength.

While the next four years will be to Boston a period of anticipation, it will be to Richter a term of ardent longing.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

For the last but one of his concerts with the Boston Symphony orchestra, at Music Hall last evening, Conductor Arthur Nikisch presented a Wagner programme in which the assistance was had of Miss Felicia Kaschoska, Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, Miss Louise Leimer and Mr. Heinrich Meyn, as vocal soloists.

The selections made from the familiar concert repertoire of music drama arrangements were as follows: Overture to "Rienzi," in D major; prelude to act 3, dance of apprentices, march of the master singers and homage to Hans Sachs, from "The Master-singers of Nuermberg"; preiude and first scene from "Das Rheingold"; Siegfried passing through the fire, from "Siegfried," act 3, scene 2, and morning dawn, and Siegfried's voyage up the Rhine, from "Goetterdaemmerung," prologue; Siegfried's funeral march, from "Goetterdaemmerung," act 3, scene 2, and Bruennhilde's dying speech over Siegfried's body, from "Goetterdaemmerung," act 3, scene 3.

The work of the orchestra was especially fine in the "Rienzi" overture, the performance of this number arousing the audience to a grand demonstration of its appreciation; an almost equally good results were given the scenes from "The Master-singers."

Few of the excerpts from the music dramas of this composer give so little satisfaction as the scene between the Rhine daughters and Alberich, and, apart from the stage settings, the almost meaningless declamations and outcries of the singers went for little. The thankless task put upon the four singers was duly accomplished with apparently about equal satisfaction both sides the stage line.

Miss Kaschoska was somewhat overweighted by the vocal demands of the Brunhilde declamatory number, but her delivery of its trying measure was characterized by excellent musical taste and intelligence.

The season and Mr. Nikisch's engagement ends with next Saturday's concert, when the programme will be made up of Mozart's symphony No. 1 in D major; Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, and Beethoven's symphony No. 3, "Eroica."

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, APRIL 23, 1893.

Wagner Heard at the Symphony.

A programme consisting exclusively of selections from the works of Richard Wagner was played by the Symphony orchestra last evening. The increased attendance at both afternoon rehearsal and evening concert and the cordial applause bestowed showed that the programme was very welcome to Symphony concert patrons.

The selections consisted of the overture to "Rienzi," prelude to act III. of the "Mastersingers," dance of apprentices, march of master singers and homage to Hans Sachs from the same opera; prelude and first scene from "Das Rheingold," selections from the third act of "Siegfried" and the "Goetterdaemmerung" prologue, arranged by Hans Richter; Siegfried's funeral march from "Goetterdaemmerung" and Bruenhilde's dying speech over Siegfried's body, from the same opera.

The full resources of the orchestra were required for the interpretation of this programme, and the admirable manner in which every demand was met was most gratifying to the audience, and offered further evidence of the generally accepted fact that Boston has the finest symphony orchestra in the world.

The varied and highly colored harmonic effects of the brilliant overture were played with splendid spirit and expression, and the weird funeral march was given in a grandly impressive manner. The "Master-singers" numbers were also charmingly played.

Herr Richter's arrangement of the "Siegfried and Goetterdaemmerung" selections is a most interesting and harmonious work, and a more effective interpretation than that given by Director Nikisch could not be readily imagined.

In interpreting the first scene from "Das Rheingold," the orchestra had the assistance of the following vocal soloists: Miss Felicia Kaschoska as Woglinde, Mrs. Arthur Nikisch as Wellgunde, Miss Louise Leimer as Flosshilde, Mr. Heinrich Meyn as Alberich.

They all sang with intelligence and good expression, and won hearty plaudits in spite of the fact that their voices were occasionally almost drowned by the tremendous volume of tone from the big orchestra.

Miss Felicia Kaschotka's singing of Bruennhild's speech made a very favorable impression.

The last of this season's symphony concerts will be given on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of this week. The programme will be as follows: Mozart, symphony No. 1, in D major; Schubert, unfinished symphony; Beethoven, symphony No. 3, "Eroica."

RICHTER DISAPPOINTED.

Despite His Refusal He Still Wants to Come to Boston.

VIENNA, April 23.—Although circumstances forced Hans Richter to reconsider his acceptance of the directorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and to decline the offer, he has not relinquished the idea of going to America or lost his great desire to do so. Repeated efforts have been made during some years past to induce Herr Richter to permanently leave Austria. It is said that, among other invitations, he has had a standing offer from the Boston Symphony Orchestra ever since Mr. Higginson brought that superb organization into existence.

Finally, Herr Richter thought he saw his way clear to the acceptance of a transatlantic engagement. But when the news of his desire to go to Boston leaked out in Vienna last week, there was great consternation among the Austrian public. And besides, jealousy, both professional and national, had long been operative to Herr Richter's discomfort, but since all laid great stress upon the fact that Herr Richter's contract in Vienna would not expire for four years, and as Herr Richter did not and does not desire to break his contract, he remains.

When the news got abroad that he actually had decided to go to Boston, the matter was the topic of the day in Vienna, and was discussed with all the eagerness of a political crisis.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 24, 1893.

The Symphony Concert.

A great Wagnerian programme was given at the symphony concert of Saturday, and it attracted the largest audience of the season. It began with the Rienzi overture which was magnificently played. This overture is in itself the best refutation of the critics of the Rowbotham stripe who hold that Wagner was incapable of writing a melody, for the prayer of Rienzi, which forms such an important part of the work, is nothing if not melodic. The performance was a worthy one both in reading and execution; the trumpets shaded their long notes in excellent style, the violins (spite of the absence of the concertmeister) played with abundant spirit, and the power of the finale was deafening but appropriate.

To enjoy the prelude to the third act of "The Mastersingers" one must be thoroughly familiar with the motives or "guiding-figures" which are used, and it is more than probable that not one tenth of the audience had memorized these figures. Wagner has brought, by the interweaving of such figures, a new intellectuality into music, an intellectuality different from that found in the contrapuntal evolutions of Bach and from the thematic treatment of Beethoven, but none the less definite counterpoise to the emotional side of the art.

Such music speaks a language as definite as French or Italian, and for the average auditor to rhapsodize over it without knowing the purport of its leit-motiven is as if one innocent of all Hellenic knowledge were to descant upon the beauties of a Greek tragedy which he had only heard in the unknown tongue; a few years ago Mme. Wagner inquired of the writer whether Wagner was understood in America or was only "the fashion?" The question cannot be satisfactorily answered even now. The analysis in the programme-book was carefully prepared, but nothing short of actual lessons can make the average auditor familiar with the language of Wagner's music, or with the suggestions conveyed in almost every measure of such a prelude. The performance was good, the shading delicate, the climaxes well worked up, and that wonderful bit of Mediaevalism, the dance of the apprentices, with its quaint seven-barred phrases, was especially admirable in its spirit.

Far less satisfactory was the opening scene from "Rhinegold," for here the music requires the scenery and action to make it impressive. The unique treatment of the chord of E flat which is reiterated until the rest of the tonal system seems obliterated, is wonderfully graphic when one sees the Rhine flowing and ever flowing, but on the concert platform it is simply monotonous. The singers, one and all were not Wagnerian singers; they just accomplished their task, but this achievement through palpable effort is fatal to Wagnerian effects; a tolerable Wagnerian performance (especially in the vocal parts) is as unbearable as a tolerable egg or a reasonably satisfactory heaven would be. Everything seemed spasmodic, and in the orchestra the ensemble was anything but perfect, while the horn broke in almost every phrase.

The pasticcio from the two last operas of the trilogy, arranged by Hans Richter (the name brings up a sad host of "might-have-been") only seems to prove that Wagner was right in desiring that his works might not be concertized too much, it could not sustain the interest, and it was not well-played into the bargain, many of the figures being drowned out altogether.

What was said above concerning the comprehension of the story that the Wagnerian orchestra has to tell, can be repeated with still greater force in connection with the funeral march of Siegfried. Next Saturday we are to have a funeral march (in the heroic symphony) in which every musical auditor will discern the brooding warriors, the weeping maiden, a work which impressed the poet Coleridge as "a funeral in Purple," and which is, in every measure, as the burial of some mighty Viking; in the present Wagnerian work we have this heroic character and something besides; here we find a life story in tones, all the chief episodes in Siegfried's life are recited by the orchestra, by means of the guiding figures; if ever there was a definite language in orchestral music it is here. The work was finely performed and its interpretation deserved equal recognition with that of the Rienzi overture.

With the finale of the "Goetterdaemmerung" the concert fittingly ended; there probably never has been a finale like this attempted in music; to end the greatest operatic work ever conceived by human mind with a monologue, showed how little hampered by tradition the composer was; there is no attempt to pile Ossa upon Pelion, there is no desire to overwhelm the the auditor with a stupendous combination of forces (Berloiz would have done that) there is only the frank presentation of the pathetic end of the story, nothing is to distract the attention from the noble Brunnhilde in her hour of supreme agony; but that sorrowing woman standing alone is grander than all the choruses that the Italians have heaped up in their climaxes. It is, however, necessary that the Brunnhilde should be an artist of overwhelming power, for in the whole realm of operatic work there is nothing which demands such dramatic force as this finale; and Miss Kaschoska was only painstaking, true in intonation (generally), and often loud of voice; how tame these points of merit are in comparison with what Wagner has demanded; technique and effort were to be lost sight of altogether, a presentation of the power of Fate such as the old Greek tragic poets imagined was to be impressed upon the auditor, and here we received only the impression of a conscientious artist using every effort to accomplish a very arduous task, and at the end one was glad that no accident or serious shortcoming had occurred.

The audience applauded everything and seemed to feel obliged to ascribe everything that was unclearly done, or seemed unintelligible, to the depth of the Wagnerian school.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, APRIL 24, 1893.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the twenty-third concert, given in the Music Hal llast Saturday evening, was made up wholly of selections from the works of Richard Wagner, and was as follows:

Overture to "Rienzi."
Peelude to Act III.' Dance of Apprentices, March of the Master-singtrs and Homage to Hans Sachs, from "Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg."
Prelude and First Scene from "Das Rheingold."
Woglinde: Miss Felicia Kaschoska.
Wellgunde: Mrs. Arthur Nikisch.
Flossbilde: Miss Louise Leimer.
Alberich: Mr. Heinrich Meynt.
Siegfried passing through the Fize (from 'Siegfried," Act iii., Scene 2), Morning Dawn, and Siegfried's Voyage up the Rhine (from "Götterdämmerung," Prologue), arranged for concert performance by Hans Richter.
Siegfried's Fnneral March, from "Götterdämmerung," Act. iii., Scene 2.
Brunnhilde's dying speech over Siegfried's body, from "Götterdämmerung," Act iii., Scene 3.
Brünnhilde: Miss Felicia Kaschoska.

A memorable concert in the "Rienzi" overture," Mr. Nikisch makes a little change, which, we believe, was first made in this country by Mr. Walter Damrosch in New York a year or two ago, substituting an inverted turn for the direct one in the first measure of the theme of Rienzi's prayer, in the slow introduction. About the authority for this change various stories are told, the best authenticated of which seems to be this: Hans Richter, looking over the score of "Rienzi" one day was struck with a certain resemblance between the beginning of Rienzi's prayer and the first few notes of the motive of "Siegfried and Brünnhilde's wedded love" in the prologue of Götterdämmerung." The inverted turn is an integral and characteristic factor of the latter; and it occurred to Richter to substitute this inverted turn for the more usual direct one in the Rienzi theme. He accordingly proposed the change to Wagner, who expressed himself as much pleased with it. To us the change seems a not particularly happy one; what the phrase gains thereby in possible distinction it loses in suavity and naturalness. Indeed we think Wagner has seldom been wholly happy in remodelling his earlier works and making them up to date; there is a chasm between his first and third manners that cannot be bridged over, and his earlier works are best as he first conceived them. The performance of the overture was one of those new experiences that Mr. Nikisch gives one from time to time; in brilliancy and vigor of accent it was incomparable. The effect produced at the last return of the "Santo Spirito Cavaliere" theme in the coda was simply overwhelming. And somehow this pushing the frank, outspoken brilliancy of the music to the uttermost pitch, this vigorons playing it for all it is worth, seemed to eliminate much of its coarseness and triviality. For once the overture to "Rienzi" sounded thoroughly inspiring.

The excerpts from the "Meistersinger" are excellently well put together; only we would protest against that unnecessary little tag of somebody else's harmony at the end, which sounds strangely foreign and out of place. There is absolutely no reason why the thing should not end pianissimo, just as the prelude to the third act does. The piece was admirably played.

In his conducting the prelude to "Das Rheingold"—that seemingly endless billowing up and down on the chord of E-flat major—Mr. Nikisch showed how ever-increasing vitality of accent can relieve monotony and make it even exciting. The exquisite first scene between Alberich and the Rhine daughters suffered somewhat by the singing not being invariably in tune, although much of it was beautifully done. The orchestra did its part of the work admirably. What a wonderful scene it is! We know of nothing in this vein in which Wagner has shown himself more full of genius. It was, however, a by no means happy idea to end it, as was done on Saturday evening, with a gratuitous and dramatically inexplicable return to the exultant cry, "Rheingold! Rheingold!" of the three Rhine-daughters. Think of it for a moment: Alberich has run off with the gold, the Rhine-daughters shriek "Woe! Woe!" in terrific diminished-seventh chords, and then, all of a sudden and with no assignable reason, fall into renewed raptures over the gold, just as if nothing had happened! The musical effect is as senseless as the dramatic incongruity. And it would have been so easy to let the orchestra go on with the transformation music, just as it is in the score, and end off majestically with the Valhalla-motive on the brass, taking the second ending in D-flat major!

A similar impression was made upon us by the ending tagged on by Hans Richter to his selections from "Siegfried" and "Götterdämmerung." In the original score, the closing selection—the orchestral interlude between the prologue and first act of "Götterdammerung" ("Siegfrieds Rheinfahrt")—gradually changes from the joyous, estatic character of the Rhine daughters' song to deeper and deeper mysteriousness, ending with as complete and well-prepared a closing cadence (on the first B-natural in the strings and kettledrums of the opening scene in the first act) as can be found in all Wagner. At worst, if this sudden appearance of the strings on a single note in unison, after the full chords on the bass trumpet, trombones, and bass tube that lead up to it, seems a little sudden and unexplained, a full closing chord of B minor might well have been written out for the brass instruments. But, instead of this, Richter has stopped short at the entrance of the dark, mysterious themes in the interlude, and tagged on a few measures of the Valhalla-motive from "Das Rheingold." Now, ending the piece as it ends in the original score would not have displeased a living soul who did not know the music; whereas this interrupting Wagner's thought, and passing on to something utterly irrelevant, merely for the sake of ending off with a blaze, instead of pianissimo, does irritate those listeners who happen to know the music as it stands in the score. The selections were capitally played by the orchestra, the little scherzo on two of Siegfried's themes and Loge's "fire-motive" being given with a clearness and brilliancy that we have not heard before. The great funeral march—why is this movement called a "march," by the way?—was grandly given and made a most profound impression. A little care in expunging certain notes in the contrabass-tuba part, evidently written in for performances where the full force of brass indicated in the score was not available, would have avoided at least one startling tuba effect; but the impressiveness of the performance was such as to make one overlook such details.

The great closing scene in "Götterdammerung" was given with immense impressiveness, Miss Kaschoska singing the part of Brünnhilde with great dramatic power and sincerity of feeling. We can not like Mr. Nikisch's holding back the tempo at Brünnhilde's last "Siegfried! Siegfried! Sieh! Selig grüsst dich dein Weib!" We far prefer Mr. Gericke's and Mme. Lilli Lehmann's way of ending with an impetuous rush. But this was the only flaw; singer and orchestra vied with one another in giving the grand music all its tragic majesty. The orchestral peroration on the three united themes—Valhalla-motive, Rhine-daughters'-motive, and redemption-motive was played with a clearness and expressive power that left nothing to be desired.

In these selections from the "Nibelungen" dramas the orchestra was almost complete, the only instruments lacking to make up the full quota being a third oboe and clarinet, the eighth horn, and five more harps. The Bayreuth-tubas (of which the Boston Symphony Orchestra owns a set) could not be used, their place being taken by horns, and now and then a trombone or bass-tuba. Might it not be well, though, to keep our horn-players to some extent in practice on these beautiful instruments, to meet such emergencies? It would certainly be less of a task for good horn-players to get to feel at home on them than for a clarinetist to master the saxophone, and their quality of tone in the "Nibelungen" music would be very valuable.

The next programme is: Mozart, symphony in D major ("Parisian"); Schubert, unfinished symphony in B minor; Beethoven, symphony No. 3, in E flat major ("Eroica").

Boston Daily Globe.
TUESDAY, APRIL 25, 1893.

WEINGARTNER?

Is That the Name of the Coming Director?

Berlin's Famous Leader Named for Nikisch's Place.

Other Available Men for the Symphony's Baton.

Mr. Higginson Declines to Give Information,

But the Public May Choose a Favorite from This List.

How would Felix Weingartner, 31 years old, handsome, talented and enthusiastic, the leading concert and opera orchestra conductor of Berlin, suit the artistic requirements of Boston as director of the Symphony orchestra?

Weingartner has been considered by Henry L. Higginson, proprietor and director-general of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and so seriously has he scrutinized the Berlin director's musical accomplishments and reputation abroad that he had, according to authentic reports from abroad, decided that Herr Weingartner was a competent and desirable successor to Mr. Nikisch's baton.

This leader's record in Berlin, and the success he has had in arousing the city from a partial lethargy to the most demonstrative enthusiasm was found to be a sufficient certificate of his artistic endowments, ability as a leader and interpreter of symphonic compositions to warrant his approach.

He has been asked to come to Boston, with a suggestion of the emoluments connected with the position.

So quietly was the conversation conducted by cable that it is but little known in Boston that the renowned and has been communicated with.

Youthful Leader

In fact, the limited extent to which it is known on this side is not due to any word dropped here: it came from abroad, and right from Herr Weingartner's own lips in words uttered to a friend.

As the story, which is strongly authenticated, goes, Herr Weingartner told a friend of his abroad that in leaving Berlin it was at his option to go either to England or America.

When the friend, naturally surprised at the latter possibility, asked for more particulars as to the American engagement open for him, the young man replied that he had received a substantial offer of the position of director of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

It is not yet authoritatively stated whether this director has refused to come to Boston, nor is it known that he has positively accepted the position.

It is impossible to secure anything in Boston from the one man who conducts this end of the negotiations for the musicians, consequently the reports from abroad have to be relied upon.

The field of capable symphony orchestra conductors is recognized as very limited, and the demands of this city are such that it seems necessary for Mr. Higginson to have a foreign musician at the head of the orchestra.

As was shown in the case of Hans Richter, the men are not always available, and the fact that prominent conductors abroad are under government restraint and dictation, in consequence of their subsidized directorships reduces the number who can listen to Mr. Higginson's offers still more.

In view of the limited number from which to choose, a GLOBE reporter yesterday endeavored to learn of the men abroad who could fill the director's chair and who were not hampered by contracts or other restrictions which would prevent their accepting if

Offered the Position.

E. A. MacDowell, who is recognized as a leading composer, was seen.

Said Mr. MacDowell: "One of the leading directors abroad, and the most promising young man now recognized, is Felix Weingartner, now in Berlin. He has been approached with regard to accepting the position of director of the Symphony orchestra here. I learn from an apparently authentic source that he has been tendered the directorship.

"You know he is going to leave Berlin. He has been very much dissatisfied for some time with the conditions which surround him in the German capital. He is reported as saying to a friend that he had his choice between two positions—either to go to London and Edinburgh or to come to Boston.

"I have seen no mention made as to whether he has refused the Boston offer or not.

"The offer from England is to direct the opera in London and also conduct concerts at Edinburgh.

"It seems as though he would make an admirable director for the Boston Symphony orchestra. He was a protege of Liszt, and is an enthusiastic admirer of this composer.

"In 1883, when he was only 21 years old, his first opera, entitled 'Sakuntale,' was produced at Weimar, under the patronage of Liszt. The opera was fairly successful.

"He has composed and produced two operas since then, but neither has added to his reputation, and the last

Was a Failure.

"But he has more than regained what he lost in reputation from his operas by his work as a conductor of concerts at Berlin, and during the past year especially he has made a brilliant success. He has been made more of in Berlin than any leader in 50 years.

"Weingartner is a brilliant musician. He is a fine pianist and a tremendous enthusiast. He is a great devotee of Liszt, Berlioz and Wagner."

Mr. MacDowell was asked concerning other directors abroad who might be equal to the demands here and who possibly could accept if asked.

Said he: "Well, there are not very many to select from.

"In Vienna, where Hans Richter is, there is Jahn, but I doubt if it would be possible to get him. He is 58 or 60 years of age, and has for 11 years been the manager of the opera house there.

"He is above Richter, and I imagine he is the one who was responsible for the Emperor restraining Richter from coming here. He is a sort of a go between between Richter and the Emperor. He very rarely leads the orchestra.

"Gericke, who was the symphony director immediately preceding Mr. Nikisch, is in Vienna, but of course we don't know whether he would come to Boston again or not.

"Motti, who directs at Carlsruhe, is a very talented man, but I think it is doubtful if he would come to Boston. His health is very poor, and he could not stand the strain. He has only just returned from Italy, and was married a short time ago. He is a man of high attainments and has just written an opera.

"He was offered the position which Weingartner holds at Berlin three years ago before Weingartner was engaged, but refused it solely for Artistic Reasons.

"He went there and conducted three concerts, and then declined to accept, although the place was worth more than his present position.

"In Munich there is Levi, but he is getting very old and has traveled about a good deal. As he is supposed to have a life position there, I do not think he could be induced to come here.

"There is a director in Berlin named Muck, but I do not think he is to be considered, as he has not much of a reputation. He has not done very much.

"In Paris there are two men who might be obtained if their services were desired. They are Colonne and Lamoureux, and both are men of excellent training."

Mr. MacDowell's attention was called to the general feeling that a German must be the leader, and not a Frenchman, and to this he replied:

"We have here a German orchestra to a great extent, although there are some French and even some Americans in it.

"We of course cannot tell how a Frenchman would handle the Symphony orchestra, but both Colonne and Lamoureux are capable men and men of determination, and either would manage the orchestra.

"Colonne directs weekly concerts on Sundays in Paris, which are called the Chatelet concerts, and are of high grade. The style of the symphony orchestra is bound to change with a new director, and with Colonne there would be a decided change probably. With him as director we should probably have more of the French school, although of course we would have the Beethoven symphonies just the same.

"When I say a change of style I mean that under Colonne the modern German school would suffer—

That is, Brahms'.

Colonne is essentially a concert conductor. I do not think he ever directed an opera.

"Lamoureux directs Sunday concerts in Paris also. He is a very capable conductor, and is remembered prominently, you know, as the man who tried to present Wagner to the French public. He produced "Lohengrin" on his own account in Paris, and the people refused to accept it and he lost a great deal of money.

"Neither of these men are in any way under government subsidy and could undoubtedly come.

"In Dresden the principal director is Schuch, who is a very fine man, but he is director of opera and does not direct concerts. I hardly think he would be acceptable here on this account. His wife is a leading singer.

"In Dresden there is also Nicode, who is a director of symphony concerts, but he is very rich and could not, I think, be induced to come here.

"That leaves Henschel, who is in London, and who was the first director of the Boston Symphony orchestra. Everybody knows of him, and I do not know whether he would come back or not.

"There is one thing that I think you ought to call attention to, and which no one seems to have noticed. In the interview with Richter he said the contract he would have made with Mr. Higginson called for two concerts a week.

"Well now that won't complete the season of the Boston Symphony orchestra. Why there are some weeks that they play

Three or Four Times.

"If the new director is only to appear at two concerts a week, it means that there must be an under director to lead the orchestra at Providence and Cambridge and other places.

"If there is to be an assistant director, why would it not be a good idea to give some talented American musician the chance? It would be a good thing for the musical advancement of the country, and would be a deserved recognition."

The above statement places Weingartner way ahead of the others as a possible future director of the symphony orchestra, as the only really desirable German beside him is Motti, and he, on account of his poor health and his new opera to be produced, would probably not accept any foreign engagement.

As for Henschel, it is not believed among musical people here that he would care to come back to Boston, but concerning Gericke of Vienna, there is an uncertainty as to whether he would return here or not.

It is not believed that Mr. Higginson would care to ask any former director of the Symphony to return, as his policy has been to get something new each time.

Henschel would probably not be so satisfactory, coming after two such men as Gericke and Nikisch.

As for the two Frenchmen, Colonne and Lamoureux, it is extremely doubtful if they would be persona grata to the orchestra here, as it is so essentially German, and Mr. Higginson would probably only take one of these two as a last resort.

Colonne is more prominent in concert work, but it is said that Mr. Higginson does not favor him.

There was a rumor about town yesterday afternoon that Mr. Henschel was coming back on a three years' contract.

A GLOBE reporter waited upon

Henry L. Higginson

to talk over the situation with him.

Said he: "Mr. Higginson, there is a report about town that Henschel is coming back on a three years' contract."

Mr. Higginson looked pleasant, and replied, with charming naivete: "Is that so? Where did you hear that?"

"It was told by ——."

"Well, suppose you go and ask —— if it is so," and the Music Hall proprietor smiled again.

"Well, Mr. Higginson, asked the reporter, "how about Felix Weingartner of Berlin? I understand you have been negotiating for him to succeed Mr. Nikisch."

Mr. Higginson became immediately excited and talked in fortissimo passages. Said he, as he walked vigorously about:

"I'll tell you just as I have told others. I won't say anything about it. You newspaper men have hampered me and caused me a great deal of annoyance, and made my task heavier. It's nobody's business who I get. I don't want to be criticized, either, for it makes matters worse.

"I shall not tell you anything until I get ready to. I shall try and deceive you all I can. My word is not worth anything, so you need not believe anything I tell you about it."

Mr. Higginson was as vigorous in his demeanor as the words would indicate.

On the whole, it would be a pretty good plan for those interested in knowing Boston's new symphony director to keep their eye on young Felix Weingartner, who can be reached by cable at Berlin.

B. J. Lang was interviewed, and stated that his preference would be for the return of Gericke, and he and many others had hoped for his acceptance before Richter was approached, and now looked for him with even more hope.

He thought Gericke's health, which was the cause of his resigning and leaving Boston, was such now that he could undertake the work here again with safety.

He said the former symphony director was conducting a musical organization in Vienna similar to the Cecilia Club of Boston, and also orchestral concerts.

Whether or not Weingartner be finally engaged, the next symphony leader is undoubtedly mentioned in this article.

BRATTLE HALL, : : CAMBRIDGE.

:::::1893:::::

Wednesday Evening, April 26, at 8.

(LAST OF THE SEASON.)

Third Concert

BY

The Kneisel Quartet.

FRANZ KNEISEL. L. SVECENSKI.
OTTO ROTH. ALWIN SCHROEDER.

Programme.

C. M. LOEFFLER. SEXTUOR for two VIOLINS, two VIOLAS, and two 'CELLI in A minor.
Allegro vivo e appassionato andante.—Presto.—Andante. Allegro con spirito.
Second Viola, MR. MAX ZACH.
Second 'Cello, MR. LEO SCHULZ.

IVAN KNORR. PIANO QUARTET in E flat, op. 3.
Allegro molto moderato.—Scherzo (vivace)—Andante.—Finale (moderato).
Piano, MR. CARL STASNY.

SCHUBERT. QUARTET in D minor, (op. posth.)
Allegro.—Andante con moto.—Scherzo (allegro molto.) Presto.

The Piano is a Miller.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1892-93.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

X. CONCERT.

(LAST OF THE SEASON.)

THURSDAY, APRIL 27, AT 7.45, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

JOHANN SEBASTIAN BACH. SUITE in D major.
I. Overture: Grave. D major. Vivace. D major.
II. Air: Lento. D major.
III. Gavotte I.: Allegro. D major. Gavotte II.: the same tempo. D major.
IV. Gigue: Allegro vivace. D major.

LUDWIG VAN BEETHOVEN. SYMPHONY in C minor, No. 5, op. 67.
Allegro con brio. C minor.
Andante con moto. A flat major.
Scherzo, Allegro. C minor.
Trio. C major.
Finale, Allegro. C major.

WAGNER. OVERTURE, "Tannhaeuser."

[148]

Boston Daily Globe.
TUESDAY, APRIL 25, 1893.

WEINGARTNER?

Is That the Name of the Coming Director?

Berlin's Famous Leader Named for Nikisch's Place.

Other Available Men for the Symphony's Baton.

Mr. Higginson Declines to Give Information,

But the Public May Choose a Favorite from This List.

How would Felix Weingartner, 31 years old, handsome, talented and enthusiastic, the leading concert and opera orchestra conductor of Berlin, suit the artistic requirements of Boston as director of the Symphony orchestra?

Weingartner has been considered by Henry L. Higginson, proprietor and director-general of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and so seriously has he scrutinized the Berlin director's musical accomplishments and reputation abroad that he had, according to authentic reports from abroad, decided that Herr Weingartner was a competent and desirable successor to Mr. Nikisch's baton.

This leader's record in Berlin, and the success he has had in arousing the city from a partial lethargy to the most demonstrative enthusiasm was found to be a sufficient certificate of his artistic endowments, ability as a leader and interpreter of symphonic compositions to warrant his approach.

He has been asked to come to Boston, with a suggestion of the emoluments connected with the position.

So quietly was the conversation conducted by cable that it is but little known in Boston that the renowned and has been communicated with.

Youthful Leader

In fact, the limited extent to which it is known on this side is not due to any word dropped here; it came from abroad, and right from Herr Weingartner's own lips in words uttered to a friend.

As the story, which is strongly authenticated, goes, Herr Weingartner told a friend of his abroad that in leaving Berlin it was at his option to go either to England or America.

When the friend, naturally surprised at the latter possibility, asked for more particulars as to the American engagement open for him, the young man replied that he had received a substantial offer of the position of director of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

It is not yet authoritatively stated whether this director has refused to come to Boston, nor is it known that he has positively accepted the position.

It is impossible to secure anything in Boston from the one man who conducts this end of the negotiations for the musicians, consequently the reports from abroad have to be relied upon.

The field of capable symphony orchestra conductors is recognized as very limited, and the demands of this city are such that it seems necessary for Mr. Higginson to have a foreign musician at the head of the orchestra.

As was shown in the case of Hans Richter, the men are not always available, and the fact that prominent conductors abroad are under government restraint and dictation, in consequence of their subsidized directorships reduces the number who can listen to Mr. Higginson's offers still more.

In view of the limited number from which to choose, a GLOBE reporter yesterday endeavored to learn of the men abroad who could fill the director's chair and who were not hampered by contracts or other restrictions which would prevent their accepting if

Offered the Position.

E. A. MacDowell, who is recognized as a leading composer, was seen.

Said Mr. MacDowell: "One of the leading directors abroad, and the most promising young man now recognized, is Felix Weingartner, now in Berlin. He has been approached with regard to accepting the position of director of the Symphony orchestra here. I learn from an apparently authentic source that he has been tendered the directorship.

"You know he is going to leave Berlin. He has been very much dissatisfied for some time with the conditions which surround him in the German capital. He is reported as saying to a friend that he had his choice between two positions—either to go to London and Edinburgh or to come to Boston.

"I have seen no mention made as to whether he has refused the Boston offer or not.

"The offer from England is to direct the opera in London and also conduct concerts at Edinburgh.

"It seems as though he would make an admirable director for the Boston Symphony orchestra. He was a protege of Liszt, and is an enthusiastic admirer of this composer.

"In 1883, when he was only 21 years old, his first opera, entitled 'Sakuntale,' was produced at Weimar, under the patronage of Liszt. The opera was fairly successful.

"He has composed and produced two operas since then, but neither has added [illegible] his reputation, and the last

Was a Failure.

"But he has more than regained what he lost in reputation from his operas by his work as a conductor of concerts at Berlin, and during the past year especially he has made a brilliant success. He has been made more of in Berlin than any leader in 50 years.

"Weingartner is a brilliant musician. He is a fine pianist and a tremendous enthusiast. He is a great devotee of Liszt, Berlioz and Wagner."

Mr. MacDowell was asked concerning other directors abroad who might be equal to the demands here and who possibly could accept if asked.

Said he: "Well, there are not very many to select from.

"In Vienna, where Hans Richter is, there is Jahn, but I doubt if it would be possible to get him. He is 58 or 60 years of age, and has for 11 years been the manager of the opera house there.

"He is above Richter, and I imagine he is the one who was responsible for the Emperor restraining Richter from coming here. He is a sort of a go between between Richter and the Emperor. He very rarely leads the orchestra.

"Gericke, who was the symphony director immediately preceding Mr. Nikisch, is in Vienna, but of course we don't know whether he would come to Boston again or not.

"Mottl, who directs at Carlsruhe, is a very talented man, but I think it is doubtful if he would come to Boston. His health is very poor, and he could not stand the strain. He has only just returned from Italy, and was married a short time ago. He is a man of high attainments and has just written an opera.

"He was offered the position which Wiengartner holds at Berlin three years ago before Wiengartner was engaged, but refused it solely for Artistic Reasons.

"He went there and conducted three concerts, and then declined to accept, although the place was worth more than his present position.

"In Munich there is Levi, but he is getting very old and has traveled about a good deal. As he is supposed to have a life position there, I do not think he could be induced to come here.

"There is a director in Berlin named Muck, but I do not think he is to be considered, as he has not much of a reputation. He has not done very much.

"In Paris there are two men who might be obtained if their services were desired. They are Colonne and Lamoureux, and both are men of excellent training."

Mr. MacDowell's attention was called to the general feeling that a German must be the leader, and not a Frenchman, and to this he replied:

"We have here a German orchestra to a great extent, although there are some French and even some Americans in it.

"We of course cannot tell how a Frenchman would handle the Symphony orchestra, but both Colonne and Lamoureux are capable men and men of determination, and either would manage the orchestra.

"Colonne directs weekly concerts on Sundays in Paris, which are called the Chatelet concerts, and are of high grade. The style of the symphony orchestra is bound to change with a new director, and with Colonne there would be a decided change probably. With him as director we should probably have more of the French school, although of course we would have the Beethoven symphonies just the same.

"When I say a change of style I mean that under Colonne the modern German school would suffer—

That is, Brahms'.

Colonne is essentially a concert conductor. I do not think he ever directed an opera.

"Lamoureux directs Sunday concerts in Paris also. He is a very capable conductor, and is remembered prominently, you know, as the man who tried to present Wagner to the French public. He produced "Lohengrin" on his own account in Paris, and the people refused to accept it and he lost a great deal of money.

"Neither of these men are in any way under government subsidy and could undoubtedly come.

"In Dresden the principal director is Schuch, who is a very fine man, but he is director of opera and does not direct concerts. I hardly think he would be acceptable here on this account. His wife is a leading singer.

"In Dresden there is also Nicode, who is a director of symphony concerts, but he is very rich and could not, I think, be induced to come here.

"That leaves Henschel, who is in London, and who was the first director of the Boston Symphony orchestra. Everybody knows of him, and I do not know whether he would come back or not.

"There is one thing that I think you ought to call attention to, and which no one seems to have noticed. In the interview with Richter he said the contract he would have made with Mr. Higginson called for two concerts a week.

"Well now that won't complete the season of the Boston Symphony orchestra. Why there are some weeks that they play

Three or Four Times.

"If the new director is only to appear at two concerts a week, it means that there must be an under director to lead the orchestra at Providence and Cambridge and other places.

"If there is to be an assistant director, why would it not be a good idea to give some talented American musician the chance? It would be a good thing for the musical advancement of the country, and would be a deserved recognition."

The above statement places Weingartner way ahead of the others as a possible future director of the symphony orchestra, as the only really desirable German beside him is Mottl, and he, on account of his poor health and his new opera to be produced, would probably not accept any foreign engagement.

As for Henschel, it is not believed among musical people here that he would care to come back to Boston, but concerning Gericke of Vienna, there is an uncertainty as to whether he would return here or not.

It is not believed that Mr. Higginson would care to ask any former director of the Symphony to return, as his policy has been to get something new each time.

Henschel would probably not be so satisfactory, coming after two such men as Gericke and Nikisch.

As for the two Frenchmen, Colonne and Lamoureux, it is extremely doubtful if they would be persona grata to the orchestra here, as it is so essentially German, and Mr. Higginson would probably only take one of these two as a last resort.

Colonne is more prominent in concert work, but it is said that Mr. Higginson does not favor him.

There was a rumor about town yesterday afternoon that Mr. Henschel was coming back on a three years' contract.

A GLOBE reporter waited upon

Henry L. Higginson

to talk over the situation with him.

Said he: "Mr. Higginson, there is a report about town that Henschel is coming back on a three years' contract."

Mr. Higginson looked pleasant, and replied, with charming naivete: "Is that so? Where did you hear that?"

"It was told by ——"

"Well, suppose you go and ask —— if it is so," and the Music Hall proprietor smiled again.

"Well, Mr. Higginson," asked the reporter, "how about Felix Weingartner of Berlin? I understand you have been negotiating for him to succeed Mr. Nikisch."

Mr. Higginson became immediately excited and talked in fortissimo passages. Said he, as he walked vigorously about:

"I'll tell you just as I have told others. I won't say anything about it. You newspaper men have hampered me and caused me a great deal of annoyance, and made my task heavier. It's nobody's business who I get. I don't want to be criticized, either, for it makes matters worse.

"I shall not tell you anything until I get ready to. I shall try and deceive you all I can. My word is not worth anything, so you need not believe anything I tell you about it."

Mr. Higginson was as vigorous in his demeanor as the words would indicate.

On the whole, it would be a pretty good plan for those interested in knowing Boston's new symphony director to keep their eye on young Felix Weingartner, who can be reached by cable at Berlin.

B. J. Lang was interviewed, and stated that his preference would be for the return of Gericke, and he and many others had hoped for his acceptance before Richter was approached, and now looked for him with even more hope.

He thought Gericke's health, which was the cause of his resigning and leaving Boston, was such now that he could undertake the work here again with safety.

He said the former symphony director was conducting a musical organization in Vienna similar to the Cecilia Club of Boston, and also orchestral concerts.

Whether or not Weingartner be finally engaged, the next symphony leader is undoubtedly mentioned in this article.

BRATTLE HALL, : : CAMBRIDGE.

:::::1893:::::

Wednesday Evening, April 26, at 8.

(LAST OF THE SEASON.)

Third Concert

BY

The Kneisel Quartet.

FRANZ KNEISEL. L. SVECENSKI.
OTTO ROTH. ALWIN SCHROEDER.

Programme.

C. M. LOEFFLER. SEXTUOR for two VIOLINS, two VIOLAS, and two 'CELLI in A minor.
Allegro vivo e appassionato andante.—Presto.—Andante. Allegro con spirito.
Second Viola, MR. MAX ZACH.
Second 'Cello, MR. LEO SCHULZ.

IVAN KNORR. PIANO QUARTET in E flat, op. 3.
Allegro molto moderato.—Scherzo (vivace)—Andante.—Finale (moderato).
Piano, MR. CARL STASNY.

SCHUBERT. QUARTET in D minor, (op. posth.)
Allegro.—Andante con moto.—Scherzo (allegro molto.) Presto.

The Piano is a Miller.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1892-93.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

X. CONCERT.

(LAST OF THE SEASON.)

THURSDAY, APRIL 27, AT 7.45, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

JOHANN SEBASTIAN BACH. SUITE in D major.
I. Overture: Grave. D major. Vivace. D major.
II. Air: Lento. D major.
III. Gavotte I.: Allegro. D major. Gavotte II.: the same tempo. D major.
IV. Gigue: Allegro vivace. D major.

LUDWIG VAN BEETHOVEN. SYMPHONY in C minor, No. 5, op. 67.
Allegro con brio. C minor.
Andante con moto. A flat major.
Scherzo, Allegro. C minor.
Trio. C major.
Finale, Allegro. C major.

WAGNER. OVERTURE, "Tannhaeuser."

[148]

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, APRIL 26, 1893.

The program of the twenty-third symphony concert was made up of selections from the works of Wagner:

Overture to "Rienzi."

Prelude to Act III. Dance of Apprentices, March of the Mastersingers and Homage to Hans Sachs, from "The Mastersinger of Nuremberg."

Prelude and First Scene from "Das Rheingold."

Woglinde.....Miss Felicia Kaschoska
Wellgunde.....Mrs. Arthur Nikisch
Flosshilde.....Miss Louise Leimer
Alberich.....Mr. Henry Meyn

Siegfried Passing Through the Fire, from "Siegfried," Act III., Scene 2 and Morning Dawn, and Siegfried's Voyage up the Rhine, from "Götterdämmerung" Prologue.

Siegfried's Funeral March, from "Götterdämmerung," Act III., Scene 2.

Bruenhilde's Dying Speech Over Siegfried's Body, from "Götterdämmerung," Act III., Scene 3.

Bruenhilde.....Miss Kaschoska.

The audience was very large and very enthusiastic. The overture to Rienzi provoked the most spontaneous and prolonged applause. The orchestral numbers were finely played with unusual brilliancy and dash. The singers worked earnestly in the performance of the allotted task.

* * *

Nothing was known at Music Hall last night about the withdrawal of Richter's acceptance. Mr. Ellis was not in town.

PHILIP HALE.

The Last Kneisel Concert.

THE postponed concert of the Kneisel Quartet of Boston occurred last Monday afternoon in Chickering Hall. The club played Haydn's quartet in D, op. 64, No. 5; Beethoven's noble and lofty C sharp minor quartet, and the revised edition of Brahms' lovely trio in B for piano and strings. This latter work is full of the characteristic Brahmsian idioms, has not a dry movement, is spontaneous, melodious and full of power. Oddly enough, the final allegro ends in B minor. Scholarly as Brahms always is, he is pre-eminently a composer of moods, only his moods are not as other men's. What he says is ever individual. The trio was played in the most finished manner, Mr. Arthur Whiting, of Boston, playing the piano in an unobtrusive and thoroughly musical fashion. The quartet played in their usual beauty of tone, a true quartet tone, and the four concerts this season have been unquestionably enjoyable and interesting.

RICHTER HAS SIGNED THE CONTRACT.

CONTRADICTORY rumors to the contrary notwithstanding, Hans Richter signed the articles of agreement with Mr. Higginson Thursday, April 13, by which he is under contract to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in place of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, resigned. This news was given us by Mr. C. A. Ellis, the manager of the orchestra. Now the matter rests entirely with Mr. Richter.

If he can get away he will, for he is anxious to visit us in an artistic capacity. Whether he will be allowed to resign his Viennese engagements remains to be seen. He has always the Emperor as a final court of appeal, anyhow. Besides there is no law that can prevent him taking a steamer to Boston. The talk about life pensions, &c., is not conclusive, for by the terms of his contract with Mr. Higginson, he would be more than reimbursed for any sacrifices made on that score. Besides, Richter is a man past fifty. In Mr. Floersheim's interesting budget of Berlin news this week the situation is discussed; also a latter day estimate of the great conductor's work.

WEINGARTNER TO MUNICH.

As I take up the English musical papers I am forced to smile when I read how they are fighting about who Weingartner is. It appears that a new orchestral society has been formed at Glasgow and that it was proposed to engage that young man for the post of conductor. Well, they may propose for a long time; Weingartner is already disposed of. Meanwhile I learn that Colonel Higginson has also been after that much sought after young man and that very tempting financial offers have been made him if he wants to be the immediate successor to Arthur Nikisch, Esq. Of this, however, there could be as little question as of the acceptance of the Glasgow engagement, as Weingartner is still bound for three years by contract to the Royal Opera House. I do not think that Colonel Higginson is exactly the man to be a party to a breach of contract, even if Weingartner for the sake of the almighty dollar had been willing to break his Berlin engagement, a fact which I very much doubt, however. Not to be outbid and to make assurance doubly sure in order to hold his bird, Count Hochberg, the royal intendant, last week made Weingarner an offer for a lifelong engagement under splendid and most flattering conditions. This offer, I am informed from headquarters, Weingartner is said to have virtually accepted before several days ago he left for Milan where he is to conduct several concerts this week. To-day, however, the telegraph, to the great consternation of everybody, brings the news that Weingartner has signed with the Munich Royal Opera House, of which Possart now is the intendant, and that from April 1, 1896, when his Berlin contract will expire, he is to become the successor to General Director Hermann Levi, who by that time will probably retire from active service. Whether or not this officially published telegram tells the truth I cannot at this moment verify, but I hardly doubt its authenticity.

* * *

But what will become of Boston and its fine orchestra is the question foremost in my mind. The Boston critics drove away Nikisch, as they did Gericke before him. Hans Richter they cannot get, all rumors to the contrary notwithstanding; and if they could get him they would not long be satisfied, as he is growing old and rather a little careless and easy going. His conducting, as I had occasion to notice this season, would never do in Boston, where for exactness and finesse they have been spoiled by both Gericke and Nikisch. Mottl will not leave Carlsruhe: besides, he would also prove more or less disappointing. The list of great conductors is rather limited just now, and a smaller one they could not very well tolerate at Boston after Nikisch. Erdmannsdörfer, of Bremen, might possibly do, and I think they can get him; but outside of him I know only one man, one great conductor whom they could get, and his name I am not going to divulge unless I am applied to in the matter. In Boston, however, they will not think of him, and in fact will probably know barely more of him than his name, if that be mentioned. There is, however, one man in the United States just now who knows whom I mean, and who also knows all about that conductor, and that man's name is Franz Rummel.

Boston Transcript

THURSDAY, APRIL 27, 1893.

MR. NIKISCH'S DEPARTURE.

A Peremptory and Unexpected Close to His Engagement.

Mr. Nikisch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has decided to wield the baton over that organization for the last time next Saturday evening. This is the end of the Boston series of symphony concerts, but not of the year's work embraced in his contract with Colonel Higginson as three weeks of travel including two important concerts at the World's Fair remain. Mr. Nikisch has had the right to sunder his connection at any time, and at the beginning of this week gave Colonel Higginson notice of his decision not to accompany the orchestra on its tour, assigning as his reason an apprehension of ill health. It appears, however, that the director offered on certain conditions to fill out his season—which conditions Mr. Higginson found totally inadmissible—and which, moreover, of course could offer no guarantee that Mr. Nikisch's health would be such that he could travel to the West. The question as to who will conduct the orchestra on its tour remains open for the present, but probably the task will devolve naturally on Mr. Kneisel, the leader of the violins.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCIII, NO. 118.

FRIDAY, APRIL 28, 1893.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Mr. Arthur Nikisch's Abrupt Resignation—The Opera.

Mr. Arthur Nikisch will appear as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra for the last time tomorrow evening, although the season covered by his contract with Mr. Higginson does not end until May 20. It was understood that Mr. Nikisch would accompany the orchestra on its western tour beginning next Monday, and he had made the programmes to be given in the different cities.

By the terms of his contract Mr. Nikisch had the right, under certain conditions, to terminate his engagement at any time. Within a few days he gave notice that he would not make the western tour, giving as his reason fear of sickness. He made a proposition, however, that under certain conditions he would finish the season. These conditions were inadmissable and were declined.

It is probable that the remaining concerts will be conducted by Concertmaster Kneisel.

Boston Journal.

FRIDAY, APRIL 28, 1893.

WILL IT BE MOTTL?

Reported Now That the Famous Carlsruhe Conductor Has Been Called to Succeed Nikisch.

And now it is said that Felix Mottl, the famous musical conductor of Carlsruhe, has received an offer from the Boston Symphony Orchestra management to take the place made vacant by the resignation of Arthur Nikisch. But it is added that so many appeals have been made to Mottl to induce him to remain in Carlsruhe that it is thought he may decline the offer to go to America.

Mottl was born Aug. 29, 1856, at Unter-St. Veit, near Vienna. He was a pupil of the Vienna Conservatory. In 1881 he was called to Carlsruhe to take charge of the opera orchestra. In 1886 he refused a call to Berlin. In the same year he directed at Baireuth with great success. Of late his health has been poor, and he has directed at rare intervals in different German cities. Mottl has written an opera, "Agnes Bernauer," performed at Weimar, 1880.

Mr. Nikisch has decided to wield the baton over the Symphony Orchestra for the last time next Saturday evening. This is the end of the Boston series of Symphony concerts, but not of the year's work embraced in his contract with Colonel Higginson, as three weeks of travel, including two important concerts at the World's Fair, remain. Mr. Nikisch has had the right to sunder his connection at any time, and at the beginning of this week gave Colonel Higginson notice of his decision not to accompany the orchestra on its tour, assigning as his reason an apprehension of ill health. It appears, however, that the director offered on certain conditions to fill out his season—which conditions Mr. Higginson found totally inadmissible—and which, moreover, of course could offer no guarantee that Mr. Nikisch's health would be such that he could travel to the West. The question as to who will conduct the orchestra on its tour remains open for the present, but probably the task will devolve naturally on Mr. Kneisel, the leader of the violins.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.

FRIDAY MORNING, APRIL 28, 1893.

MR. NIKISCH'S LAST CONCERT.

Not to Accompany the Symphony Orchestra On its Tour.

Mr. Nikisch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has decided to wield the baton over that organization for the last time next Saturday evening. This is the end of the Boston series of symphony concerts, but not of the year's work embraced in his contract with Col. Higginson, as three weeks of travel, including two important concerts at the world's fair, remain.

Mr. Nikisch has had the right to sunder his connection at any time, and at the beginning of this week gave Col. Higginson notice of his decision not to accompany the orchestra on its tour, assigning as his reason an apprehension of ill health. It appears, however, that the director offered on certain conditions to fill out his season—which conditions Mr. Higginson found totally inadmissible—and which, moreover, of course could offer no guarantee that Mr. Nikisch's health would be such that he could travel to the West.

The question as to who will conduct the orchestra on its tour remains open for the present, but probably the task will devolve naturally on Mr. Kneisel, the leader of the violins.

Boston Daily Globe.

FRIDAY, APRIL 28.

NIKISCH NEARLY THROUGH.

His Last Appearance Will be on Saturday Next.

Next Saturday the Boston Symphony orchestra closes its engagement in this city, and on that occasion Mr. Nikisch will wield the baton for the last time over that organization of musicians.

The close of the Boston series does not complete the year's work, as the orchestra has a contract with Col. Higginson for three weeks of travel, including two important concerts to be given at the World's fair. Mr. Nikisch notified Col. Higginson early in the week, that due to apprehensions of ill health he would not accompany the orchestra on its tour. He, however, offered under certain conditions to fulfil the engagement, but the conditions were found inadmissible by Col. Higginson.

Mr. Kneisel, the leader of the violins, will probably lead the orchestra during its Western tour.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

FRIDAY MORNING, APRIL 28, 1893.

NIKISCH SOON TO GO.

Mr. Nikisch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has decided to wield the baton over that organization for the last time next Saturday evening. This is the end of the Boston series of Symphony concerts, but not of the year's work embraced in his contract with Colonel Higginson, as three weeks of travel, including two important concerts at the World's Fair, remain. Mr. Nikisch cannot go to Chicago on account of ill health, and during the latter engagement Mr. Kneisel will probably wave the baton.

BOSTON HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, APRIL 29,

THE SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR.

NOW THAT RICHTER is effectually disposed of as the next conductor, the Symphony Orchestra is apparently no nearer having a leader than before. It is to be regretted that Richter cannot come, not only because he wanted to, but because Boston evidently wanted him. But it is now quite clear that he will at some time in the future become its conductor, presumably when his present contract expires four years from now. The Berlin correspondent of the Musical Courier is of the opinion that Boston would not like Richter long, and that he would be driven away. He says: "He is growing old and rather a little careless and easy-going. His conducting, as I had occasion to notice this season, would never do in Boston, where for exactness and finess they have been spoiled by both Gericke and Nikisch."

Early in the week it was rumored that Weingartner had been offered the position, but this is most effectually settled by the fact that this young conductor has just signed with the Munich Royal Opera House, of which Possart is now the intendent. At this expiration of the contract, in 1896, he is to become the successor of Hermann Levi. The list of men who are eminent enough to suit seems to embrace only those who are fastened elsewhere, for after Gericke and Nikisch a small man would not do. Mottl, it is said, will not leave Carlsruhe and Erdmannsdörfer if Bremen is mentioned as available. This is the situation at present, and it must be settled by Mr. Higginson. He is getting many suggestions, but the funniest is from the above-quoted correspondent of the Musical Courier, who says he knows the name of the one great conductor who would do for the place, but that his name is known in the United States to only one man. He further announces that he will divulge it if he is applied to in the matter. It seems a little odd that this great man should be concealed so closely, but perhaps Mr. Higginson will finally be driven to giving this correspondent the notice that he is begging, and then we shall all know of this wonderful man who has so marvelously escaped fame.

[149]

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, APRIL 26, 1893.

The program of the twenty-third symphony concert was made up of selections from the works of Wagner:

Overture to "Rienzi."

Prelude to Act III. Dance of Apprentices, March of the Mastersingers and Homage to Hans Sachs, from "The Mastersinger of Nuremberg."

Prelude and First Scene from "Das Rheingold."

Woglinde.....Miss Felicia Kaschoska
Wellgunde.....Mrs. Arthur Nikisch
Flosshilde.....Miss Louise Leimer
Alberich.....Mr. Henry Meyn

Siegfried Passing Through the Fire, from "Siegfried," Act III., Scene 2 and Morning Dawn, and Siegfried's Voyage up the Rhine, from "Götterdämmerung" Prologue.

Siegfried's Funeral March, from "Götterdämmerung," Act III., Scene 2.

Bruenhilde's Dying Speech Over Siegfried's Body, from "Götterdämmerung," Act III., Scene 3.

Bruenhilde.....Miss Kaschoska.

The audience was very large and very enthusiastic. The overture to Rienzi provoked the most spontaneous and prolonged applause. The orchestral numbers were finely played with unusual brilliancy and dash. The singers worked earnestly in the performance of the allotted task.

* * *

Nothing was known at Music Hall last night about the withdrawal of Richter's acceptance. Mr. Ellis was not in town.

PHILIP HALE.

The Last Kneisel Concert.

THE postponed concert of the Kneisel Quartet of Boston occurred last Monday afternoon in Chickering Hall. The club played Haydn's quartet in D, op. 64, No. 5; Beethoven's noble and lofty C sharp minor quartet, and the revised edition of Brahms' lovely trio in B for piano and strings. This latter work is full of the characteristic Brahmsian idioms, has not a dry movement, is spontaneous, melodious and full of power. Oddly enough, the final allegro ends in B minor. Scholarly as Brahms always is, he is pre-eminently a composer of moods, only his moods are not as other men's. What he says is ever individual. The trio was played in the most finished manner, Mr. Arthur Whiting, of Boston, playing the piano in an unobtrusive and thoroughly musical fashion. The quartet played in their usual beauty of tone, a true quartet tone, and the four concerts this season have been unquestionably enjoyable and interesting.

RICHTER HAS SIGNED THE CONTRACT.

CONTRADICTORY rumors to the contrary notwithstanding, Hans Richter signed the articles of agreement with Mr. Higginson Thursday, April 13, by which he is under contract to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in place of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, resigned. This news was given us by Mr. C. A. Ellis, the manager of the orchestra. Now the matter rests entirely with Mr. Richter.

If he can get away he will, for he is anxious to visit us in an artistic capacity. Whether he will be allowed to resign his Viennese engagements remains to be seen. He has always the Emperor as a final court of appeal, anyhow. Besides there is no law that can prevent him taking a steamer to Boston. The talk about life pensions, &c., is not conclusive, for by the terms of his contract with Mr. Higginson, he would be more than reimbursed for any sacrifices made on that score. Besides, Richter is a man past fifty. In Mr. Floersheim's interesting budget of Berlin news this week the situation is discussed; also a latter day estimate of the great conductor's work.

WEINGARTNER TO MUNICH.

As I take up the English musical papers I am forced to smile when I read how they are fighting about who Weingartner is. It appears that a new orchestral society has been formed at Glasgow and that it was proposed to engage that young man for the post of conductor. Well, they may propose for a long time; Weingartner is already disposed of. Meanwhile I learn that Colonel Higginson has also been after that much sought after young man and that very tempting financial offers have been made him if he wants to be the immediate successor to Arthur Nikisch, Esq. Of this, however, there could be as little question as of the acceptance of the Glasgow engagement, as Weingartner is still bound for three years by contract to the Royal Opera House. I do not think that Colonel Higginson is exactly the man to be a party to a breach of contract, even if Weingartner for the sake of the almighty dollar had been willing to break his Berlin engagement, a fact which I very much doubt, however. Not to be outbid and to make assurance doubly sure in order to hold his bird, Count Hochberg, the royal intendant, last week made Weingarner an offer for a lifelong engagement under splendid and most flattering conditions. This offer, I am informed from headquarters, Weingartner is said to have virtually accepted before several days ago he left for Milan where he is to conduct several concerts this week. To-day, however, the telegraph, to the great consternation of everybody, brings the news that Weingartner has signed with the Munich Royal Opera House, of which Possart now is the intendant, and that from April 1, 1896, when his Berlin contract will expire, he is to become the successor to General Director Hermann Levi, who by that time will probably retire from active service. Whether or not this officially published telegram tells the truth I cannot at this moment verify, but I hardly doubt its authenticity.

* * *

But what will become of Boston and its fine orchestra is the question foremost in my mind. The Boston critics drove away Nikisch, as they did Gericke before him. Hans Richter they cannot get, all rumors to the contrary notwithstanding; and if they could get him they would not long be satisfied, as he is growing old and rather a little careless and easy going. His conducting, as I had occasion to notice this season, would never do in Boston, where for exactness and finesse they have been spoiled by both Gericke and Nikisch. Mottl will not leave Carlsruhe: besides, he would also prove more or less disappointing. The list of great conductors is rather limited just now, and a smaller one they could not very well tolerate at Boston after Nikisch. Erdmannsdörfer, of Bremen, might possibly do, and I think they can get him; but outside of him I know only one man, one great conductor whom they could get, and his name I am not going to divulge unless I am applied to in the matter. In Boston, however, they will not think of him, and in fact will probably know barely more of him than his name, if that be mentioned. There is, however, one man in the United States just now who knows whom I mean, and who also knows all about that conductor, and that man's name is Franz Rummel.

Boston Transcript

THURSDAY, APRIL 27, 1893.

MR. NIKISCH'S DEPARTURE.

A Peremptory and Unexpected Close to His Engagement.

Mr. Nikisch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has decided to wield the baton over that organization for the last time next Saturday evening. This is the end of the Boston series of symphony concerts, but not of the year's work embraced in his contract with Colonel Higginson as three weeks of travel including two important concerts at the World's Fair remain. Mr. Nikisch has had the right to sunder his connection at any time, and at the beginning of this week gave Colonel Higginson notice of his decision not to accompany the orchestra on its tour, assigning as his reason an apprehension of ill health. It appears, however, that the director offered on certain conditions to fill out his season—which conditions Mr. Higginson found totally inadmissible—and which, moreover, of course could offer no guarantee that Mr. Nikisch's health would be such that he could travel to the West. The question as to who will conduct the orchestra on its tour remains open for the present, but probably the task will devolve naturally on Mr. Kneisel, the leader of the violins.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCIII, NO. 118.

FRIDAY, APRIL 28, 1893.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Mr. Arthur Nikisch's Abrupt Resignation—The Opera.

Mr. Arthur Nikisch will appear as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra for the last time tomorrow evening, although the season covered by his contract with Mr. Higginson does not end until May 20. It was understood that Mr. Nikisch would accompany the orchestra on its western tour beginning next Monday, and he had made the programmes to be given in the different cities.

By the terms of his contract Mr. Nikisch had the right, under certain conditions, to terminate his engagement at any time. Within a few days he gave notice that he would not make the western tour, giving as his reason fear of sickness. He made a proposition, however, that under certain conditions he would finish the season. These conditions were inadmissable and were declined.

It is probable that the remaining concerts will be conducted by Concertmaster Kneisel.

Boston Journal.

FRIDAY, APRIL 28, 1893.

WILL IT BE MOTTL?

Reported Now That the Famous Carlsruhe Conductor Has Been Called to Succeed Nikisch.

And now it is said that Felix Mottl, the famous musical conductor of Carlsruhe, has received an offer from the Boston Symphony Orchestra management to take the place made vacant by the resignation of Arthur Nikisch. But it is added that so many appeals have been made to Mottl to induce him to remain in Carlsruhe that it is thought he may decline the offer to go to America.

Mottl was born Aug. 29, 1856, at Unter-St. Veit, near Vienna. He was a pupil of the Vienna Conservatory. In 1881 he was called to Carlsruhe to take charge of the opera orchestra. In 1886 he refused a call to Berlin. In the same year he directed at Baireuth with great success. Of late his health has been poor, and he has directed at rare intervals in different German cities. Mottl has written an opera, "Agnes Bernauer," performed at Weimar, 1880.

Mr. Nikisch has decided to wield the baton over the Symphony Orchestra for the last time next Saturday evening. This is the end of the Boston series of Symphony concerts, but not of the year's work embraced in his contract with Colonel Higginson, as three weeks of travel, including two important concerts at the World's Fair, remain. Mr. Nikisch has had the right to sunder his connection at any time, and at the beginning of this week gave Colonel Higginson notice of his decision not to accompany the orchestra on its tour, assigning as his reason an apprehension of ill health. It appears, however, that the director offered on certain conditions to fill out his season—which conditions Mr. Higginson found totally inadmissible—and which, moreover, of course could offer no guarantee that Mr. Nikisch's health would be such that he could travel to the West. The question as to who will conduct the orchestra on its tour remains open for the present, but probably the task will devolve naturally on Mr. Kneisel, the leader of the violins.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

FRIDAY MORNING, APRIL 28, 1893.

MR. NIKISCH'S LAST CONCERT.

Not to Accompany the Symphony Orchestra On its Tour.

Mr. Nikisch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has decided to wield the baton over that organization for the last time next Saturday evening. This is the end of the Boston series of symphony concerts, but not of the year's work embraced in his contract with Col. Higginson, as three weeks of travel, including two important concerts at the world's fair, remain.

Mr. Nikisch has had the right to sunder his connection at any time, and at the beginning of this week gave Col. Higginson notice of his decision not to accompany the orchestra on its tour, assigning as his reason an apprehension of ill health. It appears, however, that the director offered on certain conditions to fill out his season—which conditions Mr. Higginson found totally inadmissible—and which, moreover, of course could offer no guarantee that Mr. Nikisch's health would be such that he could travel to the West.

The question as to who will conduct the orchestra on its tour remains open for the present, but probably the task will devolve naturally on Mr. Kneisel, the leader of the violins.

Boston Daily Globe.

FRIDAY, APRIL 28.

NIKISCH NEARLY THROUGH.

His Last Appearance Will be on Saturday Next.

Next Saturday the Boston Symphony orchestra closes its engagement in this city, and on that occasion Mr. Nikisch will wield the baton for the last time over that organization of musicians.

The close of the Boston series does not complete the year's work, as the orchestra has a contract with Col. Higginson for three weeks of travel, including two important concerts to be given at the World's fair. Mr. Nikisch notified Col. Higginson early in the week, that due to apprehensions of ill health he would not accompany the orchestra on its tour. He, however, offered under certain conditions to fulfil the engagement, but the conditions were found inadmissible by Col. Higginson.

Mr. Kneisel, the leader of the violins, will probably lead the orchestra during its Western tour.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

FRIDAY MORNING, APRIL 28, 1893.

NIKISCH SOON TO GO.

Mr. Nikisch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has decided to wield the baton over that organization for the last time next Saturday evening. This is the end of the Boston series of Symphony concerts, but not of the year's work embraced in his contract with Colonel Higginson, as three weeks of travel, including two important concerts at the World's Fair, remain. Mr. Nikisch cannot go to Chicago on account of ill health, and during the latter engagement Mr. Kneisel will probably wave the baton.

BOSTON HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, APRIL 29,

THE SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR.

NOW THAT RICHTER is effectually disposed of as the next conductor, the Symphony Orchestra is apparently no nearer having a leader than before. It is to be regretted that Richter cannot come, not only because he wanted to, but because Boston evidently wanted him. But it is now quite clear that he will at some time in the future become its conductor, presumably when his present contract expires four years from now. The Berlin correspondent of the Musical Courier is of the opinion that Boston would not like Richter long, and that he would be driven away. He says: "He is growing old and rather a little careless and easy-going. His conducting, as I had occasion to notice this season, would never do in Boston, where for exactness and finess they have been spoiled by both Gericke and Nikisch."

Early in the week it was rumored that Weingartner had been offered the position, but this is most effectually settled by the fact that this young conductor has just signed with the Munich Royal Opera House, of which Possart is now the intendent. At this expiration of the contract, in 1896, he is to become the successor of Hermann Levi. The list of men who are eminent enough to suit seems to embrace only those who are fastened elsewhere, for after Gericke and Nikisch a small man would not do. Mottl, it is said, will not leave Carlsruhe and Erdmannsdörfer if Bremen is mentioned as available. This is the situation at present, and it must be settled by Mr. Higginson. He is getting many suggestions, but the funniest is from the above-quoted correspondent of the Musical Courier, who says he knows the name of the one great conductor who would do for the place, but that his name is known in the United States to only one man. He further announces that he will divulge it if he is applied to in the matter. It seems a little odd that this great man should be concealed so closely, but perhaps Mr. Higginson will finally be driven to giving this correspondent the notice that he is begging, and then we shall all know of this wonderful man who has so marvelously escaped fame.

[149]

...ston Journal.

SATURDAY, APRIL 29, 1893.

WHO WILL LEAD?

New Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Will He Be Weingartner, Mottl or Another?

Notes and Gossip Concerning Three Celebrities.

The question, "Who will be the successor of Mr. Nikisch?" seems to be still unanswered.

Mr. Richter must obey his Emperor.

It is hard to believe the report that "Richter is a painfully lazy man, with no interest whatever in what is going on in the musical world."

It is possible, however, that he dreads the travel to which the leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is subjected by his contract.

Even Mr. Nikisch, a young and presumably spry man, shudders at the thought of another visit to Chicago, and, therefore, does not hesitate to leave his employer in the lurch.

Or, perhaps, Mr. Nikisch is pricked by keen desire to touch once more the soil of his loved fatherland; and he cannot endure the thought of patriotism checked by a mere commercial detail.

PAUL FELIX WEINGARTNER.

***

There is natural public curiosity concerning the successor.

In certain quarters this curiosity is condemned.

It is said, and by those high in authority, that the whole affair is a private enterprise, and therefore the curiosity of the public is impertinent.

Now the Boston Symphony Orchestra is not an institution of eleemosynary relief.

It is true that one man had the courage and the financial resources to found the institution.

At present these concerts are supported in great part by the people who bid eagerly for seats at the yearly auction sale.

Speculators in tickets have shown a praiseworthy desire to put music on a higher plane.

Lovers of music who cannot spare the money for a seat are nevertheless admitted to Music Hall.

They are allowed a certain amount of standing room, and the softer sex is given the use of platform steps.

Surely is public curiosity legitimate when it revolves about a public thing.

If this orchestra were retained solely for the purpose of enlivening conversation in a private house—and such concerts were given this season in certain parlors in New York—then public curiosity might be regarded with reason as out of place.

***

Now that the arrival of Mr. Richter seems unlikely other names are mentioned, and there are rumors of offers made, digested, refused or accepted.

***

The name of Weingartner, for instance, has been urged on the public attention.

And who is Weingartner?

***

Paul Felix Weingartner was born June 2, 1863, in Zara, Dalmatia. His father died when he was young, and the family then moved to Graz. Felix entered the gymnasium, studied music with his mother, and then became a pupil of Wilhelm Meyer. He wrote piano pieces which were published in 1880 by Schuberth of Hamburg. Aided with a city scholarship, Weingartner, in 1881, entered the Leipsic Conservatory. He also studied philosophy at the university. In 1882 he met Liszt, who became warmly interested in him. He left Leipsic in 1883 with the "Mozart prize," and then wrote the text and music of an opera, "Sakuntala," which was first produced March 20, 1884, at Weimar, under Lassen's direction. In 1884 Weingartner appeared as an orchestral conductor in Koenigsberg; he then went to Dantzic, where he finished the text and music of an opera, "Malawika," produced under his direction at Munich, June 2, 1886. He was conductor at the Hamburg Stadt Theatre in 1887; in 1889 he was called to Mannheim; he was at the Frankfort Opera House from June until September, 1890. In 1891 he was called to the opera house at Berlin and began there May 22. The performances, under his direction, of "Lohengrin," "Barber of Seville," "Carmen," "Don Giovanni," "Figaro" and "Fidelio" were highly praised, and as conductor at the Symphony concerts he won distinction by his reading of the Fantastic Symphony by Berlioz, Mozart's G minor symphony and Beethoven's seventh symphony.

But his popularity was suddenly destroyed, at least for a time, by his extraordinary conduct after the failure of his opera "Genesius," first produced at Berlin, Nov. 15, 1892. The criticisms were severe. The opera was withdrawn after the second performance, which was given to an almost empty house. Mr. Weingartner then appeared in print with a letter "To whom it may concern." In it he called the public of Berlin frivolous and unable to judge of such an earnest work as "Genesius." Weingartner in his letter said that at the repetition of his opera "an empty house yawned at him;" whereupon the Boersen Courier remarked "Weingartner was in luck, for if the house had been well filled, a full house would have yawned at him." It was rumored that Weingartner asked Count Hochberg to relieve him of his contract as conductor. The position of first conductor at the Frankfort Opera House was offered to him, but after a vacation trip to Italy he again appeared in Berlin, clothed and apparently in his right mind.

LOZE-HENGRIN AT THE OPERA.
Caricature by Blass in the Pilori, Sept. 27, 1891.

There are conflicting rumors now concerning Weingartner's plans. A new orchestral society at Glasgow is said to have tempted him. Weingartner has a three-year contract with the Berlin Opera House, and the Intendant made him lately a flattering offer for a life-long engagement. It was generally understood that Weingartner accepted this last offer, but Mr. Otto Floersheim, in a letter (April 4) from Berlin to the Musical Courier, makes the following statement:

"To-day the telegraph, to the great consternation of everybody, brings the news that Weingartner has signed with the Munich Royal Opera House, of which Possart now is the intendant, and that from April 1, 1896, when his Berlin contract will expire, he is to become the successor to General Director Hermann Levi, who by that time will probably retire from active service. Whether or not this officially published telegram tells the truth I cannot at this moment verify, but I hardly doubt its authenticity."

Mr. Floersheim writes as follows concerning the possibility of Weingartner's appearance here:

"Meanwhile, I learn that Col. Higginson has also been after that much sought after young man, and that very tempting financial offers have been made him if he wants to be the immediate successor to Arthur Nikisch, Esq. Of this, however, there could be as little question as of the acceptance of the Glasgow engagement, as Weingartner is still bound for three years by contract to the Royal Opera House. I do not think that Col. Higginson is exactly the man to be a party to a breach of contract, even if Weingartner for the sake of the almighty dollar had been willing to break his Berlin engagement, a fact which I very much doubt, however."

There is no doubt, however, of this: that Weingartner has retained his popularity in Berlin, so far as the public at large is concerned, although there are excellent musicians who protest against the occasional musical eccentricities of this restless, nervous man.

Weingartner was married Nov. 5, 1891, to Miss Juillerat-Chasseur, a woman of French Switzerland, whom he met in Mannheim.

He has written the operas above mentioned, songs and a suite, dedicated to von Buelow, for string orchestra.

***

Felix Mottl has been named as the possible successor of Mr. Nikisch, and it is now stated that he has received a definite offer.

***

Mottl enjoys fame as a conductor of opera, and as an authority on the subject of Wagner he is known throughout Europe.

***

But he is not considered a great or distinguished leader of symphony concerts.

***

His appearance in Berlin as a temporary conductor of the Philharmonic concert was a distinct and acknowledged failure.

He directed the sixth subscription concert the ninth of last January, and such was his reception by public and press that he was reluctant to appear at the ninth concert; he conducted, however, but he did not redeem himself, if the reports of that performance are worthy of belief.

THE NEW SIEGE OF PARIS IN 1891.
(An unpublished sketch by Moloch.)

It is possible that his physical condition had much to do with this fiasco. There was a report not long ago that overwork had affected his mind, and that he only found relief by a sojourn in an asylum.

He was able to marry, however, and Dec. 17, 1891, he wedded Henriette Standhartner, an opera singer. The wedding was at Vienna; the witnesses were Hans Richter and the baritone, Reichmann; Siegfried Wagner is said to have been present.

There was talk at the time of Richter's retirement from the Vienna Opera House and Mottl's succession. It was only talk, and Mottl returned to Carlsruhe.

Mottl is at least a man of catholic taste, and he has offered the hospitality of his opera house to such French composers as Berlioz and Chabrier.

***

It is a singular commentary on the condition of music in Boston that the name of Lamoureux, one of the most distinguished conductors in Europe, has not been seriously considered.

Charles Lamoureux was born at Bordeaux, September 28, 1834. He entered the Paris Conservatory in 18[illegible] and studied the violin under Girard. In 18[illegible] he took the first prize for [illegible] composition, with [illegible] and studied composition with Massenet, Bizet, Saint-Saens, Boelmann, Vincent d' Indy, Chabrier, Charpentier and Chevillard.

It is true that the names of Boelman and Chevillard are unknown outside of France.

It is also true that Lamoureux passed over the compositions of Humperdink, Riemenschneider and P. Scharwenka.

PHILIP HALE.

WHY NIKISCH GOES.

The Director Himself Tells One Story and Rumor Tells Another.

It has been currently reported that the resignation of Director Nikisch of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was a hasty act, and that he repents having accepted the offer of the Opera House in Buda Pesth. The story is thus told:

When Mr. Nikisch received the offer from Buda Pesth he went to see Mr. Higginson, the patron of the symphony concerts. He told him of the offer, and said that if a five years' contract were given him he would remain here. Incidentally it may be remarked that Mr. Nikisch is said to get a salary of $9000 a season here, while the Buda Pesth position is worth about $4500. The low cost of living, however, and the many professional advantages easily consume the difference. Mr. Higginson said that he would consider the matter, whereupon Mr. Nikisch acted as if he were insulted, expressing his opinions not mildly, and, to cap it all, he immediately cabled his acceptance to the Hungarian house. It is this action which, it is said, he repents. Subsequently, when the arrangements for the Western trip were being made, he requested extra renumeration. It was refused him, and this, rumor has it, is why the director of the Symphony Orchestra will not accompany it to Chicago.

A Journal reporter interviewed Mr. Nikisch yesterday afternoon, and the director said: "The only reason why I am not going West with the orchestra is that my health is not good. I am completely exhausted. That is really the reason. I intend to go abroad in a week or two. I will go first to Buda Pesth, and then take a rest at some place in the mountains."

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, APRIL 29, 1893.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The twenty-third programme was all taken from Wagner, whose early manner was represented by the noisy and tumultuous "Rienzi" overture, introductory to that opera of tremendous demonstration, crowds, rebellions, death and conflagration. The later periods of his composition were shown in the prelude and first scene of "Rheingold," those Siegfried scenes tacked together by Richter, and the funeral march and the last Brünnhilde declamation from "Götterdämmerung." The orchestral work was generally good, and the occasional slips and jars did not impair the general effect for most listeners. The prelude and its subsequent scene are utterly out of place in a concert-room and mean absolutely nothing without Wagner's spectacular attempts to imitate a river and its bed, a mortal living under water and supposititious mermaids in the agonies of swimming counterfeited by lumbering and sea-sickness-provoking machines. The vocal part was rather untuneful and impot nt and the whole thing was a mistake. Miss Kaschoska did her best with the Brünnhilde, which she delivered vigorously and with that small infusion of musical quality and vocal art which the exigency of being "dramatic," as the Wagner school generally understands it, permitted.

Tonight the season will end with a rather unpersuasive programme. Three symphonies compose it—Mozart's first, Schubert's "Unfinished" and Beethoven's "Eroica." Mr. Nikisch will then conduct the orchestra for the last time.

Boston Journal.

SATURDAY, APRIL 29, 1893.

WHO WILL LEAD?

New Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Will He Be Weingartner, Mottl or Another?

Notes and Gossip Concerning Three Celebrities.

The question, "Who will be the successor of Mr. Nikisch?" seems to be still unanswered.

Mr. Richter must obey his Emperor.

It is hard to believe the report that "Richter is a painfully lazy man, with no interest whatever in what is going on in the musical world."

It is possible, however, that he dreads the travel to which the leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is subjected by his contract.

Even Mr. Nikisch, a young and presumably spry man, shudders at the thought of another visit to Chicago, and, therefore, does not hesitate to leave his employer in the lurch.

Or, perhaps, Mr. Nikisch is pricked by keen desire to touch once more the soil of his loved fatherland; and he cannot endure the thought of patriotism checked by a mere commercial detail.

PAUL FELIX WEINGARTNER.

***

There is natural public curiosity concerning the successor.

In certain quarters this curiosity is condemned.

It is said, and by those high in authority, that the whole affair is a private enterprise, and therefore the curiosity of the public is impertinent.

Now the Boston Symphony Orchestra is not an institution of eleemosynary relief.

It is true that one man had the courage and the financial resources to found the institution.

At present these concerts are supported in great part by the people who bid eagerly for seats at the yearly auction sale.

Speculators in tickets have shown a praiseworthy desire to put music on a higher plane.

Lovers of music who cannot spare the money for a seat are nevertheless admitted to Music Hall.

They are allowed a certain amount of standing room, and the softer sex is given the use of platform steps.

Surely is public curiosity legitimate when it revolves about a public thing.

If this orchestra were retained solely for the purpose of enlivening conversation in a private house—and such concerts were given this season in certain parlors in New York—then public curiosity might be regarded with reason as out of place.

***

Now that the arrival of Mr. Richter seems unlikely other names are mentioned, and there are rumors of offers made, digested, refused or accepted.

***

The name of Weingartner, for instance, has been urged on the public attention.

And who is Weingartner?

***

Paul Felix Weingartner was born June 2, 1863, in Zara, Dalmatia. His father died when he was young, and the family then moved to Graz. Felix entered the gymnasium, studied music with his mother, and then became a pupil of Wilhelm Meyer. He wrote piano pieces, which were published in 1880 by Schuberth of Hamburg. Aided with a city scholarship Weingartner, in 1881, entered the Leipsic Conservatory. He also studied philosophy at the university. In 1882 he met Liszt, who became warmly interested in him. He left Leipsic in 1883 with the "Mozart prize," and then wrote the text and music of an opera, "Sakuntala," which was first produced March 20, 1884, at Weimar, under Lassen's direction. In 1884 Weingartner appeared as an orchestral conductor in Koenigsberg; he then went to Dantzic, where he finished the text and music of an opera, "Malawika," produced under his direction at Munich, June 2, 1886. He was conductor at the Hamburg Stadt Theatre in 1887; in 1889 he was called to Mannheim; he was at the Frankfort Opera House from June until September, 1890. In 1891 he was called to the opera house at Berlin and began there May 22. The performances, under his direction, of "Lohengrin," "Barber of Seville," "Carmen," "Don Giovanni," "Figaro" and "Fidelio" were highly praised, and as conductor at the Symphony concerts he won distinction by his reading of the Fantastic Symphony by Berlioz, Mozart's G minor symphony and Beethoven's seventh symphony.

But his popularity was suddenly destroyed, at least for a time, by his extraordinary conduct after the failure of his opera "Genesius," first produced at Berlin, Nov. 15, 1892. The criticisms were severe. The opera was withdrawn after the second performance, which was given to an almost empty house. Mr. Weingartner then appeared in print with a letter "To whom it may concern," in it he called the public of Berlin frivolous and unable to judge of such an earnest work as "Genesius." Weingartner in his letter said that at the repetition of his opera "an empty house yawned at him;" whereupon the Boersen Courier remarked "Weingartner was in luck, for if the house had been well filled, a full house would have yawned at him." It was rumored that Weingartner asked Count Hochberg to relieve him of his contract as conductor. The position of first conductor at the Frankfort Opera House was offered to him, but after a vacation trip to Italy he again appeared in Berlin, clothed and apparently in his right mind.

LOZE-HENGRIN AT THE OPERA.
Caricature by Blass in the Pilori, Sept. 27, 1891.

There are conflicting rumors now concerning Weingartner's plans. A new orchestral society at Glasgow is said to have tempted him. Weingartner has a three-year contract with the Berlin Opera House, and the Intendant made him lately a flattering offer for a life-long engagement. It was generally understood that Weingartner accepted this last offer, but Mr. Otto Floersheim, in a letter (April 4) from Berlin to the Musical Courier, makes the following statement:

"To-day the telegraph, to the great consternation of everybody, brings the news that Weingartner has signed with the Munich Royal Opera House, of which Possart now is the intendant, and that from April 1, 1896, when his Berlin contract will expire, he is to become the successor to General Director Hermann Levi, who by that time will probably retire from active service. Whether or not this officially published telegram tells the truth I cannot at this moment verify, but I hardly doubt its authenticity."

Mr. Floersheim writes as follows concerning the possibility of Weingartner's appearance here:

"Meanwhile, I learn that Col. Higginson has also been after that much sought after young man, and that very tempting financial offers have been made him if he wants to be the immediate successor to Arthur Nikisch, Esq. Of this, however, there could be as little question as of the acceptance of the Glasgow engagement, as Weingartner is still bound for three years by contract to the Royal Opera House. I do not think that Col. Higginson is exactly the man to be a party to a breach of contract, even if Weingartner for the sake of the almighty dollar had been willing to break his Berlin engagement, a fact which I very much doubt, however."

There is no doubt, however, of this: that Weingartner has regained his popularity in Berlin, so far as the public at large is concerned, although there are excellent musicians who protest against the occasional musical eccentricities of this restless, nervous man.

Weingartner was married Nov. 5, 1891, to Miss Juillerat-Chasseur, a woman of French Switzerland, whom he met in Mannheim.

He has written the operas above mentioned, songs and a suite, dedicated to von Buelow, for string orchestra.

***

Felix Mottl has been named as the possible successor of Mr. Nikisch, and it is now stated that he has received a definite offer.

***

Mottl enjoys fame as a conductor of opera, and as an authority on the subject of Wagner he is known throughout Europe.

***

But he is not considered a great or distinguished leader of symphony concerts.

***

His appearance in Berlin as a temporary conductor of the Philharmonic concert was a distinct and acknowledged failure.

He directed the sixth subscription concert the ninth or last January, and such was his reception by public and press that he was reluctant to appear at the ninth concert; he conducted, however, but he did not redeem himself, if the reports of that performance are worthy of belief.

THE NEW SIEGE OF PARIS IN 1891.
(An unpublished sketch by Moloch.)

It is possible that his physical condition had much to do with this fiasco. There was a report not long ago that overwork had affected his mind, and that he only found relief by a sojourn in an asylum.

He was able to marry, however, and Dec. 17, 1891, he wedded Henriette Standhartner, an opera singer. The wedding was at Vienna; the witnesses were Hans Richter and the baritone, Reichmann; Siegfried Wagner is said to have been present.

There was talk at the time of Richter's retirement from the Vienna Opera House and Mottl's succession. It was only talk, and Mottl returned to Carlsruhe.

Mottl is at least a man of catholic taste, and he has offered the hospitality of his opera house to such French composers as Berlioz and Chabrier.

***

It is a singular commentary on the condition of music in Boston that the name of Lamoureux, one of the most distinguished conductors in Europe, has not been seriously considered.

Charles Lamoureux was born at Bordeaux, September 28, 1834. He entered the Paris Conservatory in 18[illegible] and studied the violin under Girard. In 18[illegible] he took the first prize for violin playing, [illegible] studied composition with Tolbecque, Leborne and Colonne. He then taught, and he founded a string quartette. A member of the Conservatory orchestra, he became its second conductor. Having traveled extensively in Germany and England, Lamoureux became acquainted with choral works of great proportions, and in 1873, unaided, and at his own expense, he founded a society called the "Harmonie Sacrée." Under his direction "The Messiah" was given for the first time in France, Dec. 19, 1873. Other works given were Bach's Passion according to Matthew; Handel's "Judas Maccabeus;" Gounod's "Gallia" and Massenet's "Eve."

Here Lamoureux first showed the qualities that distinguished his leadership: "Scrupulously careful in detail; patient in the preparation; knowledge and musical feeling combined, and to a rare degree; precision and authority joined to enthusiasm; control over men and the ability to communicate personal emotion to others."

In 1875 Lamoureux was conductor of the great Festival at Rouen in honor of Boieldieu. In 1876 Carvalho made him conductor at the Opera Comique. In 1877 he succeeded Deldevez as first conductor at the Paris Opera. He resigned this position Dec 21, 1879, on account of a dispute with Vaucorbeil, the director, concerning the tempo of a movement in "Don Giovanni." He founded, Oct 23, 1881, the Nouveaux Concerts, which under his leadership are a musical feature not only of Paris, but of Europe. He was the first to introduce Brahms's sextets into France. At the head of the Wagnerian movement in France he gave the first performance of "Lohengrin" in France May 3, 1887, at the Eden Theatre. He also was conductor at the performance of "Lohengrin" in September, 1891, at the Paris Opera.

The programmes of the concerts given by Lamoureux this season included works by Brahms, Wagner, Bruch, Dvorak, Grieg, Tschaikowsky, Schumann, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Weber, Liszt, Rubinstein, Ewstafiew, Berlioz, Massenet, Bizet, Saint-Saens, Boelmann, Vincent d' Indy, Chabrier, Charpentier and Chevillard.

It is true that the names of Boelman and Chevillard are unknown outside of France.

It is also true that Lamoureux passed over the compositions of Humperdink, Riemenschneider and P. Scharwenka.

PHILIP HALE.

WHY NIKISCH GOES.

The Director Himself Tells One Story and Rumor Tells Another.

It has been currently reported that the resignation of Director Nikisch of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was a hasty act, and that he repents having accepted the offer of the Opera House in Buda Pesth. The story is thus told:

When Mr. Nikisch received the offer from Buda Pesth he went to see Mr. Higginson, the patron of the symphony concerts. He told him of the offer, and said that if a five years' contract were given him he would remain here. Incidentally it may be remarked that Mr. Nikisch is said to get a salary of $9000 a season here, while the Buda Pesth position is worth about $4500. The low cost of living, however, and the many professional advantages easily consume the difference. Mr. Higginson said that he would consider the matter, whereupon Mr. Nikisch acted as if he were insulted, expressing his opinions not mildly, and, to cap it all, he immediately cabled his acceptance to the Hungarian house. It is this action which, it is said, he repents. Subsequently, when the arrangements for the Western trip were being made, he requested extra renumeration. It was refused him, and this, rumor has it, is why the director of the Symphony Orchestra will not accompany it to Chicago.

A Journal reporter interviewed Mr. Nikisch yesterday afternoon, and the director said: "The only reason why I am not going West with the orchestra is that my health is not good. I am completely exhausted. That is really the reason. I intend to go abroad in a week or two. I will go first to Buda Pesth, and then take a rest at some place in the mountains."

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, APRIL 29, 1893.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The twenty-third programme was all taken from Wagner, whose early manner was represented by the noisy and tumultuous "Rienzi" overture, introductory to that opera of tremendous demonstration, crowds, rebellions, death and conflagration. The later periods of his composition were shown in the prelude and first scene of "Rheingold," those Siegfried scenes tacked together by Richter, and the funeral march and the last Brünnhilde declamation from "Götterdämmerung." The orchestral work was generally good, and the occasional slips and jars did not impair the general effect for most listeners. The prelude and its subsequent scene are utterly out of place in a concert-room and mean absolutely nothing without Wagner's spectacular attempts to imitate a river and its bed, a mortal living under water and supposititious mermaids in the agonies of swimming counterfeited by lumbering and sea-sickness-provoking machines. The vocal part was rather untuneful and impot nt and the whole thing was a mistake. Miss Kaschoska did her best with the Brünnhilde, which she delivered vigorously and with that small infusion of musical quality and vocal art which the exigency of being "dramatic," as the Wagner school generally understands it, permitted.

Tonight the season will end with a rather unpersuasive programme. Three symphonies compose it—Mozart's first, Schubert's "Unfinished" and Beethoven's "Eroica." Mr. Nikisch will then conduct the orchestra for the last time.

Mr. C. A. Ellis announces

TWO · SONG · RECITALS

. . BY . .

Mr. Plunket Greene,

Basso.

. . AT . .

CHICKERING HALL,

. . ON . .

Wednesday Afternoon, April 26th,

Saturday Afternoon, April 29th.

Tickets, with Reserved Seats, $1.50.

On sale at Music Hall Box Office beginning Monday, April 17th.

ORDERS SENT TO MR. C. A. ELLIS, MUSIC HALL, WILL RECEIVE PROMPT ATTENTION.

Itinerary

OF THE

SEVENTH ANNUAL TOUR

(May, 1893)

OF THE . . . . . .

Boston Symphony Orchestra

[redacted], CONDUCTOR.

MR. FRANZ KNEISEL, CONDUCTOR.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

F. R. COMEE, Asst. Manager.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 30.

[illegible] Symphony Concert.

The last concert of the current season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, took place in Music Hall, last night. The programme was: Symphony No. 31, in D Mozart; unfinished symphony, Schubert; "Eroica" Symphony, Beethoven. A very large audience was in attendance. Three symphonies made a somewhat exacting programme to listen to. To review the performances in detail would be only to repeat what we have so often written of the conductor's revised and amended versions of great classical works. The programme afforded him ample opportunities to give a final display of his many faults and his few virtues as a leader. He was warmly received on his first appearance, and was well applauded at different stages of the concert. At the close, curiously enough, there was no demonstration from the public until the orchestra, taking advantage of their last opportunity of the season to applaud, did so heartily, and the audience joining in, continued until Mr. Nikisch was recalled several times. On the last occasion he made a speech, thanking everybody for everything; explained that his ill health prevented him from going to Chicago, and expressed his belief that his dear friend Mr. Kneisel would replace him on the trip, very satisfactorily. The orchestra and the audience applauded again, the season was over, and Mr. Nikisch ceased to be the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra. In our next issue we shall give a review of the Symphony Orchestra season.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY, MAY 1, 1893.

The Twenty-Fourth Concert of the Symphony Orchestra.

The 24th and last Symphony concert of the series of '92-'93 was given Saturday evening in Music Hall. Mr. Arthur Nikisch then made his last appearance as conductor of this orchestra.

The programme was as follows: Symphony, D major (Parisian), Mozart; Unfinished Symphony, B minor, Schubert; Symphony No. 3, Beethoven.

The air of the hall was hot and foul, so that the concert seemed of interminable length. The programme was one of dignity, and the music might have been more fully enjoyed if the attending atmospheric circumstances had been more congenial. But even bad air could not vitiate the tender melancholy and the unearthly beauty of Schubert's fragment.

It is not necessary, now that Mr. Nikisch is no longer in authority, to write at length concerning the merits or faults of the performance of Saturday evening. The orchestra played as though the members appreciated the dignity of the occasion, and, if unfavorable criticism were to be made, it would chiefly concern itself with the ultra-modern ideas of Mr. Nikisch in regard to the proper pace of a movement. The first movement, for instance, of the Heroic Symphony showed the characteristics of the man. There were occasional great effects, and, on the other hand, the frank simplicity of the composer was turned often into the sentimental affectation of the conductor.

Mr. Nikisch will soon be engaged in a congenial task. He is by nature an operatic conductor; he, a Hungarian, is fully equipped for the duty of conducting opera in a Hungarian town to the delight of a Hungarian audience. Surely there is no one here that will not wish him success in the achievement of this task. May his life, then, be one prolonged Hungarian rhapsody!

PHILIP HALE.

MR. NIKISCH SPEAKS.

When Mr. Nikisch came before the public Saturday evening he was applauded heartily. He found the stand and the desk decorated with flowers, and during the concert he was presented with wreaths. After the finale of the Heroic Symphony he was twice recalled, and he then made a speech in English. The speech in substance was as follows: He expressed his appreciation of the kindness shown him here and in other towns of the United States; he praised the orchestra, and he declared that he himself had always given his best endeavor to the gratification of the musical taste of the public. And he expressed great regret, unexpected, that he would be unable on account of sickness to oblige his generous audiences by conducting the season's work in the future. However, declared that his "dear friend Kneisel," as conductor on the tour, would maintain the reputation of the orchestra.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, APRIL 30, 1893.

Last Symphony Concert.

The last symphony concert of the season was given in Music Hall last evening, when Conductor Nikisch bade farewell to the orchestra over which he has presided during the last three years. The orchestra will give several more concerts in other cities this year, but Mr. Nikisch made his final appearance last evening.

Very large audiences were present at both the Friday afternoon rehearsal and at the concert last evening. On both occasions there were substantial expressions of regard for Mr. Nikisch, showing very plainly that a large proportion of the symphony concert patrons sincerely regret that he is to leave them.

Mr. Nikisch has certainly worked conscientiously to maintain the high standard of the orchestra entrusted to his care, and he has the satisfaction of knowing that it has lost nothing under his direction; on the contrary the band is today acknowledged to be the best in the world.

That Mr. Nikisch failed to satisfy the taste of all is not surprising. He has plainly done what he believed to be right, and for the much good work that he has accomplished he will be kindly and gratefully remembered.

Last evening's concert did not call for lengthy comment. The programme was excessively heavy, consisting of three symphonies, Mozart's "Parisian" symphony in D major, Schubert's unfinished symphony and Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony. The last two have been frequently given here under Mr. Nikisch's direction. Schubert's delicious music was played with much expression and artistic effect, and the interpretation of Beethoven's grandly impressive work was marked by the welcome and unwelcome characteristics which have heretofore been pointed out in Mr. Nikisch's reading of the great master's writings. The "Parisian" symphony is a very interesting work, and it was played in a commendable manner.

—Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch, with their two beautiful children and Mme. Nikisch, will sail for London in a fortnight. Later they go to Paris. Mr. and Mrs. Niskisch have been besieged with farewell attentions by their hosts of friends, and at the rehearsal Friday and at the concert last night Mr. Nikisch had a great ovation.

[151]

Mr. C. A. Ellis announces

TWO · SONG · RECITALS

BY

Mr. Plunket Greene,

Basso.

AT

CHICKERING HALL.

ON

Wednesday Afternoon, April 26th,

Saturday Afternoon, April 29th.

Tickets, with Reserved Seats, $1.50.

On sale at Music Hall Box Office beginning Monday, April 17th.

ORDERS SENT TO MR. C. A. ELLIS, MUSIC HALL, WILL RECEIVE PROMPT ATTENTION.

Itinerary

OF THE

SEVENTH ANNUAL TOUR

OF THE (May, 1893)

Boston Symphony Orchestra

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, CONDUCTOR.

MR. FRANZ KNEISEL, CONDUCTOR.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

F. R. COMEE, Asst. Manager.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY, MAY 1, 1893.

The Twenty-Fourth Concert of the Symphony Orchestra.

The 24th and last Symphony concert of the series of '92-'93 was given Saturday evening in Music Hall. Mr. Arthur Nikisch then made his last appearance as conductor of this orchestra.

The programme was as follows: Symphony, D major (Parisian), Mozart; Unfinished Symphony, B minor, Schubert; Symphony No. 3, Beethoven.

The air of the hall was hot and foul, so that the concert seemed of interminable length. The programme was one of dignity, and the music might have been more fully enjoyed if the attending atmospheric circumstances had been more congenial. But even bad air could not vitiate the tender melancholy and the unearthly beauty of Schubert's fragment.

It is not necessary, now that Mr. Nikisch is no longer in authority, to write at length concerning the merits or faults of the performance of Saturday evening. The orchestra played as though the members appreciated the dignity of the occasion, and, if unfavorable criticism were to be made, it would chiefly concern itself with the ultra-modern ideas of Mr. Nikisch in regard to the proper pace of a movement. The first movement, for instance, of the Heroic Symphony showed the characteristics of the man. There were occasional great effects, and, on the other hand, the frank simplicity of the composer was turned often into the sentimental affectation of the conductor.

Mr. Nikisch will soon be engaged in a congenial task. He is by nature an operatic conductor; he, a Hungarian, is fully equipped for the duty of conducting opera in a Hungarian town to the delight of a Hungarian audience. Surely there is no one here that will not wish him success in the achievement of this task.

May his life, then, be one prolonged Hungarian rhapsody!

PHILIP HALE.

MR. NIKISCH SPEAKS.

When Mr. Nikisch came before the public Saturday evening he was applauded heartily. He found the stand and the desk decorated with flowers, and during the concert he was presented with wreaths. After the finale of the Heroic Symphony he was twice recalled, and he then made a speech in English. The speech in substance was as follows: He expressed his appreciation of the kindness shown him here and in other towns of the United States; he praised the orchestra, and he declared that he himself had always given his best endeavor to the gratification of the musical taste of the public; and he expressed great regret, unbounded regret, that he would be unable on account of sickness to oblige his generous patron by completing the season's work in the West. He, however, declared that his "dear friend Kneisel," as conductor on the tour, would maintain the reputation of the orchestra.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, APRIL 30, 1893.

Last Symphony Concert.

The last symphony concert of the season was given in Music Hall last evening, when Conductor Nikisch bade farewell to the orchestra over which he has presided during the last three years. The orchestra will give several more concerts in other cities this year, but Mr. Nikisch made his final appearance last evening.

Very large audiences were present at both the Friday afternoon rehearsal and at the concert last evening. On both occasions there were substantial expressions of regard for Mr. Nikisch, showing very plainly that a large proportion of the symphony concert patrons sincerely regret that he is to leave them.

Mr. Nikisch has certainly worked conscientiously to maintain the high standard of the orchestra entrusted to his care, and he has the satisfaction of knowing that it has lost nothing under his direction; on the contrary the band is today acknowledged to be the best in the world.

That Mr. Nikisch failed to satisfy the taste of all is not surprising. He has plainly done what he believed to be right, and for the much good work that he has accomplished he will be kindly and gratefully remembered.

Last evening's concert did not call for lengthy comment. The programme was excessively heavy, consisting of three symphonies, Mozart's "Parisian" symphony in D major, Schubert's unfinished symphony and Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony. The last two have been frequently given here under Mr. Nikisch's direction. Schubert's delicious music was played with much expression and artistic effect, and the interpretation of Beethoven's grandly impressive work was marked by the welcome and unwelcome characteristics which have heretofore been pointed out in Mr. Nikisch's reading of the great master's writings. The "Parisian" symphony is a very interesting work, and it was played in a commendable manner.

—Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch, with their two beautiful children and Mme. Nikisch, will sail for London in a fortnight. Later they go to Paris. Mr. and Mrs. Niskisch have been besieged with farewell attentions by their hosts of friends, and at the rehearsal Friday and at the concert last night Mr. Nikisch had a great ovation.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 30.

...e Symphony Concert.

The last concert of the current season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, took place in Music Hall, last night. The programme was: Symphony No. 31, in D Mozart; unfinished symphony, Schubert; "Eroica" Symphony, Beethoven. A very large audience was in attendance Three symphonies made a somewhat exacting programme to listen to. To review the performances in detail would be only to repeat what we have so often written of the conductor's revised and amended versions of great classical works. The programme afforded him ample opportunities to give a final display of his many faults and his few virtues as a leader. He was warmly received on his first appearance, and was well applauded at different stages of the concert. At the close, curiously enough, there was no demonstration from the public until the orchestra, taking advantage of their last opportunity of the season to applaud, did so heartily, and the audience joining in, continued until Mr. Nikisch was recalled several times. On the last occasion he made a speech, thanking everybody for everything; explained that his ill health prevented him from going to Chicago, and expressed his belief that his dear friend Mr. Kneisel would replace him on the trip, very satisfactorily. The orchestra and the audience applauded again, the season was over, and Mr. Nikisch ceased to be the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra. In our next issue we shall give a review of the Symphony Orchestra season.

[151]

PROGRAMME,

Wednesday Afternoon, April 26th.

Bois épais, - - - - - - - - - - Lully (1685)

Si tra i ceppi, - - - - - - - - - - Handel

Wer sich der Einsamkeit ergiebt, - - - - - - - Schubert

Waldesgespräch,
In der Fremde,
Dichterliebe, (1, 2, 3,) - - - - - - - - Schumann

PART II.

Old Irish Melodies, arranged by C. Villiers Stanford.

When she answered me.

Patrick Sarsfield.

Sweet Isle.

The Battle Hymn.

The Zephyrs blest.

PART III.

Old Hungarian Melodies adapted by Francis Korbay.

Mid the Cornfields.

Marishka.

Shepherd, see thy horse's foaming mane.

PROGRAMME,

Saturday Afternoon, April 29th.

Beglückte Heerde, - - - - - - - - - - Bach

Vittoria, - - - - - - - - - - - Carissimi

Feldeinsamkeit, - - - - - - - - - - Brahms

Der Engel, - - - - - - - - - - Wagner

Ein Ton, - - - - - - - - - - - Cornelius

Gute Nacht,
Weep ye no more,
Hey! Nonny No! - - - - - - - - Battison Haynes

PART II.

Ancient Melodies of the British Isles, arranged by Arthur Somervell.

Floodes of Teares,
The Three Ravens,
The Happy Farmer, - - - - - - - - - English

By the waters of Babylon
The Ash Grove, - - - - - - - - - - Welsh

Scots wha hae, - - - - - - - - - - Scottish

Myle Charaine, - - - - - - - - - - Manx

Where be going? - - - - - - - - - - Cornish

The Little Red Fox, - - - - - - - - - Irish

Itinerary

OF

SEVENTH AN

OF THE . . . . . .

Bost
Symp
Orch

MR. FRANZ KNEIS

C. A. ELLIS,
Manager.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL

...e Symphony Concert.

The last concert of the current season by the Bo
Symphony Orchestra, took place in Music Hall, night. The programme was: Symphony No. 31,
Mozart; unfinished symphony, Schubert; "Ero Symphony, Beethoven. A very large audience wa attendance Three symphonies made a somewhat acting programme to listen to. To review the per mances in detail would be only to repeat what we h so often written of the conductor's revised amended versions of great classical wor
The programme afforded him ample opport ties to give a final display of his many fa and his few virtues as a leader. He warmly received on his first appearance, was well applauded at different stages of the conc
At the close, curiously enough, there was no dem stration from the public until the orchestra, taki advantage of their last opportunity of the season applaud, did so heartily, and the audience joining continued until Mr. Nikisch was recalled seve times. On the last occasion he made a spee thanking everybody for everything; explained th his ill health prevented him from going to Chicago, a expressed his belief that his dear friend Mr. Knei would replace him on the trip, very satisfactorily. Th orchestra and the audience applauded again, the se son was over, and Mr. Nikisch ceased to be the condu tor of the Symphony Orchestra. In our next issue w shall give a review of the Symphony Orchestra se son.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY, MAY 1, 1893.

The Twenty-Fourth Concert of the Symphony Orchestra.

The 24th and last Symphony concert of the series of '92-'93 was given Saturday evening in Music Hall. Mr. Arthur Nikisch then made his last appearance as conductor of this orchestra.

The programme was as follows: Symphony, D major (Parisian), Mozart; Unfinished Symphony, B minor, Schubert; Symphony No. 3, Beethoven.

The air of the hall was hot and foul, so that the concert seemed of interminable length. The programme was one of dignity, and the music might have been more fully enjoyed if the attending atmospheric circumstances had been more congenial. But even bad air could not vitiate the tender melancholy and the unearthly beauty of Schubert's fragment.

It is not necessary, now that Mr. Nikisch is no longer in authority, to write at length concerning the merits or faults of the performance of Saturday evening. The orchestra played as though the members appreciated the dignity of the occasion, and, if unfavorable criticism were to be made, it would chiefly concern itself with the ultra-modern ideas of Mr. Nikisch in regard to the proper pace of a movement. The first movement, for instance, of the Heroic Symphony showed the characteristics of the man. There were occasional great effects, and, on the other hand, the frank simplicity of the composer was turned often into the sentimental affectation of the conductor.

Mr. Nikisch will soon be engaged in a congenial task. He is by nature an operatic conductor; he, a Hungarian, is fully equipped for the duty of conducting opera in a Hungarian town to the delight of a Hungarian audience. Surely there is no one here that will not wish him success in the achievement of this task.

May his life, then, be one prolonged Hungarian rhapsody!

PHILIP HALE.

MR. NIKISCH SPEAKS.

When Mr. Nikisch came before the public Saturday evening he was applauded heartily. He found the stand and the desk decorated with flowers, and during the concert he was presented with wreaths. After the finale of the Heroic Symphony he was twice recalled, and he then made a speech in English. The speech in substance was as follows: He expressed his appreciation of the kindness shown him here and in other towns of the United States; he praised the orchestra, and he declared that he himself had always given his best endeavor to the gratification of the musical taste of the public; and he expressed great regret, unbounded regret, that he would be unable on account of sickness to oblige his generous patron by completing the season's work in the West. He, however, declared that his "dear friend Kneisel," as conductor on the tour, would maintain the reputation of the orchestra.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, APRIL 30, 1893.

Last Symphony Concert.

The last symphony concert of the season was given in Music Hall last evening, when Conductor Nikisch bade farewell to the orchestra over which he has presided during the last three years. The orchestra will give several more concerts in other cities this year, but Mr. Nikisch made his final appearance last evening.

Very large audiences were present at both the Friday afternoon rehearsal and at the concert last evening. On both occasions there were substantial expressions of regard for Mr. Nikisch, showing very plainly that a large proportion of the symphony concert patrons sincerely regret that he is to leave them.

Mr. Nikisch has certainly worked conscientiously to maintain the high standard of the orchestra entrusted to his care, and he has the satisfaction of knowing that it has lost nothing under his direction; on the contrary the band is today acknowledged to be the best in the world.

That Mr. Nikisch failed to satisfy the taste of all is not surprising. He has plainly done what he believed to be right, and for the much good work that he has accomplished he will be kindly and gratefully remembered.

Last evening's concert did not call for lengthy comment. The programme was excessively heavy, consisting of three symphonies, Mozart's "Parisian" symphony in D major, Schubert's unfinished symphony and Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony. The last two have been frequently given here under Mr. Nikisch's direction. Schubert's delicious music was played with much expression and artistic effect, and the interpretation of Beethoven's grandly impressive work was marked by the welcome and unwelcome characteristics which have heretofore been pointed out in Mr. Nikisch's reading of the great master's writings. The "Parisian" symphony is a very interesting work, and it was played in a commendable manner.

—Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch, with their two beautiful children and Mme. Nikisch, will sail for London in a fortnight. Later they go to Paris. Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch have been besieged with farewell attentions by their hosts of friends, and at the rehearsal Friday and at the concert last night Mr. Nikisch had a great ovation.

PROG

Bois épais,

Si tra i ceppi

Wer sich der

Waldesgespr
In der Frem
Dichterliebe,

When she at

Patrick Sarsf

Sweet Isle.

The Battle I

The Zephyr

Mid the Cor

Marie Ka.

Shepherd, s

Mr. Plunket Greene, Basso.

Mr. Greene possesses an uncommon degree of sentiment and geniality, correct taste admirable enunciation, and a sufficiently broad cultivation to enable him to sing all kind of music successfully, if not equally well.—New York Sun.

Mr. Greene is a basso cantante with a voice of lovely quality, and a method which i is a peculiar pleasure to praise. He discovered himself to be an artist of rare gifts and graces, who is entitled to a hearty welcome to our shores.—New York Tribune.

Mr. Greene's phrasing is most intelligent, his enunciation of notable excellence, and his whole style of singing most refined and artistic —New York World.

He has more temperament, more graciousness, and more flexibility of style than mos visitors from the British Isles. His Irish songs alone should make his fortune.—New York Recorder.

The highest pleasure of the afternoon was the performance of Wotan's Farewell and the fire scene from "Die Walkure," with Mr. Plunket Greene as Wotan. His singing o the farewell was very beautiful. It was sonorous in tone, dignified and artistic in phrasing and deeply poetic in sentiment.—New York Times.

Mr. Greene is an admirable artist, gifted with an organ of much resonance, richnes and sympathetic quality.—New York Press, Feb. 27th, 93.

The Irish and Scotch songs were dignified by the superb manner in which Mr Plunket Greene sang them.—Herald, Feb 27th, '93.

Far more satisfactory was the wonderful music of the Good Friday spell, which wa sung by Mr. Rieger and Mr. Plunket Greene. This latter gentleman sang the part o Gurnemanz, his original role, at Bayreuth in 1890.

[illegible] the best [illegible] work he has given us so far, being refined, tender and full o artistic expression.—World, Feb. 20th, '93.

Mr. Greene has a powerful voice of beautiful quality, over which he has unusuall [illegible] and genuine warmth of musical and poetic feeling. His enunciation i beautifully distinct and his musical phrasing highly intelligent. Emotionally his singin [illegible] sentiment.—N. Y. Mail and Express.

THE MUSICAL, ETC., SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CONCERT, March 24th, 1893.

Plunket Greene has a beautiful and remarkable voice. It is a baritone, lyric in quality and of great sweetness and pathos; but it has nearly the volume of a dramatic organ.—Press.

Mr. [illegible] a distinct success. He has a splendid presence and an excellent [illegible] ge from "Hans Sachs" admirably, and made a de ided impression. He is charming, and the audience was captivated His singing [illegible] gs of the year. His voice is fresh, and his method delightful.

Mr. [illegible] od degree in Hans Sachs Monologue from "Die Meistersinger," and strong, was in style, finish and sympathy perfection. [illegible] master of style was apparent from his discrimi tion [illegible] English ballad methods—not an easy thing even for the [illegible]

Mr. [illegible] ne'v favorable impression. He has a rich, re sonant [illegible] s with an ease and grace rarely met with in basso His [illegible] .—Hearld and Star.

Mr. [illegible] sound is noble, smooth, and full; his pronunci y good. His selections were of the romantic he [illegible] m was charming and refreshing. He has together a rare personality that adds greatly to [illegible] pathos were most artistic and charming —Advertiser.

Mr. G[illegible] D HAYDN SOCIETY.

His [illegible] His voice is remarkably sweet and flex [illegible] particularly well suited to oratorio music

His [illegible] His [illegible] created quite a furore.—Post, Apr. 3, '93

[illegible] successes of recent years, his sing visits to this city.—Herald, April 1893.

Itinerary

OF

SEVENTH AN

OF THE . . . . .

Bosto
Symp
Orche

MR. FRANZ KNEIS

C. A. ELLIS,
Manager.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 3

...e Symphony Concert.

The last concert of the current season by the Bo Symphony Orchestra, took place in Music Hall, night. The programme was: Symphony No. 31, i Mozart; unfinished symphony, Schubert; "Eroi Symphony, Beethoven. A very large audience wa attendance Three symphonies made a somewhat acting programme to listen to. To review the per mances in detail would be only to repeat what we h so often written of the conductor's revised amended versions of great classical wor The programme afforded him ample opport ties to give a final display of his many fa and his few virtues as a leader. He w warmly received on his first appearance, a was well applauded at different stages of the conce At the close, curiously enough, there was no demo stration from the public until the orchestra, taki advantage of their last opportunity of the season applaud, did so heartily, and the audience joining continued until Mr. Nikisch was recalled sever times. On the last occasion he made a speec thanking everybody for everything; explained th his ill health prevented him from going to Chicago, a expressed his belief that his dear friend Mr. Kneis would replace him on the trip, very satisfactorily. Th orchestra and the audience applauded again, the se son was over, and Mr. Nikisch ceased to be the condu tor of the Symphony Orchestra. In our next issue w shall give a review of the Symphony Orchestra se son.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY, MAY 1, 1893.

The Twenty-Fourth Concert of the Symphony Orchestra.

The 24th and last Symphony concert of the series of '92-'93 was given Saturday evening in Music Hall. Mr. Arthur Nikisch then made his last appearance as conductor of this orchestra.

The programme was as follows: Symphony, D major (Parisian), Mozart; Unfinished Symphony, B minor, Schubert; Symphony No. 3, Beethoven.

The air of the hall was hot and foul, so that the concert seemed of interminable length. The programme was one of dignity, and the music might have been more fully enjoyed if the attending atmospheric circumstances had been more congenial. But even bad air could not vitiate the tender melancholy and the unearthly beauty of Schubert's fragment.

It is not necessary, now that Mr. Nikisch is no longer in authority, to write at length concerning the merits or faults of the performance of Saturday evening. The orchestra played as though the members appreciated the dignity of the occasion, and, if unfavorable criticism were to be made, it would chiefly concern itself with the ultra-modern ideas of Mr. Nikisch in regard to the proper pace of a movement. The first movement, for instance, of the Heroic Symphony showed the characteristics of the man. There were occasional great effects, and, on the other hand, the frank simplicity of the composer was turned often into the sentimental affectation of the conductor.

Mr. Nikisch will soon be engaged in a congenial task. He is by nature an operatic conductor; he, a Hungarian, is fully equipped for the duty of conducting opera in a Hungarian town to the delight of a Hungarian audience. Surely there is no one here that will not wish him success in the achievement of this task.

May his life, then, be one prolonged Hungarian rhapsody!

PHILIP HALE.

MR. NIKISCH SPEAKS.

When Mr. Nikisch came before the public Saturday evening he was applauded heartily. He found the stand and the desk decorated with flowers, and during the concert he was presented with wreaths. After the finale of the Heroic Symphony he was twice recalled, and he then made a speech in English. The speech in substance was as follows: He expressed his appreciation of the kindness shown him here and in other towns of the United States; he praised the orchestra, and he declared that he himself had always given his best endeavor to the gratification of the musical taste of the public; and he expressed great regret, unbounded regret, that he would be unable on account of sickness to oblige his generous patron by completing the season's work in the West. He, however, declared that his "dear friend Kneisel," as conductor on the tour, would maintain the reputation of the orchestra.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, APRIL 30, 1893.

Last Symphony Concert.

The last symphony concert of the season was given in Music Hall last evening, when Conductor Nikisch bade farewell to the orchestra over which he has presided during the last three years. The orchestra will give several more concerts in other cities this year, but Mr. Nikisch made his final appearance last evening.

Very large audiences were present at both the Friday afternoon rehearsal and at the concert last evening. On both occasions there were substantial expressions of regard for Mr. Nikisch, showing very plainly that a large proportion of the symphony concert patrons sincerely regret that he is to leave them.

Mr. Nikisch has certainly worked conscientiously to maintain the high standard of the orchestra entrusted to his care, and he has the satisfaction of knowing that it has lost nothing under his direction; on the contrary the band is today acknowledged to be the best in the world.

That Mr. Nikisch failed to satisfy the taste of all is not surprising. He has plainly done what he believed to be right, and for the much good work that he has accomplished he will be kindly and gratefully remembered.

Last evening's concert did not call for lengthy comment. The programme was excessively heavy, consisting of three symphonies, Mozart's "Parisian" symphony in D major, Schubert's unfinished symphony and Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony. The last two have been frequently given here under Mr. Nikisch's direction. Schubert's delicious music was played with much expression and artistic effect, and the interpretation of Beethoven's grandly impressive work was marked by the welcome and unwelcome characteristics which have heretofore been pointed out in Mr. Nikisch's reading of the great master's writings. The "Parisian" symphony is a very interesting work, and it was played in a commendable manner.

—Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch, with their two beautiful children and Mme. Nikisch, will sail for London in a fortnight. Later they go to Paris. Mr. and Mrs. Niskisch have been besieged with farewell attentions by their hosts of friends, and at the rehearsal Friday and at the concert last night Mr. Nikisch had a great ovation.

[151]

Mr. C. A. Ellis announces

TWO · SONG

. . BY

Mr. Plunk

Bass

. . AT .

CHICKERIN

. . ON .

Wednesday Afternoon, A

Saturday

Tickets, with Reserved Seats, $1.50.

On sale at Music Hall Box Office beginning Monday, April 17th.

ORDERS SENT TO MR. C. A. ELLIS, MUSIC HALL, WILL RECEIVE PROMPT ATTENTION.

ITINERARY.

TUESDAY, May 2.

Leave Boston, Boston & Albany depot, 7.15 P. M., in Wagner palace sleeping cars for Rochester, via Boston & Albany and New York Central railroads.

WEDNESDAY, May 3.

Breakfast at Syracuse, 7.00 A. M.; arrive Rochester 9.55 A. M.; Whitcomb Hotel; concert at Lyceum Theatre 8.00 P. M.

THURSDAY, May 4.

Leave Rochester, New York Central station, corner of Railroad avenue and State street, 9.55 A. M.; arrive at Buffalo 12.00 M.; Genesee Hotel; concert at Music Hall 8.00 P. M.; leave

Boston Journal.

MONDAY, MAY 1, 1893.

The Twenty-Fourth Concert of the Symphony Orchestra.

The 24th and last Symphony concert of the series of '92-'93 was given Saturday evening in Music Hall. Mr. Arthur Nikisch then made his last appearance as conductor of this orchestra.

The programme was as follows: Symphony, D major (Parisian), Mozart; Unfinished Symphony, B minor, Schubert; Symphony No. 3, Beethoven.

The air of the hall was hot and foul, so that the concert seemed of interminable length. The programme was one of dignity, and the music might have been more fully enjoyed if the attending atmospheric circumstances had been more congenial. But even bad air could not vitiate the tender melancholy and the unearthly beauty of Schubert's fragment.

It is not necessary, now that Mr. Nikisch is no longer in authority, to write at length concerning the merits or faults of the performance of Saturday evening. The orchestra played as though the members appreciated the dignity of the occasion, and, if unfavorable criticism were to be made, it would chiefly concern itself with the ultra-modern ideas of Mr. Nikisch in regard to the proper pace of a movement. The first movement, for instance, of the Heroic Symphony showed the characteristics of the man. There were occasional great effects, and, on the other hand, the frank simplicity of the composer was turned often into the sentimental affectation of the conductor.

Mr. Nikisch will soon be engaged in a congenial task. He is by nature an operatic conductor; he, a Hungarian, is fully equipped for the duty of conducting opera in a Hungarian town to the delight of a Hungarian audience. Surely there is no one here that will not wish him success in the achievement of this task.

May his life, then, be one prolonged Hungarian rhapsody!

PHILIP HALE.

MR. NIKISCH SPEAKS.

When Mr. Nikisch came before the public Saturday evening he was applauded heartily. He found the stand and the desk decorated with flowers, and during the concert he was presented with wreaths. After the finale of the Heroic Symphony he was twice recalled, and he then made a speech in English. The speech in substance was as follows: He expressed his appreciation of the kindness shown him here and in other towns of the United States; he praised the orchestra, and he declared that he himself had always given his best endeavor to the gratification of the musical taste of the public; and he expressed great regret, unbounded regret, that he would be unable on account of sickness to oblige his generous patron by completing the season's work in the West. He, however, declared that his "dear friend Kneisel," as conductor on the tour, would maintain the reputation of the orchestra.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, APRIL 30, 1893.

Last Symphony Concert.

The last symphony concert of the season was given in Music Hall last evening, when Conductor Nikisch bade farewell to the orchestra over which he has presided during the last three years. The orchestra will give several more concerts in other cities this year, but Mr. Nikisch made his final appearance last evening.

Very large audiences were present at both the Friday afternoon rehearsal and at the concert last evening. On both occasions there were substantial expressions of regard for Mr. Nikisch, showing very plainly that a large proportion of the symphony concert patrons sincerely regret that he is to leave them.

Mr. Nikisch has certainly worked conscientiously to maintain the high standard of the orchestra entrusted to his care, and he has the satisfaction of knowing that it has lost nothing under his direction; on the contrary, the band is today acknowledged to be the best in the world.

That Mr. Nikisch failed to satisfy the taste of all is not surprising. He has plainly done what he believed to be right, and for the much good work that he has accomplished he will be kindly and gratefully remembered.

Last evening's concert did not call for lengthy comment. The programme was excessively heavy, consisting of three symphonies, Mozart's "Parisian" symphony in D major, Schubert's unfinished symphony and Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony. The last two have been frequently given here under Mr. Nikisch's direction. Schubert's delicious music was played with much expression and artistic effect, and the interpretation of Beethoven's grandly impressive work was marked by the welcome and unwelcome characteristics which have heretofore been pointed out in Mr. Nikisch's reading of the great master's writings. The "Parisian" symphony is a very interesting work, and it was played in a commendable manner.

—Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch, with their two beautiful children and Mme. Nikisch, will sail for London in a fortnight. Later they go to Paris. Mr. and Mrs. Niskisch have been besieged with farewell attentions by their hosts of friends, and at the rehearsal Friday and at the concert last night Mr. Nikisch had a great ovation.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 30.

...n Symphony Concert.

The last concert of the current season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, took place in Music Hall, last night. The programme was: Symphony No. 31, in D Mozart; unfinished symphony, Schubert; "Eroica" Symphony, Beethoven. A very large audience was in attendance. Three symphonies made a somewhat exacting programme to listen to. To review the performances in detail would be only to repeat what we have so often written of the conductor's revised and amended versions of great classical works. The programme afforded him ample opportunities to give a final display of his many faults and his few virtues as a leader. He was warmly received on his first appearance, and was well applauded at different stages of the concert. At the close, curiously enough, there was no demonstration from the public until the orchestra, taking advantage of their last opportunity of the season to applaud, did so heartily, and the audience joining in, continued until Mr. Nikisch was recalled several times. On the last occasion he made a speech, thanking everybody for everything; explained that his ill health prevented him from going to Chicago, and expressed his belief that his dear friend Mr. Kneisel would replace him on the trip, very satisfactorily. The orchestra and the audience applauded again, the season was over, and Mr. Nikisch ceased to be the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra. In our next issue we shall give a review of the Symphony Orchestra season.

[151]

Mr. C. A. Ellis announces

TWO · SONG

. . BY

Mr. Plunk

Bass

. . AT . .

CHICKERIN

. . ON . .

Wednesday Afternoon, A

Saturday

Tickets, with Reserved Seats, $1.50.

On sale at Music Hall Box Office beginning Monday, April 17th.

ORDERS SENT TO MR. C. A. ELLIS, MUSIC HALL, WILL RECEIVE PROMPT ATTENTION.

Buffalo, Erie depot, Exchange street, 11.15 P. M. (Pullman sleeping cars ready at 10.00 P. M.).

Route: New York, Chicago & St. Louis Ry., Pittsburg, Shenango & Lake Erie Ry., and Pittsburg & Western Ry.)

FRIDAY, May 5.
Arrive at Pittsburg 7.30 A. M.; Seventh Avenue Hotel; concert at Old City Hall 8.00 P. M.

SATURDAY, May 6.
Concert at Old City Hall 8.00 P. M.

SUNDAY, May 7.
Leave Pittsburg, Baltimore & Ohio depot, corner of Smithfield and Water streets, 9.00 A. M., in special train, arriving at Cleveland 2.00 P. M.; Hollenden Hotel.
(Route: Pittsburg & Western and Valley Rys.)

MONDAY, May 8.
Concert at Music Hall at 8.00 P. M.

TUESDAY, May 9.
Leave Cleveland, Lake Shore depot, foot of Bank street, 10.40 A. M. (train No. 5), arriving at Toledo 1.55 P. M.; Boody, St. James, and Depot Hotels; concert at "The Armory" at 8.00 P. M.; Leave Toledo, C. H. V. & T. depot, foot of Knapp street, 12.00 midnight (Pullman sleeping cars ready for occupancy at 10.00 P. M.).

WEDNESDAY, May 10.
Arrive at Columbus about 5.30 A. M.; sleeping cars can be occupied until 8.00 A. M.; Chittenden Hotel; concert at Henrietta Theatre 8.00 P. M.

THURSDAY, May 11.
Leave Columbus, Union depot, via Baltimore & Ohio R. R., 8.30 A. M. (train No. 101), arriving at Cincinnati 12.25 noon; Grand Hotel; concert at Music Hall 8.00 P. M.

FRIDAY, May 12.
Leave Cincinnati, Union depot, via O. & M. R. R., 8.05 A. M. (train No. 15), arriving at Louisville 11.57 A. M.; Galt Hotel; concert at Amphitheatre Auditorium at 8.00 P. M.

SATURDAY, May 13.
Concert at Amphitheatre Auditorium 2.30 P. M.; leave Louisville, via "Monon Route" depot, corner of Tenth street and Broadway, at 9.10 P. M. (train No. 4), for Chicago.

SUNDAY, May 14.
Arrive at Chicago 8.12 A. M.; Pullman Hotel, Fifty-fifth street, between Washington and Madison avenues, near Jackson Park.

MONDAY, May 15.
Matinee concert at Music Hall, Exposition grounds, hour to be announced.

TUESDAY, May 16.
Matinee concert at Music Hall, Exposition grounds, hour to be announced.

WEDNESDAY, May 17.
Leave Chicago, Michigan Central depot, foot of Lake street, at 8.00 A. M., in special train, arriving at Grand Rapids 1.30 P. M.; Morton Hotel; concert at Hartman Hall, 8.00 P. M.; leave Grand Rapids, Grand Trunk Ry. depot, 11.15 P. M., arriving at Grand Haven at 12.00 midnight, when steamer is taken for Milwaukee; lunch served on board steamer.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 30.

...e Symphony Concert.

The last concert of the current season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, took place in Music Hall, last night. The programme was: Symphony No. 31, in D Mozart; unfinished symphony, Schubert; "Eroica" Symphony, Beethoven. A very large audience was in attendance. Three symphonies made a somewhat exacting programme to listen to. To review the performances in detail would be only to repeat what we have so often written of the conductor's revised and amended versions of great classical works. The programme afforded him ample opportunties to give a final display of his many faults and his few virtues as a leader. He was warmly received on his first appearance, and was well applauded at different stages of the concert. At the close, curiously enough, there was no demonstration from the public until the orchestra, taking advantage of their last opportunity of the season to applaud, did so heartily, and the audience joining in, continued until Mr. Nikisch was recalled several times. On the last occasion he made a speech, thanking everybody for everything; explained that his ill health prevented him from going to Chicago, and expressed his belief that his dear friend Mr. Kneisel would replace him on the trip, very satisfactorily. The orchestra and the audience applauded again, the season was over, and Mr. Nikisch ceased to be the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra. In our next issue we shall give a review of the Symphony Orchestra season.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY, MAY 1, 1893.

The Twenty-Fourth Concert of the Symphony Orchestra.

The 24th and last Symphony concert of the series of '92-'93 was given Saturday evening in Music Hall. Mr. Arthur Nikisch then made his last appearance as conductor of this orchestra.

The programme was as follows: Symphony, D major (Parisian), Mozart; Unfinished Symphony, B minor, Schubert; Symphony No. 3, Beethoven.

The air of the hall was hot and foul, so that the concert seemed of interminable length. The programme was one of dignity, and the music might have been more fully enjoyed if the attending atmospheric circumstances had been more congenial. But even bad air could not vitiate the tender melancholy and the unearthly beauty of Schubert's fragment.

It is not necessary, now that Mr. Nikisch is no longer in authority, to write at length concerning the merits or faults of the performance of Saturday evening. The orchestra played as though the members appreciated the dignity of the occasion, and, if unfavorable criticism were to be made, it would chiefly concern itself with the ultra-modern ideas of Mr. Nikisch in regard to the proper pace of a movement. The first movement, for instance, of the Heroic Symphony showed the characteristics of the man. There were occasional great effects, and, on the other hand, the frank simplicity of the composer was turned often into the sentimental affectation of the conductor.

Mr. Nikisch will soon be engaged in a congenial task. He is by nature an operatic conductor; he, a Hungarian, is fully equipped for the duty of conducting opera in a Hungarian town to the delight of a Hungarian audience. Surely there is no one here that will not wish him success in the achievement of this task.

May his life, then, be one prolonged Hungarian rhapsody!

PHILIP HALE.

MR. NIKISCH SPEAKS.

When Mr. Nikisch came before the public Saturday evening he was applauded heartily. He found the stand and the desk decorated with flowers, and during the concert he was presented with wreaths. After the finale of the Heroic Symphony he was twice recalled, and he then made a speech in English. The speech in substance was as follows: He expressed his appreciation of the kindness shown him here and in other towns of the United States; he praised the orchestra, and he declared that he himself had always given his best endeavor to the gratification of the musical taste of the public; and he expressed great regret, unbounded regret, that he would be unable on account of sickness to oblige his generous patron by completing the season's work in the west. He, however, declared that his "dear friend Kneisel," as conductor on the tour, would maintain the reputation of the orchestra.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, APRIL 30, 1893.

Last Symphony Concert.

The last symphony concert of the season was given in Music Hall last evening, when Conductor Nikisch bade farewell to the orchestra over which he has presided during the last three years. The orchestra will give several more concerts in other cities this year, but Mr. Nikisch made his final appearance last evening.

Very large audiences were present at both the Friday afternoon rehearsal and at the concert last evening. On both occasions there were substantial expressions of regard for Mr. Nikisch, showing very plainly that a large proportion of the symphony concert patrons sincerely regret that he is to leave them.

Mr. Nikisch has certainly worked conscientiously to maintain the high standard of the orchestra entrusted to his care, and he has the satisfaction of knowing that it has lost nothing under his direction; on the contrary the band is today acknowledged to be the best in the world.

That Mr. Nikisch failed to satisfy the taste of all is not surprising. He has plainly done what he believed to be right, and for the much good work that he has accomplished he will be kindly and gratefully remembered.

Last evening's concert did not call for lengthy comment. The programme was excessively heavy, consisting of three symphonies, Mozart's "Parisian" symphony in D major, Schubert's unfinished symphony and Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony. The last two have been frequently given here under Mr. Nikisch's direction. Schubert's delicious music was played with much expression and artistic effect, and the interpretation of Beethoven's grandly impressive work was marked by the welcome and unwelcome characteristics which have heretofore been pointed out in Mr. Nikisch's reading of the great master's writings. The "Parisian" symphony is a very interesting work, and it was played in a commendable manner.

—Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch, with their two beautiful children and Mme. Nikisch, will sail for London in a fortnight. Later they go to Paris. Mr. and Mrs. Niskisch have been besieged with farewell attentions by their hosts of friends, and at the rehearsal Friday and at the concert last night Mr. Nikisch had a great ovation.

[151]

Mr. C. A. Ellis announces

TWO · SONG

BY

Mr. Plunk

Bass

AT

CHICKERIN

ON Wednesday Afternoon, A

Saturday

Tickets, with Reserved Seats, $1.50.

On sale at Music Hall Box Office beginning Monday, April 17th.

ORDERS SENT TO MR. C. A. ELLIS, MUSIC HALL, WILL RECEIVE PROMPT ATTENTION.

THURSDAY, May 18.

Arrive at Milwaukee 8.00 A. M.; Plankinton Hotel; concert at Academy of Music 8.00 P. M.; leave Milwaukee by steamer, 11.15 P. M., for Grand Haven; lunch served on board steamer after concert.

FRIDAY, May 19.

Arrive at Grand Haven 7.00 A. M.; breakfast on steamer; leave Grand Haven 9.00 A. M. (train No. 16); arrive at Grand Rapids 10.20 A. M.; dinner at Morton Hotel; leave Grand Rapids, Union depot, via Michigan Central R. R., 1.00 P. M., in special train; arrive at Ann Arbor 4.30 P. M. (cars will be side tracked until after concert); supper at Granger's Hall, South State street; concert at University Hall 8.00 P. M.; leave Ann Arbor 11.15 P. M. in special train, reaching Detroit at midnight; Russell Hotel.

SATURDAY, May 20.

Concert at The Auditorium 8.00 P. M.

SUNDAY, May 21.

Leave Detroit, Michigan Central depot, foot of Third street, 9.00 A. M., in special train for Niagara Falls, arriving there at 4.30 P. M.; lunch at St. Thomas, Ont., about 1.00 P. M.; stop at Niagara Falls two hours, with dinner at Cataract House at 5.45 P. M.; leave Niagara Falls 6.30 P. M.

MONDAY, May 22.

Breakfast at Springfield; arrive at Boston, Boston & Albany depot, 10.50 A. M.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 30.

...n Symphony Concert.

The last concert of the current season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, took place in Music Hall, last night. The programme was: Symphony No. 31, in D Mozart; unfinished symphony, Schubert; "Eroica" Symphony, Beethoven. A very large audience was in attendance Three symphonies made a somewhat exacting programme to listen to. To review the performances in detail would be only to repeat what we have so often written of the conductor's revised and amended versions of great classical works. The programme afforded him ample opportunities to give a final display of his many faults and his few virtues as a leader. He was warmly received on his first appearance, and was well applauded at different stages of the concert. At the close, curiously enough, there was no demonstration from the public until the orchestra, taking advantage of their last opportunity of the season to applaud, did so heartily, and the audience joining in, continued until Mr. Nikisch was recalled several times. On the last occasion he made a speech, thanking everybody for everything; explained that his ill health prevented him from going to Chicago, and expressed his belief that his dear friend Mr. Kneisel would replace him on the trip, very satisfactorily. The orchestra and the audience applauded again, the season was over, and Mr. Nikisch ceased to be the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra. In our next issue we shall give a review of the Symphony Orchestra season.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY, MAY 1, 1893.

The Twenty-Fourth Concert of the Symphony Orchestra.

The 24th and last Symphony concert of the series of '92-'93 was given Saturday evening in Music Hall. Mr. Arthur Nikisch then made his last appearance as conductor of this orchestra.

The programme was as follows: Symphony, D major (Parisian), Mozart; Unfinished Symphony, B minor, Schubert; Symphony No. 3, Beethoven.

The air of the hall was hot and foul, so that the concert seemed of interminable length. The programme was one of dignity, and the music might have been more fully enjoyed if the attending atmospheric circumstances had been more congenial. But even bad air could not vitiate the tender melancholy and the unearthly beauty of Schubert's fragment.

It is not necessary, now that Mr. Nikisch is no longer in authority, to write at length concerning the merits or faults of the performance of Saturday evening. The orchestra played as though the members appreciated the dignity of the occasion, and, if unfavorable criticism were to be made, it would chiefly concern itself with the ultra-modern ideas of Mr. Nikisch in regard to the proper pace of a movement. The first movement, for instance, of the Heroic Symphony showed the characteristics of the man. There were occasional great effects, and, on the other hand, the frank simplicity of the composer was turned often into the sentimental affectation of the conductor.

Mr. Nikisch will soon be engaged in a congenial task. He is by nature an operatic conductor; he, a Hungarian, is fully equipped for the duty of conducting opera in a Hungarian town to the delight of a Hungarian audience. Surely there is no one here that will not wish him success in the achievement of this task.

May his life, then, be one prolonged Hungarian rhapsody!

PHILIP HALE.

MR. NIKISCH SPEAKS.

When Mr. Nikisch came before the public Saturday evening he was applauded heartily. He found the stand and the desk decorated with flowers, and during the concert he was presented with wreaths. After the finale of the Heroic Symphony he was twice recalled, and he then made a speech in English. The speech in substance was as follows: He expressed his appreciation of the kindness shown him here and in other towns of the United States; he praised the orchestra, and he declared that he himself had always given his best endeavor to the gratification of the musical taste of the public; and he expressed great regret, unbounded regret, that he would be unable on account of sickness to oblige his generous patrons by completing the season's work in the West. He, however, declared that his "dear friend Kneisel," as conductor on the tour, would maintain the reputation of the orchestra.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, APRIL 30, 1893.

Last Symphony Concert.

The last symphony concert of the season was given in Music Hall last evening, when Conductor Nikisch bade farewell to the orchestra over which he has presided during the last three years. The orchestra will give several more concerts in other cities this year, but Mr. Nikisch made his final appearance last evening.

Very large audiences were present at both the Friday afternoon rehearsal and at the concert last evening. On both occasions there were substantial expressions of regard for Mr. Nikisch, showing very plainly that a large proportion of the symphony concert patrons sincerely regret that he is to leave them.

Mr. Nikisch has certainly worked conscientiously to maintain the high standard of the orchestra entrusted to his care, and he has the satisfaction of knowing that it has lost nothing under his direction; on the contrary the band is today acknowledged to be the best in the world.

That Mr. Nikisch failed to satisfy the taste of all is not surprising. He has plainly done what he believed to be right, and for the much good work that he has accomplished he will be kindly and gratefully remembered.

Last evening's concert did not call for lengthy comment. The programme was excessively heavy, consisting of three symphonies, Mozart's "Parisian" symphony in D major, Schubert's unfinished symphony and Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony. The last two have been frequently given here under Mr. Nikisch's direction. Schubert's delicious music was played with much expression and artistic effect, and the interpretation of Beethoven's grandly impressive work was marked by the welcome and unwelcome characteristics which have heretofore been pointed out in Mr. Nikisch's reading of the great master's writings. The "Parisian" symphony is a very interesting work, and it was played in a commendable manner.

—Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch, with their two beautiful children and Mme. Nikisch, will sail for London in a fortnight. Later they go to Paris. Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch have been besieged with farewell attentions by their hosts of friends, and at the rehearsal Friday and at the concert last night Mr. Nikisch had a great ovation.

[151]

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 30, 1893.

LAST CONCERT OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA'S SEASON.

The twelfth season of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra closed with the twenty-fourth concert of the series in Music Hall, last evening. During this season eighty-nine compositions, for the most part strictly orchestral, have been performed. Forty-four composers have been represented by these compositions as follows: D'Albert, 1; Bach, 2; Beethoven, 9; Berlioz, 3; Bizet, 1; Brahms, 4; Bruch, 1; Busoni, 1; Davidhoff, 1; Dvoraka, 4; Ernst, 1; Foote, 1; Gade 1; Gilson, 1; Goldmark, 2; Gounod, 1; Grieg, 1; Haydn, 2; Humperdinck, 1; Lalo, 1; Lang, 1; Liszt, 4; MacDowell, 3; Mendelssohn, 3; Moszowkowski, 1; Mozart, 2; Nicolai, 1; Paderewski, 1; Paine, 1; Raff, 2; Reinecker, 1; Riemenschneider, 1; Rubinstein, 1; Saint-Saens, 4; Scharwenka, 1; Schubert, 3; Schumann, 4; Sphor, 1; Svendsen, 1; Thieriot, 1; Tschaikowski, 2; Vieuxtemps, 1; Volkmann, 1; Wagner, 10; Weber, 3.

N. B. Ten compositions by Richard Wagner in this series and only two by Mozart; only four American composers granted a hearing; not a Cherubini overture in the entire list.

Such is the record. The programme for last evening's concert contained three symphonies;—Mozart's No. 31, in D major ("Parisian"); Schubert's unfinished Symphony in B minor; and Beethoven's Symphony No. 3, in E flat major "Eroica."

The venerable age of the Mozart symphony "Parisian" should not have detracted a whit from the admiration that more than ever seemed its due, though not all of it was performed in either the right spirit or time, nor with any such fervency, neither taste, as the reverential listener to anything by Mozart might reasonably have demanded for it. Technically the orchestral delivery was often marred by a characteristic lack of unanimity in the response to the baton. The shortcoming, however, confined itself to the more rapid passages of the allegro movements, and was at no time so conspicuous as absolutely to offend. In any event, it is pleasant to think that at least one Mozart symphony was granted a performance. It is not easy to estimate Mozart's value to the world, but the claim in his behalf is at least plausible—that he not only created many great works, but that he inspired many more. Were we to extract from modern music, indeed, all that it owes to Bach and Mozart, there would remain a fragmentary mass that would barely hint at its former glory.

True, Mozart modeled the architecture of his art upon the foundation that had been laid by Haydn, but he did more than this. He refined the form of the symphony. By the power of his genius he immeasurably extended its power of musical expression. That this expression was idealized by Beethoven and possibly carried to even a greater height seems largely due to Beethoven's developing the technique of the orchestra. Mozart first realized a charm of euphony that had hitherto been quite unknown to German composers. Richard Wagner in his music of the future freely acknowledges this and adds that Mozart "while giving to Italian opera the richer development of instrumental composition, he also imparted the sweetness of Italian singing to orchestral melody.

Nevertheless the all conspicuous melodist of the concert was Schubert, the only composer the world has known who could rely upon his genius for melody alone (for no other genius had he) to place him in the foremost rank. Poor Schubert! In his saddest hours only would the muse enrich his art. His eighth symphony (unfinished) sprang from greatest pain. It speaks to us of one whose life was one long dark, dreary day; but as Jean Paul Richter truly says, "We shroud the cages of birds when we would teach them to sing." And so it was with Schubert. His life was enshrouded and its dreariness long spun out was only occasionally relieved by transient gleams of light.

Why Schubert never completed it is not definitely known, but that he actually intended to do so is certain, as nine bars of a scherzo for it, he began, which are written on the autographic score. For forty-five years this eighth symphony lapsed into oblivion, and then as it were it suddenly awoke to find itself famous. Many features of the performance last evening were worthy of praise. The impressive lead of the strings in the first of the allegro having all the charm of mystery in attendance upon it was exquisitely played; and the beautiful changes of orchestral color towards the close of this movement were delicately reproduced. In the second movement, where the horns and bassoons, heard in conjunction with the basses, pizzicato, in a phrase that frequently puts in its appearance somewhat parathentically in its relation to the melody proper, the playing was excellent.

The Beethoven symphony, to be brief, was admirably played. At its conclusion the conductor emeritus of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was persistently recalled, not by the audience en masse but by a very considerable portion of it. Mr. Nikisch finally responded by appearing at the conductor's desk and addressing the audience, substantially as follows: He thanked all present for the very hearty ovation that he had received. Perhaps Mr. Nickisch was unmindful that there were many in his presence who could not conscientiously participate in the ovation. He thanked the orchestra. This was very appropriate, for the very much inflated reputation that Mr. Nikisch enjoys as a conductor has been created for him by Mr. H. L. Higginson and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It is here well to bear in mind that Mr. Nikisch prior to his coming to this country but was the assistant conductor at Leipzic opera house. Finally Mr. Nikisch regretted (?) that on account of ill health(?) it would be impossible for him to accompany his faithful orchestra to Chicago and participate in the concerts to be given at the World's Fair. Just at this point in his remarks it should be stated, Mr. Nikisch was pitiably insincere. It is generally understood that he declined to go to Chicago with the orchestra because the ungentlemanly, the charlatanic and insulting inducements he held out to Mr. Higginson were politely but firmly declined. Good riddance to this man Nikisch. His coming to this country was a mistaken and the artistic reputation of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has as a result been seriously imperiled. His most praiseworthy achievement in this country is in the altogether discreditable manner of his taking leave of it.

Apropos of Herr Hans Richter's rumored engagement as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra a "Town Topics" correspondent writes from Vienna: "My twelve months's experience here has considerably lessened the awful respect I used to entertain for the ability of the 'incomparable' Hans. Of course, he is a great leader, but only for some things. His fiasco with 'L'Amico Fritz' proved that. Then he is a painfully lazy man, with no interest whatever in what is going on in the musical world. They say he was terribly 'cut up' at his lack of success in Berlin, whither he went twice this winter to replace Von Bulow, and where, I am assured, only forty tickets outside of the regular abonnement were sold for his second concert. When I mentioned to a member of his band that he was likely to go to America, the answer was: 'If this be true, many of us will rejoice heartily. He has a most unpleasant way of dealing with the musicians of his orchestra.'"

SUNDAY HERALD

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCIII, NO 120.

SUNDAY, APRIL 30, 1893.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. Arthur Nikisch Makes His Last Appearance.

Music Hall Packed to the Doors—Director Nikisch Given a Grand Ovation—He Returns Thanks and Regrets His Enforced Retirement in a Short Speech.

The last concert of the 12th season of the Boston Symphony orchestra, given at Music Hall last evening, was an event of unusual interest, as it somewhat unexpectedly terminated the engagement of Mr. Arthur Nikisch as its conductor. It was evident that the patrons of the concerts had come to the hall with an anticipation of participating in some happening other than is usual at these concerts and there was a general air of expectation upon the incoming crowds that could not be mistaken.

Mr. Nikisch came to Boston four years ago well nigh a complete stranger to the patrons of these concerts, and having a name that was hardly known outside the limited circle of those who had met him in Europe. He goes back to his former line of musical life across the water with a record of a most remarkable character for, whatever his abilities as a conductor may be, and whatever may be said in regard to his programmes, he has seen the orchestral scheme so nobly founded and sustained by Mr. Higginson becomes a self-supporting enterprise, not only at home, but in every city which it visits periodically.

In so doing he has changed this undertaking from a private effort in the interest of good music to a service of concerts supported liberally by a public which has shown a disposition to accept whatever was provided for them with a spirit of humility and gratitude at once surprising and amusing.

It is to be regretted, whatever estimate is put upon the artistic results of Mr. Nikisch's career here, that it should be terminated so abruptly, and the kindly parting with the conductor of the orchestra for four seasons was a courteous recognition of what he has done, which reflected credit upon the patrons of these concerts.

The programme of the evening consisted of Mozart's "Parisian" symphony, No. 31, in D major, Schubert's unfinished symphony, in B minor, and Beethoven's "Eroica." There is little need to comment at length upon the performance of such a programme after the work of this conductor during his occupancy of his present position.

His ideas of the symphonic works of the composers represented in the evening's list are well known, and his readings were in conformity with his earlier programmes of a like order. He was made to know the satisfaction of the immense audience at the close of each movement, and at the end of the unfinished symphony he was presented with two immense laurel wreaths, each tied with elaborate bows of his nation's colors.

The entrance of Mr. Nikisch was attended by an ovation which any man might take pride in gaining from a Boston audience, and as he stood beside the flower-bedecked desk preparatory to mounting the high stand he has used so often the orchestra and audience joined their applause and continued it for some minutes.

At the conclusion of the "Eroica" the conductor was applauded and repeated recalls followed his retirement, the demands in this way finally leading him to follow the American fashion and make a farewell speech. In these final words Mr. Nikisch expressed his high appreciation of the kindness shown him in Boston and in all the American cities he had visited. He then paid his respects to the members of the orchestra, speaking of them in the warmest terms and commending them as soldiers whose loyalty he had always felt assured of and with whom he had always found a victory possible. He closed by expressing great regret that his generous patron had been put to so much trouble by his physical inability to complete the season's work on the tour, and said that with his dear friend Kneisel in his place he had full confidence in the continued success of the orchestra.

The opening concert of the 13th season will be given on the evening of Oct. 14 next, and the name of Mr. Nikisch's successor will be officially made public on that or an earlier date.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, MAY 1, 1893.

The Symphony Concert.

De mortuis nil nisi bonum! Mr. Nikisch has departed with unexpected suddenness, and the reviewer may omit cavil at the strange make-up of the final programme, the omission of Beethoven repeats, and the melancholy speech which culminated the proceedings and which was scarcely a Tennysonian "Passing of Arthur." That the speech was called for may well be doubted, as well as the propriety of the introduction of an Apologia pro vita sua into such a concert.

Mr. Nikisch has shown great strength in some directions, great weakness in others; the theatrical instincts which made a Weber or a Liszt work glitter and glow gave to Beethoven and Schumann a strange smell of the footlights. The operatic bent of the conductor's mind often showed at its best in the orchestral work of concertos, in which his elasticity of treatment and his close following of the solo artist were commendable. His pictures were generally painted with a large brush; he cared far more for the general effect than for any details whatever, and thus a "Tannhaeuser" overture would become intensely exciting even if its subthemes were altogether lost; it was in music very much what the impressionist school has been in painting.

While such a school was sure to have its moments of greatness, it cannot be contended that it was an unmixed blessing for us, since it led the orchestra to care more for a brilliant tone than for a careful shading, and it led the audiences to yearn for constantly increased quantities of pepper. Thus the public taste has become tinged with a craving for sensations. Any modern orchestral concoction, without a single idea, has been accepted if only the element of unrest was in it, and if it gave plenty of cymbal, drum or tambourine clashes, trombone growls, piccolo shrieks, and a symmetrical, clear or conservative work runs a decided risk of being counted "slow." "The evil that men do lives after them." It is very possible that a less radical conductor will seem tame to Bostonians for some time to come.

The faults of the system were not present in the performance of Saturday; indeed, it seemed as if there were an intention to keep within the strictest limits of the letter of the law in the matter of readings, and an unwonted air of conservatism seemed to hang over the entire programme. The "Parisian" symphony by Mozart is not comparable with the Jupiter or the G minor by the same composer, and one could have wished the latter to represent Mozart in a programme in which all was symphonic. There was, however, a certain unity in the order of the works, and a lesson to be drawn from the contrasts presented, for the Parisian symphony represented the lightness and grace and symmetry of Mozart, the "Unfinished Symphony" the melodic contrasts of Schubert, and the Heroic the power and grandeur of Beethoven. Each symphony had its own points, which caused it to differ from its congeners. There could have been a greater accentuation of the differences of style to advantage.

In the Parisian symphony Mozart was so careful not to become prolix that he sometimes became too light, as the finale proved, but the omission, by the composer, of a minuet, and the reduction of the work to three movements, was not a disadvantage. It was a lesson in finales to compare the ending of this work with that of the Heroic symphony. Mozart's finales have the old jig spirit in them (the gigue was the finale of the suite, which might be called the mother of the symphony) so have Haydn's, and so had the finale of Beethoven's first symphony. But when Beethoven, in his second symphony, replaced the minuet with the scherzo, he led the way to a reform of the finale, for the rollicking spirit was transferred to the third movement, and the finale became more dignified and powerful.

Schubert's unfinished symphony is the most wonderful example in the world of what can be done with melody alone; all of Schubert's instrumental works seem but songs arranged in a new setting, and the unfinished symphony is sure to win every audience by its melodic grace; it is not what the symphonic form was intended to be, and it essentially differs from all other symphonies, but no one dare say that it is weaker because its charm is wholly different. Its performance was a creditable one.

The Heroic ended the concert and the season. It was played with an evident care for the composer's markings, with the exception of the funeral march which was taken somewhat rapidly. This is a very odd fault to chronicle, and it certainly leans to virtue's side; it was as if the conductor, determined not to sentimentalize, had allowed the pendulum to swing too far in the other direction. Coleridge once called this "a funeral procession in purple," but on this occasion it had a shade of scarlet in it, particularly in the major theme, in which the oboe did some excellent work.

In the trio of the scherzo the three horns did excellent work, not a suspicion of a break being audible. This may be called the first actual scherzo of the symphonic repertoire, for the scherzo of the second symphony is more of a minuet than the minuet of the first. And the finale is the first example of the achievement of a proper counterpoise to the inherent strength of the sonata-movement form, the first introduction of grand variations into the symphony as a climax. It was proper that Beethoven should break a fetter in ending the symphony dedicated to the memory of a hero. It is strange to read how little Beethoven's contemporaries appreciated the master's power in variations; one of the critics said of him: "Mr. Beethoven does not and cannot properly vary a theme," and another urges him to study the variations of Haydn. Brahms is the only true successor to Beethoven in this particular field, a combination of development with elaboration, and the critics are at present repeating history in attacking his work in this form.

The variations were finely played, and, although the concert was longer than usual, few auditors left until its conclusion. The programme for next October has a significant blank where the conductor's name is wont to be, but the character of the personnel of the orchestra, and the earnestness of its founder, are sufficient guarantee of a brilliant future. LOUIS C. ELSON.

Efforts Still Being Made to Secure the Release of Hans Richter.

A story current that Mr. Higginson of the Symphony Orchestra had sent a special envoy to Vienna to use his influence in obtaining Richter's release from the Emperor has but slender foundation. No person has been delegated for this special purpose, and the story no doubt arose from the fact that every time one of Mr. Higginson's personal friends leaves the country for a season abroad he has, and will from this time on, urge upon all such the necessity of making every effort, through Gericke and Jaher, in a sense rivals of Richter, to induce the royal favor to recognize Richter's desire to come to Boston.

Besides any advantage that might accrue to Gericke, in the event of Richter's being finally enabled to come here, there is no doubt that the warm spot he cherishes for Mr. Higginson and the orchestra would make him more than usually zealous in using his influence.

As for anybody's being sent from here on any special mission, that is not true any further than that all Mr. Higginson's friends, and he has an especially large and valuable acquaintance in Vienna, are making every effort possible to bring about the result desired.

More than one straw indicates that Mr. Nikisch and his late patron have parted on none of the best terms, and the story of the inside of the conductor's resignation, followed by his blank refusal to go upon the Western tour, may be traced more or less directly to Nikisch's intention of squeezing Mr. Higginson more than the latter would stand for the ex-conductor's services.

The orchestra is obliged to make some considerable sacrifices on account of the ex-conductor's sudden determination not to undertake the Western trip. The members were to start last evening for Canada on their way to the West, but it has been determined to have two rehearsals under Franz Kneisel, who will conduct on the Western tour, before leaving. Accordingly two dates have been cancelled in Canada.

The orchestra will play practically the same programme at all the cities on the coming tour. So that the sacrifices are two-fold, pecuniary and artistic, though as to the latter it has been thought better for the reputation of the orchestra to confine itself to a limited programme rather than undertake anything that with inadequate preparation might prove disastrous.

THE LEADER.

MAY, 1893.

The announcement that the famous Richter is to succeed the famous Nikisch as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra has caused a very pleasurable excitement, and art lovers go about triumphantly whistling choice melodious morsels from the Nibelungen. One of the pleasant things connected with this business is the statement that Herr Richter comes to us not because he has been tempted with a large salary, but because he loves the American people. It is curious and delightfully flattering at the same time to discover how fond European celebrities are of the great American public. Paderewski weeps when he leaves us; Mrs. Kendall is never happy while she is away from us, and Patti is continually tempted by her love to visit us and give a farewell performance. But whatever may be the motives it is a good thing to have a great conductor with us and it is doubly fortunate that Herr Richter is a man with broad, artistic taste and with a love of good music wherever found, for many of his admirers regard his coming to Boston as the triumph of Germany and German music. The gift of looking at art from one viewpoint is fascinating and it saves the brain from the wear and tear of much thinking but it is born of prejudice and intensifies prejudice. We do not want German music alone, but German music plus what is best in all other kinds of music. Unfortunately the teaching we have received lay only along one line until we began to believe that German music was the one only species of music. Happily we are emerging from this mistake, and under the guidance of Herr Richter the field of art will broaden until it includes France, Italy, England and other civilized countries.

On the evening of April 15th the Symphony orchestra treated us to the Symphonic Tone Poem, by F. B. Busoni. The peculiarity of this poem is that it has not rhythm, metre or meaning, nor has it even the merit of being a good puzzle. Its prevailing tendency is to say nothing with the most gorgeous pomp; he gathers together all the available instruments of modern times, starts them into activity without a vitalizing and centralizing idea and allows them to begin and end in vain noise. It was not soulful music and it was not even good lay figure music for it emerged from and returned to chaos. There was a good deal of affected pomp about it, and it attempted, with some success, to hide its meretriciousness under the sober garb of science, but its aimlessness, its foolishness, its bombast, its affectation and its dulness were still apparent. There was little reason why it should have been written and no reason why it should have been played. It was bewildering, nerve-tearing and exasperating, and if it had any merit it was that of standing as an example of a species of music that should be avoided by every composer who sympathizes with the sufferings of human nature and who loves his noble art.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 30, 1893.

LAST CONCERT OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA'S SEASON.

The twelfth season of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra closed with the twenty-fourth concert of the series in Music Hall, last evening. During this season eighty-nine compositions, for the most part strictly orchestral, have been performed. Forty-four composers have been represented by these compositions as follows: D'Albert, 1; Bach, 2; Beethoven, 9; Berlioz, 3; Bizet, 1; Brahms, 4; Bruch, 1; Busoni, 1; Davidhoff, 1; Dvoraka, 4; Ernst, 1; Foote, 1; Gade 1; Gilson, 1; Goldmark, 2: Gounod, 1; Grieg, 1; Haydn, 2; Humperdink, 1; Lalo, 1; Lang, 1; Liszt, 4; MacDowell, 3; Mendelssohn, 2; Moszowkowski, 1; Mozart, 2; Nicolai, 1; Paderewski, 1; Paine, 1; Raff, 2; Reinecker, 1; Riemenschneider, 1; Rubinstein, 1; Saint-Saens, 4; Scharwenka, 1; Schubert, 3; Schumann, 4; Sphor, 1; Svendsen, 1; Thieriot, 1; Tschalkowski, 2; Vieuxtemps, 1; Volkmann, 1; Wagner, 10; Weber, 3.

N. B. Ten compositions by Richard Wagner in this series and only two by Mozart; only four American composers granted a hearing; not a Cherubini overture in the entire list.

Such is the record. The programme for last evening's concert contained three symphonies;—Mozart's No. 31, in D major ("Parisian"); Schubert's unfinished Symphony in B minor; and Beethoven's Symphony No. 3, in E flat major "Eroica."

The venerable age of the Mozart symphony "Parisian" should not have detracted a whit from the admiration that more than ever seemed its due, though not all of it was performed in either the right spirit or time, nor with any such fervency, neither taste, as the reverential listener to anything by Mozart might reasonably have demanded for it. Technically the orchestral delivery was often marred by a characteristic lack of unanimity in the response to the baton. The shortcoming, however, confined itself to the more rapid passages of the allegro movements, and was at no time so conspicuous as absolutely to offend. In any event, it is pleasant to think that at least one Mozart symphony was granted a performance. It is not easy to estimate Mozart's value to the world, but the claim in his behalf is at least plausible—that he not only created many great works, but that he inspired many more. Were we to extract from modern music, indeed, all that it owes to Bach and Mozart, there would remain a fragmentary mass that would barely hint at its former glory.

True, Mozart modeled the architecture of his art upon the foundation that had been laid by Haydn, but he did more than this. He refined the form of the symphony. By the power of his genius he immeasurably extended its power of musical expression. That this expression was idealized by Beethoven and possibly carried to even a greater height seems largely due to Beethoven's developing the technique of the orchestra. Mozart first realized a charm of euphony that had hitherto been quite unknown to German composers. Richard Wagner in his music of the future freely acknowledges this and adds that Mozart "while giving to Italian opera the richer development of instrumental composition, he also imparted the sweetness of Italian singing to orchestral melody.

Nevertheless the all conspicuous melodist of the concert was Schubert, the only composer the world has known who could rely upon his genius for melody alone (for no other genius had he) to place him in the foremost rank. Poor Schubert! In his saddest hours only would the muse enrich his art. His eighth symphony (unfinished) sprang from greatest pain. It speaks to us of one whose life was one long dark, dreary day; but as Jean Paul Richter truly says, "We shroud the cages of birds when we would teach them to sing." And so it was with Schubert. His life was enshrouded and its dreariness long spun out was only occasionally relieved by transient gleams of light.

Why Schubert never completed it is not definitely known, but that he actually intended to do so is certain, as nine bars of a scherzo for it, he began, which are written on the autographic score. For forty-five years this eighth symphony lapsed into oblivion, and then as it were it suddenly awoke to find itself famous. Many features of the performance last evening were worthy of praise. The impressive lead of the strings in the first of the allegro having all the charm of mystery in attendance upon it was exquisitely played; and the beautiful changes of orchestral color towards the close of this movement were delicately reproduced. In the second movement, where the horns and bassoons, heard in conjunction with the basses, pizzicato, in a phrase that frequently puts in its appearance somewhat parathentically in its relation to the melody proper, the playing was excellent.

The Beethoven symphony, to be brief, was admirably played. At its conclusion the conductor emeritus of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was persistently recalled, not by the audience en masse but by a very considerable portion of it. Mr. Nikisch finally responded by appearing at the conductor's desk and addressing the audience, substantially as follows: He thanked all present for the very hearty ovation that he had received. Perhaps Mr. Nickisch was unmindful that there were many in his presence who could not conscientiously participate in the ovation. He thanked the orchestra. This was very appropriate, for the very much inflated reputation that Mr. Nikisch enjoys as a conductor has been created for him by Mr. H. L. Higginson and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It is here well to bear in mind that Mr. Nikisch prior to his coming to this country but was the assistant conductor at Leipzic opera house. Finally Mr. Nikisch regretted (?) that on account of ill health(?) it would be impossible for him to accompany his faithful orchestra to Chicago and participate in the concerts to be given at the World's Fair. Just at this point in his remarks it should be stated, Mr. Nikisch was pitiably insincere. It is generally understood that he declined to go to Chicago with the orchestra because the ungentlemanly, the charlatanic and insulting inducements he held out to Mr. Higginson were politely but firmly declined. Good riddance to this man Nikisch. His coming to this country was a mistaken and the artistic reputation of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has as a result been seriously imperiled. His most praiseworthy achievement in this country is in the altogether discreditable manner of his taking leave of it.

Apropos of Herr Hans Richter's rumored engagement as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra a "Town Topics" correspondent writes from Vienna: "My twelve months's experience here has considerably lessened the awful respect I used to entertain for the ability of the 'incomparable' Hans. Of course, he is a great leader, but only for some things. His fiasco with 'L'Amico Fritz' proved that. Then he is a painfully lazy man, with no interest whatever in what is going on in the musical world. They say he was terribly 'cut up' at his lack of success in Berlin, whither he went twice this winter to replace Von Bulow, and where, I am assured, only forty tickets outside of the regular abonnement were sold for his second concert. When I mentioned to a member of his band that he was likely to go to America, the answer was: 'If this be true, many of us will rejoice heartily. He has a most unpleasant way of dealing with the musicians of his orchestra.'"

SUNDAY HERALD

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCIII, NO 120.

SUNDAY, APRIL 30, 1893.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. Arthur Nikisch Makes His Last Appearance.

Music Hall Packed to the Doors—Director Nikisch Given a Grand Ovation—He Returns Thanks and Regrets His Enforced Retirement in a Short Speech.

The last concert of the 12th season of the Boston Symphony orchestra, given at Music Hall last evening, was an event of unusual interest, as it somewhat unexpectedly terminated the engagement of Mr. Arthur Nikisch as its conductor. It was evident that the patrons of the concerts had come to the hall with an anticipation of participating in some happening other than is usual at these concerts and there was a general air of expectation upon the incoming crowds that could not be mistaken.

Mr. Nikisch came to Boston four years ago well nigh a complete stranger to the patrons of these concerts, and having a name that was hardly known outside the limited circle of those who had met him in Europe. He goes back to his former line of musical life across the water with a record of a most remarkable character for, whatever his abilities as a conductor may be, and whatever may be said in regard to his programmes, he has seen the orchestral scheme so nobly founded and sustained by Mr. Higginson becomes a self-supporting enterprise, not only at home, but in every city which it visits periodically.

In so doing he has changed this undertaking from a private effort in the interest of good music to a service of concerts supported liberally by a public which has shown a disposition to accept whatever was provided for them with a spirit of humility and gratitude at once surprising and amusing.

It is to be regretted, whatever estimate is put upon the artistic results of Mr. Nikisch's career here, that it should be terminated so abruptly, and the kindly parting with the conductor of the orchestra for four seasons was a courteous recognition of what he has done, which reflected credit upon the patrons of these concerts.

The programme of the evening consisted of Mozart's "Parisian" symphony, No. 31, in D major, Schubert's unfinished symphony, in B minor, and Beethoven's "Eroica." There is little need to comment at length upon the performance of such a programme after the work of this conductor during his occupancy of his present position.

His ideas of the symphonic works of the composers represented in the evening's list are well known, and his readings were in conformity with his earlier programmes of a like order. He was made to know the satisfaction of the immense audience at the close of each movement, and at the end of the unfinished symphony he was presented with two immense laurel wreaths, each tied with elaborate bows of his nation's colors.

The entrance of Mr. Nikisch was attended by an ovation which any man might take pride in gaining from a Boston audience, and as he stood beside the flower-bedecked desk preparatory to mounting the high stand he has used so often the orchestra and audience joined their applause and continued it for some minutes.

At the conclusion of the "Eroica" the conductor was applauded and repeated recalls followed his retirement, the demands in this way finally leading him to follow the American fashion and make a farewell speech. In these final words Mr. Nikisch expressed his high appreciation of the kindness shown him in Boston and in all the American cities he had visited. He then paid his respects to the members of the orchestra, speaking of them in the warmest terms and commending them as soldiers whose loyalty he had always felt assured of and with whom he had always found a victory possible. He closed by expressing great regret that his generous patron had been put to so much trouble by his physical inability to complete the season's work on the tour, and said that with his dear friend Kneisel in his place he had full confidence in the continued success of the orchestra.

The opening concert of the 13th season will be given on the evening of Oct. 14 next, and the name of Mr. Nikisch's successor will be officially made public on that or an earlier date.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, MAY 1, 1893.

The Symphony Concert.

De mortuis nil nisi bonum! Mr. Nikisch has departed with unexpected suddenness, and the reviewer may omit cavil at the strange make-up of the final programme, the omission of Beethoven repeats, and the melancholy speech which culminated the proceedings and which was scarcely a Tennysonian "Passing of Arthur." That the speech was called for may well be doubted, as well as the propriety of the introduction of an Apologia pro vita sua into such a concert.

Mr. Nikisch has shown great strength in some directions, great weakness in others; the theatrical instincts which made a Weber or a Liszt work glitter and glow gave to Beethoven and Schumann a strange smell of the footlights. The operatic bent of the conductor's mind often showed at its best in the orchestral work of concertos, in which his elasticity of treatment and his close following of the solo artist were commendable. His pictures were generally painted with a large brush; he cared far more for the general effect than for any details whatever, and thus a "Tannhaeuser" overture would become intensely exciting even if its subthemes were altogether lost; it was in music very much what the impressionist school has been in painting.

While such a school was sure to have its moments of greatness, it cannot be contended that it was an unmixed blessing for us, since it led the orchestra to care more for a brilliant tone than for a careful shading, and it led the audiences to yearn for constantly increased quantities of pepper. Thus the public taste has become tinged with a craving for sensations. Any modern orchestral concoction, without a single idea, has been accepted if only the element of unrest was in it, and if it gave plently of cymbal, drum or tambourine clashes, trombone growls, piccolo shrieks, and a symmetrical, clear or conservative work runs a decided risk of being counted "slow." "The evil that men do lives after them." It is very possible that a less radical conductor will seem tame to Bostonians for some time to come.

The faults of the system were not present in the performance of Saturday; indeed, it seemed as if there were an intention to keep within the strictest limits of the letter of the law in the matter of readings, and an unwonted air of conservatism seemed to hang over the entire programme. The "Parisian" symphony by Mozart is not comparable with the Jupiter or the G minor by the same composer, and one could have wished the latter to represent Mozart in a programme in which all was symphonic. There was, however, a certain unity in the order of the works, and a lesson to be drawn from the contrasts presented, for the Parisian symphony represented the lightness and grace and symmetry of Mozart, the "Unfinished Symphony" the melodic contrasts of Schubert, and the Heroic the power and grandeur of Beethoven. Each symphony had its own points, which caused it to differ from its congeners. There could have been a greater accentuation of the differences of style to advantage.

In the Parisian symphony Mozart was so careful not to become prolix that he sometimes became too light, as the finale proved, but the omission, by the composer, of a minuet, and the reduction of the work to three movements, was not a disadvantage. It was a lesson in finales to compare the ending of this work with that of the Heroic symphony. Mozart's finales have the old jig spirit in them (the gigue was the finale of the suite, which might be called the mother of the symphony) so have Haydn's, and so had the finale of Beethoven's first symphony. But when Beethoven, in his second symphony, replaced the minuet with the scherzo, he led the way to a reform of the finale, for the rollicking spirit was transferred to the third movement, and the finale became more dignified and powerful.

Schubert's unfinished symphony is the most wonderful example in the world of what can be done with melody alone; all of Schubert's instrumental works seem but songs arranged in a new setting, and the unfinished symphony is sure to win every audience by its melodic grace; it is not what the symphonic form was intended to be, and it essentially differs from all other symphonies, but no one dare say that it is weaker because its charm is wholly different. Its performance was a creditable one.

The Heroic ended the concert and the season. It was played with an evident care for the composer's markings, with the exception of the funeral march which was taken somewhat rapidly. This is a very odd fault to chronicle, and it certainly leans to virtue's side; it was as if the conductor, determined not to sentimentalize, had allowed the pendulum to swing too far in the other direction. Coleridge once called this "a funeral procession in purple," but on this occasion it had a shade of scarlet in it, particularly in the major theme, in which the oboe did some excellent work.

In the trio of the scherzo the three horns did excellent work, not a suspicion of a break being audible. This may be called the first actual scherzo of the symphonic repertoire, for the scherzo of the second symphony is more of a minuet than the minuet of the first. And the finale is the first example of the achievement of a proper counterpoise to the inherent strength of the sonata-movement form, the first introduction of grand variations into the symphony as a climax. It was proper that Beethoven should break a fetter in ending the symphony dedicated to the memory of a hero. It is strange to read how little Beethoven's contemporaries appreciated the master's power in variations; one of the critics said of him: "Mr. Beethoven does not and cannot properly vary a theme," and another urges him to study the variations of Haydn. Brahms is the only true successor to Beethoven in this particular field, a combination of development with elaboration, and the critics are at present repeating history in attacking his work in this form.

The variations were finely played, and, although the concert was longer than usual, few auditors left until its conclusion. The programme for next October has a significant blank where the conductor's name is wont to be, but the character of the personnel of the orchestra, and the earnestness of its founder, are sufficient guarantee of a brilliant future. LOUIS C. ELSON.

NIKISCH'S SUCCESSOR.

Efforts Still Being Made to Secure the Release of Hans Richter.

A story current that Mr. Higginson of the Symphony Orchestra had sent a special envoy to Vienna to use his influence in obtaining Richter's release from the Emperor has but slender foundation. No person has been delegated for this special purpose, and the story no doubt arose from the fact that every time one of Mr. Higginson's personal friends leaves the country for a season abroad he has, and will from this time on, urge upon all such the necessity of making every effort, through Gericke and Jaher, in a sense rivals of Richter, to induce the royal favor to recognize Richter's desire to come to Boston.

Besides any advantage that might accrue to Gericke, in the event of Richter's being finally enabled to come here, there is no doubt that the warm spot he cherishes for Mr. Higginson and the orchestra would make him more than usually zealous in using his influence.

As for anybody's being sent from here on any special mission, that is not true any further than that all Mr. Higginson's friends, and he has an especially large and valuable acquaintance in Vienna, are making every effort possible to bring about the result desired.

More than one straw indicates that Mr. Nikisch and his late patron have parted on none of the best terms, and the story of the inside of the conductor's resignation, followed by his blank refusal to go upon the Western tour, may be traced more or less directly to Nikisch's intention of squeezing Mr. Higginson more than the latter would stand for the ex-conductor's services.

The orchestra is obliged to make some considerable sacrifices on account of the ex-conductor's sudden determination not to undertake the Western trip. The members were to start last evening for Canada on their way to the West, but it has been determined to have two rehearsals under Franz Kneisel, who will conduct on the Western tour, before leaving. Accordingly two dates have been cancelled in Canada.

The orchestra will play practically the same programme at all the cities on the coming tour. So that the sacrifices are twofold, pecuniary and artistic, though as to the latter it has been thought better for the reputation of the orchestra to confine itself to a limited programme rather than undertake anything that with inadequate preparation might prove disastrous.

THE LEADER.

MAY, 1893.

The announcement that the famous Richter is to succeed the famous Nikisch as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra has caused a very pleasurable excitement, and art lovers go about triumphantly whistling choice melodious morsels from the Nibelungen. One of the pleasant things connected with this business is the statement that Herr Richter comes to us not because he has been tempted with a large salary, but because he loves the American people. It is curious and delightfully flattering at the same time to discover how fond European celebrities are of the great American public. Paderewski weeps when he leaves us; Mrs. Kendall is never happy while she is away from us, and Patti is continually tempted by her love to visit us and give a farewell performance. But whatever may be the motives it is a good thing to have a great conductor with us and it is doubly fortunate that Herr Richter is a man with broad, artistic taste and with a love of good music wherever found, for many of his admirers regard his coming to Boston as the triumph of Germany and German music. The gift of looking at art from one viewpoint is fascinating and it saves the brain from the wear and tear of much thinking but it is born of prejudice and intensifies prejudice. We do not want German music alone, but German music plus what is best in all other kinds of music. Unfortunately the teaching we have received lay only along one line until we began to believe that German music was the one only species of music. Happily we are emerging from this mistake, and under the guidance of Herr Richter the field of art will broaden until it includes France, Italy, England and other civilized countries.

On the evening of April 15th the Symphony orchestra treated us to the Symphonic Tone Poem, by F. B. Busoni. The peculiarity of this poem is that it has not rhythm, metre or meaning, nor has it even the merit of being a good puzzle. Its prevailing tendency is to say nothing with the most gorgeous pomp; he gathers together all the available instruments of modern times, starts them into activity without a vitalizing and centralizing idea and allows them to begin and end in vain noise. It was not soulful music and it was not even good lay figure music for it emerged from and returned to chaos. There was a good deal of affected pomp about it, and it attempted, with some success, to hide its meretriciousness under the sober garb of science, but its aimlessness, its foolishness, its bombast, its affectation and its dulness were still apparent. There was little reason why it should have been written and no reason why it should have been played. It was bewildering, nerve-tearing and exasperating, and if it had any merit it was that of standing as an example of a species of music that should be avoided by every composer who sympathizes with the sufferings of human nature and who loves his noble art.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, MAY 1, 1893.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the twenty-fourth and last symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Mozart: Symphony No. 31 (Breitkopf & Härtel Ed. No. 1) in D major ("Parisian.")
Schubert: Symphony in B minor (unfinished.)
Beethoven: Symphony No. 3, in E-flat major ("Eroica"), Opus 55.

A noble programme to wind up a season and celebrate the last appearance here of our conductor. If anyone in the audience habitually inclined to be scared at the thought of "three symphonies" did not find his fears futile, and that there was as much variety in these three by Mozart, Schubert and Beethoven as in an ordinary programme, ostensibly more varied, we suspect that individual of forming his opinions more from title-pages than from the music itself.

It is always good to hear a Mozart symphony; especially good to hear one that falls outside that narrow, if glorious, circle of the "Jupiter," the G minor, and the E-flat major. This "Parisian" symphony, written for the Concert Spirituel in Paris, is a masterwork, if ever there was one. Mozart was young when he wrote it, and yet what marked individuality the work shows! One does not find so fully formed a "personal" style in Beethoven's earlier works; they show not a little of the one and only Beethoven, it is true, but they are full of suggestions of Haydn, not only of his style and methods, but of his mental attitude and cast of musical thought. But in this symphony of Mozart's one finds little to recall Haydn; the character of the themes, the manner of treatment, the whole musical essence of the work, even to the instrumentation, are Mozart's and his alone. That Mozart was putting his best foot well foremost in this symphony, and girding himself up to do his very best, might be suspected from the mere fact of his intending it especially for the great Paris orchestra; but there is also quite sufficient internal evidence to show that he meant to do something hors ligne; he has written all three movements in that elaborate and highly organized "sonata-form" which composers, especially in his day, generally cared to apply only to the first movement of symphonies; and his omission of the customary minuet is to be regarded less as a willingness on his part to stunt the symphony of one of its regular members and make it a "small" symphony, than as a desire to have nothing in it that should fall short of the dignity of the largest symphonic form—a form that could not possibly be applied to the minuet.

The style of the work is at once more elaborate, bolder and more subtile than one finds in most of even the longer symphonies by Haydn; the composer makes light of and plays with difficulties such as only the most expert contrapuntist could face without betraying some sense of effort. Then the beauty, richness and individuality of the instrumentation, the variety of orchestral effects produced by simple means, by invariably treating every instrument according to its own essential nature! Surely no man, either before or since, has ever succeeded in making horns and trumpets sound just as Mozart does. Not even the Wagnerian panoply of brass can surpass Mozart's two horns and two trumpets in brilliancy.

The symphony was admirably played, with all due grace, sentiment, and buoyancy of phrasing, yet with a constant regard for the true classic measure in expression and classic consistency in tempo. In clearness, smoothness, and vitality of accent the performance left nothing to be desired. It was a rare delight all through.

Similar fine traits were noteworthy in the playing of the Schubert unfinished symphony. Here, as was not unnatural, Mr. Nikisch allowed himself more freedom in the matter of tempo—the work calls for it; it is more modern in feeling, more dramatic than the Mozart piece. And be it said that Mr. Nikisch's modifications of tempo were all slight, and, to our mind, all singularly felicitous; one was new to us: taking the first theme, both at its first announcement and afterwards in the working-out, a little faster than the next following subsidiary. Many conductors have been too inclined to try for dramatic impressiveness by dragging out this first theme, making the beginning of the working-out in especial a very Desert of Sahara for dreariness; Mr. Nikisch takes it just right. The Andante con moto, not the most inspiring movement in the world, if the truth be told, was beautifully given, and in a way to reduce its tedium to a minimum.

The ever great "Eroica" was a triumph! That glorious first movement that set all criticism by the ears when it first came out, and now stands by common consent on the very pinnacle of orchestral composition, was grandly given. There was not an overdone accent, not a phrase but was allowed to retain its own native grandeur, untarnished by any strutting grandiosity; and yet, with what fire, with what immense effectiveness the whole was played! Only one point we should have liked to hear go otherwise; in that much-discussed entry of the horn on the tonic against a dominant accompaniment, Mr. Nikisch takes a rather timid middle course; he does not audaciously "correct" the passage, by letting the second violins fall from A-flat to G, nor has he the boldness to let the A-flat in the violins grate audibly against the G in the horn; he simply tones down the violins to such an extent that you really do not hear the dissonance at all. Now, the passage, as it stands in the score, may be a piece of sheer fantastic, mad-sap humor, if you will; on this head we have nothing to say; but, if Beethoven wrote that grating dissonance and, what is more, insisted upon its being "all right" when rehearsing the symphony, one naturally concludes that he meant it to be heard.

Mr. Nikisch took the Funeral March at a less portentiously dragging pace than when he first conducted the symphony here. For this all thanks! the movement gains much thereby in dignity. The performance was admirable in majestic impressiveness.

Both the scherzo and finale were splendidly played. At the close of the concert, the applause being of the heartiest, Mr. Nikisch stepped forward to the front of the platform and spoke a few regretful words of farewell to the audience and the orchestra.

Of Mr. Nikisch's course as a conductor here we will not speak now, leaving all consideration of this subject for another, more fitting time. For the present all we will say is simply, Good-by and good luck!

Boston Journal.

TUESDAY, MAY 2, 1893.

NIKISCH'S FINAL WORD.

He Denies That There Has Been a Breach of Contract—His Rights.

Considering the proverbial taciturnity of Mr. Henry L. Higginson and the domestic inclinations of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, the current stories touching the conversation, actions and general behavior of the patron of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the ex-conductor of the same during the last few moments which they officially spent together are plentiful. The latest ran thus:

In the contract which Mr. Nikisch signed four years ago was a clause which read that a sum of money (the exact amount was variously stated) should be forfeited if he should break it, i. e., if he should terminate his engagement unexpectedly. According to the chief narrators of this story, Mr. Higginson considered the undue haste and short notice of Mr. Nikisch equivalent to a breach of contract, and gave notice of a desire to receive the forfeited sum. He even went further. He said that if the sum was not paid freely he would sue the director for $5000.

The peculiar interest about this report—which has a truthful mist about it—is that it enables the Journal to settle all discussion. A reporter related the foregoing story to Mr. Nikisch Monday afternoon, and in answer was made this statement: "I have broken no contract. There was no such thing as a sum forfeit in the contract. The provisions of the contract gave me the right to terminate my engagement at any time, but on a condition that I should pay a certain sum. I never have nor never will break a contract."

Then the reporter spoke of the rumored intention of Mr. Higginson to sue him. In answer, Mr. Nikisch took from his pocket a large sheet of paper, on which was neatly typewritten an acknowledgment of the receipt of $5000, and also of the honorable termination of the engagement according to the contract of December, 1888. It was signed by Henry L. Higginson, and bore the date of April 30.

"That settles it, does it not?" remarked the conductor.

"I paid that sum last Saturday, as you see, and did it to save my health and my life. That is all."

So be it.

Boston Transcript

WEDNESDAY, MAY 3, 1893.

Mr. Nikisch's Departure.

Mr. Nikisch has exhibited to a reporter a typewritten acknowledgment of the receipt from him by Colonel Henry L. Higginson of $5000, and also of the honorable termination of the engagement according to the contract of December, 1888. It was signed by Henry L. Higginson, and bore the date of April 30. "That settles it, does it not?" remarked the conductor to the reporter. "I paid that sum last Saturday, as you see, and did it to save my health and my life. That is all." Mr. Nikisch also remarked: "I have broken no contract. There was no such thing as a sum forfeit in the contract. The provisions of the contract gave me the right to terminate my engagement at any time, but on a condition that I should pay a certain sum. I never have nor never will break a contract." Whatever it may be called, this sacrifice of $5000 is to be added to the loss of $1000 in salary that would have accrued in the remaining three weeks of the orchestra's season, and the $2000 bonus that Colonel Higginson has always given his conductors at the close of each year's work.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Franz Kneisel, has started on its seventh annual trip. The party numbers seventy-eight, and travels in three special Wagner sleeping-cars. The first concert will be given in Rochester this evening, the second in Buffalo Thursday evening, and concerts with the Mozart Club of Pittsburg on Friday and Saturday, will close the week. The second week will include concerts in Cleveland, Toledo, Columbus, Cincinnati, the latter in charge of the Ladies' Musical Club, closing with two concerts in Louisville. The orchestra will arrive in Chicago on May 14, and will give at the World's Fair afternoon concerts on May 15 and 16. From Chicago the tour includes Grand Rapids, a concert with the Arion Society in Milwaukee, the musical event of the season at Ann Arbor University, and closes on May 20, in Detroit, with a concert under the auspices of the Detroit Musical Society. The orchestra will arrive in Boston on May 22. All arrangements for the trip have been made by Charles A. Ellis and his assistant, Fred R. Comee, will be with the orches-

Musikalische Rundschau.

Wien, 15. April 1893.

— Aus dem Hofoperntheater kommt die Nachricht von dem Rücktritte des ersten Hofopern-Capellmeisters Hans Richter in dieser seiner Eigenschaft und als Dirigent der Philharmoniker. Wir begnügen uns für heute damit, diese Nachricht zu verzeichnen, behalten uns aber vor, des Ausführlichen die hohe Bedeutung dieses genialen Dirigenten und den Verlust für das Wiener Musikleben entsprechend zu würdigen.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, MAY 6, 1893.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The programme for the last concert of this season was a queer one—Mozart's thirty-first or "Parisian" symphony, Schubert's unfinished symphony and Beethoven's "Eroica." If one must have three symphonies all at once, perhaps those would do as well as any that could be chosen—the brilliancy of Mozart, the sympathetic melody of Schubert and the grandeur of Beethoven. But for the close of a season—and especially for the close of a four years' course of seasons—it would have been better had Mr. Nikisch made a choice of music which would have satisfied more than the one journal which apparently has been enraptured with everything which Mr. Nikisch has done, except when everybody else was pleased. This combination appeared much as if its maker were at the end of his interest or of his wits and arranged this as safe and standard. It made the evening very long, and as the hall was unusually close and hot, listening was not easy. The playing was exceedingly good and in the difficult and catchy passages the men were evidently alert and anxious to make no slip. The readings were reasonable and right, exception made of the funeral march in the "Eroica," which moved somewhat too lightly and trippingly for full dignity and impressiveness.

At the close of the concert Mr. Nikisch, who had been complimented with laurel wreaths and flowers, was several times recalled, until at last he made a few remarks to the waiting people. Possibly it would have been more discreet in him to say nothing, considering the manner of his withdrawal, but as the audience practically compelled him to speak, he should not be blamed for saying what was on his mind. There is no question but he spoke frankly and truly in saying that he had tried to do his best. That has never been doubted, even by his severest critics; the strongest point maintained against him being that he was not in his proper place, being a dramatic conductor in a concert-conductor's desk. All will wish him well in his new sphere, and will expect to hear fine and honorable reports of him.

According to the tabulation in the programme ninety-two numbers, instrumental and vocal, have been presented during the season. Of these fourteen are credited as novelties, and six were taken from American composers. France had a fair showing and Scandinavia was recognized, as also was Italy; but the vast proportion of the music was German. Of the novelties not all were worth their places, and some—such as the Humperdinck and Riemenschneider works—had best have been left untouched. The solo list was creditable, with an exception or two, and the choral experiment was barely a succès d'estime. Altogether the season cannot be conceded to have raised the standard of excellence or repute either in art or performance, although is must be set down as much better than any other city could have furnished and only to be excepted to by those who have been educated and accustomed to constantly increasing merit.

What is the use of mincing matters and refraining to tell Mr. Otto Floersheim—or the person who writes to the Musical Courier over his initials—that he does not speak the truth, and that the falsehood he writes about Boston inclines one to believe him capable of claiming the credit for work done by somebody else. He has certainly been charged in print with getting another person to prepare the orchestral score for a certain triviality which was allowed a place on a Boston Symphony programme, and he has never refuted the charge, so far as is known here. He writes from Berlin to his paper thus:—

The news that Arthur Nikisch will soon leave Boston has spread here with great rapidity and caused quite some astonishment. Not, however, to me. It is far better and more satisfactory to an artist of Nikisch's rank and abilities to be the intendent and conductor of the Pesth Opera House (a position similar to that held by Jahn in Vienna) than to be chef d'orchestre at Boston and be harassed by the Hub's voracious music critics, who howl like wolves in the teeth of every artist who dares to please the public longer than two seasons.

A second letter from this same man includes this further insolent statement:—

The Boston critics drove away Nikisch, as they did Gericke before him.

The last assertion is a flat, out-and-out lie or else a specimen of the grossest ignorance, being contradicted by Mr. Nikisch's frequent assertions that he did not read the newspapers and neither knew nor cared what they said. Huge and outrageous as this falsity is, it is matched in size at least by the impudence and arrogance of the lines with which the paragraph ends:—

If Colonel Higginson wants to know the right man to take upon his shoulders the cloak of Nikisch, let him apply to me at once and I will tell him whom to engage.

For sheer, unadulterated effrontery, there has not been anything equal to this for a good while. Mr. "O. F." must have been elevating himself with his own "Elevation."

American Art Journal.

OFFICES, 23 UNION SQUARE, NEW YORK.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MAY 6, 1893.

THE reason that Hans Richter will seek America as the field of his future musical labors lies in the fact that with all his fame he is unable to earn sufficient money in the Kaiserstadt to support his family. Boston, the American Leipsic, will see to it that the learned doctor, his better half, and the dozen or more little Richters will be amply provided for. Richter's leavetaking at the Philharmonic concert in Vienna on Sunday, according to a London correspondent, was a very impressive scene. Applauded and cheered by an enthusiastic audience, he at last consented to make a short speech. He explained that the work at the Opera was too much for him, and that by directing concerts only he could not provide for a large family at Vienna; so, as a lucrative and honorable offer had been made to him, he must respond to the call. Even if he found it hard to leave Vienna, he felt happy that it was mostly due to his efforts that the works of Wagner, his great master, were admired and loved there. There are still many people in Vienna who think that if the Emperor does not release Dr. Richter from his contract he cannot go, but he is quite determined, whatever may be the consequences. He leaves for Chicago, to direct six concerts at the Exhibition in June. He remains there part of July, and then returns to Vienna to make his final arrangements, sell his house in the Cottage Quarter, and take away his family. On the 1st of October his work with the Boston Symphony Orchestra begins.

IT IS SAID that Arthur Nikisch, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is already repenting his giving up of that lucrative post. According to a story telegraphed to the Herald, it appears that when Mr. Nikisch received the offer from Buda-Pesth he went to see Mr. Higginson, the patron of the Symphony concerts, and told him of the offer. He said that if a five years' contract were given him he would remain here. Incidentally it may be remarked that Mr. Nikisch is said to get a salary of $9,000 a season here, while the Buda-Pesth position is worth about $4,500.

Mr. Higginson said that he would consider the matter. Whereupon Mr. Nikisch acted as if he were insulted, expressing his opinions not mildly, and, to cap all, he immediately cabled his acceptance to the Hungarian house. It is this action which, it is said, he repents. Subsequently, when the arrangements for the Western trip were being made, he requested extra remuneration. It was refused him, and this, rumor has it, is why the director of the Symphony Orchestra will not accompany it to Chicago,

"The only reason why I am not going West with the orchestra," said Mr. Nikisch to the reporter yesterday, "is that my health is not good. I am completely exhausted. I intend to go abroad in a week or two. I will go first to Buda-Pesth and then take a rest some place in the mountains."

[153]

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, MAY 1, 1893.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the twenty-fourth and last symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Mozart: Symphony No. 31 (Breitkopf & Härtel Ed. No. 1) in D major ("Parisian.")
Schubert: Symphony in B minor (unfinished.)
Beethoven: Symphony No. 3, in E-flat major ("Eroica"), Opus 55.

A noble programme to wind up a season and celebrate the last appearance here of our conductor. If anyone in the audience habitually inclined to be scared at the thought of "three symphonies" did not find his fears futile, and that there was as much variety in these three by Mozart, Schubert and Beethoven as in an ordinary programme, ostensibly more varied, we suspect that individual of forming his opinions more from title-pages than from the music itself.

It is always good to hear a Mozart symphony; especially good to hear one that falls outside that narrow, if glorious, circle of the "Jupiter," the G minor, and the E-flat major. This "Parisian" symphony, written for the Concert Spirituel in Paris, is a masterwork, if ever there was one. Mozart was young when he wrote it, and yet what marked individuality the work shows! One does not find so fully formed a "personal" style in Beethoven's earlier works; they show not a little of the one and only Beethoven, it is true, but they are full of suggestions of Haydn, not only of his style and methods, but of his mental attitude and cast of musical thought. But in this symphony of Mozart's one finds little to recall Haydn; the character of the themes, the manner of treatment, the whole musical essence of the work, even to the instrumentation, are Mozart's and his alone. That Mozart was putting his best foot well foremost in this symphony, and girding himself up to do his very best, might be suspected from the mere fact of his intending it especially for the great Paris orchestra; but there is also quite sufficient internal evidence to show that he meant to do something hors ligne; he has written all three movements in that elaborate and highly organized "sonata-form" which composers, especially in his day, generally cared to apply only to the first movement of symphonies; and his omission of the customary minuet is to be regarded less as a willingness on his part to stunt the symphony of one of its regular members and make it a "small" symphony, than as a desire to have nothing in it that should fall short of the dignity of the largest symphonic form—a form that could not possibly be applied to the minuet.

The style of the work is at once more elaborate, bolder and more subtile than one finds in most of even the longer symphonies by Haydn; the composer makes light of and plays with difficulties such as only the most expert contrapuntist could face without betraying some sense of effort. Then the beauty, richness and individuality of the instrumentation, the variety of orchestral effects produced by simple means, by invariably treating every instrument according to its own essential nature! Surely no man, either before or since, has ever succeeded in making horns and trumpets sound just as Mozart does. Not even the Wagnerian panoply of brass can surpass Mozart's two horns and two trumpets in brilliancy.

The symphony was admirably played, with all due grace, sentiment, and buoyancy of phrasing, yet with a constant regard for the true classic measure in expression and classic consistency in tempo. In clearness, smoothness, and vitality of accent the performance left nothing to be desired. It was a rare delight all through.

Similar fine traits were noteworthy in the playing of the Schubert unfinished symphony. Here, as was not unnatural, Mr. Nikisch allowed himself more freedom in the matter of tempo—the work calls for it; it is more modern in feeling, more dramatic than the Mozart piece. And be it said that Mr. Nikisch's modifications of tempo were all slight, and, to our mind, all singularly felicitous; one was new to us; taking the first theme, both at its first announcement and afterwards in the working-out, a little faster than the next following subsidiary. Many conductors have been too inclined to try for dramatic impressiveness by dragging out this first theme, making the beginning of the working-out in especial a very Desert of Sahara for dreariness; Mr. Nikisch takes it just right. The Andante con moto, not the most inspiring movement in the world, if the truth be told, was beautifully given, and in a way to reduce its tedium to a minimum.

The ever great "Eroica" was a triumph! That glorious first movement that set all criticism by the ears when it first came out, and now stands by common consent on the very pinnacle of orchestral composition, was grandly given. There was not an overdone accent, not a phrase but was allowed to retain its own native grandeur, untarnished by any strutting grandiosity; and yet, with what fire, with what immense effectiveness the whole was played! Only one point we should have liked to hear go otherwise; in that much-discussed entry of the horn on the tonic against a dominant accompaniment, Mr. Nikisch takes a rather timid middle course; he does not audaciously "correct" the passage, by letting the second violins fall from A-flat to G, nor has he the boldness to let the A-flat in the violins grate audibly against the G in the horn; he simply tones down the violins to such an extent that you really do not hear the dissonance at all. Now, the passage, as it stands in the score, may be a piece of sheer fantastic, mad-cap humor, if you will; on this head we have nothing to say; but, if Beethoven wrote that grating dissonance and, what is more, insisted upon its being "all right" when rehearsing the symphony, one naturally concludes that he meant it to be heard.

Mr. Nikisch took the Funeral March at a less portentiously dragging pace than when he first conducted the symphony here. For this all thanks! the movement gains much thereby in dignity. The performance was admirable in majestic impressiveness.

Both the scherzo and finale were splendidly played. At the close of the concert, the applause being of the heartiest, Mr. Nikisch stepped forward to the front of the platform and spoke a few regretful words of farewell to the audience and the orchestra.

Of Mr. Nikisch's course as a conductor here we will not speak now, leaving all consideration of this subject for another, more fitting time. For the present all we will say is simply, Good-by and good luck!

[153]

Boston Journal.

TUESDAY, MAY 2, 1893.

NIKISCH'S FINAL WORD.

He Denies That There Has Been a Breach of Contract—His Rights.

Considering the proverbial taciturnity of Mr. Henry L. Higginson and the domestic inclinations of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, the current stories touching the conversation, actions and general behavior of the patron of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the ex-conductor of the same during the last few moments which they officially spent together are plentiful. The latest ran thus:

In the contract which Mr. Nikisch signed four years ago was a clause which read that a sum of money (the exact amount was variously stated) should be forfeited if he should break it, i. e., if he should terminate his engagement unexpectedly. According to the chief narrators of this story, Mr. Higginson considered the undue haste and short notice of Mr. Nikisch equivalent to a breach of contract, and gave notice of a desire to receive the forfeited sum. He even went further. He said that if the sum was not paid freely he would sue the director for $5000.

The peculiar interest about this report—which has a truthful mist about it—is that it enables the Journal to settle all discussion. A reporter related the foregoing story to Mr. Nikisch Monday afternoon, and in answer was made this statement: "I have broken no contract. There was no such thing as a sum forfeit in the contract. The provisions of the contract gave me the right to terminate my engagement at any time, but on a condition that I should pay a certain sum. I never have nor never will break a contract."

Then the reporter spoke of the rumored intention of Mr. Higginson to sue him. In answer, Mr. Nikisch took from his pocket a large sheet of paper, on which was neatly typewritten an acknowledgment of the receipt of $5000, and also of the honorable termination of the engagement according to the contract of December, 1888. It was signed by Henry L. Higginson, and bore the date of April 30.

"That settles it, does it not?" remarked the conductor.

"I paid that sum last Saturday, as you see, and did it to save my health and my life. That is all."

So be it.

Boston Transcript

WEDNESDAY, MAY 3, 1893.

Mr. Nikisch's Departure.

Mr. Nikisch has exhibited to a reporter a typewritten acknowledgment of the receipt from him by Colonel Henry L. Higginson of $5000, and also of the honorable termination of the engagement according to the contract of December, 1888. It was signed by Henry L. Higginson, and bore the date of April 30. "That settles it, does it not?" remarked the conductor to the reporter. "I paid that sum last Saturday, as you see, and did it to save my health and my life. That is all." Mr. Nikisch also remarked: "I have broken no contract. There was no such thing as a sum forfeit in the contract. The provisions of the contract gave me the right to terminate my engagement at any time, but on a condition that I should pay a certain sum. I never have nor never will break a contract." Whatever it may be called, this sacrifice of $5000 is to be added to the loss of $1000 in salary that would have accrued in the remaining three weeks of the orchestra's season, and the $2000 bonus that Colonel Higginson has always given his conductors at the close of each year's work.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Franz Kneisel, has started on its seventh annual trip. The party numbers seventy-eight, and travels in three special Wagner sleeping-cars. The first concert will be given in Rochester this evening, the second in Buffalo Thursday evening, and concerts with the Mozart Club of Pittsburg on Friday and Saturday, will close the week. The second week will include concerts in Cleveland, Toledo, Columbus, Cincinnati, the latter in charge of the Ladies' Musical Club, closing with two concerts in Louisville. The orchestra will arrive in Chicago on May 14, and will give at the World's Fair afternoon concerts on May 15 and 16. From Chicago the tour includes Grand Rapids, a concert with the Arion Society in Milwaukee, the musical event of the season at Ann Arbor University, and closes on May 20, in Detroit, with a concert under the auspices of the Detroit Musical Society. The orchestra will arrive in Boston on May 22. All arrangements for the trip have been made by Charles A. Ellis and his assistant, Fred R. Comee, will be with the orches-

Musikalische Rundschau.

Wien, 15. April 1893.

— Aus dem Hofoperntheater kommt die Nachricht von dem Rücktritte des ersten Hofopern-Capellmeisters Hans Richter in dieser seiner Eigenschaft und als Dirigent der Philharmoniker. Wir begnügen uns für heute damit, diese Nachricht zu verzeichnen, behalten uns aber vor, des Ausführlichen die hohe Bedeutung dieses genialen Dirigenten und den Verlust für das Wiener Musikleben entsprechend zu würdigen.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, MAY 6, 1893.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The programme for the last concert of this season was a queer one—Mozart's thirty-first or "Parisian" symphony, Schubert's unfinished symphony and Beethoven's "Eroica." If one must have three symphonies all at once, perhaps those would do as well as any that could be chosen—the brilliancy of Mozart, the sympathetic melody of Schubert and the grandeur of Beethoven. But for the close of a season—and especially for the close of a four years' course of seasons—it would have been better had Mr. Nikisch made a choice of music which would have satisfied more than the one journal which apparently has been enraptured with everything which Mr. Nikisch has done, except when everybody else was pleased. This combination appeared much as if its maker were at the end of his interest or of his wits and arranged this as safe and standard. It made the evening very long, and as the hall was unusually close and hot, listening was not easy. The playing was exceedingly good and in the difficult and catchy passages the men were evidently alert and anxious to make no slip. The readings were reasonable and right, exception made of the funeral march in the "Eroica," which moved somewhat too lightly and trippingly for full dignity and impressiveness.

At the close of the concert Mr. Nikisch, who had been complimented with laurel wreaths and flowers, was several times recalled, until at last he made a few remarks to the waiting people. Possibly it would have been more discreet in him to say nothing, considering the manner of his withdrawal, but as the audience practically compelled him to speak, he should not be blamed for saying what was on his mind. There is no question but he spoke frankly and truly in saying that he had tried to do his best. That has never been doubted, even by his severest critics; the strongest point maintained against him being that he was not in his proper place, being a dramatic conductor in a concert-conductor's desk. All will wish him well in his new sphere, and will expect to hear fine and honorable reports of him.

According to the tabulation in the programme ninety-two numbers, instrumental and vocal, have been presented during the season. Of these fourteen are credited as novelties, and six were taken from American composers. France had a fair showing and Scandinavia was recognized, as also was Italy; but the vast proportion of the music was German. Of the novelties not all were worth their places, and some—such as the Humperdinck and Riemenschneider works—had best have been left untouched. The solo list was creditable, with an exception or two, and the choral experiment was barely a succès d'estime. Altogether the season cannot be conceded to have raised the standard of excellence or repute either in art or performance, although is must be set down as much better than any other city could have furnished and only to be excepted to by those who have been educated and accustomed to constantly increasing merit.

What is the use of mincing matters and refraining to tell Mr. Otto Floersheim—or the person who writes to the Musical Courier over his initials—that he does not speak the truth, and that the falsehood he writes about Boston inclines one to believe him capable of claiming the credit for work done by somebody else. He has certainly been charged in print with getting another person to prepare the orchestral score for a certain triviality which was allowed a place on a Boston Symphony programme, and he has never refuted the charge, so far as is known here. He writes from Berlin to his paper thus:—

The news that Arthur Nikisch will soon leave Boston has spread here with great rapidity and caused quite some astonishment. Not, however, to me. It is far better and more satisfactory to an artist of Nikisch's rank and abilities to be the intendent and conductor of the Pesth Opera House (a position similar to that held by Jahn in Vienna) than to be chef d'orchestre at Boston and be harassed by the Hub's voracious music critics, who howl like wolves in the teeth of every artist who dares to please the public longer than two seasons.

A second letter from this same man includes this further insolent statement:—

The Boston critics drove away Nikisch, as they did Gericke before him.

The last assertion is a flat, out-and-out lie or else a specimen of the grossest ignorance, being contradicted by Mr. Nikisch's frequent assertions that he did not read the newspapers and neither knew nor cared what they said. Huge and outrageous as this falsity is, it is matched in size at least by the impudence and arrogance of the lines with which the paragraph ends:—

If Colonel Higginson wants to know the right man to take upon his shoulders the cloak of Nikisch, let him apply to me at once and I will tell him whom to engage.

For sheer, unadultered effrontery, there has not been anything equal to this for a good while. Mr. "O. F." must have been elevating himself with his own "Elevation."

American Art Journal.

OFFICES, 23 UNION SQUARE, NEW YORK.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MAY 6, 1893.

THE reason that Hans Richter will seek America as the field of his future musical labors lies in the fact that with all his fame he is unable to earn sufficient money in the Kaiserstadt to support his family. Boston, the American Leipsic, will see to it that the learned doctor, his better half, and the dozen or more little Richters will be amply provided for. Richter's leavetaking at the Philharmonic concert in Vienna on Sunday, according to a London correspondent, was a very impressive scene. Applauded and cheered by an enthusiastic audience, he at last consented to make a short speech. He explained that the work at the Opera was too much for him, and that by directing concerts only he could not provide for a large family at Vienna; so, as a lucrative and honorable offer had been made to him, he must respond to the call. Even if he found it hard to leave Vienna, he felt happy that it was mostly due to his efforts that the works of Wagner, his great master, were admired and loved there. There are still many people in Vienna who think that if the Emperor does not release Dr. Richter from his contract he cannot go, but he is quite determined, whatever may be the consequences. He leaves for Chicago, to direct six concerts at the Exhibition in June. He remains there part of July, and then returns to Vienna to make his final arrangements, sell his house in the Cottage Quarter, and take away his family. On the 1st of October his work with the Boston Symphony Orchestra begins.

IT IS SAID that Arthur Nikisch, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is already repenting his giving up of that lucrative post. According to a story telegraphed to the Herald, it appears that when Mr. Nikisch received the offer from Buda-Pesth he went to see Mr. Higginson, the patron of the Symphony concerts, and told him of the offer. He said that if a five years' contract were given him he would remain here. Incidentally it may be remarked that Mr. Nikisch is said to get a salary of $9,000 a season here, while the Buda-Pesth position is worth about $4,500.

Mr. Higginson said that he would consider the matter. Whereupon Mr. Nikisch acted as if he were insulted, expressing his opinions not mildly, and, to cap all, he immediately cabled his acceptance to the Hungarian house. It is this action which, it is said, he repents. Subsequently, when the arrangements for the Western trip were being made, he requested extra remuneration. It was refused him, and this, rumor has it, is why the director of the Symphony Orchestra will not accompany it to Chicago.

"The only reason why I am not going West with the orchestra," said Mr. Nikisch to the reporter yesterday, "is that my health is not good. I am completely exhausted. I intend to go abroad in a week or two. I will go first to Buda-Pesth and then take a rest some place in the mountains."

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, MAY 7.

The Symphony Season.

In summing up the season's work, we think that we do not exaggerate when we affirm that the series of concerts just ended were the most uninteresting that the organization has ever given. The programmes were arranged without judgment. A great deal of music that should not have had a hearing at such concerts was performed, notably the d'Albert Symphony, the Davidoff 'cello concerto, the Humperdink "Humoresque," the Riemenschneider "Dance of Death," P. Scharwenha's "Frühlingswogen," and the Busoni Symphonic "Tone-Poem." In fact, with the exception of Mr. Foote's cantata, "The Skeleton in Armor," Gilson's "La Mer," Miss Lang's Dramatic Overture, Mr. Paine's Columbus March and Hymn, Svensden's "Zorshayda," and Tschaikowshy's E-minor Symphony, these included all the new works that were given. Wagner was represented by ten compositions, Beethoven by nine; Schumann, Liszt, Brahms, Dvorak and Saint-Saëns, by four each; Bach, Haydn and Mozart by two each; and Goldmark, Mendelssohn, Raff and Tschaikowsky by the same number respectively. Weber, Berlioz and MacDowell were heard in three works each. D'Albert, Bizet, Bruch, Busoni, Davidoff, Ernst, Foote, Gade, Gilson, Gounod, Grieg, Lalo, Miss Lang, Moszkowski, Nicolai, Paderewski, Paine, Reinecke, Reimenschneider, Humperdink, Rubinstein, Scharwenka, Spohr, Svensden, Thierolt, Vieuxtemps and Volkmann, had one hearing each. As will be seen, in point of number. Wagner stands at the head of the list, a somewhat queer showing for a symphony concert season. The soloists were: Pianists, Paderewski, F. B. Busoni, George M. Nowell, Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler, Carl Stasny; the vocalists were, Miss Emma Juch, Mme. Basta-Tavary, Max Heinrich, Priscilla White, Louisa Leimer, Felicia Kaschoska, Mrs. Nikisch, Heinrich Meyn, W. J. Winch, and Mr. A. Foote's church choir; the violinists were Henri Marteau and the usual soloists of the orchestra. The symphony chorus, of which so much was promised, and from which so much was expected, was a disastrous failure, and assisted in one of the most bungling and inadequate performances of Beethoven's choral symphony ever heard in this city, after which it fortunately disappeared, to all practical intents and purposes, from view. The playing of the orchestra was, on the whole, of a lower standard of excellence than has characterized it since its earliest years, and its chief successes were achieved in those compositions in which noise predominated. Fortunately the conductor, under whose sway the orchestra has so steadily degenerated, is to control it no longer; and whatever may be the cause that induced him to cancel his engagement, there is every reason to rejoice that it is cancelled; that is, if it be desirable that the orchestra shall be restored to the efficiency that distinguished it when it was placed under the control of its late conductor. Independent of the fact that he was not fitted by experience nor by temperament to lead a symphony orchestra, and independent of the other fact that at the end of his fourth year he was no better fitted for the duty than he was at the beginning of his first, he seemed to be less influenced by devotion to art for art's sake than he was by devotion to self-glorification; hence great composers were trifled with in order that the conductor might become prominent. It seemed as if the orchestra was only considered as a potent means of advertising its conductor. It was as if nothing was to be omitted that might cause the conductor to be talked about. This was, doubtless excellent business tactics, but it was also art insincerity. Some thoughtless or mistakenly-indulgent people admired it; but the judicious grieved. However, it is over now, and i is to be hoped that the next conductor may not be another experiment, but will be chosen from the ranks of of those who have won deserved repute. Weingartner and Mottl have been named; but the former is already under a contract that has three years to run, and the latter, though an excellent opera conductor, has failed as a leader of symphony concerts. Then, too, he is a valetudinarian. However, these are not the only conductors in the world who have attained to eminence; and, moreover, while it is perhaps, not unnatural to look in the direction of Germany for a new conductor, there are able and famous conductors elsewhere, even in France. However, it would seem that a drill-master, able to bring the orchestra into proper condition again, will be most needed at the outset. The new conductor will find almost as much to undo as he will find to do.

—Just before the last Symphony Concert it was said, on the authority of some of the members, that the orchestra had resolved to let the occasion pass without making any demonstration complimentary to Mr. Nikisch at the close of the performances. As it happened, it was the public that refrained from enthusiasm until the orchestra applauded vigorously and stimulated the audience to imitation. Mr. Nikisch is reported to have said to a New York interviewer, apropos of his refusal to go on the Western trip: "I was to have received $3,000 for the Western tour, and as a forfeit of $5,000 was stipulated in case the contract is broken by me, and I have agreed to and will pay to the representative of Mr. Higginson the $5,000 to-morrow. My loss through my inability to continue these labors amounts to $8,000. Feeling as I do, and finding that there is no such exemption clause in the contract, I could not risk the tedious tour and suddenly find myself incapacitated and thereby compelled to lose this sum anyhow. Had the Western tour disabled me I should have had the fatiguing work and travel without any compensation. Mrs. Nikisch and I shall therefore leave for Europe in a week or two. I find no fault whatever with Mr. Higginson and his decision to insist upon the fulfilment of the terms of the contract, and I never paid money more willingly than I do this $5,000, although it leaves me in the same financial condition as if I had not succeeded in accumulating anything here; that is to say, my four years' work was, from that point of view, fruitless."

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, MAY 7, 1893.

Mr. Nikisch has exhibited to a reporter a type-written acknowledgement of the receipt from him by Colonel Henry L. Higginson of $5000, and also of the honorable termination of the engagement according to the contract of December, 1888. It was signed by Henry L. Higginson, and bore the date of April 30. "That settles it, does it not?" remarked the conductor to the reporter. "I paid that sum last Saturday, as you see, and did it to save my health and life. That is all." Mr. Nikisch also remarked: "I have broken no contract. There was no such thing as a sum forfeit in the contract. The provisions of the contract gave me the right to terminate my engagement at any time, but on a condition that I should pay a certain sum. I never have nor never will break a contract." Whatever it may be called, this sacrifice of $5000 is to be added to the loss of $1000 in salary that would have accrued in the remaing three weeks of the orchestra's season, and the $2000 bonus that Colonel Higginson has always given his conductors at the close of each year's work.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MAY 3, 1893.

Telephone - - - - 1253-18th.

NIKISCH'S FORFEIT.

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH closed his career as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and in consequence his American career, on Saturday night last at Music Hall, Boston, where he directed the last concert of that organization. The end came rather abruptly, as it was originally proposed to round up Mr. Nikisch's engagement with a Western tournée, including the two concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Music Hall on the Exposition grounds at Chicago on May 15 and 16, but Mr. Nikisch's state of health did not warrant any extension of his work beyond last Saturday night. Mr. Franz Kneisel, the concert master, will in all probability conduct the concerts in the West, although there may be some difficulty in the proper adjustment of these performances, as it was no doubt understood that Mr. Nikisch was to be the conductor.

The latter gentleman forfeits $5,000 in ending the contract as he does, but it is best to let him speak as he did to THE MUSICAL COURIER on Friday afternoon:

"My contract with Mr. Higginson, unlike European contracts, contains no exemption clause covering the possibility of illness," said Mr. Nikisch, "and I was to have received $3,000 for the Western tour, and as a forfeit of $5,000 is stipulated in case the contract is broken by me, and as I have agreed to and will pay to the representative of Mr. Higginson the $5,000 to-morrow, my loss through my inability to continue these labors amounts to $8,000. Feeling as I do, and finding that there is no such exemption clause in the contract, I could not risk the tedious tour and suddenly find myself incapacitated and thereby compelled to lose this sum anyhow. Had the Western tour disabled me I should have had the fatiguing work and travel without any compensation."

"Mrs. Nikisch and I shall therefore leave for Europe in a week or two. I find no fault whatever with Mr. Higginson and his decision to insist upon the fulfillment of the terms of the contract, and I never paid money more willingly than I do this $5,000, although it leaves me in the same financial condition as if I had not succeeded in accumulating anything here; that is to say, my four years' work was from that point of view fruitless.

"Who my successor will be? Oh, I do not know and have no means of ascertaining."

There are many glittering appearances surrounding the place occupied by Mr. Nikisch, but considering the demands made upon a cultured musician and gentleman, such as Mr. Nikisch is, and his social environment in Boston, the pecuniary net results are not exactly encouraging. There is virtually no cessation to the work of a conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with its many Public Rehearsals and Concerts in Boston, Cambridge, Providence, other New England cities, New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Washington and the annual Western tour. The private rehearsals necessary to keep the repertory in condition take up a considerable portion of every week, and add to this the public performances, and it will be found that the work is, as we say, incessant.

It may have been possible that Mr. Higginson retreated from the literal interpretation of his contract with Mr. Nikisch; but this is somewhat doubtful. The payment of that sum consequently signified that Mr. Nikisch had returned to the owner of the Boston Symphony Orchestra all of his earthly possessions and all that he had saved as the result of his four years of work—surely not an encouraging aspect of affairs for those who have the ambition to succeed Mr. Nikisch.

Foreign conductors who come here under the tempting influences of what appears as a great emolument frequently forget the relatively high cost of living as compared with the expenses of a family in such a continental city as Buda-Pesth, which will be Mr. Nikisch's home. To meet the exigencies imposed by Boston's social functions compels an outlay that diminishes the salary of a symphony conductor to a mere cipher. Mr. Nikisch did of course not know this nor can his inexperienced successor be aware of it. The $5,000 supposed to have been paid by Mr. Nikisch to Mr. Higginson on Saturday might be properly applied as an emergency fund for symphony conductors who are unacquainted with the style and cost of living in large American cities.

MORE ABOUT NIKISCH AND RICHTER.

LAST Sunday's New York "Herald" published rather a sensational account of Arthur Nikisch, insinuating that the eminent Hungarian conductor was about to "hedge," in other words might be cajoled into reconsidering his projected departure for Buda-Pesth. The true condition of affairs will be found elsewhere in these columns. The "Sun" on Sunday had this cablegram:

The refusal of Richter, the well-known orchestra leader, to accept the engagement offered him in Boston is due to the Viennese authorities holding him to his contract at the Royal Opera there. The contract yields him only $1,500 a year. He might have insisted upon his right to go to Boston and Chicago, but he declined as an artist to fight the Viennese over the terms of the contract.

It is very doubtful whether Richter will visit the Chicago Exposition. Manager Vert was in receipt last Sunday of a cablegram from his brother, the London manager, in which we read: "Richter engagement off for America." Everything is in a pretty pother, for as Mr. Floersheim truthfully wrote, first-class orchestral conductors are rare, even in Europe. And now Louis Lombard, of the Utica Conservatory of Music, is in receipt of a letter from Jules Massenet, the French composer, who informs him that he cannot visit the Columbian Exposition this summer as he expected to. Here is a verbatim translation made by Mr. Lombard of Massenet's letter to him:

PARIS, April 3, 1893.

MY DEAR CONFRÈRE AND FRIEND—It is indeed true that I have not been able to decide about going to Chicago. After the years of toil I have done I imperatively need a real rest this summer. Ah! it has not been without grief—but one must be reasonable.

This "fête du monde" will be a grand marvel, and I shall not be there. Alas! for me.

I send you my most faithful and devoted regards.

Cordially yours,

J. MASSENET.

A Monsieur Louis Lombard,
Directeur du Conservatoire de Music,
Utica, N. Y.

That is one more off the distinguished list compiled by that marvel of foresight and executive ability, the secretary of the Bureau of Music of the World's Columbian Exposition. Saint-Saëns will, however, surely come. Well, that is what Brahms said. We shall believe it when we see him in the Windy City. Dr. Antonin Dvorák in all probability will be the only composer of the first rank who will honor Chicago by his presence, and he will not do it officially, but as a private citizen and a resident of New York city. And so we get a foretaste of the great and thrilling schemes which will be, as we predicted a year ago—nothing but wind.

To-day Dr. Hans Richter, conductor at the Imperial Opera, the Royal Chapel and of the Philharmonic concerts, handed in his resignation to the various managements of the above institutions, and thereby created about as big a sensation as did King Alexander of Servia to-day by proclaiming his majority. Richter claims that bad health induces him to take this step, which reason, however, is only a subterfuge of course in order to get out of a contract which binds him to the Opera for a number of years to come. The more probable facts of the case are, that Richter has had a substantial offer from either Chicago or Boston, and having reached the age of fifty, drawing a salary of only 10,000 florins a year, a very paltry sum for a man like Richter, he sees the necessity of improving his position financially by accepting a good offer from America. Richter has a large family, two sons and four daughters, and it is only natural that he should wish to provide for them substantially, having hitherto not been able to lay aside a large sum. In any case I do not blame him for desiring a change from his present position at the Imperial Opera of Vienna, which is slowly but surely going down the hill, and, as far as Wagner's operas are concerned, has long since been beaten by both Munich and Dresden, both of which cities give far more satisfactory and complete performances of Wagner's works than Vienna does at the present day. Reichmann and Materna have left Vienna and there are only Winkelmann and Grengg left; the former one can never depend upon, as he is always suffering from some chronic affection of the throat, which only allows him to sing on an average four or five times a month. So, as matters stand now, I certainly believe that Richter will go to America, and, whatever city he settles in, that city is to be congratulated. The last Philharmonic concert, with Beethoven's Ninth Symphony on the program, will accordingly be the last that Richter will conduct.

The last symphony concert of the season was given the 29th. The program was as follows:

Symphony, No. 31 (Parisian)	Mozart
Unfinished symphony, B minor	Schubert
Symphony, No. 3	Beethoven

With the performance of this dignified program Mr. Nikisch took leave of Boston. There was a very large audience, and the foul air of the hall made the concert seem one of interminable length. Mr. Nikisch was warmly welcomed, and during the concert he was presented with wreaths. After the finale of the "Eroica" he was twice recalled, and he made a short speech in which he expressed his appreciation of kindnesses shown to him during his stay. He said that he had always given his best efforts in the cause of these symphony concerts, and he regretted that on account of his health he was absolutely prevented from making the Western tour with the orchestra and thus fulfilling his contract with Mr. Higginson; but he was sure that his good friend Mr. Kneisel would, &c.

There is no definite news concerning the successor. There are rumors about Weingartner, Mottl and Gericke; but Mr. Higginson keeps silence.

The promenade concerts begin Saturday, June 3.

PHILIP HALE.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCIII, NO. 127.

SUNDAY, MAY 7, 1893.

ARTHUR NIKISCH.

He Chats About His Life in This Country.

His Opinions About Boston's Musical Tastes—American Development in the Arts—Independent Judgment a National Trait—His Acquaintances Have Been Most Enjoyable.

To obtain an interview with a busy man like Arthur Nikisch, and to do this in the last week of the famous capelmeister's presence in Boston, demanded no small amount of strategy; yet a HERALD man proved equal to the occasion, and was rewarded for his persistence with a delightful conversation, in the course of which Mr. Nikisch talked freely of his musical and social experiences in the United States. Since coming to this country, nearly four years ago, he has acquired remarkable fluency in the use of English, and his occasional interjection of a German word when he wishes to be unusually precise serves but to increase one's surprise at his proficiency in what is to him a wholly foreign language. To say that the interview was quite offhand, with no fore-knowledge of the questions that were to be put to him, is only doing justice to the conductor.

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH.

Mr. Nikisch, having been caught at Music Hall in a pause between rehearsals, was first led to speak of his musical experiences in this country, and to compare them with his recollections of Europe. "It is usually supposed," said he, "that the European public, through familiarity with concerts of all kinds for more than a century, possess a higher critical faculty than is possible to Americans, however sympathetic. But this idea is not at all borne out by my own observations in musical countries like Germany and Austria. It is true that Americans have not enjoyed the same musical opportunities as Europeans, but if I were to be asked to award the palm for genuine power of appreciation and critical judgment I should not hesitate—notwithstanding the drawback to which I have referred—to share it equally with the people of this country and of Europe. It is sometimes said that the European cities have more concerts provided for them than cities of like size in the United States, but

This Again Is an Error.

Take the case of Vienna, which, with its suburbs, is a city of over a million and a half of inhabitants. Well, that important centre has only eight symphony concerts and six or eight choral concerts in the course of a year. That is very small, indeed, when you compare it with Boston, a city which, though it has only 500,000 inhabitants, is able to support annually not only 48 symphony concerts, but many miscellaneous concerts beside. This shows that, in American cities like Boston, a musical need exists which must be supplied. Of course there are people who will tell you that people go to your concerts because they want to be in the fashion—because they want to be seen where Mr. So-and-So and Mrs. So-and-So are in the habit of appearing. But this is a very superficial explanation of the big concert audiences. That the people like the music they go to hear is self-evident, and I tell you as a musician that listening to and following classical music is no child's play. It is the last material in the world which anybody would chose pour passer le temps. You can't get people to sit it through merely that they may elbow some local leader of fashion and be counted 'in the swim.' It requires not only an educated ear, but the most sustained attention; and the way these audiences behave during a concert shows that they are following the music with critical intelligence and sympathy. A few may indeed go without either desire or capacity to appreciate what is provided for them, but these are in such a small minority, as compared with the great bulk of the audiences, that they may be left out of account. The very eagerness of the people to get tickets—shown by the way in which they will wait for hours, if need be, for the privilege of purchasing a ticket—is itself sufficient to prove that mental appetite for good music, if it may be so called, lies at the bottom of the popular rush to these great musical entertainments.

"It is said again," said Mr. Nikisch, "that the Americans brought their musical tastes with them from the other side of the Atlantic, and that a large proportion of concert goers are in fact music loving foreigners. I dispute both these positions. It is true that native Americans brought a good many things over with them when they founded this republic, but they could not bring a musical taste, which had not then been developed. All the great except those of Vienna and Leipzig, are not more than from 15 to 20 years old. Even the Vienna conservatory, the oldest of the number, has this year celebrated its 50th anniversary. So that musical development in Europe is a very recent affair, and people who emigrated to this country more than 50 or 60 years ago could not have brought with them any of the musical culture and capacity which they have since [illegible]. We must, therefore, treat Americans in musical matters, as a young community which has educated itself in a large [illegible] music, and not as a people which has had the advantage of centuries of European culture. Here Mr. Nikisch [illegible] as to the relative capacity of Europeans and Americans for appreciating the musical structure of difficult compositions, and the question opened up a phase of the subject in which he has always been deeply interested. "It struck me as something remarkable," said he, "that compositions which are not very easy to grasp, by reason of their complexity, were always appreciated more quickly here than on the other side of the water. I have observed this especially in the case of the symphonies of Brahms. They are compositions of complex character, and I made it an especial point to bring them out with the utmost clearness, so that it might be easy to understand them. They were quickly grasped and followed with delight by your American audiences. A few years ago, while summering in Europe, I met Brahms and told him what an immense success with the public his first symphony had had in Boston. He was quite surprised to hear it—pleased as well as surprised—and remarked: 'I regard what you tell me as marvellous, for last year the same symphony was played here in Vienna, where I have so many personal friends, and where I have lived so many years; yet there were not more that a score of people in the hall. Of course,' he added, 'the performance was not very good.'

Conservatories of Europe,

"Another thing," said the speaker, "which confirms me in the high estimate I place upon musical taste here, is the way in which Boston judges for itself in musical matters. Some time ago a company of artists or singers came over here with quite a European reputation. They were heralded loudly and advertised in the most lavish manner, yet when they got here they had no success at all.

The Boston People

simply found out that they were not what they had been announced to be. That showed critical taste and power of independent judgment. In addition to this, the Boston people, and Americans generally, as I have noticed in my tour through the country, are remarkably wide in their musical tastes. I have seen the same audiences on one night applaud the modern music of Wagner and Liszt, and on the next enjoy just as heartily the compositions of Mozart, Haydn, Schubert and Beethoven. I noted during my journeys in the United States that in the smaller centres of population modern music, like that of Wagner, always makes the greatest hit. There is a reason for this. When people, after being absorbed in business cares all the day, go rather late in the evening to a concert, the exciting and intense music of Wagner stirs them up, while the older classical music needs a more contemplative frame of mind to do it justice. At the same time these smaller towns and cities which like Wagner so well are also capable of the greatest enthusiasm for the the performances of the classical school. I cannot isay I that there was any marked difference in the attitude of my audiences in various parts of the country. In some places there was a little less enthusiasm, in others a little more. But altogether my trip was very pleasant and gratifying. During the last four years I and Mrs. Nikisch have met a great many very pleasant and very kind people, and we shall always look back with the greatest pleasure upon our experiences while in America. Mrs. Nikisch herself never supposed that in so short a time she could come into such delightful, friendly relationships with so many charming people. Our experiences have proved to us that Americans are a most hospitable people. We were treated everywhere with the greatest courtesy, and with a heartiness which captivated us. Our own people at home, the Austrians and Hungarians, are also very hospitable and kind-hearted, but we lived some time in northern Germany, where the manners of the people are cold and stiff, and after our experiences with them, our reception in America was to us most surprising and pleasing in its character. Boston is, perhaps, a shade cooler than New York or Philadelphia, but when you get accustomed to this you feel how hearty, enthusiastic and appreciative the people are. In a city like Boston you know that you are playing for a musical people, and a little more or less handclapping makes no difference so far as encouragement is concerned. It has been enough for me to see the crowd at the doors eager to get in to know that the public liked it. If they hadn't liked it they wouldn't have come."

The next subject broached bore on Mr. Nikisch's

Observations, as a European,

regarding American customs and social life generally in the United States. The conductor does not at all assent to the idea that the American has no time for anything except making money. He has noticed that, instead of being wholly absorbed in business, Americans give a remarkably large part of their leisure to art, science, music and educational work, much of it altogether unremunerative. "One thing," said he, "struck me especially and it is that rich people here do not end their lives in laziness. In the old country when a man has acquired a competence he goes out of his business and lives a life of leisure for the rest of his days. Here men do not cease work when they become millionaires; they consider it a duty to continue active until physically incapacitated. When a Frenchman, for example, has saved f.20,000, or thereabouts, he goes out of business and takes it easy; when an American gets rich, he regards it as a duty to go on working just as long as he remains strong and healthy. I regard this as a great virtue, and not at all as a thing to be condemned. People who leave off active life in the European manner become weakened in both their physical and mental powers.

"I have noticed another fact of your social condition," Mr. Nikisch went on to say, "and that is that there is much less poverty among you than there is in Europe. This strikes a foreigner the moment he reaches your shores, and it is particularly evident in your large cities. Your institutions in the new world seem to rest on a much more solid foundation than do ours in the old. The average people of this country are much better off than the common people of Europe. I was much surprised at the number of people in this country who possess property. This state of well being, which prevails all through the United States, as I have had occasion to observe, is an element of great importance in the creation and maintenance of musical taste. All moderately well to do people in this country can afford to attend concerts and thus encourage musical enterprise. On the other side, the cultivation and satisfaction of musical tastes is enormously expensive. In the Leipsic Gewandhaus, for example, it costs 3 marks to get even standing room at a concert, while the lowest price for a seat is 5 marks. Now when you bear in mind that 3 marks is practically $3 of American money, and that a Leipsic laborer earns on an average no more than 50 marks a month, you will understand how impossible it is for the working people of Germany to attend these expensive concerts."

Here Mr. Nikisch spoke of the comparative position of women in American and in European society. "On the average," said he, "I have found in the United States than in Europe. I mean by 'cultivated' those women with whom it is easier to talk on serious subjects. Of course, there are exceptions. There are undoubtedly many highly cultivated women who pursue serious studies in all the principal countries of Europe, but, as an observer, I should say that the women [illegible] general [illegible] serious education than women on the other side of the water. I have not been in England, but in the countries I know they do not seem to care much for scientific education in women. The German, Austrian and Hungarian women are much better housekeepers. The American women, as a rule, do not possess this capacity, and Americans do not seem to care for it in their women. But in Germany and Austria education is largely directed to giving women a capacity for housekeeping, so that [illegible] married man need never come home and find his cook gone and his wife unable at a pinch to prepare his dinner. Under that system the children are wonderfully well cared for, and everything in the house is kept in perfect order. In the old countries they try to make each woman, whatever else it may be her destiny to learn, a perfect housekeeper—a good mother for her children, a good wife for her husband. And, of course," added Herr Nikisch, with a merry twinkle in his eye, "that is very convenient for the husband. What I mean is that the women over there are not so entertaining in society as are American women, and the reason is that they have been educated more to shine in the home. In music the European women take about the same interest as do the women here.

More Cultivated Women

The last topic touched on by Mr. Nikisch was the newspapers. "On the average," said he, "they have treated me very well. Some of them did not like my manner of playing. Whether it was artistic or personal antagonism, I did not allow it to trouble me. I got the impression that in this respect American newspapers are very much like the newspapers in Europe. We are all of us human beings: we all of us have our personal feelings, and to do a man full justice is not easy. But I was never disturbed by anything written against me. I went my own way and

Tried to Do My Best.

But in another respect the European journals are very slow compared with the newspapers in America. I have taken great interest in American politics, especially in the last presidential election, as well as in some local contests, and I have had plenty of opportunities for observing how enterprising your newspapers are, and how quickly the news is reported. Everybody can find in an American paper something to interest him, and gets an account of events in a few minutes, or at most a few hours, after they have happened." Here Mr. Nikisch told a story to illustrate his point. There is a Leipzig lady whose father lives at New Britain, Ct., and when Nobili shot at the Emperor Wilhelm in Berlin, one afternoon, the news of the attempt was received by the American citizen at New Britain half a day earlier than it reached his daughter through the newspapers of Leipzig, which is only 2½ hours' railway ride from Berlin. And this failure of the German press, Mr. Nikisch explained, with gusto, was due, not to any press censorship forbidding the publication of the news, but simply to the laziness of the Leipzig journalists, who were too sleepy-headed to get out a special edition, and did not report the occurrence till the next morning. In contrast with this kind of journalism the speaker pointed to the enterprise of the BOSTON HERALD, which enabled him, on the occasion of the recent great fire, to read a report of it only a few minutes after he had seen the engines on their way to quench the flames.

Mr. Nikisch finally spoke of his forthcoming journey to Buda-Pesth, the scene of his future labors, and through the HERALD man gave a regretful farewell to his large circle of friends and well wishers in Boston. He leaves this city tomorrow, and on May 11 sails for Europe on the Columbia of the Hamburg line.

Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch will sail on the Columbia for Germany May 11.

Mr. and Mrs. Franz Kneisil sail on the Furst Bismarck June 1.

The concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Rochester, Buffalo and Pittsburg during the week have been remarkably successful, and Mr. Franz Kneisel at the conductor's desk has gained the favor of the patrons of the tour with remarkable success. Manager Ellis wires that thus far Mr. Kneisel has more than realized his expectations.

BOSTON HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCIII, NO. 130.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 10, 1893.

THE RICHTER AFFAIR.

Some Interesting Details by Private Letters.

The proposed change in the professional engagements of Dr. Hans Richter caused a deal of correspondence between interested parties in Vienna and London, in which two cities the great conductor makes an important factor in the musical seasons.

A well informed correspondent residing in Vienna states that an equivalent of $20,000 per season was the sum called for by the contract which Hans Richter signed for his engagement with the Boston Symphony orchestra, and the financial temptation it offered can best be realized from the fact that for the work he does at Vienna Hans Richter gets but about $4000 a year. The correspondent adds that the Philharmonic Society intends doing something to compensate Dr. Richter for the pecuniary loss entailed by his inability to carry out the American engagement. It is proposed to give 12 concerts, instead of eight, and to ask the conductor's acceptance of the extra proceeds as a token of the society's satisfaction in having the advantage of his further services.

Concerning his Boston contract and the way it came to be cancelled, Hans Richter is quoted as saying:

"My agreement with the Americans was conditional, and therefore I had a perfect right to make it. It contained a clause to the effect that the contract would come into force the moment I was absolved from my present contract in Vienna; that it would be, ipso facto, cancelled if my resignation here were not accepted, or if no definite reply were given before April 30. I was very hopeful of being released from my present contract, and my request was seconded by my friend, the director of the opera. Such a request must pass through several stages before it is finally accorded; at any one of them it may be definitely refused. The direction of the opera kindly supported me, but the supreme board, what we call the general-intendanz, refused to give its consent, and the matter was at an end. The reasons put forward were a very flattering view of my services to the opera, and a reluctance to create precedents which in the future might have a disorganizing effect. This is the letter:

"'Adjudicating upon Herr Kapell-Meister Richter's request to be allowed to withdraw from the company of the Imperial and Royal Court Opera, the general-intendanz of the Imperial and Royal Court theatres hereby informs him that it is not in a position to support his request, seeing that it cannot but lay stress upon the retention, as long as possible, to the Court Opera Theatre of his artistic services, and that for this reason the premature cancelling of the contract now in force cannot be granted.'

"Upon receiving this decision I wrote to the director of the general-intendanz, informing him that I had received the decision, and would fulfil all my obligations in the most scrupulous manner, while feeling grateful for the highly appreciative form in which the reasons for the decision were expressed, which was all the more pleasing in that it embodied the views, not only of a revered chief but of a genuine artist."

From the above it would appear that only genuine modesty could ever have led to Hans Richter's action in signing even a provisional contract for the Boston orchestra. He has at least had good evidence of the high esteem in which he is held in Vienna, and it appears reasonable to suppose that the action of the Vienna Philharmonic will result in making good a portion of the pecuniary sacrifice he is compelled to make by continuing to his duties in Vienna.

The Musical Courier.
NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MAY 10, 1893.

The engagement of Hans Richter for Boston is the talk of the musical fraternity here. Of course you knew of it by cable long before these lines will appear in print. Richter after the last Philharmonic concert made a short speech, in which he said that conducting of opera had become too laborious for him, and that on his Viennese concert engagements he could not subsist. He therefore had accepted the favorable offers from Boston and Chicago. The papers give his income as 100,000 florins per year, with a five years' contract. Well, I suppose some discount is to be taken off from this sum. I am quite curious to see how Richter will like Boston, and still more so how the Bostonians will take to Richter, and whether they, especially the Hub's implacable critics, will not find his work a trifle less finished on the whole than that to which they have been made accustomed by both Messrs, Arthur Nikisch and Wilhelm Gericke. Qui vivra verra.

Boston Journal.
TEN PAGES.
SATURDAY, MAY 13, 1893.

The concerts given by the Kneisel Quartet were admirable so far as the quartet itself was concerned. The choice of an assistant pianist was not in all cases fortunate.

***

The programmes of the Symphony concerts do not call for unusually serious consideration.

The Symphony chorus, after two lamentable appearances, disappeared in the abyss, like Bryant's water fowl.

Novelties of little interest or absolute worthlessness were introduced and fell flat, as the pieces by Humperdinck, Riemenschneider and P. Scharwenka.

Paul Gilson's "The Sea" was butchered to make a holiday for Mr. Nikisch.

Templeton Strong's symphony was found worthy in New York, but Mr. Nikisch looked at it askew.

***

The somewhat melodramatic departure of Mr. Nikisch was followed by the melodramatic silence concerning the new conductor.

It has been announced, and on the highest authority, that the Symphony Orchestra is a private pleasure of an individual, and that the public is rude in showing curiosity concerning this new conductor, whoever he may be.

But the seats for this private entertainment are sold publicly at auction and to the highest bidders.

Speculators sit at the sale in the seats of the scornful and gamble in tickets.

If a lover of music should present himself at the door of Music Hall any fine Saturday night of the season without a ticket, he would be like unto the man of old who went to the marriage feast without a wedding garment.

The people here and in other cities are publicly invited to exchange their money for concert tickets that they may thus grow in musical wisdom.

Is not, then, the appointment of a conductor a matter of public interest?

Or in what respect do the managers of the Boston Symphony Orchestra differ from the managers of any respectable place of amusement?

PHILIP HALE.

SUNDAY HERALD

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCIII, NO. 127.

SUNDAY, MAY 7, 1893.

ARTHUR NIKISCH.

He Chats About His Life in This Country.

His Opinions About Boston's Musical Tastes—American Development in the Arts—Independent Judgment a National Trait—His Acquaintances Have Been Most Enjoyable.

To obtain an interview with a busy man like Arthur Nikisch, and to do this in the last week of the famous capelmeister's presence in Boston, demanded no small amount of strategy; yet a HERALD man proved equal to the occasion, and was rewarded for his persistence with a delightful conversation, in the course of which Mr. Nikisch talked freely of his musical and social experiences in the United States. Since coming to this country, nearly four years ago, he has acquired remarkable fluency in the use of English, and his occasional interjection of a German word when he wishes to be unusually precise serves but to increase one's surprise at his proficiency in what is to him a wholly foreign language. To say that the interview was quite offhand, with no fore-knowledge of the questions that were to be put to him, is only doing justice to the conductor.

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH.

Mr. Nikisch, having been caught at Music Hall in a pause between rehearsals, was first led to speak of his musical experiences in this country, and to compare them with his recollections of Europe. "It is usually supposed," said he, "that the European public, through familiarity with concerts of all kinds for more than a century, possess a higher critical faculty than is possible to Americans, however sympathetic. But this idea is not at all borne out by my own observations in musical countries like Germany and Austria. It is true that Americans have not enjoyed the same musical opportunities as Europeans, but if I were to be asked to award the palm for genuine power of appreciation and critical judgment I should not hesitate—notwithstanding the drawback to which I have referred—to share it equally with the people of this country and of Europe. It is sometimes said that the European cities have more concerts provided for them than cities of like size in the United States, but

This Again Is an Error.

Take the case of Vienna, which, with its suburbs, is a city of over a million and a half of inhabitants. Well, that important centre has only eight symphony concerts and six or eight choral concerts in the course of a year. That is very small, indeed, when you compare it with Boston, a city which, though it has only 500,000 inhabitants, is able to support annually not only 48 symphony concerts, but many miscellaneous concerts beside. This shows that, in American cities like Boston, a musical need exists which must be supplied. Of course there are people who will tell you that people go to your concerts because they want to be in the fashion—because they want to be seen where Mr. So-and-So and Mrs. So-and-So are in the habit of appearing. But this is a very superficial explanation of the big concert audiences. That the people like the music they go to hear is self-evident, and I tell you as a musician that listening to and following classical music is no child's play. It is the last material in the world which anybody would chose pour passer le temps. You can't get people to sit it through merely that they may elbow some local leader of fashion and be counted 'in the swim.' It requires not only an educated ear, but the most sustained attention; and the way these audiences behave during a concert shows that they are following the music with critical intelligence and sympathy. A few may indeed go without either desire or capacity to appreciate what is provided for them, but these are in such a small minority, as compared with the great bulk of the audiences, that they may be left out of account. The very eagerness of the people to get tickets—shown by the way in which they will wait for hours, if need be, for the privilege of purchasing a ticket—is itself sufficient to prove that mental appetite for good music, if it may be so called, lies at the bottom of the popular rush to these great musical entertainments.

"It is said again," said Mr. Nikisch, "that the Americans brought their musical tastes with them from the other side of the Atlantic, and that a large proportion of concert goers are in fact music loving foreigners. I dispute both these positions. It is true that native Americans brought a good many things over with them when they founded this republic, but they could not bring a musical taste, which had not then been developed. All the great except those of Vienna and Leipzig, are not more than from 15 to 20 years old. Even the Vienna conservatory, the oldest of the number, has this year celebrated its 50th anniversary. So that musical development in Europe is a very recent affair, and people who emigrated to this country more than 50 or 60 years ago could not have brought with them any of the musical culture and capacity which they have since displayed. We must, therefore, treat America, in musical matters, as a young community which has educated itself in a large

Conservatories of Europe,

Here Mr. Nikisch was asked as to the relative capacity of Europeans and Americans for appreciating the musical structure of difficult compositions, and the question opened up a phase of the subject in which he has always been deeply interested. "It struck me as something remarkable," said he, "that compositions which are not very easy to grasp, by reason of their complexity, were always appreciated more quickly here than on the other side of the water. I have observed this especially in the case of the symphonies of Brahms. They are compositions of complex character, and I made it an especial point to bring them out with the utmost clearness, so that it might be easy to understand them. They were quickly grasped and followed with delight by your American audiences. A few years ago, while summering in Europe, I met Brahms and told him what an immense success with the public his first symphony had had in Boston. He was quite surprised to hear it—pleased as well as surprised—and remarked: 'I regard what you tell me as marvellous, for last year the same symphony was played here in Vienna, where I have so many personal friends, and where I have lived so many years; yet there were not more that a score of people in the hall. Of course,' he added, 'the performance was not very good.'

"Another thing," said the speaker, "which confirms me in the high estimate I place upon musical taste here, is the way in which Boston judges for itself in musical matters. Some time ago a company of artists or singers came over here with quite a European reputation. They were heralded loudly and advertised in the most lavish manner, yet when they got here they had no success at all.

The Boston People

simply found out that they were not what they had been announced to be. That showed critical taste and power of independent judgment. In addition to this, the Boston people, and Americans generally, as I have noticed in my tour through the country, are remarkably wide in their musical tastes. I have seen the same audiences on one night applaud the modern music of Wagner and Liszt, and on the next enjoy just as heartily the compositions of Mozart, Haydn, Schubert and Beethoven. I noted during my journeys in the United States that in the smaller centres of population modern music, like that of Wagner, always makes the greatest hit. There is a reason for this. When people, after being absorbed in business cares all the day, go rather late in the evening to a concert, the exciting and intense music of Wagner stirs them up, while the older classical music needs a more contemplative frame of mind to do it justice. At the same time these smaller towns and cities which like Wagner so well are also capable of the greatest enthusiasm for the the performances of the classical school. I cannot say that there was any marked difference in the attitude of my audiences in various parts of the country. In some places there was a little less enthusiasm, in others a little more. But altogether my trip was very pleasant and gratifying. During the last four years I and Mrs. Nikisch have met a great many very pleasant and very kind people, and we shall always look back with the greatest pleasure upon our experiences while in America. Mrs. Nikisch herself never supposed that in so short a time she could come into such delightful, friendly relationships with so many charming people. Our experiences have proved to us that Americans are a most hospitable people. We were treated everywhere with the greatest courtesy, and with a heartiness which captivated us. Our own people at home, the Austrians and Hungarians, are also very hospitable and kind-hearted, but we lived some time in northern Germany, where the manners of the people are cold and stiff, and after our experiences with them, our reception in America was to us most surprising and pleasing in its character. Boston is, perhaps, a shade cooler than New York or Philadelphia, but when you get accustomed to this you feel how hearty, enthusiastic and appreciative the people are. In a city like Boston you know that you are playing for a musical people, and a little more or less handclapping makes no difference so far as encouragement is concerned. It has been enough for me to see the crowd at the doors eager to get in to know that the public liked it. If they hadn't liked it they wouldn't have come."

The next subject broached bore on Mr Nikisch's

Observations, as a European,

regarding American customs and social life generally in the United States. The conductor does not at all assent to the idea that the American has no time for anything except making money. He has noticed that, instead of being wholly absorbed in business, Americans give a remarkably large part of their leisure to art, science, music and educational work, much of it altogether unremunerative. "One thing," said he, "struck me especially and it is that rich people here do not end their lives in laziness. In the old country when a man has acquired a competence he goes out of his business and lives a life of leisure for the rest of his days. Here men do not cease work when they become millionaires; they consider it a duty to continue active until physically incapacitated. When a Frenchman, for example, has saved f.20,000, or thereabouts, he goes out of business and takes it easy; when an American gets rich, he regards it as a duty to go on working just as long as he remains strong and healthy. I regard this as a great virtue, and not at all as a thing to be condemned. People who leave off active life in the European manner become weakened in both their physical and mental powers.

"I have noticed another fact of your social condition," Mr. Nikisch went on to say, "and that is that there is much less poverty among you than there is in Europe. This strikes a foreigner the moment he reaches your shores, and it is particularly evident in your large cities. Your institutions in the new world seem to rest on a much more solid foundation than do ours in the old. The average people of this country are much better off than the common people of Europe. I was much surprised at the number of people in this country who possess property. This state of well being, which prevails all through the United States, as I have had occasion to observe, is an element of great importance in the creation and maintenance of musical taste. All moderately well to do people in this country can afford to attend concerts and thus encourage musical enterprise. On the other side, the cultivation and satisfaction of musical tastes is enormously expensive. In the Leipsic Gewandhaus, for example, it costs 3 marks to get even standing room at a concert, while the lowest price for a seat is 5 marks. Now when you bear in mind that 3 marks is practically $3 of American money, and that a Leipsic laborer earns on an average no more than 50 marks a month, you will understand how impossible it is for the working people of Germany to attend these expensive concerts."

Here Mr. Nikisch spoke of the comparative position of women in American and in European society. "On the average," said he, "I have found in the United States than in Europe. I mean by 'cultivated' those women with whom it is easier to talk on serious subjects. Of course, there are exceptions. There are undoubtedly many highly cultivated women who pursue serious studies in all the principal countries of Europe, but, as an observer, I should say that the women whom you meet in society here have in general a more scientific education than women on the other side of the water. I have not been in England, but in the countries I know they do not seem to care much for scientific education in women. The German, Austrian and Hungarian women are much better housekeepers. The American women, as a rule, do not possess this capacity, and Americans do not seem to care for it in their women. But in Germany and Austria education is largely directed to giving women a capacity for housekeeping, so that la; married man need never come home and find his cook gone and his wife unable at a pinch to prepare his dinner. Under that system the children are wonderfully well cared for, and everything in the house is kept in perfect order. In the old countries they try to make each woman, whatever else it may be her destiny to learn, a perfect housekeeper—a good mother for her children, a good wife for her husband. And, of course," added Herr Nikisch, with a merry twinkle in his eye, "that is very convenient for the husband. What I mean is that the women over there are not so entertaining in society as are American women, and the reason is that they have been educated more to shine in the home. In music the European women take about the same interest as do the women here.

More Cultivated Women

The last topic touched on by Mr. Nikisch was the newspapers. "On the average," said he, "they have treated me very well. Some of them did not like my manner of playing. Whether it was artistic or personal antagonism, I did not allow it to trouble me. I got the impression that in this respect American newspapers are very much like the newspapers in Europe. We are all of us human beings: we all of us have our personal feelings, and to do a man full justice is not easy. But I was never disturbed by anything written against me. I went my own way and

Tried to Do My Best.

But in another respect the European journals are very slow compared with the newspapers in America. I have taken great interest in American politics, especially in the last presidential election, as well as in some local contests, and I have had plenty of opportunities for observing how enterprising your newspapers are, and how quickly the news is reported. Everybody can find in an American paper something to interest him, and gets an account of events in a few minutes, or at most a few hours, after they have happened." Here Mr. Nikisch told a story to illustrate his point. There is a Leipzig lady whose father lives at New Britain, Ct., and when Nobili shot at the Emperor Wilhelm in Berlin, one afternoon, the news of the attempt was received by the American citizen at New Britain half a day earlier than it reached his daughter through the newspapers of Leipzig, which is only 2½ hours' railway ride from Berlin. And this failure of the German press, Mr. Nikisch explained, with gusto, was due, not to any press censorship forbidding the publication of the news, but simply to the laziness of the Leipzig journalists, who were too sleepy-headed to get out a special edition, and did not report the occurrence till the next morning. In contrast with this kind of journalism the speaker pointed to the enterprise of the BOSTON HERALD, which enabled him, on the occasion of the recent great fire, to read a report of it only a few minutes after he had seen the engines on their way to quench the flames.

Mr. Nikisch finally spoke of his forthcoming journey to Buda-Pesth, the scene of his future labors, and through the HERALD man gave a regretful farewell to his large circle of friends and well wishers in Boston. He leaves this city tomorrow, and on May 11 sails for Europe on the Columbia of the Hamburg line.

Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch will sail on the Columbia for Germany May 11.

Mr. and Mrs. Franz Kneisil sail on the Furst Bismarck June 1.

The concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Rochester, Buffalo and Pittsburg during the week have been remarkably successful, and Mr. Franz Kneisel at the conductor's desk has gained the favor of the patrons of the tour with remarkable success. Manager Ellis wires that thus far Mr. Kneisel has more than realized his expectations.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCIII, NO. 130.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 10, 1893.

THE RICHTER AFFAIR.

Some Interesting Details by Private Letters.

The proposed change in the professional engagements of Dr. Hans Richter caused a deal of correspondence between interested parties in Vienna and London, in which two cities the great conductor makes an important factor in the musical seasons.

A well informed correspondent residing in Vienna states that an equivalent of $20,000 per season was the sum called for by the contract which Hans Richter signed for his engagement with the Boston Symphony orchestra, and the financial temptation it offered can best be realized from the fact that for the work he does at Vienna Hans Richter gets but about $4000 a year. The correspondent adds that the Philharmonic Society intends doing something to compensate Dr. Richter for the pecuniary loss entailed by his inability to carry out the American engagement. It is proposed to give 12 concerts, instead of eight, and to ask the conductor's acceptance of the extra proceeds as a token of the society's satisfaction in having the advantage of his further services.

Concerning his Boston contract and the way it came to be cancelled, Hans Richter is quoted as saying:

"My agreement with the Americans was conditional, and therefore I had a perfect right to make it. It contained a clause to the effect that the contract would come into force the moment I was absolved from my present contract in Vienna; that it would be, ipso facto, cancelled if my resignation here were not accepted, or if no definite reply were given before April 30. I was very hopeful of being released from my present contract, and my request was seconded by my friend, the director of the opera. Such a request must pass through several stages before it is finally accorded; at any one of them it may be definitely refused. The direction of the opera kindly supported me, but the supreme board, what we call the general-intendanz, refused to give its consent, and the matter was at an end. The reasons put forward were a very flattering view of my services to the opera, and a reluctance to create precedents which in the future might have a disorganizing effect. This is the letter:

"'Adjudicating upon Herr Kapell-Meister Richter's request to be allowed to withdraw from the company of the Imperial and Royal Court Opera, the general-intendanz of the Imperial and Royal Court the tres hereby informs him that it is not in a position to support his request, seeing that it cannot but lay stress upon the retention, as long as possible, to the Court Opera Theatre of his artistic services, and that for this reason the premature cancelling of the contract now in force cannot be granted.'

"Upon receiving this decision I wrote to the director of the general-intendanz, informing him that I had received the decision, and would fulfil all my obligations in the most scrupulous manner, while feeling grateful for the highly appreciative form in which the reasons for the decision were expressed, which was all the more pleasing in that it embodied the views, not only of a revered chief but of a genuine artist."

From the above it would appear that only genuine modesty could ever have led to Hans Richter's action in signing even a provisional contract for the Boston orchestra. He has at least had good evidence of the high esteem in which he is held in Vienna, and it appears reasonable to suppose that the action of the Vienna Philharmonic will result in making good a portion of the pecuniary sacrifice he is compelled to make by continuing to his duties in Vienna.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MAY 10, 1893.

The engagement of Hans Richter for Boston is the talk of the musical fraternity here. Of course you knew of it by cable long before these lines will appear in print. Richter after the last Philharmonic concert made a short speech, in which he said that conducting of opera had become too laborious for him, and that on his Viennese concert engagements he could not subsist. He therefore had accepted the favorable offers from Boston and Chicago. The papers give his income as 100,000 florins per year, with a five years' contract. Well, I suppose some discount is to be taken off from this sum. I am quite curious to see how Richter will like Boston, and still more so how the Bostonians will take to Richter, and whether they, especially the Hub's implacable critics, will not find his work a trifle less finished on the whole than that to which they have been made accustomed by both Messrs. Arthur Nikisch and Wilhelm Gericke. Qui vivra verra.

Boston Journal.

TEN PAGES.

SATURDAY, MAY 13, 1893.

The concerts given by the Kneisel Quartet were admirable so far as the quartet itself was concerned. The choice of an assistant pianist was not in all cases fortunate.

***

The programmes of the Symphony concerts do not call for unusually serious consideration.

The Symphony chorus, after two lamentable appearances, disappeared in the abyss, like Bryant's water fowl.

Novelties of little interest or absolute worthlessness were introduced and fell flat, as the pieces by Humperdinck, Riemenschneider and P. Scharwenka.

Paul Gilson's "The Sea" was butchered to make a holiday for Mr. Nikisch.

Templeton Strong's symphony was found worthy in New York, but Mr. Nikisch looked at it askew.

***

The somewhat melodramatic departure of Mr. Nikisch was followed by the melodramatic silence concerning the new conductor.

It has been announced, and on the highest authority, that the Symphony Orchestra is a private pleasure of an individual, and that the public is rude in showing curiosity concerning this new conductor, whoever he may be.

But the seats for this private entertainment are sold publicly at auction and to the highest bidders.

Speculators sit at the sale in the seats of the scornful and gamble in tickets.

If a lover of music should present himself at the door of Music Hall any fine Saturday night of the season without a ticket, he would be like unto the man of old who went to the marriage feast without a wedding garment.

The people here and in other cities are publicly invited to exchange their money for concert tickets that they may thus grow in musical wisdom.

Is not, then, the appointment of a conductor a matter of public interest?

Or in what respect do the managers of the Boston Symphony Orchestra differ from the managers of any respectable place of amusement?

PHILIP HALE.

Boston Transcript

SATURDAY, MAY 13, 1893.

THE LATE SYMPHONY SEASON.

To the Editor of the Transcript: After waiting a reasonable length of time, since the departure of Herr Nikisch, for the calming doom of prejudice for or against, permit me, as a representative of a large following, to offer a few words about the criticisms on this our last conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

It might well be said, at the outset, that, owing to the peculiar way in which Boston obtains the advantage of hearing this orchestra, criticisms are, in a measure, out of place. We should take the good the gods provide, pay for it and be thankful. But as some adverse criticisms offered by some ancient and honorable parties have appeared on the eve of Mr. Nikisch's departure, it is in order for laymen to make a few remarks. I speak for the great mass of people who have been the mainstay and support of this enterprise, when I say that the administration just ended has, on the whole, been one of great satisfaction. To one who has been a constant attendant upon this series of concerts this fact stands out clear and beyond dispute. The comfort and enjoyment of Music Hall crowds has been too apparent to deny this. I leave out the rehearsal performances which are said to have been attended by those who went because it was the proper thing to do. I venture to say that the thought in the minds of the Saturday night audiences was not whether this or that portion of the programme should have been first or last; whether this or that piece should not have been in the group of composers for that particular evening; whether this or that movement should have been taken at a little faster or a little slower tempo because some moss-covered bigwig performed it that way forty or fifty years ago. It was beyond all question not a part of the troubles of those audiences. I never witnessed more thoroughly satisfied people in my life, and my experience dates back forty years.

When such one-sided partisan expressions, therefore, as have been lately printed regarding these concerts appear, one is constrained to ask if these critics really believe the great public looks up to them as superior beings, or cares at all for their learned inflictions. No, the great, loving heart of the public gives the true verdict on the power of music to reach the soul, and the great public has unmistakably indorsed what has been given to it the past season, and such indorsed notes are good.

It is not my purpose to enter into any hair-splitting discussion of minor matters. Our retiring conductor may have made some errors—few there be who never have—but I venture the prediction that in later years the administration of Mr. Nikisch will be quoted as one of the most pleasing, dignified and satisfactory of all that have preceded him. His graceful personality, his quiet, gentlemanly movements when at his place before the orchestra, his restfulness, his every motion a picture—these will linger long in the memory of those who attended the concerts given under his baton. These remarks have not been inspired by any personal regard. I never had the pleasure of meeting Mr. Nikisch, but I have attended the concerts of the Symphony Orchestra since the beginning, when Mr. Higginson so nobly inaugurated a series of entertainments that forever links his name with good and uplifting deeds, and by which Boston, aye, and the whole country, is rendered his debtor for all time.

One word in evidence of my statements and I have done. After three seasons of Mr. Nikisch, giving ample opportunity to study him and his methods, the sale of seats for his last season, as it proved to be, was as strong an endorsement of the man and his abilities as any shrewd financier could wish. Fortunate Boston, if she secures another as satisfactory!

WARREN.

SUNDAY HERALD

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCIII, NO. 134.

SUNDAY, MAY 14, 1893.

The concerts given by the Boston Symphony orchestra during the last week at Cleveland, Toledo, Columbus, Cincinnati and Louisville, with Mr. Franz Kneisel as conductor, have been uniformly successful, the high artistic success of the work of the orchestra having gained universal commendation and the financial results quite equalling the most sanguine expectations of Manager Charles A. Ellis, who personally directs the tour.

It will gratify the many friends and admirers of Mr. G. Campanari, the baritone singer of this city, to know that Baltimore has echoed the applause of New York and Boston over his glorious singing in that city the past week. He has been heard there in "Trovatore," "Ernani," "Cavalleria" and "Rigoletto" with the Hinrichs company, and in all was a great success. It is easy to see that 'cello playing in the Symphony orchestra will not be Mr. Campanari's only occupation next season.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY, MAY 15, 1893.

RICHTER NOT COMING TO CHICAGO.

The Musical Courier's Vienna correspondent is authority for the statement that Hans Richter, the Vienna conductor, has not only declined the Boston offer of $12,000 a year to take Mr. Nikisch's place, but has decided not to come to Chicago this summer. He was to have led some concerts at the World's Fair, but finds that his duties at the Vienna Opera House will not permit the necessary absence. It is understood that Herr Richter cannot leave Vienna until 1897 without losing the pension to which he will then be entitled.

THIS IS FRANZ KNEISEL,

A Boston Violinist, Whose Career Will Bear Watching.

BOSTON EVENING RECORD.
WEDNESDAY MAY 17

American Art Journal.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MAY 13, 1893.

TRINCULO'S LONDON NOTES.

(From Our Own Correspondent.)

LONDON, April 26, 1893.

The Richter Muddle.

The cable will no doubt have informed you that Dr. Richter has been emulating the conduct of the French King, who "Marched his army into Spain,

And then he marched them back again."

Herr Richter first suddenly decided to accept the offer of the Boston Symphony Orchestra of the conductorship in place of Herr Nikisch. He resigned his post at the Vienna Opera, and as recently as Sunday week he made a touching farewell speech to his Philharmonic audience lamenting his departure from the Austrian capital, to which he had had the honor of introducing almost all the advanced operas of Wagner. Richter also made arrangements for the selling of his house and moving his family chattels to America. With equal suddenness, he last Thursday renounced all his intentions with regard to America and resolved to stay in Vienna. In London his conduct seems to have been misunderstood. It nevertheless is easily explainable. From his post in the Royal Chapel, his conductorship of the Philharmonic Society, and of the Vienna opera, Dr. Richter earns an average income of four thousand dollars a year. For this, he always has two performances daily besides the rehearsals, and the strain is very great. At Boston, it is understood, he would only conduct two concerts a week, sometimes in Boston, sometimes elsewhere, and it is reported here, that, for a season of twenty weeks, he would have received ten thousand dollars. He would also be left free during the rest of the year, i. e., during the summer, to come to London for the Richter Concerts, and also to give some concerts in Germany. Richter, however, has about five years unexpired of his contract with the Vienna opera, and the authorities, although they desire to put in his place Herr Mottl, refuse to give him permission to resign. If he had taken French leave he would have relinquished his right to a pension, which, if he served another five years, he is entitled to for his life, with the reversion of a certain annual sum to his widow and orphans after his decease. Richter makes a great pecuniary sacrifice in giving up Boston, but his post at Vienna is at any rate certain. There was some little excitement at Birmingham over this affair, for although it was fully understood that Richter would conduct the Festival there next year, he has not yet definitely signed any contract to do so, and if he had accepted Boston it would have been impossible for him to conduct the Birmingham celebration.

SUNDAY HERALD

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCIII, NO. 141.

SUNDAY, MAY 21, 1893.

After the second concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra at Chicago Mr. Theodore Thomas entertained Conductor Kneisel, Manager Ellis and his assistant, Comee, together with a half-dozen of the leading players of the organization, in a most hospitable manner. He complimented the Boston band in the highest terms and said that he had urged all his men to attend their concerts. By the way, the Boston contingent at the exposition was loyal to its orchestra, and many of the season ticket patrons of the winter concerts here took pains to say to Manager Ellis that they had never heard the orchestra play better than under Mr. Kneisel's baton.

The Boston Symphony orchestra ended its tour at Detroit last evening, and its members will arrive home tomorrow forenoon. The concerts have, with two exceptions, been given according to the original schedule, save that they have been directed by Mr. Franz Kneisel, the former concert master of the organization. More than the anticipated results have been realized from the tour, save at Chicago, where the Boston orchestra met the fate that has so far attended all the unwisely-planned musical schemes of the exposition. The work done by Mr. Kneisel throughout the tour has gained the heartiest approval, and his services, so unexpectedly brought into requisition, have shown him to be a man and a musician of large reserve resources, equal to all emergencies and cabable of arousing the best exertions of those under his direction. His action in assuming the position so abruptly vacated has shown him to have an accurate estimate of his own abilities, and the good name of the orchestra has been honorably maintained by his devoted efforts.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.

FRIDAY MORNING, MAY 19, 1893.

CONDUCTOR KNEISEL?

There seems to be a possibility that Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL, at present concert-meister and acting conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, will succeed Mr. NIKISCH as the leader of that body. The former would prove a conservative and thorough musician for the place if no European conductor could be secured, and as the leader of one of the most famous string quartettes of this city he has certainly acquired local prominence as a careful and painstaking musician. Mr. L. C. ELSON'S assurance that the orchestra would not go backward under Mr. KNEISEL'S leadership seems to be fully warranted by what Boston has known and seen of the Symphony's concert meister, so far.

American Art Journal.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MAY 20, 1893.

AT last Nikisch has left us, Kneisel directing the Symphony Orchestra in its supplementary concerts. At the closing concert of the year's series they played the Heroic Symphony, and one hearer declares that the Funeral March sounded like a dirge over Nikisch himself, in which director and players shared the general grief. Mr. Higginson does not tell the public who the successor is to be,—not Richter, and apparently not Henschel. Why not Kneisel himself? This would be in the line of civil service reform. Nikisch has sacrificed much by leaving now, loss of the yearly bonus, loss of the last month's salary, besides an outright forfeiture of $5,000 to Mr. Higginson; but the director says his health demands the premature departure for his new field of labor.

[156]

Boston Transcript

SATURDAY, MAY 13, 1893.

THE LATE SYMPHONY SEASON.

To the Editor of the Transcript: After waiting a reasonable length of time, since the departure of Herr Nikisch, for the calming doom of prejudice for or against, permit me, as a representative of a large following, to offer a few words about the criticisms on this our last conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

It might well be said, at the outset, that, owing to the peculiar way in which Boston obtains the advantage of hearing this orchestra, criticisms are, in a measure, out of place. We should take the good the gods provide, pay for it and be thankful. But as some adverse criticisms offered by some ancient and honorable parties have appeared on the eve of Mr. Nikisch's departure, it is in order for laymen to make a few remarks. I speak for the great mass of people who have been the mainstay and support of this enterprise, when I say that the administration just ended has, on the whole, been one of great satisfaction. To one who has been a constant attendant upon this series of concerts this fact stands out clear and beyond dispute. The comfort and enjoyment of Music Hall crowds has been too apparent to deny this. I leave out the rehearsal performances which are said to have been attended by those who went because it was the proper thing to do. I venture to say that the thought in the minds of the Saturday night audiences was not whether this or that portion of the programme should have been first or last; whether this or that piece should not have been in the group of composers for that particular evening; whether this or that movement should have been taken at a little faster or a little slower tempo because some moss-covered bigwig performed it that way forty or fifty years ago. It was beyond all question not a part of the troubles of those audiences. I never witnessed more thoroughly satisfied people in my life, and my experience dates back forty years.

When such one-sided partisan expressions, therefore, as have been lately printed regarding these concerts appear, one is constrained to ask if these critics really believe the great public looks up to them as superior beings, or cares at all for their learned inflictions. No, the great, loving heart of the public gives the true verdict on the power of music to reach the soul, and the great public has unmistakably indorsed what has been given to it the past season, and such indorsed notes are good.

It is not my purpose to enter into any hair-splitting discussion of minor matters. Our retiring conductor may have made some errors—few there be who never have—but I venture the prediction that in later years the administration of Mr. Nikisch will be quoted as one of the most pleasing, dignified and satisfactory of all that have preceded him. His graceful personality, his quiet, gentlemanly movements when at his place before the orchestra, his restfulness, his every motion a picture—these will linger long in the memory of those who attended the concerts given under his baton. These remarks have not been inspired by any personal regard. I never had the pleasure of meeting Mr. Nikisch, but I have attended the concerts of the Symphony Orchestra since the beginning, when Mr. Higginson so nobly inaugurated a series of entertainments that forever links his name with good and uplifting deeds, and by which Boston, aye, and the whole country, is rendered his debtor for all time.

One word in evidence of my statements and I have done. After three seasons of Mr. Nikisch, giving ample opportunity to study him and his methods, the sale of seats for his last season, as it proved to be, was as strong an endorsement of the man and his abilities as any shrewd financier could wish. Fortunate Boston, if she secures another as satisfactory!

WARREN.

SUNDAY HERALD

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCIII, NO. 134.

SUNDAY, MAY 14, 1893.

The concerts given by the Boston Symphony orchestra during the last week at Cleveland, Toledo, Columbus, Cincinnati and Louisville, with Mr. Franz Kneisel as conductor, have been uniformly successful, the high artistic success of the work of the orchestra having gained universal commendation and the financial results quite equalling the most sanguine expectations of Manager Charles A. Ellis, who personally directs the tour.

It will gratify the many friends and admirers of Mr. G. Campanari, the baritone singer of this city, to know that Baltimore has echoed the applause of New York and Boston over his glorious singing in that city the past week. He has been heard there in "Trovatore," "Ernani," "Cavalleria" and "Rigoletto" with the Hinrichs company, and in all was a great success. It is easy to see that 'cello playing in the Symphony orchestra will not be Mr. Campanari's only occupation next season.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY, MAY 15, 1893.

RICHTER NOT COMING TO CHICAGO.

The Musical Courier's Vienna correspondent is authority for the statement that Hans Richter, the Vienna conductor, has not only declined the Boston offer of $12,000 a year to take Mr. Nikisch's place, but has decided not to come to Chicago this summer. He was to have led some concerts at the World's Fair, but finds that his duties at the Vienna Opera House will not permit the necessary absence. It is understood that Herr Richter cannot leave Vienna until 1897 without losing the pension to which he will then be entitled.

THIS IS FRANZ KNEISEL,

A Boston Violinist, Whose Career Will Bear Watching.

BOSTON EVENING RECORD, WEDNESDAY MAY 17

American Art Journal.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MAY 13, 1893.

TRINCULO'S LONDON NOTES.

(From Our Own Correspondent.)

LONDON, April 26, 1893.

The Richter Muddle.

The cable will no doubt have informed [illegible] that Dr. Richter has been emulating the [illegible] of the French King, who "Marched his army into Spain,

And then he marched them back again."

Herr Richter first suddenly decided to accept the offer of the Boston Symphony Orchestra of the conductorship in place of Herr Nikisch. He resigned his post at the Vienna [illegible] and as recently as Sunday week he [illegible] touching farewell speech to his Philharmonic audience lamenting his departure from the Austrian capital, to which he [illegible] the honor of introducing almost all the [illegible] operas of Wagner. Richter [illegible] arrangements for the selling of his [illegible] moving his family chattels to America. With equal suddenness, he last [illegible] renounced all his intentions with regard to America and resolved to stay in Vienna. In London his conduct seems to have been misunderstood. It nevertheless [illegible] easily explainable. From his post in the Royal Chapel, his conductorship of the Philharmonic Society, and of the Vienna opera, Dr. Richter earns an average income of four [illegible] dollars a year. For this, he always [illegible] performances daily besides the rehearsals, and the strain is very great. At [illegible] is understood, he would only conduct concerts a week, sometimes in Boston, sometimes elsewhere, and it is reported here, that, for a season of twenty weeks, he would have received ten thousand pounds. He would also be left free during [illegible] of the year, i. e., during the summer, to come to London for the Richter Concerts, and also to give some concerts in Germany. Richter, however, has about five years unexpired of his contract with the Vienna opera, and the authorities, although they desire to put in his place Herr Mottl, refuse to give him permission to resign. If he had taken French leave he would have relinquished his right to a pension, which, if he served another five years, he is entitled to for his life, with the reversion of a certain annual sum to his widow and orphans after his decease. Richter makes a great pecuniary sacrifice in giving up Boston, but his post at Vienna is at any rate certain. There was some little excitement at Birmingham over this affair, for although it was fully understood that Richter would conduct the Festival there next year, he has not yet definitely signed any contract to do so, and if he had accepted Boston it would have been impossible for him to conduct the Birmingham celebration.

SUNDAY HERALD

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCIII, NO. 141.

SUNDAY, MAY 21, 1893.

After the second concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra at Chicago Mr. Theodore Thomas entertained Conductor Kneisel, Manager Ellis and his assistant, Comee, together with a half-dozen of the leading players of the organization, in a most hospitable manner. He complimented the Boston band in the highest terms and said that he had urged all his men to attend their concerts. By the way, the Boston contingent at the exposition was loyal to its orchestra, and many of the season ticket patrons of the winter concerts here took pains to say to Manager Ellis that they had never heard the orchestra play better than under Mr. Kneisel's baton.

The Boston Symphony orchestra ended its tour at Detroit last evening, and its members will arrive home tomorrow forenoon. The concerts have, with two exceptions, been given according to the original schedule, save that they have been directed by Mr. Franz Kneisel, the former concert master of the organization. More than the anticipated results have been realized from the tour, save at Chicago, where the Boston orchestra met the fate that has so far attended all the unwisely-planned musical schemes of the exposition. The work done by Mr. Kneisel throughout the tour has gained the heartiest approval, and his services, so unexpectedly brought into requisition, have shown him to be a man and a musician of large reserve resources, equal to all emergencies and cabable of arousing the best exertions of those under his direction. His action in assuming the position so abruptly vacated has shown him to have an accurate estimate of his own abilities, and the good name of the orchestra has been honorably maintained by his devoted efforts.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

FRIDAY MORNING, MAY 19, 1893.

CONDUCTOR KNEISEL?

There seems to be a possibility that Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL, at present concert-meister and acting conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, will succeed Mr. NIKISCH as the leader of that body. The former would prove a conservative and thorough musician for the place if no European conductor could be secured, and as the leader of one of the most famous string quartettes of this city he has certainly acquired local prominence as a careful and painstaking musician. Mr. L. C. ELSON'S assurance that the orchestra would not go backward under Mr. KNEISEL'S leadership seems to be fully warranted by what Boston has known and seen of the Symphony's concert meister, so far.

American Art Journal.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MAY 20, 1893.

AT last Nikisch has left us, Kneisel directing the Symphony Orchestra in its supplementary concerts. At the closing concert of the year's series they played the Heroic Symphony, and one hearer declares that the Funeral March sounded like a dirge over Nikisch himself, in which director and players shared the general grief. Mr. Higginson does not tell the public who the successor is to be,—not Richter, and apparently not Henschel. Why not Kneisel himself? This would be in the line of civil service reform. Nikisch has sacrificed much by leaving now, loss of the yearly bonus, loss of the last month's salary, besides an outright forfeiture of $5,000 to Mr. Higginson; but the director says his health demands the premature departure for his new field of labor.

[156]

Rochester Correspondence.

ROCHESTER, May 12, 1893.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was greeted by a large audience May 3. The absence of the director, Arthur Nikisch, was much regretted by all; not that the concert work deteriorated under Concertmeister Kneisel's charge, but many wished to greet Nikisch the last time, and these were disappointed. The general verdict concerning the orchestra is summed up in the "Herald's" criticism:

"Each one of the four orchestral numbers was rendered in a manner in some respects beyond criticism, and the accompanimental work of the instrumentalists was equally good. The playing of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is characterized by absolute precision of movement, unwavering tempo, faultless modulation and careful attention to detail. The element of abandon is entirely eliminated from its work. There was not a trace of it manifested in any part of the program. There was not a moment when one could have honestly exclaimed: 'That was glorious!' There was not a moment when one could not honestly have exclaimed: 'That was fine!' At all times was that perfect equipoise between 'not quite enough' and 'too much' most exquisitely, most wonderfully maintained. The proportion of various instruments seemed perfect. The volume of sound was in exact accord and under marvelous control. The orchestra played as one man, and that man a master."

THIS from the Boston "Courier" about Mr. Nikisch, and confirms the account published first in THE MUSICAL COURIER as to the nature of the contract the retiring conductor had with Mr. Higginson. Says the "Courier:"

Mr. Nikisch has exhibited to a reporter a typewritten acknowledgment of the receipt from him by Col. Henry L. Higginson of $5,000, and also of the honorable termination of the engagement according to the contract of December, 1888. It was signed by Henry L. Higginson, and bore the date of April 30. "That settles it, does it not?" remarked the conductor to the reporter. "I paid that sum last Saturday, as you see, and did it to save my health and life. There was no such thing as a sum forfeit in the contract. That is all." Mr. Nikisch also remarked: "I have broken no contract. The provisions of the contract gave me the right to terminate my engagement at any time, but on condition that I should pay a certain sum. I never have nor never will break a contract." Whatever it may be called, this sacrifice of $5,000 is to be added to the loss of $1,000 in salary that would have accrued in the remaining three weeks of the orchestra's season, and the $2,000 bonus that Colonel Higginson has always given his conductors at the close of each year's work.

That Richter after all will remain quietly in Vienna you will know by cable long before these lines will reach you. But who is to be Nikisch's successor in Boston? Echo answers, "Who?"

* * *

MONDAY, MAY 15—BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.
Conductor.....Mr. Frank Kneisel
Soloist.....Mr. C. M. Loeffler

PROGRAM.

Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini".....Berlioz
Concerto, in A major, op. 26.....Saint-Saëns
(For violin and orchestra.)
Mr. Loeffler.
Prelude, Adagio and Gavotte.....Bach
Orchestration by Bachrich.
Symphonic poem, "Le Rouet d'Omphale".....Saint-Saëns
Symphony, E minor, No. 5, op. 64.....Tschaikowsky

TUESDAY, MAY 16—BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.
Conductor.....Mr. Frank Kneisel
Soloist.....Mr. Alwin Schroeder
Overture, "Leonore," No. 3.....Beethoven
Symphony No. 2, in C, op. 61.....Schumann
Concerto for violoncello and orchestra.....Saint-Saëns
(First and second movements.)
Prelude and Closing Scene, "Tristan and Isolde".....
Siegfried's "Rhine Journey," from "Götterdämmerung".....} Wagner
Overture, "Tannhäuser".....

An American program will follow the week after with symphony of Chadwick and works by Foote and McDowell.

W. WAUGH LAUDER.

Mr. Arthur Nikisch.—In an interview with a reporter of the Boston "Herald" Mr. Arthur Nikisch made these interesting remarks:

"It is said that the Americans brought their musical tastes with them from the other side of the Atlantic, and that a large proportion of concert goers are in fact music loving foreigners. I dispute both these positions. It is true that native Americans brought a good many things over with them when they founded this Republic, but they could not bring a musical taste, which had not then been developed. All the great conservatories of Europe, except those of Vienna and Leipsic, are not more than from fifteen to twenty years old. Even the Vienna Conservatory, the oldest of the number, has this year celebrated its fiftieth anniversary. So that musical development in Europe is a very recent affair, and people who emigrated to this country more than fifty or sixty years ago could not have brought with them any of the musical culture and capacity which they have since displayed.

"We must therefore treat America, in musical matters, as a young community which has educated itself in a large measure independently of Europe. * * * * Boston people, and Americans generally, as I have noticed in my tour through the country, are remarkably wide in their musical tastes. I have seen the same audiences on one night applaud the modern music of Wagner and Liszt, and on the next enjoy just as heartily the compositions of Mozart, Haydn, Schubert, and Beethoven. I noted during my journeys in the United States that in the smaller centres of population modern music, like that of Wagner, always makes the greatest hit. There is a reason for this. When people, after being absorbed in business cares all the day, go rather late in the evening to a concert, the exciting and intense music of Wagner stirs them up, while the older classical music needs a more contemplative frame of mind to do it justice. At the same time these smaller towns and cities which like Wagner so well are also capable of the greatest enthusiasm for the performances of the classical school."

Buffalo Music.

BUFFALO, N. Y., May 15, 1893.

In spite of the absence of our champion conductor-poseur, Nikisch, quite a good sized house greeted the Boston Symphonists, and the weather on that particular evening was horrid. Buffalo weather is like the girl with the curl—

When she was good, she was very, very good;
And when she was bad she was horrid!

These words no Shakespeare wrote, but they applied too pat to be ignored. I know a mother who says "her boy has the sweetest disposition in the world when he is well, but he never is well." However, this does not apply to our weather.

To return to the concert, Mrs. Kaschoska-Nussbaum, who has taken unto herself a better (and considerably smaller) half since she was here last, contributed the vocal pyrotechnics of the evening, and clean looking, blonde Loeffler "played a thing composed by a saint," I heard a woman say, by which she referred to the Saint-Saëns' concertstück, I suppose. He got a rousing encore. Kneisel handled the baton.

The Musical Courier.

There was much said at the beginning of the season about the wonders to be worked by the Boston Symphony Chorus, an annex to the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This chorus is now dead and buried. It dug its own grave and then killed itself, and it thus won loud and unanimous applause.

This unhappy chorus made two appearances: in the Ninth Symphony and in a double bill that included Brahms' "Song of Destiny" and Foote's "Skeleton in Armor."

* * *

The power of personality in music was again shown by the interest excited by the departure of Mr. Nikisch and by the gossip concerning his successor. To-day it is the conductor that is examined curiously. The work, of which he is supposed to be the interpreter, is of secondary importance.

There has as yet been no authoritative statement made concerning the successor. There is an effort in a certain quarter to boom Mr. Kneisel for the office. Mr. Kneisel is an admirable violinst, concert meister and quartet player; I do not believe that he would willingly give up his assured reputation for the risk of success or failure as a conductor, even if the managers invited him. Mr. Higginson still insists that the choice of a conductor is his own business, although no one disputes his assertion; and he still uses violent language when reference is made to the legitimate curiosity of the newspapers in the matter. A reporter, although his clothes are of approved cut and his hair is pleasingly combed, is to the owner of the Boston Symphony Oschestra as a red petticoat to a bull.

* * *

The following orchestral works were performed at the Symphony concerts this last season for the first time: d'Albert's first Symphony, Busoni's "Symphonic tone-poem" (MS.), Dvorak's overture "Husitska," a mangled version of Gilson's "La Mer," Grieg's second "Peer Gynt" suite, Humperdink's "Humoresque," Miss Lang's "Dramatic Overture" (MS.), MacDowell's "Hamlet" and "Ophelia," Paine's Columbus March and Hymn, Reinecke's overture to "King Manfred," Riemenschneider's "Dance of Death," P. Scharwenka's Früehlingswogen," Saint-Saëns' second Symphony, Svendsen's legend "Zorahayda," Thierot's Sinfonietta, E major; Tschaikowsky's E minor Symphony (No. 5). Foote's cantata "The Skeleton in Armor," Gounod's "La Vision de Jeanne d'Arc," Davidoff's concerto for 'cello No. 3, Raff's "La Fée d'Amour" were also heard at these concerts for the first time.

The soloists were as follows: Violinists, Marteau, Kneissel, Loeffler, Schnitzler, Roth, Adamowski (five of them are members of the orchestra); pianists, Buson, Fanny BloomfieldZ-eisler, Paderewski, MacDowell, Stasny, Nowell and Miss Castellano; 'cellist, Schroeder, of the orchestra; singers, Juch, Basta-Tavary, Priscilla White, Louise Leimer, Marie B. Smith, Lillian Carlsmith, Raschoska, Mrs. Nikisch and Messrs. W. J. Winch, G. J. Parker, Max Heinrich, C. E. Hay and Heinrich Meyn.

* * *

Composers were thus represented: Wagner, 10; Beethoven, 9; Dvorák, 4; Brahms, 4; Liszt, 4; Saint-Saëns, 4; Schumann, 4; Berlioz, 3; Schubert, 3; Weber, 3; MacDowell, 3; Back and Goldmark, Haydn and Mendelssohn, Mozart and Raff and Tschaikowsky, 2, and there was one performance of a work by d'Albert, Bizet, Bruch, Busoni, Davidoff, Ernst, Foote, Gade, Gilson, Gounod, Grieg, Humperdink, Lalo, Lang, Moszkowski, Nicolai, Paderewski, Paine, Reineche, Riemenschneider, Rubinstein, P. Scharwenka, Spohr, Svendsen, Thierot, Vieuxtemps, Volkmann.

* * *

The Kneisel Quartet gave a series of concerts distinguished as ever by purity of taste and perfection of performance. The chief novelties were Lalo's E flat quartet, Brahms' clarinet quartet, Loeffler's sextet and MacDowell's "Sonata Tragica" for piano.

Henri Marteau appeared at a symphony concert January 22 and triumphed gloriously. The violinists of the orchestra complained of Marteau's youth. Never mind, he will be older next year.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

As Mr. Nikisch was on the deep blue sea or seasick on May 15, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which gave its first concert on May 15 at 3 in the afternoon at Music Hall, was directed by Concertmaster Kneisel. Here is the program:

Overture, "Benevenuto Cellini".....Berlioz
Concert in A major, op. 26, for violin.....Saint-Saëns
Prelude, Adagio and Gavotte.....Bach
Symphonic poem, "Le Rouet d'Omphale".....Saint-Saëns
Symphony, B minor, No. 5, op. 64.....Tschaikowsky

Loeffler played the concerto, and the paid attendance put less than $50 in the World's Fair treasury toward the liquidation of the cost of the music scheme. The great body of readers of this department of this paper know all about the Boston organization and its programs and the manner of their performance. Carrying coal to Newcastle is an expensive and unprofitable pursuit; we shall not repeat what has so frequently been published on this and similar subjects in this paper.

The concert of May 16, by the same organization, can be appreciated by studying the program, which was as follows:

Boston Symphony Orchestra. Conductor, Mr. Frank Kneisel; soloist, Mr. Alwin Schroeder. Overture, "Leonore," No. 3, Beethoven; Symphony, No. 2 in C, Schumann; Concerto for violoncello, Saint-Saëns, first and second movements; Vorspiel and Liebestod, "Tristan and Isolde," Wagner; "Siegfried's Rhine Journey," from "Götterdämmerung," Wagner; Overture, "Tannhäuser," Wagner.

Comparing this program with the first printed above, we can readily observe that repetitions of the same works or excerpts of works are within the range of possibility inside of a week. But as no one seems to care to pay to listen to the one performance nor the other the repeating system apparently is a success. Anything goes in a scheme which can bring engagements and money to a limited number of people at the expense of the whole people.

The Post-Express.
ROCHESTER, WEDNESDAY, MAY 3.

CONDUCTOR NIKISCH.

Why He Will Not Appear at To-night's Concert.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, consisting of seventy-nine persons of whom seventy-two are performers, arrived in the city this morning, in charge of Assistant Manager Fred R. Comee. Frank Kneisel, concert meister, C. M. Loeffler, T. Adamoski, J. Adamoski, Mr. and Mrs. Nussbaum, A. Schroeder are registered with Mr. Comee at the Powers.

Regarding Arthur Nikisch's absence from the direction of the orchestra Manager Comee said: "On short notice Mr. Nikisch notified the management that owing to illness he could not proceed on the present Western trip. Concert meister Kneisel, who has been substituted for Conductor Nikisch, is perfectly competent to take his place. He has been under Mr. Nikisch's direction for four years and has been a member of his orchestra for nine years. He has often conducted the orchestra with splendid success during Mr. Nikisch's illness."

The Boston symphony orchestra, Franz Kneisel, concertmeister, will present this programme at the Lyceum to night:

Overture—Sakuntala.....Goldmark
Aria from Queen of Sheba.....Gounod
Symphony in D minor, No. 4.....Schumann
I. Rather slow (D. minor), Lively (D minor).
II. Rather slow (D minor, Hypodorian mode).
III. Scherzo: Lively (D minor). Trio: The same tempo (B flat major).
IV. Slow (D minor). Lively (D major).
Concerto for violin in G minor, No. 1....Bruch
First and second movements.
Symphonic Poem—Le Rouet d'Omphale.. Saint-Saens
Elizabeth's Aria from Tannhauser—O Lovely Halls.....Wagner
Prelude to the Meistersinger von Nuernburg.....Wagner
Soloists—Miss Felicia Kaschoska and T. Adamowski.

The illness of Arthur Nikisch, conductor, will prevent his appearance with the orchestra.

Democrat and Chronicle.

Entered at the Post-Office at Rochester, N. Y., as Second Class Mail Matter.

ROCHESTER PRINTING CO.

THURSDAY, MAY 4,

BOSTON'S ORCHESTRA.

Its Concert at the Lyceum Last Night Enjoyed by a Large Audience.

An audience that almost filled the big Lyceum gathered at that theater last night to hear the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and while it was never enthusaistic nor even warmly demonstrative it could not have failed to enjoy the excellent music that was given by the orchestra and its soloists. Perhaps the apparent coolness was due to the fact that the audience was composed, in the main, of ladies. There were attempts at recalls, of course, but they were persistent rather than vigorous, and none brough forth a response.

As has been said, the gathering could not have been insensible to the quality of the music with which it was treated. The playing of the orchestra fell but little short of being marvelous. The organization came to Rochester in the best of practice. All winter it has been giving concerts as well as rehearsing daily and the seventy musicians who compose it are able to play together with that finish and accuracy that practice gives to the work of thorough musicians. Their playing is a source of genuine delight to both the student of music and those who are able to appreciate the admirable harmonic effects that their many instruments produce when used in concert. It is delicate where delicacy is required, vigorous where vigor is required, and expressive in its passage from one form to the other. The programme that was published in the Democrat and Chronicle yesterday morning was played last night without alteration and in the manner that has made the orchestra famous. Frank Kneisel acted as conductor in the place of Arhur Nikisch, whose absence has already been explained.

Mme. Felicia Kaschoska was the vocalist of the evening and her singing met with the same favor that it has heretofore received in Rochester. She sang twice and the audience attempted to encore her each time, but she declined to respond in any way except with a bow to the continuous if rather weak applause.

Mr. Adamowski, the solo violinist, also found much favor with his auditors, receiving the heartiest applause that was heard during the evening, but, he too, only bowed his acknowledgements.

Miss Kaschoska, it is announced, will now go to Europe for three years, under an engagement with Herr Nikisch.

THE ROCHESTER HERALD.
THURSDAY, MAY 4, 1893.

HIGH CLASS MUSIC.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA HEARD IN ROCHESTER.

Local Musical Folk Turn Out in Sufficient Numbers to Leave Very Few Lyceum Seats Vacant —Entertainments This Evening.

A large audience, at first disposed to be enthusiastic, but afterward content to be simply appreciative, assembled in the Lyceum last evening to hear the far famed and justly celebrated Boston Symphony Orchestra render a programme of seven numbers, including a vocal and violin solo. The programme consisted of eminently high class music; and it was rendered in a pre-eminently highly classical manner.

It is the custom of this organization not to grant encore numbers. The reason given for this is to the effect that when a programme is lengthened by encores it not infrequently happens that persons in the audience who have come from out of town have to leave the theater without hearing the last programme number. This is sometimes a disappointment not atoned for by the interpolated selection and the result is dissatisfaction on the part of those who wished to hear the concluding numbers.

So the rule of granting no encores whatever has been adopted and it was strictly adhered to last evening. Bows were forthcoming in abandance, but an extra selection, not one. Before the audience found this out it was quite enthusiastic, insistently so. After it got used to the existing state of affairs it applauded just enough to show that it was appreciative, that was all. And perhaps it was just as well that way.

But as the audience passed out from the theater some of it said: "Just wait till Sousa comes again. He'll give us an encore if we want it; and more than one, too."

And so he will; Sousa is a good fellow that way.

The work of the orchestra last evening was uniformly excellent. Each one of the four orchestral numbers was rendered in a manner in some respects beyond criticism; and the accompanimental work of the instrumentalists was equally good. The playing of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is characterized by absolute precision of movement, unwavering tempo, faultless modulation and careful attention to detail. The element of abandon is entirely eliminated from its work. There was not a trace of it manifested in any part of the programme. There was not a moment when one could have honestly exclaimed: "That was glorious!" There was not a moment when one could not honestly have exclaimed: "That was fine!" At all times was that perfect equipoise between "not quite enough" and "too much" most exquisitely, most wonderfully maintained. The proportion of various instruments seemed perfect. The volume of sound was in exact accord and under marvelous control. The orchestra played as one man; and that man a master.

The first number, Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture, presented the orchestra very pleasantly in a rich composition, varied and musical in construction, graceful and ornate in its carefully worked out detail and artistic finish.

The Schubert symphony was the gem of the evening and in its interpretation the orchestra appeared to best advantage. Particularly fine was the scherzo and trio, while the minor intonation throughout the composition was beautifully modulated and preserved under the varying changes of the theme and arrangement.

There was only one approach to anything of a "popular" nature and that was the Saint Saens "Spinning Wheel," which was rendered with exceeding grace, daintiness, delicacy and skill. The prelude to Wagner's "Meistersinger" closed the programme with the heaviest piece of the evening, a composition which seemed almost too cumbrous for the orchestra to interpret with ease. There was such a kid glove finish about the work of the orchestra throughout that there must have been an instinctive reluctance to roll up sleeves and do Wagner.

Both soloists of the evening were cordially received. Miss Felicia Kaschoska was recalled again and again after her first selection and applauded at her second appearance. She is a singer of great confidence, one who, when she takes a high note, takes it undoubtedly and undauntedly, inspiring her audience with part of the confidence with which she inspires herself. The result is mutually agreeable.

T. Adamowski, solo violinist, created a very favorable impression. His tone is clear as a bell, his notes ringing, crisp, clean cut and incisive, his execution distinct and rapid, his style eminently one to fit him as a soloist heard to excellent advantage with orchestral accompaniment. He was compelled to rise and bow half a dozen times in response to the applause.

Owing to the announced illness of Conductor Arthur Nikisch, Concert Master Kneisel wielded the baton and seemed at all times equal to the requirements of his position.

Having been so cordially welcomed here upon the occasion of its first visit it is to be sincerely hoped that in future years the Boston Symphony Orchestra will include Rochester among the favored few cities visited during its brief tours away from Boston.

Commercial Gazette.
PITTSBURGH
SATURDAY, MAY 6, 1893.

The Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony orchestra was greeted with a crowded house last evening at Old City hall. A program of artistic and varied proportions had been arranged, and from the stately Beethoven overture on through to the Wagnerian climax, the musicians held the close attention of the audience. Enthusiastic applause greeted each number, and at the close of the Handle largo, beautifully expressed, the appreciation amounted almost to a furore. Exquisite interpretation was given to the finale of the Schumann symphony and the almost breathless silence as the crashing chords marked the triumphant close, was a tribute that could not be mistaken. The soloist of the evening was Miss Felicia Kaschoska. In the aria from Freischuetz ample scope was given to test the powers of the singer. But the passages, now tender and sweet, now impetuous, now melancholy and again ecstatic, were developed in a manner which proved the artistic worth of the singer. Miss Kaschoska received a tumultuous recall.

The program of the evening as conducted included:

Ludwig van Beethoven.....
.....Overture to "Leonore," No. 2, Op. 72
Adagio (C major).....3-4
Allegro (C major).....2-2
Weber.....Aria from "Freischuetz"
Robert Alexander Schumann.....
.....Symphony No. 2, in C major, Op. 61
I. Sostenuto assai (C major). Allegro ma non trppo (C major).
II. Scherzo; Allegro vovace (C major). Trio I.: the same tempo (G major). Trio II.: the same tempo (C major).
III. Adagio espressivo (C minor).
IV. Allegro molto vivace (C major).
Handel.....Largo
Berlioz—Two movements from "La Damnation de Faust," Op. 24.
I. Menuet des Feu-follets: Moderato (D major).....3-4
II. Valse des Sylphes: Allegro, mouvement de valse (D major)...3-8
Wagner.....Overture, "Rienzi"

To-night the program will include Mendelssohn's St. Paul, first part, by the Mozart club, under whose auspices the concerts are given, in addition to the orchestral numbers that will constitute part first of the program.

The Dispatch.
PITTSBURG, SATURDAY, MAY 6, 1893.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

An Enthusiastic Reception Tendered It at Old City Hall Last Night.

That peerless organization known as the Boston Symphony Orchestra made its annual appearance in Pittsburg last night at Old City Hall under the auspices of the Mozart Club. Through the splendid musical performances during the last two weeks the people of the two cities had been properly prepared to fully enjoy this concert, and the tremendous enthusiasm with which the world-renowned organization was received eclipsed all former demonstrations of approval. It was the spontaneous tribute of thousands of music-filled souls to art itself. Mr. Franz Kneisel wielded the baton in a thoroughly satisfactory manner. Though he may not have the magnetism of Seidl, the training of Thomas, or the finish of Nikisch, his mastery of his men is complete. Calm and dignified, he leads the orchestra forcibly through the most raging passages and guides them gently in the softest movements. The active members of the Mozart Club were seated on the stage behind the musicians, and the body of the hall was more than well filled with an uncommonly fashionable audience.

Selected from the best orchestras of Europe and America, Colonel Higginson's band embraces the elite of instrumental players. It is hardly exaggeration to state that every man is an artist, and with that the degree of perfection attained in the ensemble is described at the same time. If one class of the instruments should be mentioned as particularly brilliant the lot would fall to the strings. They, above the others, are thorough scholars. Not alone in the result of their efforts, but also in the manner of their playing they stand unchallenged. They handle their bows with the same mathematical exactness as a regiment of well-trained soliders shoulder their arms.

The vocal soloist of the evening was Miss Felicia Kaschoska, from the Metropolitan Opera House, New York. She was heard last night for the first time in this city and achieved an indisputable success. Her soprano range is remarkably large and the volume of her tone exceedingly full. Occasionally a few hard sounds may be discerned, but their number are few. She rendered Agathe's aria from Weber's "Freischuetz" with great dramatic expression and finish of execution. Five spontaneous rounds of applause were the reward, but elicited, however, no encore. Mr. C. M. Loeffler's exquisite solo violin playing with a dainty harpsichordal accompaniment by Mr. Schuecker, and afterward the full wealth of the orchestra, necessitated the repetition of Handel's idyllic "Largo."

The bad effect that rainy weather often leaves on the wood instruments was slightly felt last night. But the total impression of this rich concert was so overwhelming that no better could be wished for. The programme is appended:

LUDWIG VAN BEETHOVEN—OVERTURE TO "LEONORE," NO. 3, OP. 72.

Adagio (C major).....3-4
Allegro (C major).....2-2

WEBER—ARIA FROM "FREISCHUETZ."

ROBERT ALEXANDER SCHUMANN—SYMPHONY NO. 2, IN C MAJOR, OP. 61.

I. Sostenuto assai (C major). Allegro ma non troppo (C major).
II. Scherzo; Allegro vivace (C major). Trio I; the same tempo (G major). Trio II; the same tempo (C major).
III. Adagio espressivo (C minor).
IV. Allegro molto vivace (C major).

HANDEL.....LARGO
BERLIOZ—TWO MOVEMENTS FROM "LA DAMNATION DE FAUST," OP. 24.
I. Menuet des Feu-follets: Moderato.....(D major) 3-4
II. Valse des Sylphes: Allegro, mouvement de valse (D major) 3-8
WAGNER.....OVERTURE, "RIENZI."

---

[158].

Cleveländer Anzeiger
— und —
Deutsche Presse.
Herausgegeben von der
German-American Publ. Co.
Office: No. 221 & 223 St. Clairstr.
Telephon 362.

Concert des Bostoner Sinfonie-Orchesters.

Zu trefflich eingespielt und aus zu tüchtigen Kräften bestehend ist das Sinfonie-Orchester aus Boston, um gestern Abend in dem Concert in der Musikhalle die Abwesenheit des eigentlichen Dirigenten Arthur Nikisch — er trifft bereits seine Vorbereitungen zu seinem Abschiede von Amerika — vermissen zu lassen; auch Herr Kneisel, der erste Geiger, wußte am Dirigentenpult die Orchestermassen trefflich zu beherrschen und zu leiten. Ohne Frage ist das Bostoner Orchester das bestgeschulte und am längsten bestehende der Ver. Staaten. Es ist vermöge der Munificenz seiner Gründer und Erhalter in der angenehmen Lage, ohne Rücksicht auf den Geldpunkt sein musikalisches Dasein zu fristen, die besten verfügbaren Kräfte zu gewinnen, den einmal gewonnenen aber ein so behagliches Sein zu gewähren, daß es Niemandem, der sich einmal als tüchtiger Musiker bewährt hat, einfällt, sich freiwillig von der Gemeinschaft loszusagen. So spielt denn diese kleine aber gewählte musikalische Gemeinde wacker darauf los, in der ewigen Unruhe und Hast des amerikanischen Lebens, der steten durch die Reklame auf dem Punkte der Fieberhitze erhaltenen allgemeinen Nervosität eine wohlthuende Oase künstlerischer Ruhe und Vornehmheit; der einzige „ruhende Punkt in der Erscheinungen Flucht."

Imposant ist die harmonische Fülle der Instrumente. Vierzehn erste Violinen, jede in den Händen eines Künstlers ersten Ranges — das übertrifft Seidl und Damrosch. Die zweiten Geigen und Bratschen sind in genau entsprechendem Verhältnisse vertreten. Außerordentliche Sorgfalt ist — was besonders hervorgehoben zu werden verdient — auf die Schulung der Baßinstrumente verwendet. Dieselben sind so harmonisch abgetönt, daß z. B. in der Schumann'schen Sinfonie — bei Schumann ist der Baß wegen der zahlreichen und wichtigen Vorhalte von höchster Bedeutung und geradezu ein Charakteristicum des Componisten — der immer mächtiger und sehnsuchtsvoller anschwellende Baß genau wie eine wunderbare Orgelstimme klang, so harmonisch und reich an Klangfülle; die Einzelstimmen verschmolzen zu einer Gesammtwirkung, wie sie idealer nicht gedacht werden kann.

Das Programm bot in seinem eigentlich orchestralen Theil das selten gehörte sinfonische Gedicht von Franz Liszt, „Les Preludes", ferner die schon erwähnte Cdur-Sinfonie von Robert Schumann, eine Suite von Moszkowski und die berühmten Intermezzi aus der Wagner'schen Trilogie, Siegfried's Wanderung zu dem Fels, auf welchem Brunhild, die Walküre, im Zauberschlaf mitten in der Waberlohe schlummert, ferner die Tongemälde Morgendämmerung und Rheinfahrt.

Von mächtigster Wirkung war unstreitig die Schumann'sche Sinfonie, und hier feierte auch das Orchester und besonders der Chor der Streicher seinen glänzendsten und wohl verdienten Triumph.

Wir können uns nicht entsinnen, die völlige Verschmelzung der Einzelstimmen bei jeder Abwesenheit materieller an Saiten und Bogen erinnernder Nebengeräusche zu solcher Vollendung durchgeführt gehört zu haben, als in dem Zusammenspiel des Bostoner Orchesters. Aber nur der emsigste Fleiß, die liebevollste Vertiefung jedes Mitwirkenden in das innerste Wesen des Kunstwerkes; mit einem Worte, nur wirklich künstlerisches Streben kann solche Erfolge zeitigen und zur Reife bringen.

Herr Alwin Schröder bewies seine völlige Meisterschaft und künstlerische Beherrschung des seelenvollen Saiteninstruments, Violoncell genannt, durch den Vortrag der Transscription des vielgehörten Chopin'schen Notturnos in Esdur, sowie des stupend schwierigen, aber mit eleganter und wie spielender Leichtigkeit unter den Fingern des Künstlers dahinrieselnden Capriccio von Klengel, denen er auf allgemeines Verlangen einen Saltarello folgen ließ.

Frl. Felicia Kaschoska trug die große Arie der Lenora aus Beethoven's „Fidelio" mit schönem großen Ton und innigem Ausdruck vor.

Namens des musikalischen Cleveland glauben wir nur eine Pflicht zu erfüllen, indem wir dem Bostoner Sinfonie-Orchester für den gestrigen musikalischen Genuß aufrichtigen Dank abstatten; das reinigt und erfrischt einmal wieder Herz und Geist von dem Alltagsschmutz des Lebens. Auf baldiges Wiedersehen!

The Post-Express.
ROCHESTER, WEDNESDAY, MAY 3.

CONDUCTOR NIKISCH.

Why He Will Not Appear at To-night's Concert.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, consisting of seventy-nine persons of whom seventy-two are performers, arrived in the city this morning, in charge of Assistant Manager Fred R. Comee. Frank Kneisel, concert meister, C. M. Loeffler, T. Adamoski, J. Adamoski, Mr. and Mrs. Nussbaum, A. Schroeder are registered with Mr. Comee at the Powers.

Regarding Arthur Nikisch's absence from the direction of the orchestra Manager Comee said: "On short notice Mr. Nikisch notified the management that owing to illness he could not proceed on the present Western trip. Concert meister Kneisel, who has been substituted for Conductor Nikisch, is perfectly competent to take his place. He has been under Mr. Nikisch's direction for four years and has been a member of his orchestra for nine years. He has often conducted the orchestra with splendid success during Mr. Nikisch's illness."

The Boston symphony orchestra, Franz Kneisel, concertmeister, will present this programme at the Lyceum to-night:

Overture—Sakuntala.....Goldmark
Aria from Queen of Sheba.....Gounod
Symphony in D minor, No. 4.....Schumann
I. Rather slow (D. minor), Lively (D minor).
II. Rather slow (D minor, Hypodorian mode).
III. Scherzo: Lively (D minor). Trio: The same tempo (B flat major).
IV. Slow (D minor). Lively (D major).
Concerto for violin in G minor, No. 1....:Bruch
First and second movements.
Symphonic Poem—Le Rouet d'Omphale..Saint-Saens
Elizabeth's Aria from Tannhauser—O Lovely Halls.....Wagner
Prelude to the Meistersinger von Nuernburg.....Wagner
Soloists—Miss Felicia Kaschoska and T. Adamowski.

The illness of Arthur Nikisch, conductor, will prevent his appearance with the orchestra.

Democrat and Chronicle.

Entered at the Post-Office at Rochester, N. Y., as Second Class Mail Matter.

ROCHESTER PRINTING CO.

THURSDAY, MAY 4,

BOSTON'S ORCHESTRA.

Its Concert at the Lyceum Last Night Enjoyed by a Large Audience.

An audience that almost filled the big Lyceum gathered at that theater last night to hear the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and while it was never enthusaistic nor even warmly demonstrative it could not have failed to enjoy the excellent music that was given by the orchestra and its soloists. Perhaps the apparent coolness was due to the fact that the audience was composed, in the main, of ladies. There were attempts at recalls, of course, but they were persistent rather than vigorous, and none brough forth a response.

As has been said, the gathering could not have been insensible to the quality of the music with which it was treated. The playing of the orchestra fell but little short of being marvelous. The organization came to Rochester in the best of practice. All winter it has been giving concerts as well as rehearsing daily and the seventy musicians who compose it are able to play together with that finish and accuracy that practice gives to the work of thorough musicians. Their playing is a source of genuine delight to both the student of music and those who are able to appreciate the admirable harmonic effects that their many instruments produce when used in concert. It is delicate where delicacy is required, vigorous where vigor is required, and expressive in its passage from one form to the other. The programme that was published in the Democrat and Chronicle yesterday morning was played last night without alteration and in the manner that has made the orchestra famous. Frank Kneisel acted as conductor in the place of Arhur Nikisch, whose absence has already been explained.

Mme. Felicia Kaschoska was the vocalist of the evening and her singing met with the same favor that it has heretofore received in Rochester. She sang twice and the audience attempted to encore her each time, but she declined to respond in any way except with a bow to the continuous if rather weak applause.

Mr. Adamowski, the solo violinist, also found much favor with his auditors, receiving the heartiest applause that was heard during the evening, but, he too, only bowed his acknowledgements.

Miss Kaschoska, it is announced, will now go to Europe for three years, under an engagement with Herr Nikisch.

THE ROCHESTER HERALD.
THURSDAY, MAY 4, 1893.

HIGH CLASS MUSIC.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA HEARD IN ROCHESTER.

Local Musical Folk Turn Out in Sufficient Numbers to Leave Very Few Lyceum Seats Vacant —Entertainments This Evening.

A large audience, at first disposed to be enthusiastic, but afterward content to be simply appreciative, assembled in the Lyceum last evening to hear the far famed and justly celebrated Boston Symphony Orchestra render a programme of seven numbers, including a vocal and violin solo. The programme consisted of eminently high class music; and it was rendered in a pre-eminently highly classical manner.

It is the custom of this organization not to grant encore numbers. The reason given for this is to the effect that when a programme is lengthened by encores it not infrequently happens that persons in the audience who have come from out of town have to leave the theater without hearing the last programme number. This is sometimes a disappointment not atoned for by the interpolated selection and the result is dissatisfaction on the part of those who wished to hear the concluding numbers.

So the rule of granting no encores whatever has been adopted and it was strictly adhered to last evening. Bows were forthcoming in abandance, but an extra selection, not one. Before the audience found this out it was quite enthusiastic, insistently so. After it got used to the existing state of affairs it applauded just enough to show that it was appreciative, that was all. And perhaps it was just as well that way.

But as the audience passed out from the theater some of it said: "Just wait till Sousa comes again. He'll give us an encore if we want it; and more than one, too."

And so he will; Sousa is a good fellow that way.

The work of the orchestra last evening was uniformly excellent. Each one of the four orchestral numbers was rendered in a manner in some respects beyond criticism; and the accompanimental work of the instrumentalists was equally good. The playing of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is characterized by absolute precision of movement, unwavering tempo, faultless modulation and careful attention to detail. The element of abandon is entirely eliminated from its work. There was not a trace of it manifested in any part of the programme. There was not a moment when one could have honestly exclaimed: "That was glorious!" There was not a moment when one could not honestly have exclaimed: "That was fine!" At all times was that perfect equipoise between "not quite enough" and "too much" most exquisitely, most wonderfully maintained. The proportion of various instruments seemed perfect. The volume of sound was in exact accord and under marvelous control. The orchestra played as one man; and that man a master.

The first number, Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture, presented the orchestra very pleasantly in a rich composition, varied and musical in construction, graceful and ornate in its carefully worked out detail and artistic finish.

The Schubert symphony was the gem of the evening and in its interpretation the orchestra appeared to best advantage. Particularly fine was the scherzo and trio, while the minor intonation throughout the composition was beautifully modulated and preserved under the varying changes of the theme and arrangement.

There was only one approach to anything of a "popular" nature and that was the Saint Saens "Spinning Wheel," which was rendered with exceeding grace, daintiness, delicacy and skill. The prelude to Wagner's "Meistersinger" closed the programme with the heaviest piece of the evening, a composition which seemed almost too cumbrous for the orchestra to interpret with ease. There was such a kid glove finish about the work of the orchestra throughout that there must have been an instinctive reluctance to roll up sleeves and do Wagner.

Both soloists of the evening were cordially received. Miss Felicia Kaschoska was recalled again and again after her first selection and applauded at her second appearance. She is a singer of great confidence, one who, when she takes a high note, takes it undoubtedly and undauntedly, inspiring her audience with part of the confidence with which she inspires herself. The result is mutually agreeable.

T. Adamowski, solo violinist, created a very favorable impression. His tone is clear as a bell, his notes ringing, crisp, clean cut and incisive, his execution distinct and rapid, his style eminently one to fit him as a soloist heard to excellent advantage with orchestral accompaniment. He was compelled to rise and bow half a dozen times in response to the applause.

Owing to the announced illness of Conductor Arthur Nikisch, Concert Master Kneisel wielded the baton and seemed at all times equal to the requirements of his position.

Having been so cordially welcomed here upon the occasion of its first visit it is to be sincerely hoped that in future years the Boston Symphony Orchestra will include Rochester among the favored few cities visited during its brief tours away from Boston.

Commercial Gazette.
PITTSBURGH
SATURDAY, MAY 4, 1893.

The Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony orchestra was greeted with a crowded house last evening at Old City hall. A program of artistic and varied proportions had been arranged, and from the stately Beethoven overture on through to the Wagnerian climax, the musicians held the close attention of the audience. Enthusiastic applause greeted each number, and at the close of the Handle largo, beautifully expressed, the appreciation amounted almost to a furore. Exquisite interpretation was given to the finale of the Schumann symphony and the almost breathless silence as the crashing chords marked the triumphant close, was a tribute that could not be mistaken. The soloist of the evening was Miss Felicia Kaschoska. In the aria from Freischuetz ample scope was given to test the powers of the singer. But the passages, now tender and sweet, now impetuous, now melancholy and again ecstatic, were developed in a manner which proved the artistic worth of the singer. Miss Kaschoska received a tumultuous recall.

The program of the evening as conducted included:

Ludwig van Beethoven.....
.....Overture to "Leonore," No. 2, Op. 72
Adagio (C major).....3-4
Allegro (C major).....2-2
Weber.....Aria from "Freischuetz"
Robert Alexander Schumann.....
.....Symphony No. 2, in C major, Op. 61
I. Sostenuto assai (C major). Allegro ma non trppo (C major).
II. Scherzo; Allegro vovace (C major). Trio I.: the same tempo (G major). Trio II.: the same tempo (C major).
III. Adagio espressivo (C minor).
IV. Allegro molto vivace (C major).
Handel.....Largo
Berlioz—Two movements from "La Damnation de Faust," Op. 24.
I. Mennet des Feu-follets: Moderato (D major).....3-4
II. Valse des Sylphes: Allegro, mouvement de valse (D major)...3-8
Wagner.....Overture, "Rienzi"

To-night the program will include Mendelssohn's St. Paul, first part, by the Mozart club, under whose auspices the concerts are given, in addition to the orchestral numbers that will constitute part first of the program.

The Dispatch.
PITTSBURG, SATURDAY, MAY 6, 1893.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

An Enthusiastic Reception Tendered It at Old City Hall Last Night.

That peerless organization known as the Boston Symphony Orchestra made its annual appearance in Pittsburg last night at Old City Hall under the auspices of the Mozart Club. Through the splendid musical performances during the last two weeks the people of the two cities had been properly prepared to fully enjoy this concert, and the tremendous enthusiasm with which the world-renowned organization was received eclipsed all former demonstrations of approval. It was the spontaneous tribute of thousands of music-filled souls to art itself. Mr. Franz Kneisel wielded the baton in a thoroughly satisfactory manner. Though he may not have the magnetism of Seidl, the training of Thomas, or the finish of Nikisch, his mastery of his men is complete. Calm and dignified, he leads the orchestra forcibly through the most raging passages and guides them gently in the softest movements. The active members of the Mozart Club were seated on the stage behind the musicians, and the body of the hall was more than well filled with an uncommonly fashionable audience.

Selected from the best orchestras of Europe and America, Colonel Higginson's band embraces the elite of instrumental players. It is hardly exaggeration to state that every man is an artist, and with that the degree of perfection attained in the ensemble is described at the same time. If one class of the instruments should be mentioned as particularly brilliant the lot would fall to the strings. They, above the others, are thorough scholars. Not alone in the result of their efforts, but also in the manner of their playing they stand unchallenged. They handle their bows with the same mathematical exactness as a regiment of well-trained soliders shoulder their arms.

The vocal soloist of the evening was Miss Felicia Kaschoska, from the Metropolitan Opera House, New York. She was heard last night for the first time in this city and achieved an indisputable success. Her soprano range is remarkably large and the volume of her tone exceedingly full. Occasionally a few hard sounds may be discerned, but their number are few. She rendered Agathe's aria from Weber's "Freischuetz" with great dramatic expression and finish of execution. Five spontaneous rounds of applause were the reward, but elicited, however, no encore. Mr. C. M. Loeffler's exquisite solo violin playing with a dainty harpsichordal accompaniment by Mr. Schuecker, and afterward the full wealth of the orchestra, necessitated the repetition of Handel's idyllic "Largo."

The bad effect that rainy weather often leaves on the wood instruments was slightly felt last night. But the total impression of this rich concert was so overwhelming that no better could be wished for. The programme is appended:

LUDWIG VAN BEETHOVEN—OVERTURE TO "LEONORE," NO. 3, OP. 72.

Adagio (C major).....3-4
Allegro (C major).....2-2

WEBER—ARIA FROM "FREISCHUETZ."

ROBERT ALEXANDER SCHUMANN—SYMPHONY NO. 2, IN C MAJOR, OP. 61.

I. Sostenuto assai (C major). Allegro ma non troppo (C major).
II. Scherzo; Allegro vivace (C major). Trio I; the same tempo (G major). Trio II; the same tempo (C major).
III. Adagio espressivo (C minor).
IV. Allegro molto vivace (C major).

HANDEL.....LARGO
BERLIOZ—TWO MOVEMENTS FROM "LA DAMNATION DE FAUST," OP. 24.
I. Menuet des Feu-follets: Moderato.....(D major) 3-4
II. Valse des Sylphes; Allegro, mouvement de valse (D major) 3-8
WAGNER.....OVERTURE, "RIENZI."

[15.8].

Cleveländer Anzeiger
— und —
Deutsche Presse.
Herausgegeben von der
German-American Publ. Co.
Office: No. 221 & 223 St. Clairstr.
Telephon 362.

Concert des Bostoner Sinfonie-Orchesters.

Zu trefflich eingespielt und aus zu tüchtigen Kräften bestehend ist das Sinfonie-Orchester aus Boston, um gestern Abend in dem Concert in der Musikhalle die Abwesenheit des eigentlichen Dirigenten Arthur Nikisch — er trifft bereits seine Vorbereitungen zu seinem Abschiede von Amerika — vermissen zu lassen; auch Herr Kneisel, der erste Geiger, wußte am Dirigentenpult die Orchestermassen trefflich zu beherrschen und zu leiten. Ohne Frage ist das Bostoner Orchester das bestgeschulte und am längsten bestehende der Ver. Staaten. Es ist vermöge der Munificenz seiner Gründer und Erhalter in der angenehmen Lage, ohne Rücksicht auf den Geldpunkt sein musikalisches Dasein zu fristen, die besten verfügbaren Kräfte zu gewinnen, den einmal gewonnenen aber ein so behagliches Sein zu gewähren, daß es Niemandem, der sich einmal als tüchtiger Musiker bewährt hat, einfällt, sich freiwillig von der Gemeinschaft loszusagen. So spielt denn diese kleine aber gewählte musikalische Gemeinde wacker darauf los, in der ewigen Unruhe und Hast des amerikanischen Lebens, der steten durch die Reklame auf dem Punkte der Fieberhitze erhaltenen allgemeinen Nervosität eine wohlthuende Oase künstlerischer Ruhe und Vornehmheit; der einzige „ruhende Punkt in der Erscheinungen Flucht."

Imposant ist die harmonische Fülle der Instrumente. Vierzehn erste Violinen, jede in den Händen eines Künstlers ersten Ranges — das übertrifft Seidl und Damrosch. Die zweiten Geigen und Bratschen sind in genau entsprechendem Verhältnisse vertreten. Außerordentliche Sorgfalt ist — was besonders hervorgehoben zu werden verdient — auf die Schulung der Baßinstrumente verwendet. Dieselben sind so harmonisch abgetönt, daß z. B. in der Schumann'schen Sinfonie — bei Schumann ist der Baß wegen der zahlreichen und wichtigen Vorhalte von höchster Bedeutung und geradezu ein Charakteristicum des Componisten — der immer mächtiger und sehnsuchtsvoller anschwellende Baß genau wie eine wunderbare Orgelstimme klang, so harmonisch und reich an Klangfülle; die Einzelstimmen verschmolzen zu einer Gesammtwirkung, wie sie idealer nicht gedacht werden kann.

Das Programm bot in seinem eigentlich orchestralen Theil das selten gehörte sinfonische Gedicht von Franz Liszt, „Les Preludes", ferner die schon erwähnte Cdur-Sinfonie von Robert Schumann, eine Suite von Moszkowski und die berühmten Intermezzi aus der Wagner'schen Trilogie, Siegfried's Wanderung zu dem Fels, auf welchem Brunhild, die Walküre, im Zauberschlaf mitten in der Waberlohe schlummert, ferner die Tongemälde Morgendämmerung und Rheinfahrt.

Von mächtigster Wirkung war unstreitig die Schumann'sche Sinfonie, und hier feierte auch das Orchester und besonders der Chor der Streicher seinen glanzendsten und wohl verdienten Triumph.

Wir können uns nicht entsinnen, die völlige Verschmelzung der Einzelstimmen bei jeder Abwesenheit materieller an Saiten und Bogen erinnernder Nebengeräusche zu solcher Vollendung durchgeführt gehört zu haben, als in dem Zusammenspiel des Bostoner Orchesters. Aber nur der emsigste Fleiß, die liebevollste Vertiefung jedes Mitwirkenden in das innerste Wesen des Kunstwerkes; mit einem Worte, nur wirklich künstlerisches Streben kann solche Erfolge zeitigen und zur Reife bringen.

Herr Alwin Schröder bewies seine völlige Meisterschaft und künstlerische Beherrschung des seelenvollen Saiteninstruments, Violoncell genannt, durch den Vortrag der Transscription des vielgehörten Chopin'schen Notturnos in Esdur, sowie des stupend schwierigen, aber mit eleganter und wie spielender Leichtigkeit unter den Fingern des Künstlers dahinrieselnden Capriccio von Klengel, denen er auf allgemeines Verlangen einen Saltarello folgen ließ.

Frl. Felicia Kaschoska trug die große Arie der Lenora aus Beethoven's „Fidelio" mit schönem großen Ton und innigem Ausdruck vor.

Namens des musikalischen Cleveland glauben wir nur eine Pflicht zu erfüllen, indem wir dem Bostoner Sinfonie-Orchester für den gestrigen musikalischen Genuß aufrichtigen Dank abstatten; das reinigt und erfrischt einmal wieder Herz und Geist von dem Alltagsschmutz des Lebens. Auf baldiges Wiedersehen!

Boston Daily Globe.
MONDAY, MAY 15, 1893.

CROWDS AT THE GATES.

Another Sunday With the Fair Closed to the Public.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Fills Music Hall With Melody.

Thousands Spend the Day in Shows Outside the Grounds.

CHICAGO, May 14.—Forty thousand people went down to the World's fair grounds today, but they did not gain admission.

From 10 o'clock in the morning until 5 in the evening there was an almost continuous stream of wanderers passing down Stoney Island av. and along the whole western extent of the fair grounds.

Then there was a line of buggies, carriages, tally-ho coaches and other rigs which contained people who desired to have a glimpse of the fair buildings over the fence.

Buffalo Bill's show near the grounds reaped a rich harvest, as every seat was occupied, and it is estimated that the place contains accommodations for 18,000 people.

Prince Roland Bonaparte and a number of friends drove down to the fair, but stopped at the show.

Thousands turned from the fair gates to the fake shows and merry-go-rounds, and obtained a little recreation in that way. Every fakir flourished, while the fair languished.

At the gates there was considerably more trouble than on the previous Sunday with those who claimed the right to enter.

The order forbidding admission to exhibitors and workmen after 1 o'clock had been made public so late that many of those people were not aware of it, and in consequence arrived too late.

One New York contractor vainly tried for two hours to get inside, and finally went away disappointed.

A Columbian guard abused the gatekeeper at 63d st. and

Was Knocked Down

for his trouble.

The cable cars did a big business, but the steamboats were crowded more than at any previous time since the fair opened, the patrons getting their money's worth in the ride, and enjoying a better view of the fair buildings than could be obtained on land.

If the gates had been opened it is probable that 150,000 people would have taken advantage of the fine weather and gone to Jackson Park.

After the shower of the early morning it was a superb day for the workingmen. A large force is putting the fair grounds in order, but for reasons which nobody could explain the working force did not materialize in any unusual numbers. In fact not as many were brought out as on ordinary working days.

The 4000 teams which it was asserted would be on the grounds early in the morning dwindled down to a couple of hundred.

These were well scattered over the park and picked up considerable rubbish from around the agricultural building, the terminal station and other places where little construction work is going on.

Steam rollers kept up their grind along the north frontage of machinery hall and around the terminal station, where the roadways are yet unfinished, and where gravel and crushed stone are being dumped to improve them.

Sweepers were also brought out and brushed up all the evidence of Saturday night's crowd, making the neighborhood of the administration building presentable

For Tomorrow's Visitors.

The present week promises to be an unusually busy one with both the construction department and landscape deparment.

The construction department will centre its forces on the ethnological building, which Prof. Putnam claims has not hitherto received the attention its importance entitles it to.

Building work in other directions is pretty well out of the way, and next week ought to see the professor's new house about ready for occupancy.

He will be only too glad to move in as soon as the painters get their hogsheads and boilers out of his way.

Installation of the ethnological exhibits, although large in number, will take but a short time, for everything is sorted and classified and packed away in cases in the dairy barns near by.

This week, too, will witness a good deal of work in the Indian wigwams, provided the weather is such that the landscape people can finish up the filling and grading which they began the middle of last week.

The Midway plaisance is another place which [illegible] each vastly different a week

The exposition will have a big force working here after tomorrow, and will perform the same miracles with midway mudholes that it has with those within the larger grounds.

Herr Franz Kneisel and 90 musicians from Boston, lugging the impedimenta attached to probably the most artistic orchestra in the country, tramped across the World's fair grounds today at noon.

The army of skilled players created a sensation in the deserted grounds and the guard wanted to arrest them for breaking in.

The tread of the 180 feet in the graveyard stillness was louder

Than the March of Time.

It took three cars to bring the orchestra.

Paderewski said this organization had but one equal in the world and none this side of Europe. He appeared many times with it.

The full force was brought on, the appearance being determined as the most important one of its history. Two concerts are to be given in Music Hall tomorrow afternoon and Tuesday afternoon.

Violinist Loeffeler will be the soloist tomorrow, and Mr. Schroeder will execute Saint-Saen's concerto for violoncello and orchestra, first and second movements, Tuesday.

The conductor was not pleased with Music Hall. Most anybody dislikes to freeze, and he looked seriously perplexed when he pulled his coat tight across his broad back and hitched up another button. He rose upon his pedestal, rubbed his hands and smiled at the dozen plumbers who were wrenching and whacking at the new steam radiators.

He couldn't see exactly how their noise would fit into a symphony rehearsal, so he dropped his voice into a minor and called a guard.

The gentleman from Oklahoma responded, and at his suggestion the men with hammers and bolts gave way to those with fiddles and horns.

Herr Kneisel then gave a final shiver and rapped for eyes front.

The rows of violinists stopped their discordant tuning, the horners ceased their tootings, and the giant assembly of the world's best sat silent for the opening.

Down came the stick and the overture was on.

Gentle and mild at the first, the theme grew and widened, and spread from violins to 'cellos and bassos and horns and drums, until was bursting under the deluges of tone.

The Funnel Dome

The great melodies chased each other out into the sepulchral silence of the empty corridors.

They swept in troops down the great basin until the lifeless Neptunes seemed to turn at the awful desecration of the Puritanic Sunday, and the steadfast Franklin to drop his strong eyes from where the lightning lives.

The solitary guards awoke from their slumbers, and as far away as the administration building the music could be heard.

The first rehearsal lasted nearly two hours, the trial performance indicating a most finished concert.

Conductor Kneisel, who is temporarily filling Arthur Nikisch's place, hopes to make both events historical, since it is possible he may be retained permanently as master of the baton.

The artists made a tour of the grounds when the practice was ended.

They were entranced with the wonderful beauty, the bright sun making the buildings doubly dazzling. Size and design completely overran their wildest expectations, so they said.

They were enthusiastic over everything, and particularly anxious to make a hit, since Walter Damrosch with his New York Symphony orchestra, follows for Friday and Saturday.

The two organizations make this one of the most brilliant weeks musically of the exposition.

The Duke of Veragua and party attended high mass at St. James' church this morning. A despatch was received by the duke from the captain-general of Cuba, announcing that the Infanta Eulalia was really ill at Havana, but it did not state whether her visit to the United States was abandoned.

The ducal party will devote this week to seeing the fair, and but few engagements have been made.

Wednesday being the birthday of the King of Spain, the duke will attend a dinner given by the Spanish commissioner in honor of the event.

The duke will probably remain in the city two weeks longer. On his way East he will visit Niagara Falls, Washington and other places.

The world's congress auxiliary will be formally opened at 10 o'clock tomorrow morning in the hall of Columbus in the memorial art palace.

The week is to be devoted to the congress of representative women, who assemble at the behest of the committee of the woman's branch of the auxiliary.

PLAIN DEALER.
CLEVELAND
TUESDAY, MAY 9, 1893.

FINE MUSIC

Rendered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra — Works of Great Masters Given.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, under the conductorship of Mr. Franz Kneisel, gave a concert at Music hall last night to a small audience, considering the attraction, but what it lacked in numbers those present surely made up in enthusiasm. The orchestra is as well balanced as ever, and while not under the direction of the regular conductor, Mr. Nikisch, played with wonderful pricision, phrasing and expression under Mr. Kneisel's baton.

The program rendered was of considerable length, but thoroughly enjoyed through all of the numbers rendered. Those received the best were Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes," which is well known, having been played here a number of times. It was given with beautiful expression and called out prolonged applause.

Schumann's symphony No. 2, in four movements, afforded opportunity for splendid ensemble work. The symphony shows to a good advantage Schumann's versatility. Commencing with the first movement his quiet ideas are shown, but each succeeding movement becomes stronger until the finale, brilliant and of a marchlike character. The rendering was superb.

The favorite number, however, was two movements from suite No. 1, by Moszkowski. The theme of the first reminds one of a once favorite Russian song known throughout Germany as "Der Rothe Sarafan." It is an excellent example of Moszkowski's characteristic melodic style, its theme being repeated in eight different variations. A flute cadenza, unexpectedly introduced, was especially enjoyed during the rendering of the seventh variation. The second movement, "Perpetuum Mobile," is a favorite bravura show piece for virtuoso orchestras.

The orchestra concluded its program by rendering with splendid effect movements from "Siegfried" and "Die Goetterdaemmerung," these numbers being heard at Seidl's concert a few weeks since.

The soloists were Miss Felicia Kaschoska, soprano, and Mr. Alwin Schroeder, violoncellist. Miss Kaschoska sang Leonore's grand aria from "Fidelio," by Beethoven. Her singing was of the dramatic order and full of inspiration. Her range is very great, but her lower tones while being sweet are not strong. She seemed to be suffering from a cold.

Mr. Schroeder is the greatest violoncellist Clevelanders have heard. He played a serenade by E. Linder and "Caprices" by Klengel. He displayed wonderful tone and his technic and bowing are marvelous. On his last number Mr. Schroeder, after a most enthusiastic recall, responded by playing a "Tarantelle" by Cossmann, with a beautiful finish.

Mr. Kneisel is to be complimented upon the success he has had with the orchestra since Mr. Nikisch has been ill. It is a trying position for the "concert meister" which was appreciated by those present.

State Journal
THURSDAY, - - - May 11, 1893.
THE OHIO STATE JOURNAL

Boston Symphony Concert.

Only a fair-sized audience greeted the Boston Symphony orchestra at the Henrietta last evening. That there was not a larger crowd was due partly to the fact of there having been so many entertainments of a high order during the past few weeks, and to a certain disappointment over Mr. Nikish's not appearing with the orchestra. Those who were not present missed one of the most enjoyable concerts of the season and if the attendance had been in proportion to its merit there would not have been standing room in the theater.

THE COMMERCIAL GAZETTE
CINCINNATI,
FRIDAY, MAY 12, 1893.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Delights a Great Audience, and the Ladies' Musical Club Is Proud of Itself.

It was a great concert at Music Hall last night, the Boston Symphony Orchestra—by many considered the finest orchestra in the country—rendering a fine programme. The orchestra came out under the auspices of the Ladies' Musical Club, which gave the guarantee fund, and the result demonstrates that they had not too highly estimated the musical taste of the community.

Mr. Franz Kneisel was the conductor, Mr. Nikisch having gone to his native land, and he proved himself to be a leader of courage and ability. He had the orchestra extremely well in hand. But when it came to Miss Kaschoska's scene, "Love's Death," from "Tristan and Isolde," Love died very hard, drowned out completely by a tremendous crescendo that only a Materna could dominate. Miss Kaschoska might well exclaim, "How they swell and roar around me," for her solo was entirely sacrificed.

A delicious little number on the programme was the waltz of the sylphs and minuet of fireflies. It is a most delicate and fairy-like bit of orchestration, and was rendered marvelously.

Mr. C. M. Loeffler played a Saint-Saens concerto for the violin with remarkable technique, and was much applauded.

The concluding number was a Tschaikowsky symphony (No. 5 in E minor), and was rendered in a faultless manner.

The Ladies' Musical Club are greatly to be congratulated. They have wound up the musical season in a manner altogether admirable.

A few of those present were Mr. and Mrs. Fenton Lawson, Mr. and Mrs. Henry Sage, Dr. and Mrs. Charles Dodd, Mrs. Wm. Dodd, Mrs. Bonner, Miss Bonner, Mrs. Thrall, Misses Thrall, Miss Josie Thrall, Dr. and Mrs. Withrow, Miss Follett, Mrs. Clements, Miss Clements, Mrs. Wilmot Kidd, Mr. Stanley Kidd, Mr. and Mrs. Albert Chatfield, Mr. and Mrs. F. W. Huntington, Misses Stone, Mrs. Webster, Mr. and Mrs. Kelly, nee Hetlich; Mr. and Mrs. N. Henchman Davis, Mr. H. Roelker, Mr. Edw'd Goepper, Dr. Clark Davis, Mr. and Mrs. Dwight Kinney, Mr. and Mrs. Howard Hinkle, Mr. and Mrs. Chas. Jacob, Miss Gallgher, Mr. and Mrs. Wm. McAlpin, Mrs. Matthew Addy and party, Mrs. F. H. Aldrich, Miss Aldrich, Miss Luella Crane, Mr. and Mrs. Galbreath, Mr. and Mrs. Herbert Stewart, Mr. Walter DeCamp, Mr. Woodworth, Judge Cox, Mr. and Mrs. W. H. Doane, Misses Doane, Dr. Bradford, Mrs. Bradford, Mrs. Cox, Mr. and Mrs. James Cullen, Miss Clara Jordan.

CHICAGO HERALD,
WEDNESDAY, MAY 17

PLAYS TO ANOTHER SMALL AUDIENCE.

Boston Symphony Orchestra's Final Concert at the Fair Grounds.

At the second concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra given under the direction of Franz Kneisel in music hall yesterday afternoon the many virtues that have made the organization famous were displayed in even a more fortunate manner than on the day previous. The audience was approximately the same in size as that which listened to the first concert. The programme included Beethoven's "Leonore" overture, No. 3; Schumann's second symphony; the prelude and closing scene from "Tristan and Isolde," "Siegfried's Rhine Journey" from the "Goetterdaemmerung" and the "Tannhaeuser," overtures. In all these numbers the idiosyncrasies which are more or less characteristic of the interpretations of this orchestra were easily discernible. In the domain of music the Boston Symphony orchestra is the exponent of Rembrandt effects. Its lights and shades are almost unnecessarily abrupt, its transitions in dynamic effects are sudden, and thus there results a constant undulation from which the element of restfulness is conspicuously absent. Technically the work of the orchestra is perfection itself, and this phase in the playing of the strings was especially noteworthy in the scherzo of the symphony and in the whirl that introduces the finale of the "Leonore" overture.

The soloists were M. Felice Kaschosha, who sang the finale in the "Tristan and Isolde," and Alwin Schroeder, the principal violoncellist, who played two movements of Saint Saens' concerto for that instrument. It is a composition that offered the soloist ample opportunity to display his beautiful tone and his excellent technique, and of this he availed himself to the utmost, receiving several recalls as a reward for his admirable effort.

Festival hall was so cold in the morning that it was found impossible to give the popular concert there so that both orchestra and audience were transferred to the music hall in which steam coils have been inserted. They were there and visible to the eye, but so far as any appreciable difference in the atmosphere was concerned one was justified in doubting their efficacy. Finally, at 1 o'clock instead of 12, Mr. Thomas mounted his dais and began the concert with the march and overture from "Tannhaeuser," which were followed by the allegretto from Beethoven's seventh symphony, Weber's "Invitation to the Dance," Liszt's second polonaise and other compositions, all of which were heartily applauded. Owing to the absence of facilities for heating festival hall to-day's concert will again be given in music hall. The programme is as follows:

"Marche Slav"	Tschaikowsky
Overture, "Rienzi"	Wagner
Ballet music, "Queen of Sheba"	Goldmark
Largo. Violin obligato by Max Bendix.	Handel
Symphonic poem, "Phaeton"	Saint-Saens
Slavonic rhapsody, No. 3	Dvorak
Waltz, "Sphaerenklaenge"	Joseph Strauss
Malaguena, Maurische Fantasie, from "Boabdil"	Moszkowski

[159].

The Tribune.
THE CINCINNATI TRIBUNE CO.
FRIDAY, MAY 12, 1893.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Superb Concert Under Ladies' Musical Club Auspices.

NIKISCH WAS NOT MISSED.

Over Three Thousand People Applaud Conductor Kneisel and the Distinguished Soloists.

Well, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has come and gone, leaving behind it a magnificent record for artistic achievement. And thereby hangs the reflection that if Mr. Nikisch had been in the audience he would have learned a valuable lesson. He would have gathered to himself the crucial conviction that it is not well for a man to confuse his own individuality with that of the organization he represents. The management of the great Boston organization has made few mistakes, a statement warranted by its masterful success, both artistically and financially.

Its nearest approach to a positive blunder has been the posting of the ensemble as the Nikisch band. By the way, this has not been so much due to the management as to the glittering fallibility of newspaper writers, who, in a commendable anxiety to insure success in their own particular locality, have put the name of the leader first, as though that were an essential attribute to gaining the public ear. This is a palpable error. By this we do not mean to urge that a man shall not have accorded to him the reward of faithful service, far from it; but it is in order for every man to modestly recognize his place and to con well the lesson of the centuries.

The contract of Mr. Nikisch with Mr. Higginson had yet another year to run when he received the tempting offer of the directorship of the opera at Budapest. The offer was a silver-coated pill to a man trained in old-world traditions. It meant a life post at a living salary, honors of a more or less localized restrictiveness and, at the end of usefulness, a pension. This last, with numbers of men whose natures are steeped in the bane of foreign customs, is the be all and end all of life's ambition, and it is believed to have largely influenced the leader of the Boston band in his determination to annul his agreement with the Eastern philanthropist. Men of the Nikisch stripe are not built on the American plan of life-long combativeness.

They want to fight and then be awarded the laurel of surcease of labor when that labor shall have become irksome with the advance of years. With this proffer in his possession, Mr. Nikisch sought Mr. Higginson and demanded an ultimatum as to his re-engagement for another term of five years after the expiration of his present contract. He was told that the matter was one for more careful, to say nothing of prayerful, consideration than could be embaced in a few moments of time.

It is hinted that the leader asked also for a considerable advance upon the salary he had been receiving. This, likewise, was met with the question of possible expediency. His subsequent demand for release from the stipulations of the contract was more easy of accomplishment than even he had supposed, and it will require the exercise of more than ordinary human charity to clear him of the carnal charge of bargaining, upon the principle that he was indispensable to the longer vitality of the orchestra.

Whatever the result of his effort he will have to meet general condemnation for avoiding the final responsibility of his engagement. He pleaded weariness of the flesh at the last moment, in fact, on the afternoon of the day the band was announced to depart on its tour of the Western cities. When sober reflection envelopes him as a mantle, when he shall have come into possession of his pensioned ease and a localized independence and reputation he may find satisfaction in the fact that, like the gentleman in "The Mikado," he never will be missed.

Last night's concert, in so far as the performance of the various numbers was concerned, was without a flaw. It is, however, to be regretted that in the arrangement of the programme the beauties of contrast were almost, if not wholly, ignored. The result was a general sameness that an enthusiast would scarcely notice, but which the average auditor is unable to escape from.

When Mr. Franz Kneisel came to the front of the stage he was greeted with encouraging applause. A minute later his baton was poised over the score of Beethoven's great "Leonore" overture, a work teeming with harmonic and melodic effects. After the measures that take it by wierd modulations from C major, the key in which the introduction is written, to the key of A-flat major, the reeds carry a melody that soon loses itself in a mysterious series of harmonic progressions by the strings, leading to E minor.

Then is carried out a unique idea of the great composer, who, so to speak, sends his instruments in search of the lost key. They are wanderers. The flute and violins call dismally to each other through the darkness. Other instruments join in the search, which grows more and more animated and finally results successfully, the entire orchestra, with a fortissimo chord, returning to A flat. The strings and brasses, however, breaking in excitedly upon the wailings of the flute, oboe and clarinets, admonish that they are not yet satisfied.

They want the original key, and taking a delicate theme, they play it crescendo to a climax, where the harmony, the dominant chord of C major, promises relief. Then the whole orchestra takes up the original theme with force akin to fury, the effect being thrilling. In fact, the entire work is so full of charm that it seems an injustice that each separate measure be not dwelt upon. The attempts of the strings to take up again a figure from the second theme and the furious sforzando objections from the wind instruments are the working out of a highly dramatic conception.

Then trumpet calls in the distance stop the combat, and the original theme, blithely taken by the flute, leads to a lively coda. The overture was magnificently played, and as the last note of the coda died away the audience signified approval by prolonged applause.

Mr. C. M. Loeffler played a violin concerto, No. 1, by Saint-Saens (opus 20), like a virtuoso. His tone is pure and liquid and his execution excellent. He introduced, just before the finishing measures, a cadenza of his own, displaying, better than in the composition itself, the possibilities of the instrument and his mastery of it.

In the prelude to Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde" Miss Felicia Kaschoska sang, her soprano voice showing to advantage against the orchestral background. It is velvety and in the lower register has something of a contralto richness to it. She was warmly applauded. The orchestral finale, which constituted the second part of the double number, was given with taste and precision.

The "Will o' the Wisp" minuet and the "Waltz o' the Sylphs" from the "Damnation of Faust" pleased the audience probably more than anything on the programme, but the most interesting number of the evening was Tschaikowsky's fifth symphony. The opening movement, in allegro tempo, is followed be a slow movement, in which two distinct themes are heard. It begins with a song-like melody by the horn, played in fine style, the tone being rich and mellow and the effect charming.

The two phrases which end this movement, by a mere coincidence, are almost, note for note, identical with a passage in the "Cujus Animam" from Rossini's "Stabat Mater." The finale is preceded by a slow movement, and ends after a generous use of the tympani and brasses. In two or three instances in this work the composer treats the brasses in the same Wagneresque style noticeable in his fourth symphony, which was recently played here by the New York Symphony Orchestra.

The strength of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is largely in its ensemble. No like number of men in the country more nearly play as one man. In the delicate passages calling for artistic taste there is no lack of feeling. They respond as readily to the baton of Kneisel as they did to that of Nikisch. Kneisel is not as graceful a conductor as Damrosch. His enthusiasm, however is more noticable. In conducting he seems to enter heartily into the composer's plans and to be taking great pains that the performance be perfect.

As compared with the New York Symphony Orchestra that organization must suffer somewhat. This, however, casts no reflection on either Damrosch or his men. It is the natural result of playing long years together, almost without change in the personnel of the organization. Under the same circumstances the New York orchestra would doubtless be quite as excellent. None could easily be any better.

Courier-Journal.
PUBLISHED DAILY, SUNDAY AND WEEKLY
Office: Cor. Fourth Ave. and Green St., LOUISVILLE.
SATURDAY.....MAY 13, 1893

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The disposition of the Louisville public to extend remunerative attendance to musical events of a high class has been pushed to its utmost limits of late, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra coming last in a series of orchestral concerts was not accorded the patronage its rare excellence warranted at the Auditorium last night. Of all the organizations which have appeared here during the winter this is beyond dispute the finest. The programmes rendered by this celebrated orchestra always furnish a departure from the beaten paths of concert selections. What is brightest and best, and at the same time has the merit of freshness, they always produce. Under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch the orchestra was brought to a state of superb excellence, and Mr. Franz Kuersel, who has been the concert master of the orchestra for a number of years, and who has taken Mr. Nikisch's position, showed himself to be an intelligent, careful and thoroughly competent successor. The programme given last night appealed to the purest musical taste, yet it was marked by abundant variety for so brief an arrangement. There were two symphonies, Liszt's "Les Preludes" and Tchaikowsky's No. 5 in E minor. Handel's Largo, so charming for its exquisite simplicity and melody, was rendered so delightfully that it had to be repeated. The deliciously dainty, fairy-like minuet and waltz from Berlioz' "Damnation of Faust" were given with a grace, lightness and spirit which well nigh amounted to perfection. The soloist of the evening was Miss Felicia Kaschoska. She is an artist of the German school, possessing a rich, powerful, dramatic soprano voice, and a splendid, impressive stage presence. She sang the noble and pathetic aria from "Der Freischutz" Ael meine Pulse schlagen, with fine fervor and feeling, and sang the music of "Isolde" in the excerpt from "Tristan and Isolde," which was the closing number, and which the orchestra gave with tremendously impressive effect. The concert this afternoon presents an excellent programme, and in addition to Miss Kaschoska there will be two other soloists—Mr. Alwin Schroeder and Mr. Charles Mole on the 'cello and flute. The following is the programme.

Grand Polonaise in E.....Liszt
Elizabeth's aria from "Tannhauser"....Wagner
Symphonic Poem, "Le Rouet d'Omphale".....Saint-saens

Soli for Violoncello.

(a) Lindner.....Romanza
(b) Popper.....Spinning Song
Symphony, "A Rustic Wedding"..Goldmark
(a) Theme with variations.
(b) Scene, in the garden.
(c) Dance.
Overture, "Merry Wives of Windsor"..Nicolai

THE LOUISVILLE TIMES
Saturday Evening, May 13, 1893.

ARTISTIC CONCERTS.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Auditorium.

Hans Richter Will Not Assume the Boston Baton.

Col. Savage's Benefit at the Buckingham May 29.

NEXT WEEK'S ATTRACTIONS.

Every seat in the Auditorium last night should have been occupied for the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, that excellent company of musicians gotten together and drilled by Nikisch, the late director. Herr Franz Kneisel succeeded to Nikisch's baton, and no difference is noticeable in the work of the men. The audience last night was a disappointment, but those who went say the concert was the most artistic ever given in Louisville. The programme was a most interesting one, and included such popular numbers as Handel's "Largo" and the minuet and waltz from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust." There were two symphonies on the programme, and Miss Kaschoska, a singer of the most approved German school, displayed a powerful voice, cultivated to perfection.

The Boston Symphony has never played to such cheap prices as prevail at the matinee this afternoon, and doubtless the Auditorium is crowded. The excellent programme is as follows:

Liszt.....Grand Polonaise in E
Wagner..Elizabeth's Aria from "Tannhaeuser
Miss Felicia Kaschoska.
Soli for Violoncello.
(a) Linder.....Serenade
(b) Popper.....Spinning Song
Mr. Alwin Schroeder.
Saint-Saens.....
Symphonic Poem, "Le Rouet d'Omphale"
Demersseman.....Solo for Flute, "Tremolo"
Mons. Charles Mole.
Wagner—Siegfried passing through the Fire, from "Siegfried," Act III., Scene 2, and Morning Dawn, and Siegfried's Voyage up the Rhine, from "Goetterdaemmerung," Prologue.
(Arranged by Hans Richter.)
Nicolai.....
Overture, "Merry Wives of Windsor"

* * *

A cablegram received in New York from Vienna is authority for the statement that Hans Richter, the Vienna conductor, has not only declined the Boston offer of $12,000 a year to take Mr. Nickisch's place in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, now in Louisville, but has decided not to go to Chicago this summer. He was to have led some concerts at the World's Fair, but finds that his duties at the Vienna Opera-house will not permit the necessary absence.

It is understood that Herr Richter can not leave Vienna until 1897 without losing the pension to which he will then be entitled.

* *

THE CHICAGO EVENING POST
TUESDAY, MAY 16, 1893.

LAST OF THE BOSTON CONCERTS.

The Symphony Orchestra Presents a Splendid Programme—Music for the People.

The programme for the second and last of the present Boston symphony orchestra concerts at Music Hall this afternoon was as follows:

Overture, "Leonore" No. 3.....Beethoven
Symphony No. 2, in C., op. 61.....Schumann
Sostenuto Assia, Allegro ma non troppe, Scerzo, Allegro Vivace, Adagio Expressivo, Allegro Molto Vivace.
Concert of violoncello and orchestra. Saint Saens
First and second movements.
Prelude and closing scene from "Tristan and Isolde".....Wagner
"Siegfried's Rhine Journey" from "Goetterdaemmerung".....Wagner
Overture from "Tannhaeuser".....Wagner

Miss Felicia Kaschoska sang in the "Tristan and Isolde" number.

The programme for the popular concert at music hall this morning was as follows:

March and overture, "Tannhauser".....Wagner
Alegretto, symphony No. 7.....Beethoven
"Invitation to the Dance".....Weber
Orchestration by Berlioz.
Theme, variations and finale, from Suite, op. 55.....Tschaikowsky
Norwegian rhapsody.....Svendsen
Polonaise No. 2.....Liszt

The Tribune.
THE CHICAGO
WEDNESDAY, MAY 17, 1893.

MUSIC HALL LIKE AN ICE BOX.

Auditors Shiver and Players Handicapped by the Frigid Atmosphere.

The four or five hundred persons who shivered through the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Music Hall will doubtless be surprised to learn that the steam coils in that auditorium are claimed to have contained heat. Certainly no one would have suspected it, for the temperature in the hall was such that the thrills fine music caused had no show in the presence of the shivers the cold produced. To ask musicians to play in such an atmosphere is but little less than an outrage, and to expect many patrons to pay $1 apiece to sit in such a frigid room is to expect the impossible. The Bureau of Music should see to it either that the hall is properly warmed or else discontinue the concerts until the weather moderates. Patience with present conditions is well-nigh exhausted.

The program Mr. Kneisel and his players offered contained the Beethoven "Leonore" No. 3; the Schumann C major Symphony; two movements of Saint-Saens' Cello Concerto; the "Liebestod" and Prelude from "Tristan"; "Siegfried's Rheinfahrt," and the overture to "Tannhäuser." The Symphony was finely read, with abundant fire and passion, and good appreciation of its poetic and emotional contents. The Scherzo was especially admirable for the excellent work done by the strings and the final allegro was brilliant in its climacteric effect. The Beethoven overture was skillfully played, but one missed something of the dignity and nobility more familiar readings have accustomed one to. The Wagner excerpts were splendidly given, the dramatic and descriptive powers of the selections being revealed with telling effect.

Mr. Schroeder was the 'cello soloist and proved himself entitled to a prominent place among the several great players of that instrument America can boast. The tone he wins from his 'cello is not only remarkably pure, clear, and strong, but of surpassing loveliness in its sweetness and sympathetic qualities. To this rare tonal beauty he adds an excellent technique, so that his playing yesterday was entirely satisfying and enjoyable.

Miss Kaschoska sang the Isolde music in the "Liebestod." She was overweighted by her task, but she in no wise offended, which is in itself praise, for only the greatest dramatic singers can satisfy in this scene, and lesser vocalists do well if they succeed in not offending in it.

The popular concert this morning at 12 o'clock will be given in Music Hall instead of Festival Hall.

---

[160]

THE ENQUIRER.
CINCINNATI, O.
FRIDAY.....MAY 12, 1893.

GRANDEST,

And Last of the Concerts,

Was That Given By the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

It Was Heard By a Cultured and Fashionable Audience—Other Society Events.

The concert given last evening at Music Hall by the famous Symphony Orchestra from Boston, attracted an audience large in numbers, and truly representative of the wealth and culture of music-loving citizens. The Ladies' Musical Club, of this city, which was instrumental in effecting this concert, deserves the warmest thanks from every one fortunate enough to partake of the really grand musical feast. The society people present appeared for the greater portion in evening dress, the gay tints displayed by the fair sex affording a pleasing contrast to the somberer colors of the gentlemen's toilets.

The stage on which the picked band of orchestral artists was seated had been decorated with many a potted plant of rare and costly growth, the back-ground consisting of the Apollo Club's sounding board, profuse with evergreens, the center being occupied with a large shield, on which the monogram of the Ladies' Musical Club (L. M. C.) was displayed in scarlet colors.

Shortly after 8 o'clock Mr. Franz Kneisel, the temporary successor to Mr. Arthur Nikisch, commenced the king of overtures, Beethoven's Leonore No 3.

The opening measures told at once the superior make-up of the orchestra. Such magnificent tone as given by the strings was a delight to experience, and while Cincinnati has lately heard many really excellent orchestral organizations, the work of the Boston Orchestra must be considered as the very acme of artistic excellence. The wood, wind and brass section of the band deserve also a word of praise, although they do not show at all times the artistic finesse of the strings.

The rendition of the overture was given with all the expression possible in this masterpiece of Beethoven, the closing strains of a character almost frantic with joy being given with fine effect. The concerto for violin by Saint-Saens introduced Mr. C. M. Loeffler, the excellent concertmeister of the orchestra. He performed in a manner to entitle him a place among the great artists of the age.

Mr. Loeffler's rendition of the concerto aroused the greatest enthusiasm, being called out four times. An encore, however, was not given. The third number consisted in the poetic prelude and finale from "Tristan and Isolde," by Wagner. The finale introduced Miss Felicia Kaschoska, who undertook the role of Isolde. Miss Kaschoska is a magnificent vocalist, of considerable dramatic fervor, but hardly powerful enough to cope with the gigantic orchestration.

Miss Kaschoska has been heard here in selections of a lighter character at one of the Sunday Pops, when she had a better opportunity to display her vocal accomplishments. Enough has been heard of this artist to firmly establish her reputation as a first-class soloist. The closing numbers consisted of Berlioz's "Menuet des Feu Follets" and "Valse des Sylphes" and the Tschaikowsky Symphony No. 5 in E minor. These compositions gave the orchestra a fine chance for display, as they abound in the bizarre and peculiar effects with which modern orchestral writers love to color their tone paintings.

The entire concert was a most enjoyable one, and made a fitting close to a very interesting concert season. Mr. Kneisel, the present conductor, manages his forces very acceptably, and had Mr. Nikisch been present the concert could not have been given more satisfactorily, although there were opinions expressed that Mr. Nikisch's magnetic personality might have enthused the fashionable audience to a higher pitch. Among those present were:

Mr. Hobart and family, Mr. Howard Hinkle and family, Drs. A. and G. Ehrmann, Mr. B. Ehrmann, Mr. H. Roelker and lady, Mr. G. L. Nattier and lady, Mr. Rawson and lady, Mr. Howard Douglass, Mr. Stadler and lady, Mr. Mack and lady, Mr. Chatfield, Mr. James E. Murray, Miss Armstrong, Mr. and Mrs. E. W. Glover, Mr. C. Carl, Mr. E. Roth and lady, Mr. B. W. Foley, Mr. Louis Ehrgott and lady, Mr. O. Ehrgott and lady, Mr. Fenton Lawson and lady, Mr. Chapman Johnson, Mr. M. Fletcher, Dr. Lindsay, Mr. and Mrs. L. A. Strobel, Mr. and Mrs. F. Tuchfarber, Mr. Maxwell, Mr. E. Murphy and lady, Mr. Kuhn, Mr. Seasongood.

---

of the first and middle movements seemed to have real dignity, forcefulness and beauty, the harmonization seemed varied and effective, and, especially in several places in which Mr. Phippen employs canonic imitation, the soundness of his taste and training were displayed in a manner that must have been gratifying to Dr. Dvorak and his fellow-jurors.

Mr. Bullard's suite for strings contained four movements: An Adagio, Theme and Variations, Funeral March and Rondo. The most ambitious of the movements, which tested the learning and ingenuity of the composer with the greatest severity and yielded the most points for criticism, was the Theme and Variations; the most excellent in thought and workmanship was the Funeral March, the effect of which Mr. Bullard unfortunately weakened very materially by repetition, and by tacking on a coda built on a pedal point after he had said all that he had to say, and had come to finis gracefully and naturally. The variations, with two exceptions, were a little wanting in variety, but there were points in the harmonization and in the part writing which were well worthy of being singled out for praise. The exceptions were the last two variations, in the first of which Mr. Bullard provided the spectacle so common in modern musical literature, of a composer who plunges boldly into a fugue and then incontinently drops it immediately he has accomplished the feat of getting in his four voices. The last variation was a cleverly handled rapid dance of the tarantelle order.

Mr. Parker's cantata had the advantage of a better performance than any of the other works, but it is also better music, and a large share of the credit for the better performance must go to him, for he was also the conductor. The cantata is a setting—one of many which the poem has received—of Emanuel Geibel's "Dream King and His Love." Mr. Parker has conceived his task in the spirit of narrative ballad rather than that of the drama, but he has nevertheless succeeded most admirably in the delineation of passing moods by means of harmonic and orchestral devices. His music is exceedingly well scored, fluent and melodious, and goes to its purpose with a directness which speaks of conscious strength. In it there was obvious, for the first time in the exhibition concert, a harmonious and mutually complemental union of willing and doing.—H. E. Krehbiel in New York Tribune.

MUSIC IN BOSTON.

ORCHESTRA CONCERTS.

At the concert of the Symphony Orchestra on March 25, these works were played:

Wagner: Overture, "Tannhaeuser." Raff: "The Fairy of Love," Op. 67, violin and orchestra. Gilson: "The Sea," symphonic sketches. Goldmark: "Rustic Wedding," symphony.

Only three movements of Gilson's suite were played, the portion called "The Tempest"—what would a sea tune be without a storm?—being omitted. The parts given have their pleasing moments, but more on account of their splendid and expressive coloring than for any distinct musical ideas in them. Raff's work had been played here by Sarasate with pianoforte accompaniment. The orchestra gives some go to the work, but Raff's tendency to keep on saying something after you think he is all through is as apparent as in many of his compositions, and is not relieved by the neatness of his orchestral writing. Mr. Roth played the solo part. At the concert of April 1, this was the program: Tschaikowsky: Overture-fantasy, "Romeo and Juliet." Liszt: Second pianoforte concerto, played by Mr. F. B. Busoni. Bach: Prelude, "Adagio and Gavotte" from violin sonatas, arranged for string band by Bachrich. Beethoven: Fourth symphony.

Nothing new in all this, but nevertheless the concert was a specially brilliant occasion. On April 8 came this variety: Margaret R. Lang: Dramatic overture, No. 2. Haydn: Symphony, C minor, No. 9, B. & H. Moszkowski: Two movements from first suite. Dvorak: Scherzo capriccioso, Op. 66. Mr. Max Heinrich sang an aria from Spohr's "Faust" and two songs by Schubert.

Miss Lang's work is an ingeniously devised and constructed composition with evidences of thought at every turn. This is a sweeping compliment which says almost nothing definite about the effort. But the necessity of brevity prevents further comment at this moment. It is a pleasant thing to add that a second hearing would, I am sure, be warmly granted by all who were present on this occasion. The pieces by Moszkowski and Dvorak are full of charm for their brilliancy and neatness of workmanship. The concert of April 15 had this program: Schumann: Overture to "Manfred." Brahms: Violin concerto, Op. 77. F. B. Busoni. Symphonic tone poem, MS. Weber: Overture to "Oberon."

The novelty was Mr. Busoni's "poem," dedicated to Mr. Nikisch and its first performance anywhere. No clue to the composer's purpose was furnished on the program or otherwise, bnt I have since learned by chance that a poem by Lenau was the inspiring cause. This poem says in effect that it makes mighty little difference how and where you die. With the ennnciation this highly original idea is incorporated a catalogue of the various ways for you to get out of this world—heroic and ignoble, active and passive. In view of the fact that the work was received in grim silence it seems needless to add a word about it. Possibly it may have some value as a study of instrumentation, for there is hardly a device known since Berlioz's day that is not employed. If Verdi's anvils are not there and Gilmore's guns are mute it is only because of certain physical causes that prevented their appearance in Music Hall. Wagner was the only composer recognized on the night of April 22, when these extracts from the master's music dramas were heard: Overture to "Rienzi"; prelude to Act III, Dance of Apprentices, March of the Mastersingers, and Homage to Hans Sach, from "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg"; prelude and first scene from "Das Rheingold" (the Rheindaughters and Alberich). Woglinde, Miss Felicia Kaschoska; Wellgunde, Mrs. Arthur Nikisch; Flosshilde, Miss Louise Leimer; Alberich, Mr. Heinrich Meyn; Siegfried passing through the fire, from "Siegfried," Act III, Scene 2, and Morning Dawn, also Siegfried's Voyage up the Rhine, from "Goetterdaemmerung," Act III, Scene 2; Bruenhilde's speech over Siegfried's body, from "Goetterdaemmerung," Act III, Scene 3.

The twenty-fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given on April 29, brought the twelfth regular season of that organization to a close. It was also the last appearance of Mr. Nikisch as the conductor of the band, and of course there was an enormous audience. The program was made up of three symponies, to-wit: Mozart: No. 31, in D major, "Parisian." Schubert: B minor, "Unfinished." Beethoven: No. 3 in E flat major, "Heroic," Op. 55. When the concert was ended there was great enthusiasm, cheering, clapping of hands, thumping of canes and umbrellas and every other form of noisy demonstration of interest in a central figure common on such occasions, the figure this time being Mr. Nikisch, who came and went again and again, the audience meanwhile standing as though expectant of something. The orchestra, too, waited on the stage, also standing, until at last Mr. Nikisch came to the front and spoke. In well chosen words he expressed his high appreciation of the kindness shown him in Boston and in all the American cities he had visited, and paid his respects to the members of the orchestra, speaking of them in the warmest terms and commending them as soldiers whose loyalty he had always felt assured of and with whom he had always found a victory possible. He closed by expressing great regret that his generous patron had been put to so much trouble by his physical inability to complete the work of the season on the tour, and said that with his dear friend Kneisel in his place he had full confidence in the continued success of the orchestra.

It is a pity to be compelled to say unpleasant things of one parting from us, probably forever, and one for whom there had grown a wide respect, on personal as well as on artistic grounds. But the reference to his physical disability to go with the orchestra on its western tour may convey a false impression. The route and the engagements in the several cities were all known months ago. Furthermore, they were not essentially different from those of each of the three summers before when Mr. Nikisch had gone on these tours. At any rate, if the work laid out was in excess of previous tours there was abundant opportunity to arrange matters satisfactorily. Nothing was said, however, until the eleventh hour, when terms were submitted by the conductor to Col. Higginson which were so largely in excess of reason that they were at once rejected. The fact is the little Hungarian thought to make a corner on conductors. He has succeeded in deranging matters and causing much disappointment; for instance, the concerts in Montreal and Toronto have been canceled, as Mr. Kneisel, who will hold the baton on this tour, was unwilling to risk a concert without special rehearsal, and these Canada concerts were appointed for very early dates in May, at the actual beginning of the tour. Altogether sixteen concerts had been laid out, and twelve of these had been sold. The withdrawal of Mr. Nikisch's name may make a difference in some places, but I am inclined to believe that the effect of it will not extend far.

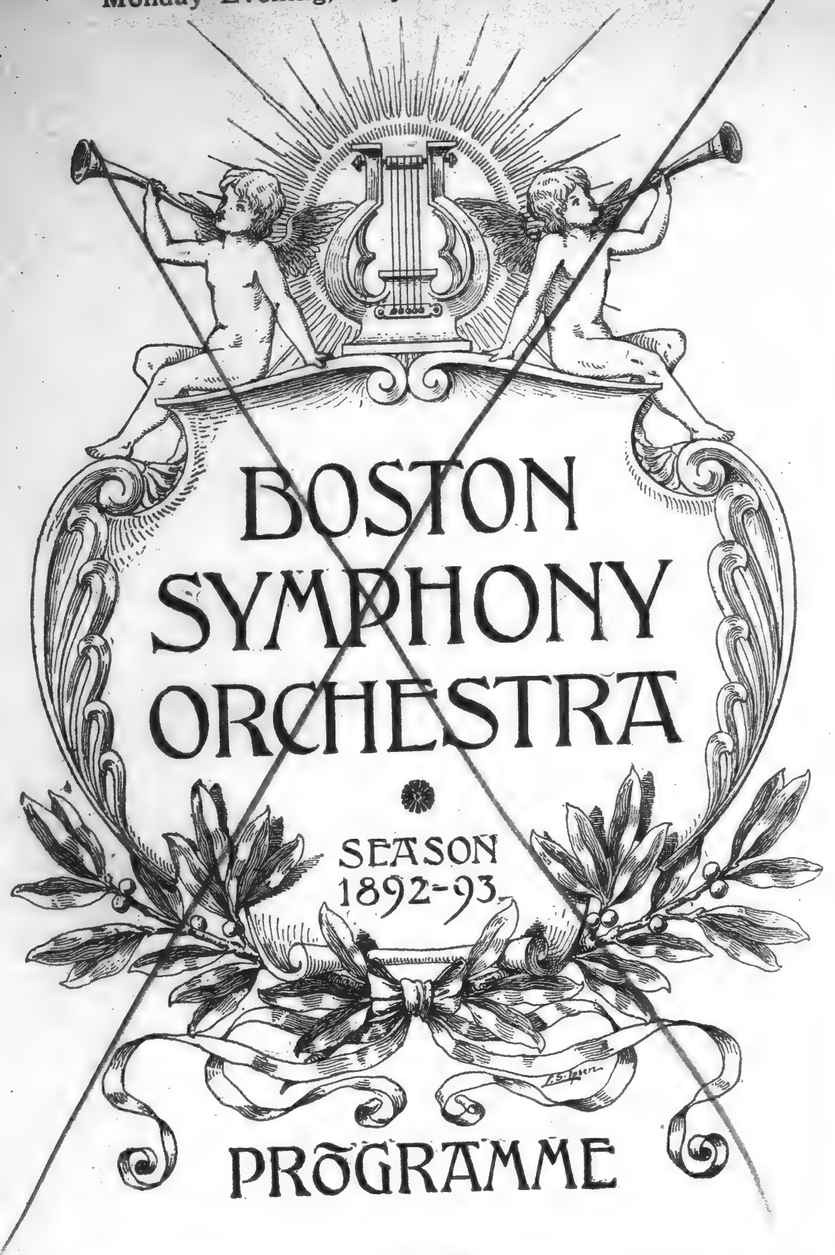
REPERTORY—SEASON 1892–93.

D'ALBERT.	Symphony No. 1, in F major, Op. 4 (first time).
BACH.	Orchestral suite in D minor.
	Præludium, adagio and gavotte, arranged for string orchestra by Bachrich.
BEETHOVEN.	Symphony No. 5, in C minor, Op. 67.
	Symphony No. 2, in D major, Op. 36.
	Symphony No. 8, in F major, Op. 93.
	Symphony No. 9, in D minor (choral), Op. 125. (Priscilla White, Louisa Leimer, William J. Winch and Heinrich Meyn.)
	Overture, "Leonore," No. 3, Op. 72.
	Overture, "Coriolan," Op. 62.
	Symphony No 7, in A major, Op. 92.
	Symphony No. 4, in B flat major, Op. 60.
	Symphony No. 3, in E flat major ("Eroica"). Op. 55.
BERLIOZ.	Minuet of Will-o'-the-wisps and Waltz of Sylphs from the "Damnation of Faust," Op. 24.
	Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini," Op. 23.
	Overture, "Le Carnaval Romain," Op. 9.
BIZET.	Suite No. 1 from "L'Arlesienne," Nos. 1, 2, 3 and 4.
BRAHMS.	Symphony No 3, in F major, Op. 90.
	"Song of Destiny," Op. 54.
	Symphony No. 4, in E minor, Op. 98.
	Concerto for violin in D major, Op. 77. (Franz Kneisel.)
BRUCH.	Concerto for violin, No. 1, in G minor, Op. 26. (Henri Marteau.)
BUSONI.	Symphonic tone poem (MS., first time).
DAVIDOFF.	Concerto for violoncello, No. 3 (first time). (Alwin Schroeder.)
DVORAK.	Suite in D major, Op. 39.
	Dramatic overture, "Husitska," Op. 67. First time in Boston.
	Symphony No. 2, in D minor, Op. 70.
	"Scherzo Capriccioso," Op. 66.
ERNST.	Concerto for violin in F sharp minor, Op. 23. (Timothee Adamowski.)
FOOTE.	"The Skeleton in Armor," Op. 28 (first time). (Marie Barnard-Smith, Lillian Carlsmith, George J. Parker and Clarence E. Hay.)
GADE.	Symphony No. 4, in B flat major, Op. 20.
GILSON.	"La Mer," symphonic sketches, Nos. 1, 2 and 3. First time in Boston.
GOLDMARK.	Overture, "Spring," in A major, Op. 36.
	Symphony, "Rustic Wedding," Op. 23.
GOUNOD.	"La Vision de Jeanne d'Arc," characteristic piece for violin and orchestra. (Henri Marteau.)
GRIEG.	Suite No. 2 from the music to "Peer Gynt," Op. 55.
HAYDN.	Symphony in B flat major, Breitkopf & Haertel Ed., No. 12.
	Symphony in C minor, Breitkopf & Haertel Ed., No. 9.
HUMPERDINK.	Humoreske (first time).
LALO.	Overture, "Le Roi d'Ys."
LANG, MARGARET RUTHVEN.	Dramatic overture No. 2, Op. 12 (MS., first time).
LISZT.	"Die Loreley," song with orchestra. (Emma Juch.)
	Symphonic poem No. 2, "Tasso, Lamento e Trionfo."
	"Mephisto Waltz," episode from Lenau's "Faust."
	Concerto for pianoforte, No. 2, in A major. (Ferruccio B. Busoni.)
MACDOWELL.	Concerto for pianoforte, No. 1, in A minor, Op. 15. (E. A. MacDowell.)
	Two symphonic poems, "Hamlet" and "Ophelia."
MENDELSSOHN.	Symphony No. 4, in A major ("Italian"), Op. 90.
	Overture to "Fingal's Cave," Op. 36.
MOSZKOWSKI.	Suite No. 1, in F major, Op. 39, Nos. 3 and 5.
MOZART.	Letter aria from "Don Giovanni." (Mme. Basta-Tavary.)
	Symphony in D major, without minuet ("Parisian").
NICOLAI.	Overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor."
PADEREWSKI.	Concerto for pianoforte, in A minor, Op. 17. (Ignace J. Paderewski.)
PAINE.	"Columbus March and Hymn."
RAFF.	Symphony No. 3, in F major ("Im Walde"), Op. 153.
	"La Fee d'Amour," characteristic piece for violin and orchestra, Op. 67. (Otto Roth.) First time at these concerts.
REINECKE.	Overture to "King Manfred."
RIEMENSCHNEIDER.	"Dance of Death" (new, first time).
RUBINSTEIN.	Concerto for pianoforte, No. 4, in D minor, Op. 70. (Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler.)
SAINT-SAENS.	Concerto for pianoforte, No. 4, in C minor, Op. 44. (Carl Stasny.)
	Symphony No. 2, in A minor, Op. 55.
	Concerto for pianoforte, No. 2, in G minor, Op. 22. (George M. Nowell.)
	Concerto for violin, No. 1, in A major, Op. 20. (C. M. Loeffler.)
SCHARWENKA, PHILIPP.	Symphonic poem, "Fruehlingswogen," Op. 87. First time in Boston.
SCHUBERT.	"Gruppe aus dem Tartarus,"—"Die Allmacht." (Max Heinrich.)
	Unfinished symphony in B minor.
SCHUMANN.	Symphony No. 2, in C major, Op. 64.
	Symphony No. 1, in B flat major, Op. 38.
	Symphony No. 3, in E flat major ("Rhenish"), Op. 97.
	Overture, "Manfred," Op. 115.
SPOHR.	Recitative and aria, "Der Hoelle Selbst," from "Faust." (Max Heinrich.)
SVENDSEN.	Legend for orchestra, "Zorahayda," Op. 11. First time in Boston.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, MONTREAL,

Monday Evening, May 1, 1893, at 8 o'clock.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1892-93.

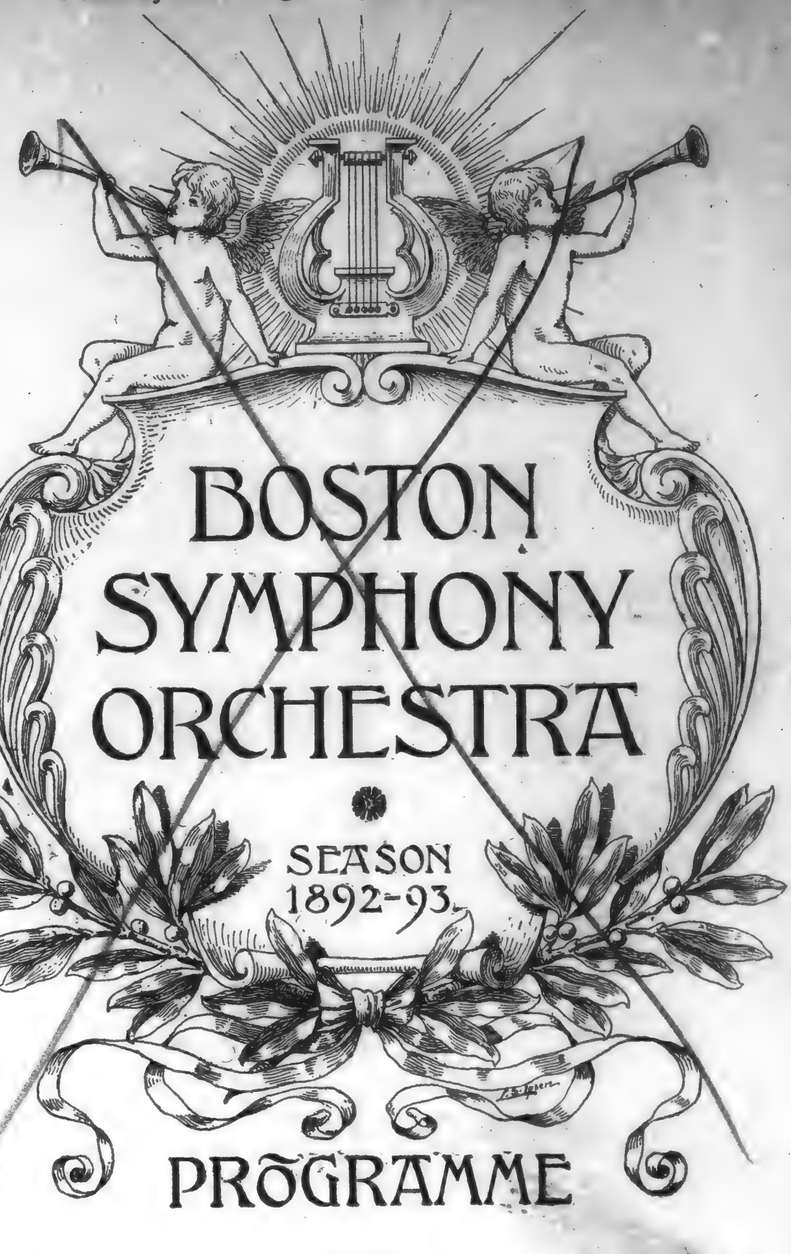
PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

Tickets on sale at Nordheimer's, on and after Monday, April 24.

GRAND OPERA HOUSE, TORONTO,

Tuesday Evening, May 2, 1893, at 8 o'clock.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1892-93.

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

Tickets on sale at Grand Opera House, on and after Tuesday, Apr. 25.

LYCEUM THEATRE, ... ROCHESTER,

Wednesday Evening, May 3, 1893, at 8 o'clock.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1892-93

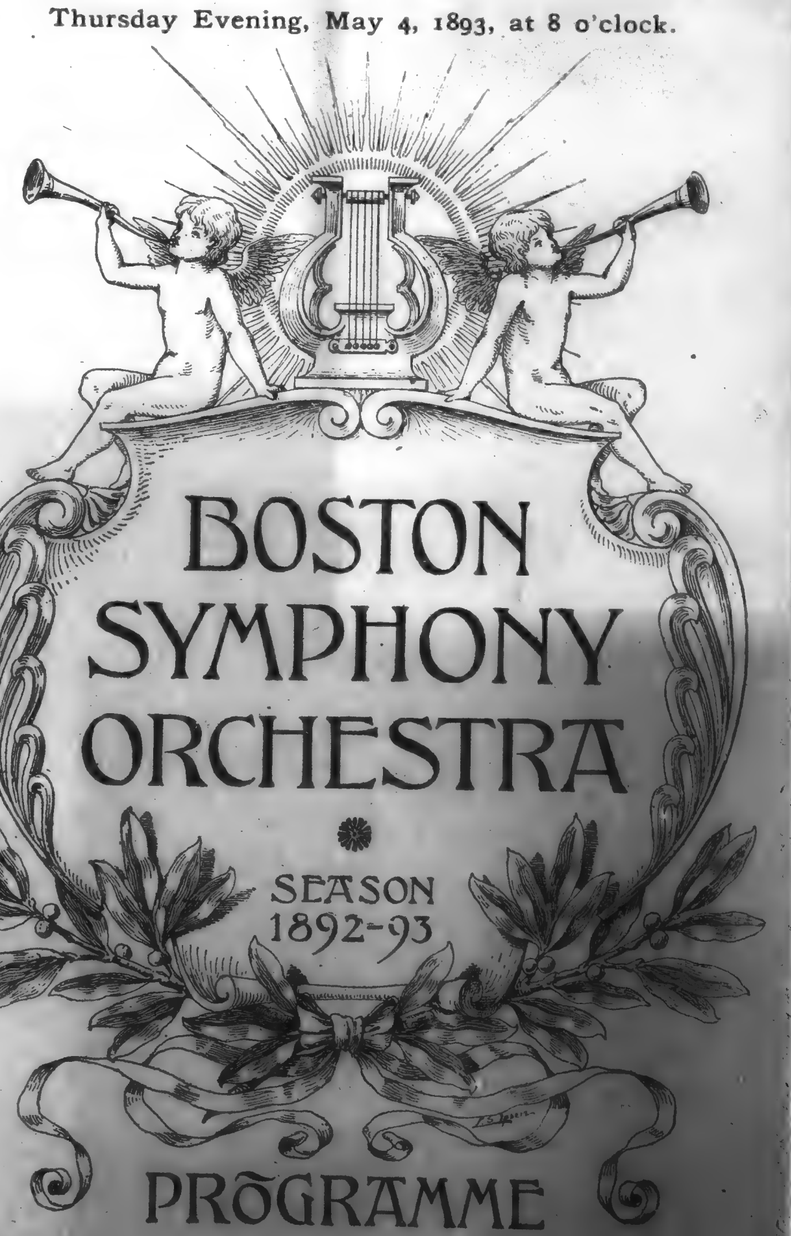
PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

Tickets on sale at the Lyceum Theatre, on and after Thursday, April 27.

MUSIC HALL, ... BUFFALO,

Thursday Evening, May 4, 1893, at 8 o'clock.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1892-93

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager. F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

[162]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

OLD CITY HALL,
PITTSBURGH.

Friday Evening, May 5.
Saturday Evening, May 6.

. . SEVENTH TOUR . .

TWO GRAND CONCERTS BY THE MOZART CLUB,
Mr. JAS. P. McCOLLUM, Director,

. . . AND THE . . .

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1892-93

PROGRAMME

Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL, Conductor.

. . . SOLOISTS . . .

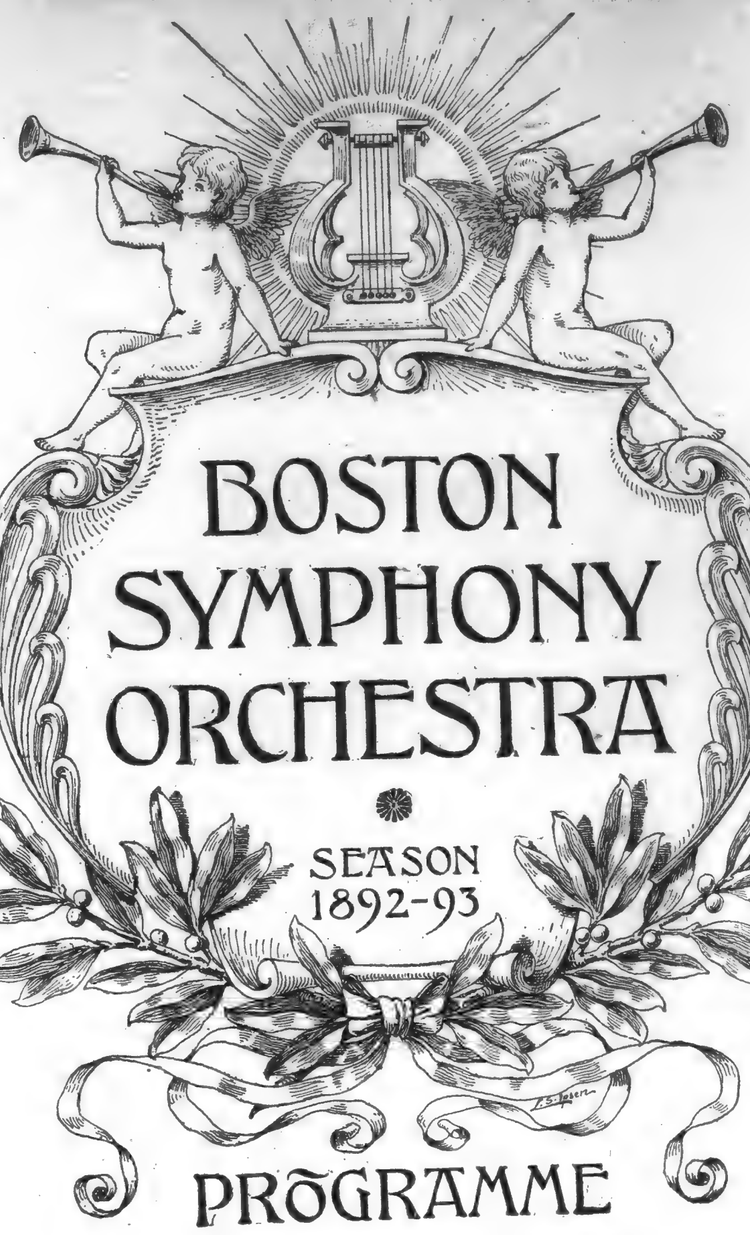
Miss FELICIA KASCHOSKA, Dramatic Soprano, from the Metropolitan Opera House.
Mr. C. M. LOEFFLER, Violin.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager. F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

For Particulars as to the Sale of Tickets, see Daily Papers.

MUSIC HALL, ... CLEVELAND,

Monday Evening, May 8, 1893, at 8 o'clock.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1892-93

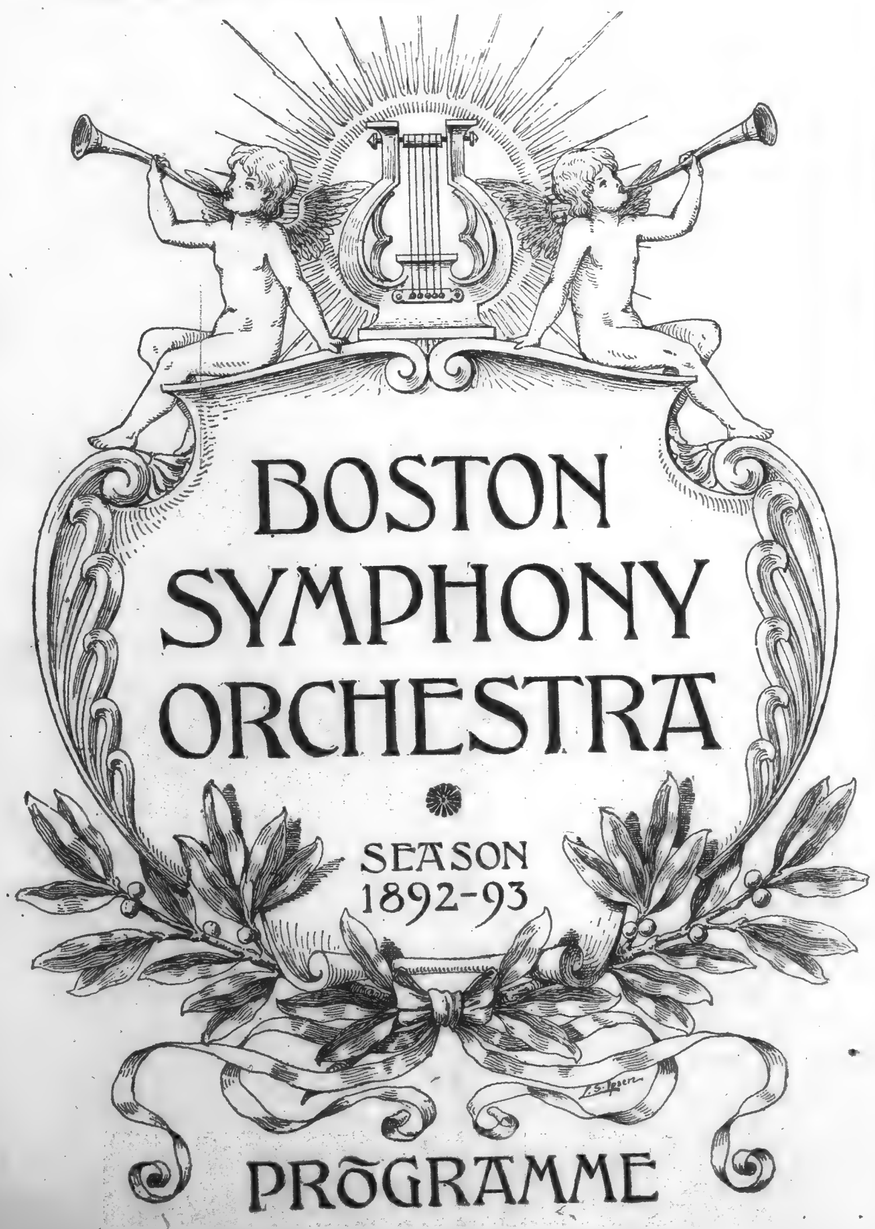
PROGRAMME

Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL, Conductor.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager. F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

HENRIETTA THEATRE, . . . COLUMBUS,

Wednesday Evening, May 10, 1893, at 8 o'clock.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1892-93

PROGRAMME

Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL, Conductor.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager. F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

MUSIC HALL, ... CINCINNATI.

Thursday Evening, May 11, 1893, at 8 o'clock.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1892-93

PROGRAMME

Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL, Conductor.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager. F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

AMPHITHEATRE AUDITORIUM, - LOUISVILLE.

DANIEL QUILP, Proprietor and Manager.

Friday Evening, May 12, 1893, at 8 o'clock.

Saturday Afternoon, May 13, 1893, at 2.30 o'clock.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1892-93

PROGRAMME

Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL, Conductor.

C. A ELLIS, Manager. F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

HARTMAN HALL, . . . GRAND RAPIDS,

Wednesday Evening, May 17, 1893, at 8 o'clock.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1892-93

PROGRAMME

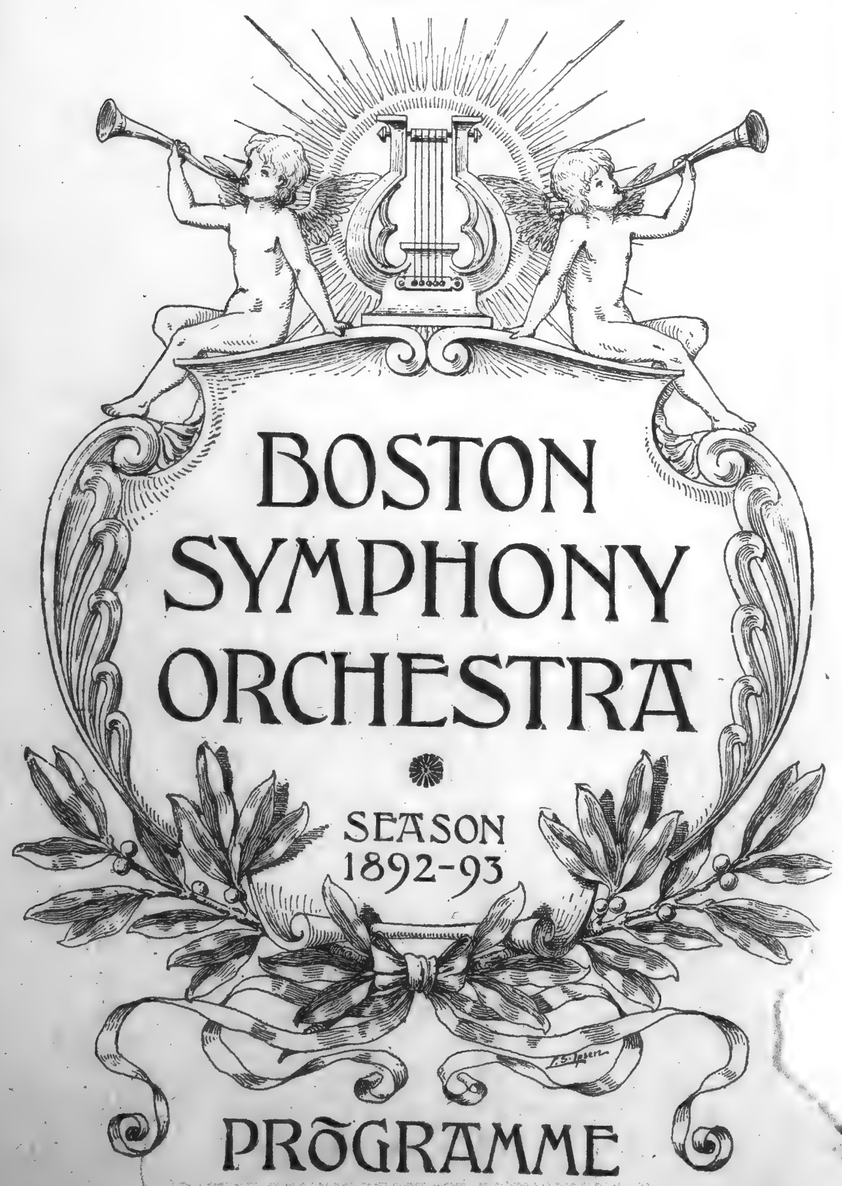
Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL, Conductor.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager. F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, . . . MILWAUKEE,

Thursday Evening, May 18, 1893, at 8 o'clock.

Under the auspices of the Arion Club.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1892-93

PROGRAMME

Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL, Conductor.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager. F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

UNIVERSITY HALL, ... ANN ARBOR,

Friday Evening, May 19, 1893, at 8 o'clock.

UNIVERSITY MUSICAL SOCIETY.

FRANCIS W. KELSEY, PH. D., PRESIDENT. ALBERT A. STANLEY, A.M., DIRECTOR.

Choral Union Series, 1892-1893.

FOURTH SEASON. FIFTH CONCERT. COMPLETE SERIES NO. XXII.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1892-93

PROGRAMME

Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL, Conductor.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager. F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

Grand Wagner Concert, Choral Union (280 voices), Eminent Soloists and Full Orchestra,
MAY 31, 1893.

164

AMPHITHEATRE AUDITORIUM, - LOUISVILLE.

DANIEL QUILP, Proprietor and Manager.

Friday Evening, May 12, 1893, at 8 o'clock.

Saturday Afternoon, May 13, 1893, at 2.30 o'clock.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORC

PR

Mr. FRA

C. A ELLIS, Manager.

HARTMAN HALL, . . . GRAND RAPIDS,

Wednesday Evening, May 17, 1893, at 8 o'clock.

BOSTON SYMPHONY RCHESTRA

SEASON 1892-93

ROGRAMME

RANZ KNEISEL, Conductor.

F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

World's Columbian Exposition.

CHICAGO : MAY-OCTOBER : 1893.

TUESDAY, MAY 16,
AT THREE O'CLOCK . . .

Music Hall Series

No. 7.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA . . .

Conductor, - MR. FRANZ KNEISEL

Soloists, - - { MR. ALWIN SCHROEDER
MISS FELICE KASCHOSKA

. . . Programme.

Overture, "Leonore," No. 3, - - - Beethoven

Symphony No. 2, in C major, Op. 61, - - Schumann

Sostenuto Assai.—Allegro ma non Troppe.
Scherzo—(Allegro Vivace).
Adagio Expressivo.
Allegro Molto Vivace.

Concerto for Violoncello and Orchestra, - - Saint-Saens

First and Second Movements.
MR. SCHROEDER.

Prelude and Closing Scene, "Tristan and Isolde," - Wagner

ISOLDE, - - MISS KASCHOSKA.

"Siegfried's Rhine Journey," from "Goetterdaemmerung," Wagnre

Overture, "Tannhaeuser," - - - - Wagner

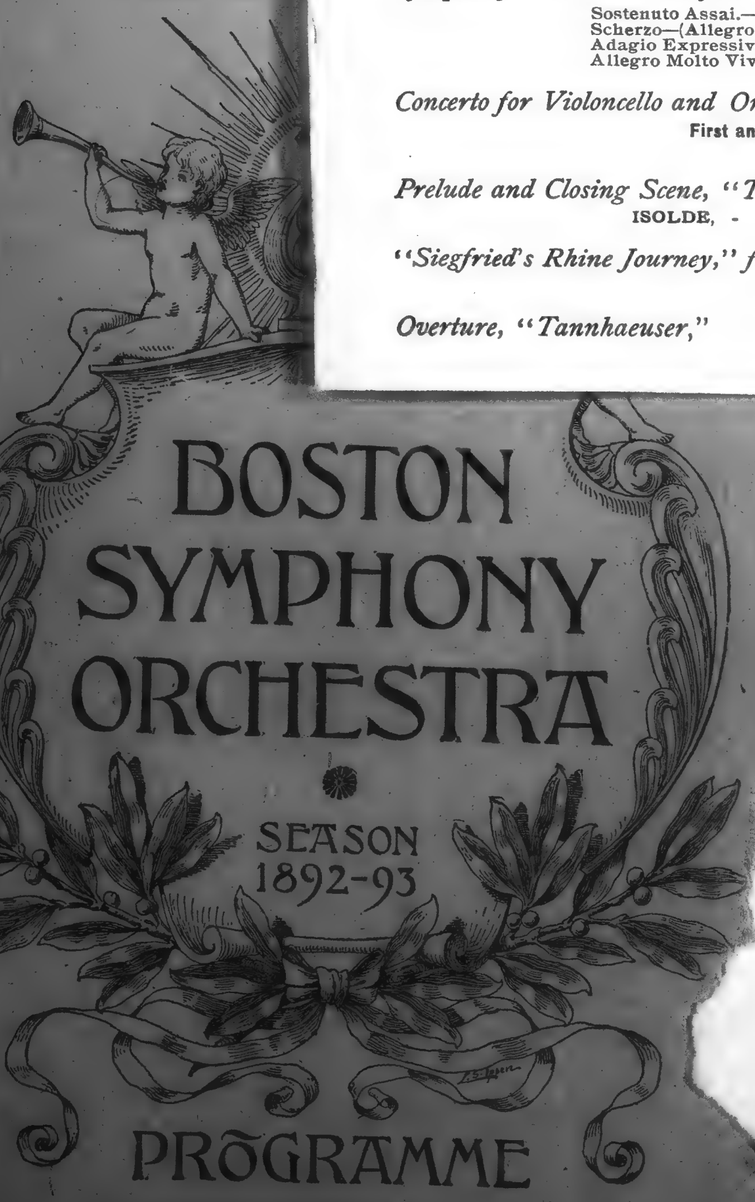
ACADEMY OF MUSIC,

Thursday Evening,

Under the aus



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1892-93

PROGRAMME

Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL, Conductor.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager. F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

[164]

, ... ANN ARBOR,

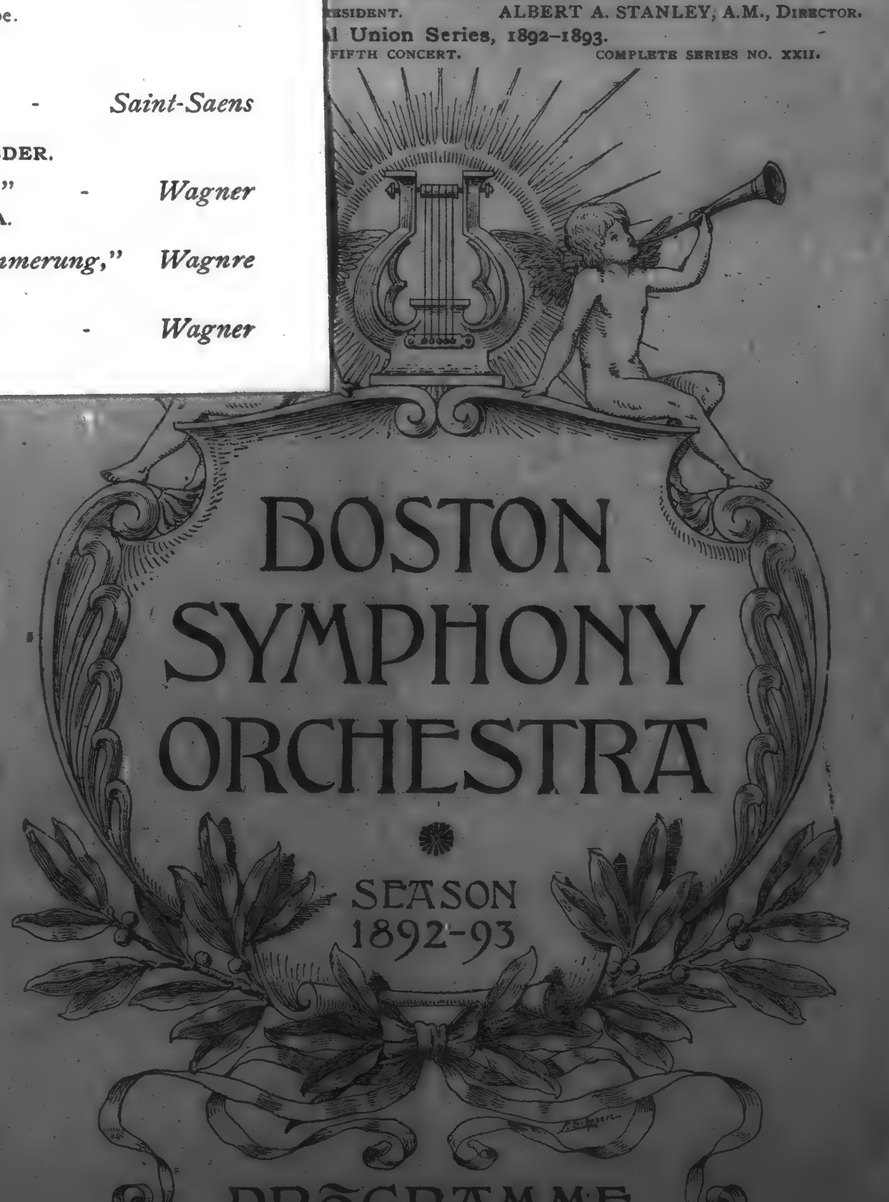
ng, May 19, 1893, at 8 o'clock.

SITY MUSICAL SOCIETY.

RESIDENT. ALBERT A. STANLEY, A.M., DIRECTOR.

l Union Series, 1892–1893.

FIFTH CONCERT. COMPLETE SERIES NO. XXII.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1892-93

PROGRAMME

Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL, Conductor.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager. F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

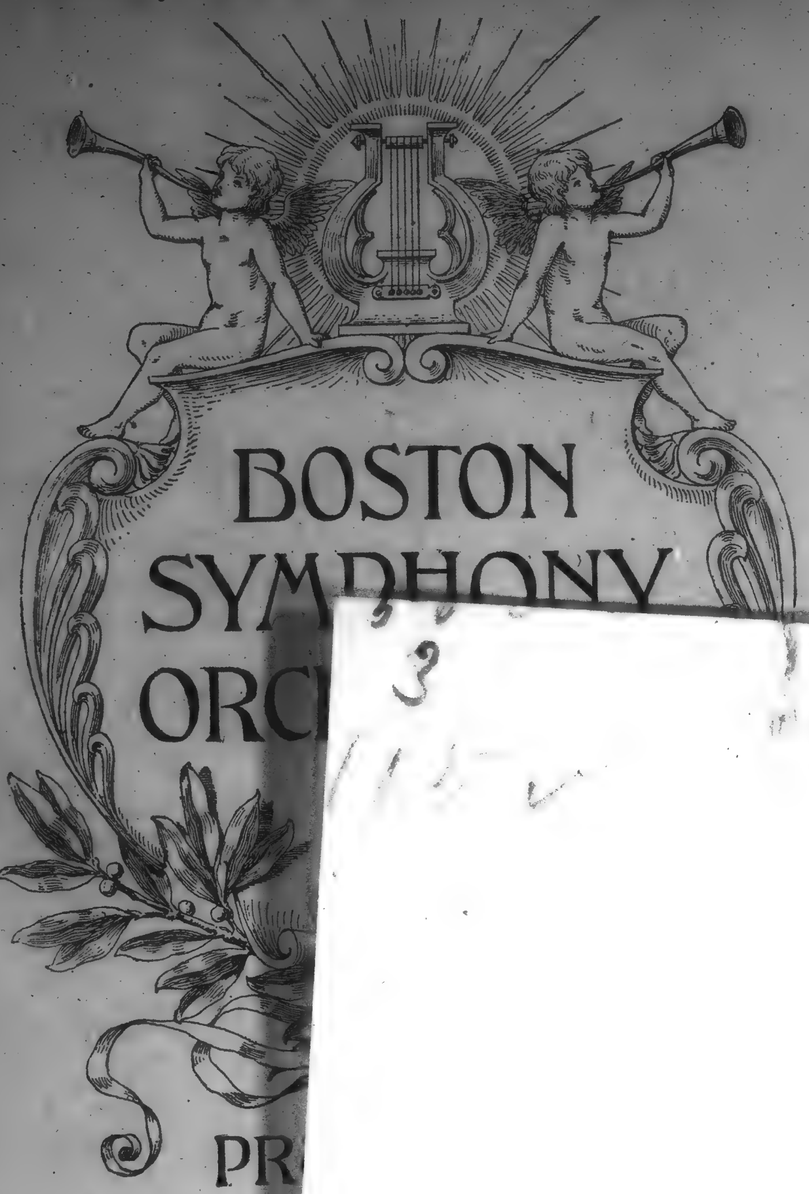
Grand Wagner Concert, Choral Union (280 voices), Eminent Soloists and Full Orchestra,
MAY 31, 1893.

AMPHITHEATRE AUDITORIUM, - LOUISVILLE.

DANIEL QUILP, Proprietor and Manager.

Friday Evening, May 12, 1893, at 8 o'clock.

Saturday Afternoon, May 13, 1893, at 2.30 o'clock.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORC

PR

Mr. FRA

C. A ELLIS, Manager.

3

HARTMAN HALL, . . . GRAND RAPIDS,

Wednesday Evening, May 17, 1893, at 8 o'clock.

BOSTON SYMPHONY RCHESTRA

SEASON 1892-93

PROGRAMME

FRANZ KNEISEL, Conductor.

r. F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC

Thursday Evenin

Under the

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1892-93

PROGRAMME

Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL, Conductor.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager. F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

[16.4]

LL, ... ANN ARBOR,

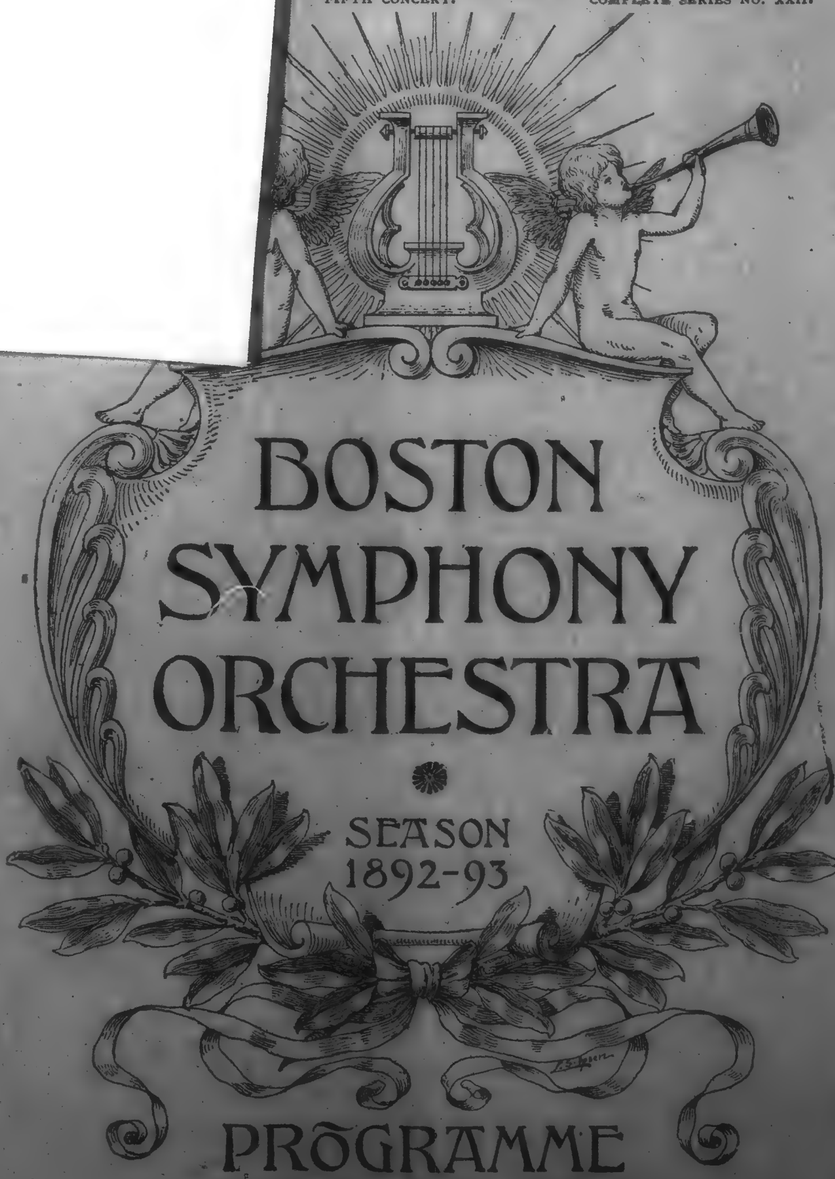
ning, May 19, 1893, at 8 o'clock.

RSITY MUSICAL SOCIETY.

PRESIDENT. ALBERT A. STANLEY, A.M., DIRECTOR.

oral Union Series, 1892–1893.

FIFTH CONCERT. COMPLETE SERIES NO. XXII.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1892-93

PROGRAMME

Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL, Conductor.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager. F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

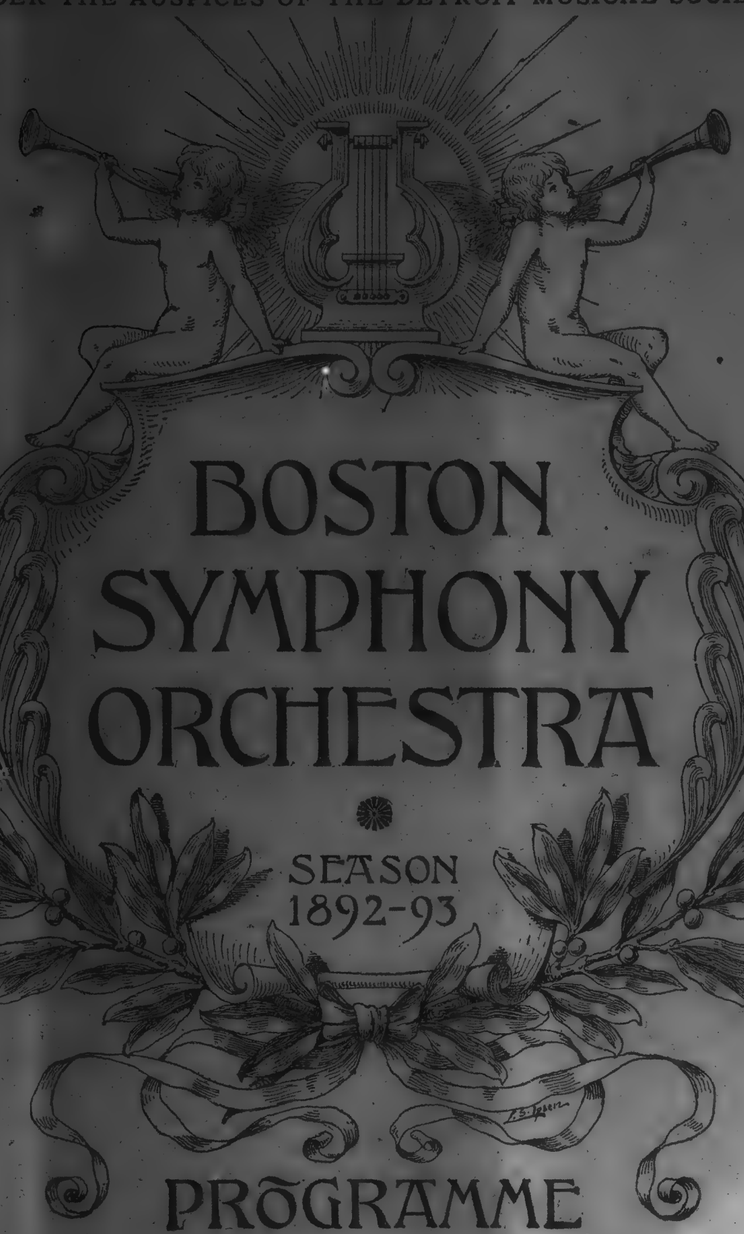
Grand Wagner Concert, Choral Union (280 voices), Eminent Soloists and Full Orchestra,
MAY 31, 1893.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

THE AUDITORIUM, ... DETROIT,

Saturday Evening, May 20, 1893, at 8 o'clock.

UNDER THE AUSPICES OF THE DETROIT MUSICAL SOCIETY.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1892-93

PROGRAMME

Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL, Conductor.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager. F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

193D RECEPTION,

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, MAY 5TH, 1893,

EXPOSITION RECITAL HALL.

THE KNEISEL QUARTETTE.

PROGRAMME.

[165]

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Armory
TOLEDO, OHIO.

Season of 1892-93.

Tuesday Evening, May 9, 1893, at 8:00.

☆ ☆ ☆ ☆

PROGRAMME

☆ ☆ ☆ ☆

WAGNER, ... Overture, "Tannhaeuser."

BEETHOVEN, . . Leonore's Grand Aria from "Fidelio."

SCHUBERT, ... Unfinished Symphony, in B minor.

I. Allegro Moderato (B Minor)
II. Andante con moto (E major)

HANDEL, ... Largo.

Arranged for violin solo, harp, violins in unison, and full orchestra, by Hellmesberger.

Soli for Violoncello.

a. C. REINECKE, ... Romanza.

b. KLENGEL, ... Capriccio.

WAGNER, ... Elizabeth's Aria,
From "Tannhaeuser" "O Lovely Halls."

LISZT, ... Symphonic Poem, "Les Preludes."

Andante (G major)
Andante marcato (G major)
Allegro ma non troppo (A minor)
Allegretto pastorale (A major)
Allegro marziale animato (G major)
Andante maestoso (G major)

Soloists: MISS FELICIA KASCHOSKA, MR. FRANZ KNEISEL, MR. ALWIN SCROEDER.

☞ See Street Car Arrangements on Page 3. ☜

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

THE AUDITORIUM, ... DETROIT,

Saturday Evening, May 20, 1893, at 8 o'clock.

UNDER THE AUSPICES OF THE DETROIT MUSICAL SOCIETY.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1892-93

PROGRAMME

Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL, Conductor.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager. F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

193D RECEPTION,

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, MAY 5TH, 1893,

EXPOSITION RECITAL HALL.

THE KNEISEL QUARTETTE.

PROGRAMME.

[165]

The Armory
TOLEDO, OHIO.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Season of 1892-93

Tuesday Evening, May 9, 1893, at 8:00.

PROGRAMME

WAGNER, ... Overture, "Tannhaeuser."

BEETHOVEN, . . Leonore's Grand Aria from "Fidelio."

SCHUBERT, ... Unfinished Symphony, in B minor.

I. Allegro Moderato (B Minor)
II. Andante con moto (E major)

HANDEL, ... Largo.

Arranged for violin solo, harp, violins in unison, and full orchestra, by Hellmesberger.

Soli for Violoncello.

a. C. REINECKE, ... Romanza.

b. KLENGEL, ... Capriccio.

WAGNER, ... Elizabeth's Aria, From "Tannhaeuser" "O Lovely Halls."

LISZT, ... Symphonic Poem, "Les Preludes."

Andante (G major)
Andante marcato (G major)
Allegro ma non troppo (A minor)
Allegretto pastorale (A major)
Allegro marziale animato (G major)
Andante maestoso (G major)

Soloists: MISS FELICIA KASCHOSKA, MR. FRANZ KNEISEL, MR. ALWIN SCROEDER.

☞ See Street Car Arrangements on Page 3. ☜

THE AUDITORIUM, ... DETROIT,

Saturday Evening, May 20, 1893, at 8 o'clock.

UNDER THE AUSPICES OF THE DETROIT MUSICAL SOCIETY.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1892-93

PROGRAMME

Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL, Conductor.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager. F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

THE KNEISEL QUARTETTE,

of Boston.

*

MR. FRANZ KNEISEL, ... First Violin.
MR. OTTO ROTH, ... Second Violin.
MR. LOUIS SVECENSKI, ... Viola.
MR. ALWIN SCHROEDER, ... Violoncello.

PROGRAMME.

*

Haydn: Quartette in D major.
a. Allegro moderato.
b. Adagio cantabile.
c. Menuetto; allegretto.
d. Presto.

Chopin: Nocturne.
Schubert: Moment Musicale.
Cossmann: Tarantelle.

MR. SCHROEDER.

Schumann: Quartette in A major, Op. 41, No. 3.
Second Movement.
Beethoven: Quartette in G major, Op. 18, No. 2.
a. Adagio.
b. Scherzo.

Svendsen: Romance.

MR. KNEISEL.

Schubert: Variations from Quartette in D minor.

Boston
Symphon
Orchestra

Tuesday Evening,

☆

PROG

☆

WAGNER, ...
BEETHOVEN, . . Le
SCHUBERT, ...
I. Allegro Mo
II. Andante co
HANDEL, ...
Arranged for violin solo, harp, violins
Soli
a. C. REINECKE, . . .
b. KLENGEL, ...
WAGNER, ...
Fro
LISZT, ...
Andante (G
Andante ma
Allegro ma
Allegretto p
Allegro ma
Andante ma

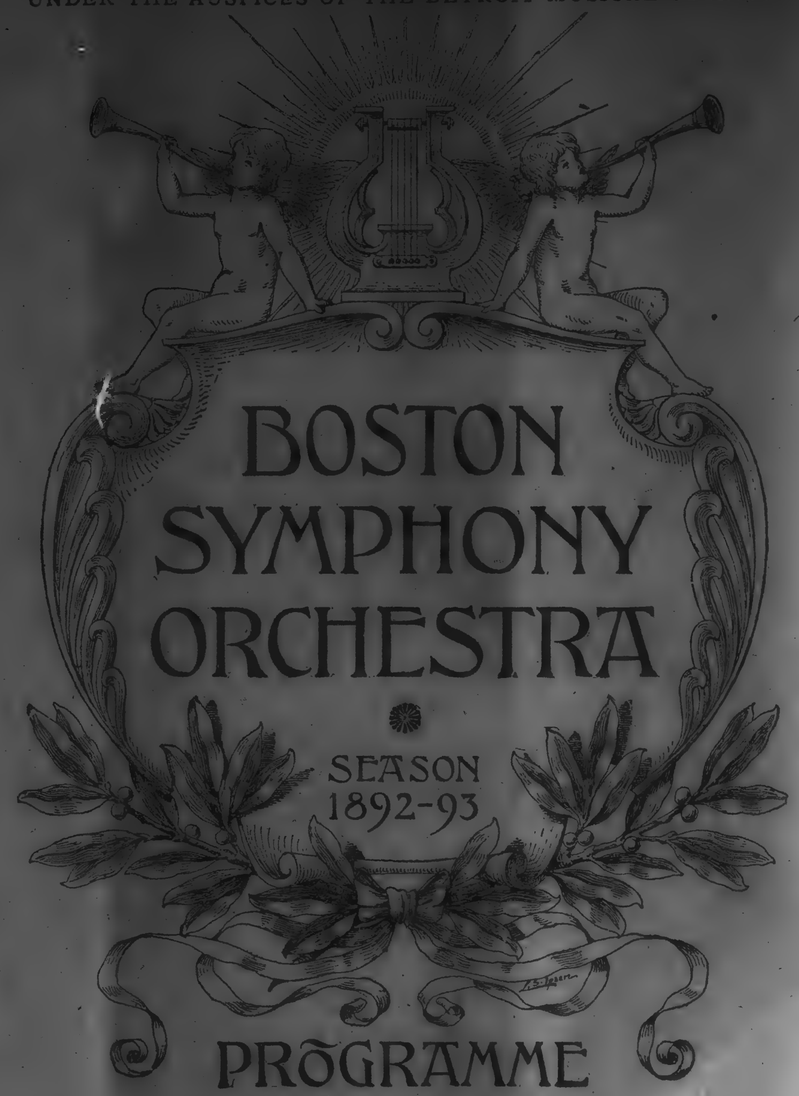
Soloists: { MIS
MR.
MR.

☞ See Street Ga

THE AUDITORIUM, ... DETROIT,

Saturday Evening, May 20, 1893, at 8 o'clock.

UNDER THE AUSPICES OF THE DETROIT MUSICAL SOCIETY.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1892-93

PROGRAMME

Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL, Conductor.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager. F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

W. V. DERMITT & CO. ENGRAVERS AND PRINTERS.

MR.
MR.
MR.
MR.

Boston
Symphon
Orchestra

Tuesday Evening,

☆

PROG

☆

WAGNER, ...

BEETHOVEN, . . Le

SCHUBERT, ...

I. Allegro Mo
II. Andante co

HANDEL, ...

Arranged for violin solo, harp, violins

Soli f

a. C. REINECKE, . .

b. KLENGEL, . . .

WAGNER, ...

Fro

LISZT, . , ...

Andante (C
Andante ma
Allegro ma
Allegretto p
Allegro mar
Andante ma

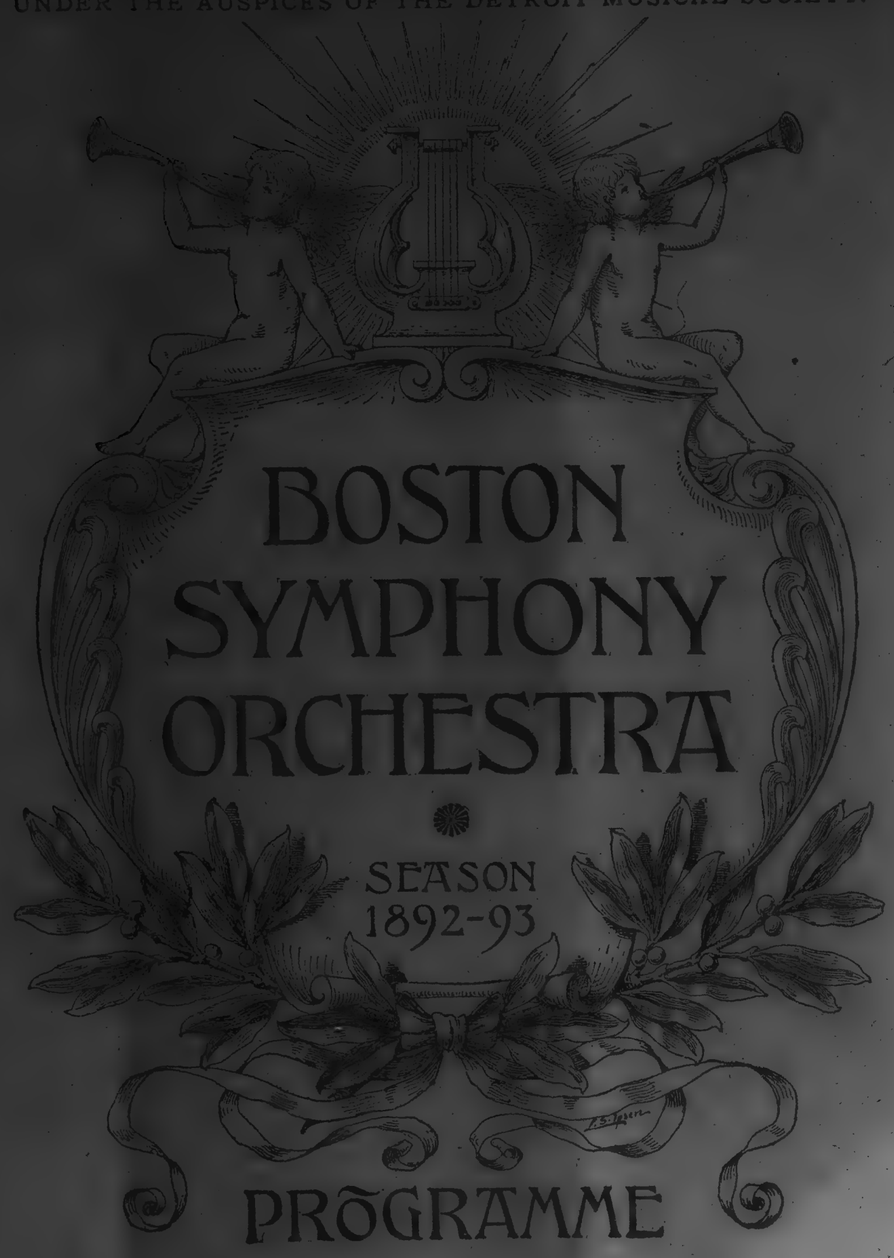
Soloists: { MIS
MR.
MR.

☞ See Street Ca

THE AUDITORIUM, ... DETROIT,

Saturday Evening, May 20, 1893, at 8 o'clock.

UNDER THE AUSPICES OF THE DETROIT MUSICAL SOCIETY.



PROGRAMME

Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL, Conductor.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager. F. R. COMBE

PAST AND PRESENT.

TIME alone fixes the true value of a piano, and settles all disputes as to merit; for without lasting qualities a musical instrument is of little account. People purchase a piano not only for this year, but expect satisfaction years hence. To insure this result care must be exercised in making the selection.

For twenty-three years this house has handled the famous Boardman & Gray Pianos, during which time thousands have been sold to careful and discriminating buyers, and the results have more than justified all claims made for them.

Side by side with Steinway, Chickering, and other high grade pianos, whose reputations were perhaps even greater, still the reliable BOARDMAN & GRAY outsold all competitors, until to-day no other first-class piano in this market can show a better record for durability, or count among its friends and purchasers so many musicians as the BOARDMAN & GRAY.

With a reputation wholly unpurchased, and selling only upon their merits as a strictly first class piano. We invite the careful attention of buyers to the BOARDMAN & GRAY, as possessing all that is desirable in a piano, and that, after many years of wear, can still be truly termed a musical instrument.

See the BOARDMAN & GRAY before buying.

THE WHITNEY & CURRIER COMPANY,

GENERAL AGENTS,

217 & 219 Summit Street, TOLEDO OHIO.

STREET CARS.

At close of this concert a large number of cars will be awaiting as follows:

CONSOLIDATED LINE.

Cars for Monroe street, Adams street, Dorr street, Broadway, Lower Summit street, Union Depot, Ohio Central Depot, Pennsylvania Depot, Oak street, Ironville and East Broadway, on Orange street at the entrance to the Armory.

Cars for Cherry street and Lagrange street will be at the intersection of Michigan and Cherry streets.

Cars for Lower Erie street and Nebraska avenue will be at the intersection of Superior and Orange streets. No transfer necessary.

TOLEDO ELECTRIC LINE.

Forty cars will be in readiness at John street and Canton avenue, one short block from the Armory, for the Union Depot direct, Indiana avenue, and Air Line Junction, the Belt Line by way of Monroe, and the Belt Line by way of Woodruff avenue, Vermont and Bancroft, Sherman street, Mulberry and Cherry street line. No transfer necessary.

THE AUDITORIUM, ... DETROIT,

Saturday Evening, May 20, 1893, at 8 o'clock.

UNDER THE AUSPICES OF THE DETROIT MUSICAL SOCIETY.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1892-93

PROGRAMME

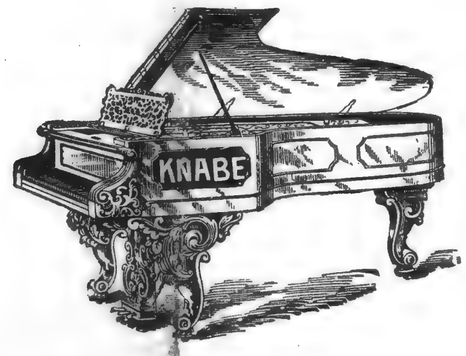
Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL, Conductor.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager. F. R. COMEE, Asst. Manager.

Wm. Knabe & Co.

MANUFACTURERS OF

GRAND AND UPRIGHT | PIANOS



EUGEN D'ALBERT.

From fullest conviction, I declare them to be the best Instruments in America.

DR. HANS VON BÜLOW.

Their sound and touch are more sympathetic to my ears and hands than all others of the country. I declare them the absolutely best in America.

ALFRED GRÜNFIELD.

I consider them the best instruments of our times.

P. TSCHAIKOVSKY.

Combines with great volume of tone, rare sympathetic and noble tone color and perfect action.

THE WHITNEY & CURRIER CO.,

SOLE AGENTS,

217 and 219 SUMMIT STREET.

THE BEE JOB ROOMS, TOLEDO, O.

[165]

THE · ARMORY,

TOLEDO,

Tuesday Evening, May 9, 1893,

AT EIGHT O'CLOCK.

First Appearance in Toledo

OF THE FAMOUS

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

TWELFTH SEASON, 1892-93.

SEVENTH ANNUAL TOUR.

With Historical and Descriptive Notes by William F. Apthorp.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
THURSDAY MORNING, JUNE 15, 1893.

TO SAVE THE SYMPHONIES.

An Effort Made to Build a New Music Hall on the Back Bay.

The new rapid transit bill, which will become a law (in all probability) next autumn, destroys Music Hall, thus depriving the city of the only hall which can be used for concerts, public meetings or festivals of any kind, always excepting Mechanics' Hall, which is too large for ordinary use. This loss will interfere with the concerts heretofore given at Music Hall, viz., those of the Handel and Haydn, Apollo and Cecilia societies and of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as well as all occasional concerts.

The contracts for the symphony orchestra are now in process, and must be settled at once. If funds to build a new hall cannot be raised within 10 days the concerts of that orchestra must be abandoned.

It is therefore proposed to build a new hall or theatre, of which the plans will be put in the hands of a competent committee. An option on an excellent location at the corner of West Chester park and near Huntington ave. has been taken at a fair price. To this end it is desired to raise $400,000, and subscriptions may be sent to the office of T. D. Boardman, Ames Building.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.
THURSDAY MORNING, JUNE 15, 1893.
VOL. CXXII. NO. 142.

A NEW HALL NEEDED.

Symphony Concerts Must Be Continued.

MUSIC HALL UNAVAILABLE.

Rapid Transit Bill Will Destroy the Old Hall—Effort of Prominent Citizens to Secure a New Building.

The probability of the adoption of the rapid transit bill in November brings to public notice a contingency not hitherto foreseen.

If the bill becomes a law the Boston Music Hall will be one of the first buildings to fall. The proposed route will pass through where the hall now stands.

The destruction of Music Hall will leave Boston without a suitable place for concerts of any magnitude. Mechanics' Hall is the only other building in the city available, and its great size renders it unsuitable.

The lack of such a hall would be a public loss. It would operate to the disadvantage of the art of music in this city. It would be practically impossible to satisfy the popular taste for high class music, which has been catered to in Music Hall.

The most notable loss would probably be that of the Symphony Orchestra. Colonel Higginson on Monday had a conference with Mayor Matthews. As a result he is convinced that the old hall will not be available next winter. It is therefore a question of great moment to him what he will do for a hall for the Symphony concerts next season.

It is necessary for him to know very soon. His contracts with the conductor are for five years, and it is necessary for him to make one very soon. Then the members of the band must all be contracted with. The engagements must be made very soon, so that the pressing need of a decision in regard to a new hall will be at once understood.

Several prominent gentlemen have risen to the occasion, and propose to raise sufficient money to build a new music hall which shall do the city proud and be worthy of her musical interests. A site for the building has already been chosen and an option on it secured, as will be seen in the following circular, issued yesterday:

The new rapid transit bill, which will become a law (in all probability) next autumn, destroys Music Hall, thus depriving the city of the only hall which can be used for concerts, public meetings, or festivals of any kind, always excepting Mechanics' Hall, which is too large for ordinary use. This loss will interfere with the concerts heretofore given at Music Hall, viz: those of the Handel and Haydn, Apollo and Cecilia societies and of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as well as all occasional concerts.

The contracts for the Symphony Orchestra are now in process, and must be settled at once. If funds to build a new hall cannot be raised within ten days the concerts of that orchestra must be abandoned indefinitely.

It is proposed to build a new hall or theatre, of which the plans will be put in the hands of a competent committee. An option on an excellent location at the corner of West Chester park and near Huntington avenue has been taken at a fair price.

To this end it is desired to raise $400,000, and subscriptions may be sent to the office of Mr. T. D. Boardman, Ames Building.

The urgency of the situation will be seen by a perusal of the above. When Music Hall was built, some forty years ago, $100,000 was raised in sixty days. With the vast increase in wealth and musical interest there should be no difficulty in raising four times the sum in a much smaller period.

A NEW MUSIC HALL.

The need of a new Music Hall in Boston has been foreseen for some time. It is now urgently presented in the circular of appeal for subscriptions to such an enterprise.

The basis of this appeal is the fact that the route of the proposed "alley road" for rapid transit purposes passes directly over the site of the present Music Hall. If the scheme proposed in this law is adopted, the Music Hall which has served the Boston public for more than forty years will be wiped out of existence. Tremont Temple may or may not be restored to available condition. Mechanics' Hall is too huge and its acoustic properties are not perfect for this purpose. And this would mean a homeless fate for the symphony concerts, the Handel and Haydn oratorios, and the great singing clubs.

It is possible that the alley road will not be built. There are several contingencies that might arise to prevent it. But with dispossession threatening, the musical interests of Boston do well to set about making provision for protection in advance.

Whether the present Music Hall goes or stays, the project for which subscriptions are now asked is a good one for the city. It is for the public advantage that such a hall be provided. It is an investment which promises large returns in other ways than those which are known commercially, although there is little doubt of its profitable character. And if the old Music Hall is wiped out, it becomes a public necessity and also an enterprise which may properly be classed among

In such a crisis as this, it is not to be feared that the public-spirited lovers of art in Boston will permit delay. Ten days would be a short time in which to raise half a million dollars for some enterprises; it will not be too short for this.

For what would Boston be without its Symphony Orchestra, without its Handel and Haydn oratorios, without its [illegible] without its song concerts of the Apollo and Cecilia? And it must go without these if it has no Music Hall.

[166]

The . . . . .
Whitney & Currier Company
. . . . .

217 and 219 Summit St., TOLEDO,

WHOLESALE AND RETAIL DEALERS IN

HIGH ☆ GRADE

☆ PIANOS ☆

NOTE.—By reason of large Cash purchases and direct dealing with the manufacturer, we are enabled to sell a better Piano for the money than any other Music House in this city, in proof of which we ask that buyers should visit other houses and get prices, and compare the same grade of Pianos in our Warerooms and judge for themselves.

SEE US BEFORE BUYING.

☆ ANNOUNCEMENT. ☆

MR. C. W. HICKOK takes great pleasure in announcing to the music lovers of Toledo and vicinity the engagement of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for one concert at the New Armory, Tuesday evening, May 9th.

. . . . . High musical authorities place this superb orchestra first among the leading orchestras of the world. It certainly is without an equal in America.

. . . . . This will be the first appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Toledo, and the last appearance here of its celebrated conductor, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, who has accepted a long engagement as conductor of the Royal Opera at Buda Pesth, and leaves this country for Europe shortly after the Toledo concert.

☆ THE ☆ ARMORY. ☆

. . . . . The Armory is exceedingly well adapted to a concert of this kind. It is perfectly fire proof. The seating capacity is more than double that of any other auditorium in Toledo. The acoustics having been thoroughly tested, are pronounced exceptionally fine, in fact equal to any room in the State, not excepting Music Hall of Cincinnati.

. . . . . It is on the ground floor, well lighted and perfectly ventilated, and only one block from two leading street car lines (Cherry street line at Michigan street and Canton avenue line at John street), and two blocks from the Huron line at Orange street. Plenty of cars will be used by both companies to accommodate those attending this concert.

PRICES.

Reserved Seats, - - $1.50 and $1.00.
General Admission, - - - - - 1.00.

Advanced Sale opens at Whitney & Currier's Store, Wednesday, May 3d, at 9 a. m.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.

THURSDAY MORNING, JUNE 15, 1893.

TO SAVE THE SYMPHONIES.

An Effort Made to Build a New Music Hall on the Back Bay.

The new rapid transit bill, which will become a law (in all probability) next autumn, destroys Music Hall, thus depriving the city of the only hall which can be used for concerts, public meetings or festivals of any kind, always excepting Mechanics' Hall, which is too large for ordinary use. This loss will interfere with the concerts heretofore given at Music Hall, viz., those of the Handel and Haydn, Apollo and Cecilia societies and of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as well as all occasional concerts.

The contracts for the symphony orchestra are now in process, and must be settled at once. If funds to build a new hall cannot be raised within 10 days the concerts of that orchestra must be abandoned.

It is therefore proposed to build a new hall or theatre, of which the plans will be put in the hands of a competent committee. An option on an excellent location at the corner of West Chester park and near Huntington ave. has been taken at a fair price. To this end it is desired to raise $400,000, and subscriptions may be sent to the office of T. D. Boardman, Ames Building.

The ..... Whitney & Currier Company .....

217 and 219 Summit St., TOLEDO,

WHOLESALE AND RETAIL DEALERS IN

HIGH ☆ GRADE

☆ PIANOS ☆

NOTE.—By reason of large Cash purchases and direct dealing with the manufacturer, we are enabled to sell a better Piano for the money than any other Music House in this city, in proof of which we ask that buyers should visit other houses and get prices, and compare the same grade of Pianos in our Warerooms and judge for themselves.

SEE US BEFORE BUYING.

☆ ANNOUNCEMENT. ☆

MR. C. W. HICKOK takes great pleasure in announcing to the music lovers of Toledo and vicinity the engagement of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for one concert at the New Armory, Tuesday evening, May 9th.

. . . . . High musical authorities place this superb orchestra first among the leading orchestras of the world. It certainly is without an equal in America.

. . . . . This will be the first appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Toledo, and the last appearance here of its celebrated conductor, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, who has accepted a long engagement as conductor of the Royal Opera at Buda Pesth, and leaves this country for Europe shortly after the Toledo concert.

☆ THE ☆ ARMORY. ☆

. . . . . The Armory is exceedingly well adapted to a concert of this kind. It is perfectly fire proof. The seating capacity is more than double that of any other auditorium in Toledo. The acoustics having been thoroughly tested, are pronounced exceptionally fine, in fact equal to any room in the State, not excepting Music Hall of Cincinnati.

. . . . . It is on the ground floor, well lighted and perfectly ventilated, and only one block from two leading street car lines (Cherry street line at Michigan street and Canton avenue line at John street), and two blocks from the Huron line at Orange street. Plenty of cars will be used by both companies to accommodate those attending this concert.

PRICES.

Reserved Seats, - - $1.50 and $1.00.
General Admission, - - - - - 1.00.

Advanced Sale opens at Whitney & Currier's Store, Wednesday, May 3d, at 9 a. m.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.

THURSDAY MORNING, JUNE 15, 1893.

TO SAVE THE SYMPHONIES.

An Effort Made to Build a New Music Hall on the Back Bay.

The new rapid transit bill, which will become a law (in all probability) next autumn, destroys Music Hall, thus depriving the city of the only hall which can be used for concerts, public meetings or festivals of any kind, always excepting Mechanics' Hall, which is too large for ordinary use. This loss will interfere with the concerts heretofore given at Music Hall, viz., those of the Handel and Haydn, Apollo and Cecilia societies and of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as well as all occasional concerts.

The contracts for the symphony orchestra are now in process, and must be settled at once. If funds to build a new hall cannot be raised within 10 days the concerts of that orchestra must be abandoned.

It is therefore proposed to build a new hall or theatre, of which the plans will be put in the hands of a competent committee. An option on an excellent location at the corner of West Chester park and near Huntington ave. has been taken at a fair price. To this end it is desired to raise $400,000, and subscriptions may be sent to the office of T. D. Boardman, Ames Building.

"Music is the harmonious voice of creation; an echo of the invisible world; one note of the divine concord which the entire universe is destined one day to sound.

—MAZZINI.

BOARDMAN & GRAY PIANOS

ESTABLISHED·1837

This famous instrument is, without doubt, the most popular piano in this market.

BEAUTIFUL AND SYMPATHETIC IN TONE QUALITY.

PERFECTION ITSELF IN ACTION,

RESPONDING WITH EQUAL PROMPTITUDE TO THE MOST DELICATE OR POWERFUL TOUCH.

MAGNIFICENT IN APPEARANCE, AND POSSESSING THE GREATEST DURABILITY.

They are the admiration of musicians wherever seen. No piano in the world is better calculated to withstand the effects of this trying climate than the Boardman & Gray.

The Whitney & Currier Co.,

GENERAL AGENTS,

217 & 219 Summit Street, TOLEDO, OHIO.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Armory

TOLEDO, OHIO.

Season of 1892-93.

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

Tuesday Evening, May 9, 1893, at 8:00.

☆ ☆ ☆ ☆

PROGRAMME

☆ ☆ ☆ ☆

WAGNER, ... Overture, "Tannhaeuser."

BEETHOVEN, . . Leonore's Grand Aria from "Fidelio."

SCHUBERT, ... Unfinished Symphony, in B minor.

Allegro moderato—Andante con moto.

HANDEL, ... Largo.

Soli for Violoncello.

a. C. REINECKE, ... Romanza.

b. KLENGEL, ... Capriccio.

WAGNER, ... Elizabeth's Aria, From "Tannhaeuser" "O Lovely Halls."

LISZT, ... Symphonic Poem, "Les Preludes."

Soloists: MISS FELICIA KASCHOSKA, MR. FRANZ KNEISEL, MR. ALWIN SCROEDER.

☞ See Historical and Descriptive Notes on following pages. ☜

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

THURSDAY MORNING, JUNE 15, 1893.

TO SAVE THE SYMPHONIES.

An Effort Made to Build a New Music Hall on the Back Bay.

The new rapid transit bill, which will become a law (in all probability) next autumn, destroys Music Hall, thus depriving the city of the only hall which can be used for concerts, public meetings or festivals of any kind, always excepting Mechanics' Hall, which is too large for ordinary use. This loss will interfere with the concerts heretofore given at Music Hall, viz., those of the Handel and Haydn, Apollo and Cecilia societies and of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as well as all occasional concerts.

The contracts for the symphony orchestra are now in process, and must be settled at once. If funds to build a new hall cannot be raised within 10 days the concerts of that orchestra must be abandoned.

It is therefore proposed to build a new hall or theatre, of which the plans will be put in the hands of a competent committee. An option on an excellent location at the corner of West Chester park and near Huntington ave. has been taken at a fair price. To this end it is desired to raise $400,000, and subscriptions may be sent to the office of T. D. Boardman, Ames Building.

NOTES

☆

HISTORICAL AND DESCRIPTIVE.

☆

Overture to "Tannhaeuser." Richard Wagner.

This, for a long time the most popular of all Wagner's orchestral compositions, is now to be regarded as a concert overture rather than as the prelude to the opera of "Tannhäuser." When Wagner remodeled the first two scenes of Act I. for the performance at the Acadámie de Musique in Paris in 1861, he found that the form of the overture no longer satisfied him. He had developed his theories of the music-drama during his exile at Zürich (some time after the opera of "Tannhäuser" was written); and the overture, in its original shape, did not tally with these theories. The glowing peroration made it too much of a complete composition in itself instead of the merely suggestive prelude to a dramatic action which he now desired. Another consideration, too, may have had some weight with him: the last return of the Pilgrim's Chant in E major, with its whirling accompaniment on the violins, was so immensely brilliant in its effectiveness that it might well make this same chant seem tame and ineffective by comparison, as it appears in E flat, and with a less tumultuous accompaniment, in the third act of the opera itself. So he cut this glowing return of the Pilgrims' Chant from his overture, connecting the Venus Mountain music of the middle of the piece immediately with the new Bacchanale he had written for the first theme of the opera. He was so well satisfied with the changes he had made for the Paris performances that he declared the Paris "version" of "Tannhäuser" the only authentic one, so that the overture in its original shape lapsed henceforth from the theatre to the concert-room, where it still remains in the repertory of all fine orchestras. Looking upon it as an independent composition, a sort of symphonic poem in itself, and no longer as a prelude to the opera, Wagner wrote an explanatory, descriptive programme to it, such as has been written to more than one purely orchestral composition. Unluckily this explanatory programme of Wagner's, an exceedingly flamboyant piece of poetic writing, is not of a character to make its reproduction here wholly desirable. The main gist of it is, however, as follows:—

The overture begins with the chant of the returning pilgrims, as the pious procession passes before the mind's eye of the listener,—first heard faintly, as in the dim distance, then swelling louder and louder, as the pilgrims draw nearer, and then losing itself again, as the procession little by little passes out of hearing. It is evening twilight; rosy clouds arise, laden with intoxicating perfumes; the air is filled with all the seduction of the Venus Mountain; Tannhæuser, the love singer, appears, and sings his glowing song of love. He sees Venus herself lying on a couch before him; sweet siren songs resound on every hand; he is drawn on into the interior of the mountain, where the love-goddess holds her bacchanalian court. Then comes the dawn, and the chant of the pilgrims again sounds from afar; the sun rises in his unclouded splendor; the rustling and whirring that filled the enchanted air of the mountain now swell to a billowing torrent of sound, as of the ecstacy of new-born Nature. The pilgrims' song of redemption rises louder and louder. It is the jubilation of the mountain itself, now redeemed from the curse of unholiness. Thus beat all the pulses of life to the song of redemption; and both severed elements, soul and senses, God and Nature, embrace in the holy, reuniting kiss of love.

Silks,	Dress Goods	Cloaks,
Trimmings,	Ribbons,	Laces,

☆

First Consideration, QUALITY
Second Consideration, STYLE
Third Consideration, PRICE

Bearing these in mind, we are able to show the best qualities, the choicest styles and the lowest prices.

Lamson Brothers,

333 and 335 Summit St.,

TOLEDO, - - OHIO.

☆

Hosiery,	Underwear,	Gloves,
Draperies,	Linens,	Notions,

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.

THURSDAY MORNING, JUNE 15, 1893.

TO SAVE THE SYMPHONIES.

An Effort Made to Build a New Music Hall on the Back Bay.

The new rapid transit bill, which will become a law (in all probability) next autumn, destroys Music Hall, thus depriving the city of the only hall which can be used for concerts, public meetings or festivals of any kind, always excepting Mechanics' Hall, which is too large for ordinary use. This loss will interfere with the concerts heretofore given at Music Hall, viz., those of the Handel and Haydn, Apollo and Cecilia societies and of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as well as all occasional concerts.

The contracts for the symphony orchestra are now in process, and must be settled at once. If funds to build a new hall cannot be raised within 10 days the concerts of that orchestra must be abandoned.

It is therefore proposed to build a new hall or theatre, of which the plans will be put in the hands of a competent committee. An option on an excellent location at the corner of West Chester park and near Huntington ave. has been taken at a fair price. To this end it is desired to raise $400,000, and subscriptions may be sent to the office of T. D. Boardman, Ames Building.

Recitative: "Abscheulicher! wo eilst du hin?" and aria: "Komm, Hoffnung," from "Fidelio," Act I Scene 6. Ludwig van Beethoven.

"Fidelio," Beethoven's only opera, was first given at the Theatre an der Wien, in Vienna, on Nov. 20, 1805. The libretto was an adaptation by Joseph Sonnleithner of a French text by Jean-Nicolas Bouilly, entitled "Léonore, ou l'amour conjugal," which had twice before been set to music (by Pierre Gaveaux, as Léonore, ou l'amour conjugal," brought out at the Opéra Comique in Paris on Feb. 19, 1798; and by Ferdinando Paër, as "Leonora, ossia l'amore conjugale," brought out in Dresden on Oct. 3, 1804). The libretto was delivered to Beethoven in the winter of 1804-5, and he composed the first version of the opera at Hetzendorf during the following summer. It was produced in this version, which was in three acts, under discouraging circumstances. The French had just taken possession of Vienna, which was deserted by the Austrian court and nobility. After three performances the work was withdrawn. It was considered too long; and three numbers were accordingly dropped from it, and the libretto reduced to two acts by Stephen Breuning. In this second version it was given at the Vienna Hof-Oper on March 29 and April 10, 1806, and again withdrawn. In 1814 the libretto was once more revised by Fredrich Treitschke, and Beethoven rewrote much of the music. In this third and final version the work was produced at the Kärnthnerthor-Theatre on May 23, 1814. Beethoven had wished from the beginning to have the opera called "Leonore;" but he was overruled by the management of the theatre, and it was always billed as "Fidelio."

The subject of the opera is the endeavors of Leonore, the heroine, to liberate her husband, Florestan, who has been cast into a dungeon by Pizarro, governor of a state prison in Spain. For this purpose she disguises herself as a boy, and, under the name of Fidelio, enters the service of the old jailer, Rocco. The recitative and air sung at this concert are a soliloquy of Leonore's, after she has overheard Pizarro try to bribe Rocco to assassinate Florestan in his underground cell. The text is as follows:—

"Detestable one! whither hastenest thou? what is thy intent? what wilt thou in thy wild wrath? The cry of pity, the voice of humanity, can nothing move thy tiger-spirit? But though wrath and fury rage in thy soul like the waves of the sea, a colored rainbow shines before me, resting brightly on dark clouds. It beams so quietly and peacefully down upon me; it reflects old times again, and my blood flows more calmly through my veins.

"Come, hope, let not thy last star fade from the weary one's sight! Oh! come, illumine my goal, be it never so distant; love will reach it.

"I follow the inward prompting, I waver not, the duty of a faithful wife's love strengthens me. O thou, for whom I have borne all, could I but push my way to the place where malice has cast thee into chains, and bring thee sweet comfort!"

Of this great scene Hector Berlitz writes as follows:—

"Fidelio's grand air is with recitative, adago cantabile, final allegro, and accompaniment of three horns and one bassoon obbligati.

"I find in the recitative a fine dramatic animation; the adagio is sublime with its tender accent and melancholy grace; the allegro carries you away, full as it is of noble enthusiasm, magnificent, well worthy to have served as a model for Agathe's air in the 'Freischütz.' Some excellent critics are, I know, not of my opinion; I am happy not to be of theirs. . .

"The theme of the allegro of this admirable air is announced by the

THE FINEST OF GOODS.

IMPORTATIONS OF : : :

Fancy Slippers

FROM

M. ROBITSEK & CO.

VIENNA, AUSTRIA.

A Specialty of NOVELTIES.

PARTIES, BALLS, OPERA.

REINHART & MURPHY,

SHOE MEN, 443 SUMMIT STREET, Near Oak.

As Fine as the Symphony Orchestra.

THIS IS SAYING A GREAT DEAL.

. . BUT A . .

"Patek, Phillippe & Co." Watch,

IS THE BEST MADE IN THE WORLD. YOU SHOULD SEE THEM

A Complete Line of Fine Diamonds,

Beautiful Jewelry and Silver Goods.

We make a specialty of fine Engraved Visiting Cards, Correspondence Stationery, Stamping, etc.

Get a sample of our "WARD'S LINEN PAPER" at 23 cents per pound,

THE CHEAPEST GOOD PAPER IN THE MARKET.

Prompt Attention Given to Out of Town Orders.

J. J. FREEMAN, JEWELER.

TOLEDO, OHIO.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

THURSDAY MORNING, JUNE 15, 1893.

TO SAVE THE SYMPHONIES.

An Effort Made to Build a New Music Hall on the Back Bay.

The new rapid transit bill, which will become a law (in all probability) next autumn, destroys Music Hall, thus depriving the city of the only hall which can be used for concerts, public meetings or festivals of any kind, always excepting Mechanics' Hall, which is too large for ordinary use. This loss will interfere with the concerts heretofore given at Music Hall, viz., those of the Handel and Haydn, Apollo and Cecilia societies and of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as well as all occasional concerts.

The contracts for the symphony orchestra are now in process, and must be settled at once. If funds to build a new hall cannot be raised within 10 days the concerts of that orchestra must be abandoned.

It is therefore proposed to build a new hall or theatre, of which the plans will be put in the hands of a competent committee. An option on an excellent location at the corner of West Chester park and near Huntington ave. has been taken at a fair price. To this end it is desired to raise $400,000, and subscriptions may be sent to the office of T. D. Boardman, Ames Building.

three horns and the bassoon alone, which confine themselves to sounding successively the five notes of the chord: B, E, G-sharp, B, E. This forms four measures of incredible originality. You could give these five notes to any musician who did not know them, telling him to combine them in a hundred different ways, and I wager that, in his hundred combinations, you would not find the impetuous and proud phrase Beethoven has formed from them, so unforeseen is its rythm. In many people's eyes this allegro is stained with one grave fault: it has no little phrase that can be easily retained in the memory. These dilettanti, insensible of the numerous and brilliant beauties of the movement, expect their phrases of four measures, as children expect the bean in a Twelfth-Night cake, as provincials expect the B-natural, the note of a tenor who is making his début. The cake may be delicious, the tenor may be the most delightful singer in the world; neither of them will have any success without the precious accessory! It hasn't any bean! He hasn't any note!

"Agathe's air in the 'Freischütz' is almost popular; it has the note!

"How many pieces of Rossini himself, that prince of melodists, have remained in the shade because they hadn't the note!

"Moreover, the four wind instruments that accompany the voice disturb the majority of listeners a little by attracting their attention too strongly. Yet these instruments make no display of needless difficulties; Beethoven has not treated them; as Mozart did several times the basset-horn, as solo instruments, in the pretentious acceptation of the term. Mozart in 'Tito,' makes the basset-horn perform a sort of concerto while the prima donna is sying that 'she sees death approaching, etc.' This contrast between a dramatis persona, animated by the most sombre emotions, and a virtuoso who, under the pretext of accompanying the melody, thinks only of showing off the agility of his fingers, is one of the most ungraceful and puerile, one of the most contrary to dramatic common sense, and even the most unfavorable to good musical effect. The part cast by Beethoven for these four wind instruments is not of this sort; he did not mean to show them off, but to get from them a kind of accompaniment thoroughly in harmony with the sentiment of the singing personage, a particular clang-tint that no other orchestral combination could produce. The veiled, almost painful tones of the horns associates itself as felicitously as possible with the distressed joy, the trembling hope, with which Leonore's heart is filled; it is sweet and tender as the cooing of a dove.

"Surely it was a great, loving heart that poured itself forth in this wonderous inspiration!"

Unfinished Symphony in B-minor. — Franz Schubert.

I. Allegro moderato (B-minor) - - - - 3-4
II. Andante con moto (E-major) - - - - 3-8

The first movement of this fragment of a symphony is noteworthy for its absolute clearness of form. The first theme, which is just eight measures long, is immediately announced by the 'celli and double-basses, in octaves: then follows a softly rustling, restless phrase in the first and second violins, over a throbbing pizzicato accompaniment the violas and basses, which is properly to be regarded as a counter-theme to the first subsidiary, which latter makes its appearance four measures later in the first oboe and clarinet in unison. This subsidiary, with its restless counter-theme, is developed briefly in cressendo, until its progress is interrupted by two loud chords for the full orchestra,—like stertorious, spasmodic breathing in uneasy sleep,—followed by a sort of sigh in the clarinets, bassoons, and horns, after which the development continues for five measures more, when it is cut short by more spasmodic snortings of the full orchestra. Four measures of transition, on the horns and bassoons, lead to a key of G major. After two preparatory measures of syncopated accompaniment (the bass in the double-basses pizzicati, the middle parts in the violas, and clarinets) the second theme is given out by the 'celli,—a melody of entrancing grace, but which has the peculiarity that its first phrase seems either to end with one foot in the air or else to lead to nothing but a repetion of itself. This time it is repeated by the first and second violins in octaves, ending literally with one foot in the air. A measure's rest is followed by some stormy chord-passages for the whole orchestra, after which one of the figures from the second theme is worked up in countrapuntal imitation, by way of conclusion-theme: at least, when the wind instruments chime in, it assumes the character of a veritable Beethovenish coda. This ends the first part of the movement, which is one of the most concisely exposed since Mozart and Haydn, although the intrinsic character of the theme is essentially modern.

The working-out is elaborate, now mysterious, now stormy, countrapuntal elements being especially prominent in it. The leading up to the third part of the movement is absolutely masterly, and in sharp contrast to the extraordinarily abrupt transition from the first subsidiary to the second theme in the first part. The third part is there before you know it, so cunningly, almost slily, is it led up to. Curiously enough, it does not begin with a return of the first theme, but with the restless counter-theme to the first subsidiary, which comes regularly in the tonic B minor. From this point onward, however, the third part bears quite the regular, tradi-

Artographs,

The Most Artistic Portrait Made.

• • • •

WE WILL BE PLEASED TO SHOW THEM
TO YOU.

• • • •

VAN LOO & TROST,
328 SUMMIT ST.

Photographers.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.

THURSDAY MORNING, JUNE 15, 1893.

TO SAVE THE SYMPHONIES.

An Effort Made to Build a New Music Hall on the Back Bay.

The new rapid transit bill, which will become a law (in all probability) next autumn, destroys Music Hall, thus depriving the city of the only hall which can be used for concerts, public meetings or festivals of any kind, always excepting Mechanics' Hall, which is too large for ordinary use. This loss will interfere with the concerts heretofore given at Music Hall, viz., those of the Handel and Haydn, Apollo and Cecilia societies and of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as well as all occasional concerts.

The contracts for the symphony orchestra are now in process, and must be settled at once. If funds to build a new hall cannot be raised within 10 days the concerts of that orchestra must be abandoned.

It is therefore proposed to build a new hall or theatre, of which the plans will be put in the hands of a competent committee. An option on an excellent location at the corner of West Chester park and near Huntington ave. has been taken at a fair price. To this end it is desired to raise $400,000, and subscriptions may be sent to the office of T. D. Boardman, Ames Building.

tional relations to the first; the second theme coming in in D major. A short coda brings the movement to a close.

The second movement is in rather an unusual form for a symphonic slow movement: it consists virtually of the first part of a movement in the regular sonata-form, repeated over again with but little variation, and then a brief coda. One feels almost as if Schubert had originally intended to write the movement in fully developed sonata form,—the form in which first allegro movements are regularly written,—but found, after he had repeated his first part, that, owing to the slow tempo, the movement was already long enough, and would only bear the addition of a short coda. If this is so, it is certainly the only instance known in which he had any compunctions about making a movement too long.

The first theme is of the regulation length of sixteen measures; but its construction is none the less peculiar. Its real first and second sections (of four measures each) are each preceded by two introductory measures in the horns and bassoons, over a descending pizzicato bass. This makes twelve measures, so that the remaining four measures of the theme come in rather curiously, almost as a gratuitous tag. The result is that the theme, in spite of its regulation number of measures, seems to be in three sections instead of four. After having thus been played through in E major, it is immediately repeated in E minor. Then comes the first subsidiary (in E major), a glorious theme in the full orchestra, that reminds one of one of the grandest moments in the trio of the scherzo in the composer's great C major symphony (No. 9). This is followed by a little play with the first theme, when a long G sharp in the first violins, rising to its octave, and then falling to E, introduces the second theme in C sharp minor. This theme, accompanied in syncopated chords by the strings, is first sung by the clarinet, then taken up and varied a little by the oboe and flute. It is followed by a more energetic second subsidiary in the full orchestra, which leads in turn to the conclusion theme, which, like the conclusion theme in the first movement, is really made up of pieces of the second theme. It begins in D major, modulates to G major, and then by the same process to C major. From this key a clever modulation brings us back once more to the tonic E major; and the first part which we have just finished is virtually played over again, with some alterations and changes of key, however, that give it somewhat the aspect of a third part. The coda is very short.

This symphony is scored in both its movements for full classic orchestra, with only two horns, but with trumpets, trombones, and kettle-drums. The instrumentation is a decided advance upon that of the great C major symphony, showing far more care and painstaking. The remaining two movements of the work, if indeed they were ever written, have never come to light.

Largo. George Frederic Handel.

Arranged for violin solo, harp, violins in unison, and full orchestra by Hellmesberger.

This exceedingly popular movement has a history of its own. The original composition belongs to one of Handel's Italian operas, "Serse" (Xerxes). This opera was written by Handel between Dec. 26, 1737, and Feb. 14, 1738: it was first brought out in London on April 15, 1738. The part of Xerxes (the leading part in the opera) was written for soprano (or mezzo-soprano), according to the prevailing custom of Handel's day, which was that the leading part, whether male or female, in almost any opera, should be written for a female voice.

The air in question is the first number in the opera, after the overture, and is sung by Xerxes himself. The stage direction in Handel's score is, "A summer-house beside a most beautiful garden, in the middle of which stands a plane-tree." Xerxes is lazily lolling under the tree, and the air he sings is preceded by the following recitative: "Soft and beautiful leaves of my beloved plane-tree, may fate shine through you. Thunder, lightning and storms have never outraged your dear peace, nor has the fierce south wind come to profane you." This recitative is followed by an air (marked larghetto in the score), of which the original text is the following quatrain:—

SERSE.—Ombra mai fu
Di vegetabile
Cara ed amabile
Soave piu. [Si tiene ammirando il platano.]

(XERXES.—There never was a more agreeable shade of a dear and lovely plant. [Stands admiring the plane-tree.])

The air, which is quite short, has a fully written-out accompaniment for a four-part string orchestra (a not too common thing in Handel's scores), besides, a thorough bass figuring, which looks as if the composer meant to add an improvised harpsichord-part at the performance. The whole atmosphere of the air is thoroughly pastoral, and the deeper emotions have nothing to do with it.

But Hellmesberger, of Vienna, saw chances of enormous effect in this simple melody, if not of the sort Handel contemplated. He has arranged it as follows: he first has the air played through by a solo violin, accompanied by a harp (Handel's original harmony being retained as nearly as possible in the circumstances). Then he has the same air repeated by all the violins in unison, the accompaniment being given to more and more

A Beautiful Complexion.

To beautify the complexion, you must remove all unnatural spots from the face, such as

TAN, FRECKLES, LIVER BLOTCHES, BLACKHEADS, PIMPLES, RINGWORMS,

AND ALL FACIAL SORES AND ERUPTIONS, WRINKLES, ETC.

Be cautious as to what kind of soaps and remedies you use.

Spayd's Face Ointment and Face Soap

Are the most successful preparations now sold as a skin beautifier and will free the face from blemishes without injury. It imparts a youthful freshness to the skin, making it clear and white.

Gentlemen using the ointment after shaving, prevents soreness. Mail orders promptly attended to. A large size box of ointment and one cake of the Face Soap mailed to any address upon

RECEIPT OF PRICE, ($1.00.)

C. E. SPAYD, Manufacturing Pharmacist.

TOLEDO, - - - OHIO.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.

THURSDAY MORNING, JUNE 15, 1893.

TO SAVE THE SYMPHONIES.

An Effort Made to Build a New Music Hall on the Back Bay.

The new rapid transit bill, which will become a law (in all probability) next autumn, destroys Music Hall, thus depriving the city of the only hall which can be used for concerts, public meetings or festivals of any kind, always excepting Mechanics' Hall, which is too large for ordinary use. This loss will interfere with the concerts heretofore given at Music Hall, viz., those of the Handel and Haydn, Apollo and Cecilia societies and of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as well as all occasional concerts.

The contracts for the symphony orchestra are now in process, and must be settled at once. If funds to build a new hall cannot be raised within 10 days the concerts of that orchestra must be abandoned.

It is therefore proposed to build a new hall or theatre, of which the plans will be put in the hands of a competent committee. An option on an excellent location at the corner of West Chester park and near Huntington ave. has been taken at a fair price. To this end it is desired to raise $400,000, and subscriptions may be sent to the office of T. D. Boardman, Ames Building.

instruments, until, toward the close, the full wealth of the modern orchestra is called into play. As a piece of gorgeous tone-color, this arrangement of Handel's little pastoral air is quite unique in its way.

Aria: "Dich, theure Halle gruess' ich wieder,' from 'Tannhaeuser,'" Act II, Scene I.—Richard Wagner.

This excerpt from the second act of "Tannhaeuser" should not properly be called an aria, although it is generally so styled on concert programmes: it has nothing to do with the traditional aria-form. After an orchestral introduction it begins with a recitative, and then passes on to a passage in free cantilena, with which it closes. The situation in the opera is as follows: Elizabeth, niece of Hermann, Landgrave of Thuringia, has heard of Tannhaeuser's return after a long absence. She has long been in love with him, and knows that her love is returned. She comes into the great hall of her uncle's castle, the Wartburg, where the singing contests are held, and where Tannhaeuser used to vie in song with the other Minnesingers, and apostrophizes it as follows:

"I greet thee once more, dear hall; joyfully I greet thee, beloved place! In thee his songs awake again, and wake me out of a dark dream. When he left thee, how deserted thou didst seem to me! All peace fled me, joy departed from thee. Now, as my bosom swells, thou, too, seemest proud and majestic; he who revives me and thee is no longer so far away. Be thou greeted of me!"

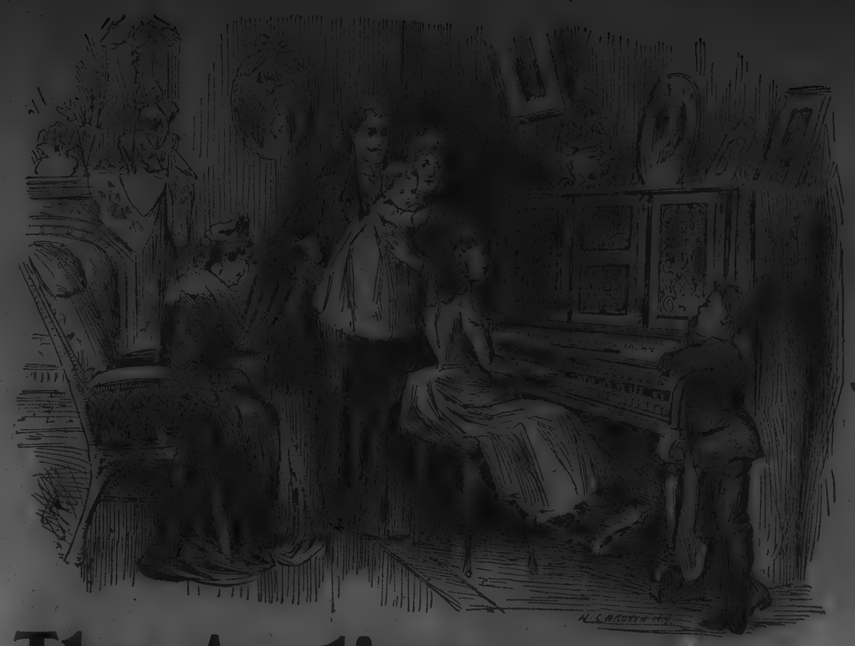
"The Preludes," symphonic poem in G major.—Franz Liszt.

Andante (G major)	4-4
Andante marcato (G major)	12-8
Allegro ma non troppo (A minor)	2-2
Allegretto pastorale (A major)	6-8
Allegro marziale animato (G major)	2-2
Andante maestoso (G major)	12-8

The text, of which this symphonic poem is the musical illustration, is taken from Lamartine's "Meditations Poetiques," and is as follows:

"Is our life anything but a series of preludes to that unknown song, the first solemn note of which is intoned by death? Love forms the enchanted dawn of every existence; but whose is the destiny in which the first bliss of happiness is not interrupted by some storm whose fatal breath dissipates his beautiful illusions, whose fell lightning blasts his altar; and whose is the cruelly wounded soul that, on coming out of one of its tempests, does not seek repose for its memories in the sweet calm of life in the country? Yet man can hardly resign himself to enjoy long the beneficent tepidity which first charmed him in Nature's bosom; and, when 'the trumpet has sounded the alarm signal,' he rushes to his post of danger, no matter what the war that calls him to the ranks, to find again in fighting the full consciousness of himself and the entire possession of his strength."

After quoting this text, no elaborate analysis of the composition itself is necessary. Any one who follows the above quotation from Lamartine, while listening to the music, can hardly escape seeing the exact way in which Liszt has illustrated it musically. Both in respect to its poetic significance and to its musical development, "Les Preludes" is the clearest of all Liszt's twelve symphonic poems, as it is also the most widely popular. The work is scored for full modern orchestra, with all the instruments of percussion, but without any of the less usual wind instruments.



The Aeolian
A Parlor Orchestra.

The Greatest Musical Invention of modern times.

An Instrument for the Musician,

As well as those wholly uneducated in the divine Art.

Only those who use them can realize the perfect fascination their use inspires. Plays everything in music, and is so easily operated that a delicate lady can use with pleasure and success. Not Mechanical; yet all can use them. Tempo and expression are both perfectly under the control of the player.

The Aeolian opens wide the door hitherto closed to thousands of music lovers, who are without the power of producing harmony—yet whose every pulse vibrates in sympathy with it.

The Aeolian furnishes both entertainment and education. It brings to the home circle in music what the well-stocked library does in literature. The spiritual, the sublime, the marvelous in music are all portrayed with this wonderful parlor orchestra.

☞A LARGE STOCK OF AEOLIANS KEPT CONSTANTLY ON EXHIBITION AT OUR WAREROOMS.

THE WHITNEY & CURRIER CO.,
GENERAL AGENTS,
217 & 219 Summit Street, TOLEDO, OHIO.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.

THURSDAY MORNING, JUNE 15, 1893.

TO SAVE THE SYMPHONIES.

An Effort Made to Build a New Music Hall on the Back Bay.

The new rapid transit bill, which will become a law (in all probability) next autumn, destroys Music Hall, thus depriving the city of the only hall which can be used for concerts, public meetings or festivals of any kind, always excepting Mechanics' Hall, which is too large for ordinary use. This loss will interfere with the concerts heretofore given at Music Hall, viz., those of the Handel and Haydn, Apollo and Cecilia societies and of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as well as all occasional concerts.

The contracts for the symphony orchestra are now in process, and must be settled at once. If funds to build a new hall cannot be raised within 10 days the concerts of that orchestra must be abandoned.

It is therefore proposed to build a new hall or theatre, of which the plans will be put in the hands of a competent committee. An option on an excellent location at the corner of West Chester park and near Huntington ave. has been taken at a fair price. To this end it is desired to raise $400,000, and subscriptions may be sent to the office of T. D. Boardman, Ames Building.

instruments, until, toward the close, the full wealth of the modern orchestra is called into play. As a piece of gorgeous tone-color, this arrangement of Handel's little pastoral air is quite unique in its way.

Aria: "Dich, theure Halle gruess' ich wieder,' from 'Tannhaeuser,'" Act II, Scene I.—Richard Wagner.

This excerpt from the second act of "Tannhaeuser" should not properly be called an aria, although it is generally so styled on concert programmes: it has nothing to do with the traditional aria-form. After an orchestral introduction it begins with a recitative, and then passes on to a passage in free cantilena, with which it closes. The situation in the opera is as follows: Elizabeth, niece of Hermann, Landgrave of Thuringia, has heard of Tannhaeuser's return after a long absence. She has long been in love with him, and knows that her love is returned. She comes into the great hall of her uncle's castle, the Wartburg, where the singing contests are held, and where Tannhaeuser used to vie in song with the other Minnesingers, and apostrophizes it as follows:

"I greet thee once more, dear hall; joyfully I greet thee, beloved place! In thee his songs awake again, and wake me out of a dark dream. When he left thee, how deserted thou didst seem to me! All peace fled me, joy departed from thee. Now, as my bosom swells, thou, too, seemest proud and majestic; he who revives me and thee is no longer so far away. Be thou greeted of me!"

"The Preludes," symphonic poem in G major.—Franz Liszt.

Andante (G major)	4-4
Andante marcato (G major)	12-8
Allegro ma non troppo (A minor)	2-2
Allegretto pastorale (A major)	6-8
Allegro marziale animato (G major)	2-2
Andante maestoso (G major)	12-8

The text, of which this symphonic poem is the musical illustration, is taken from Lamartine's "Meditations Poetiques," and is as follows:

"Is our life anything but a series of preludes to that unknown song, the first solemn note of which is intoned by death? Love forms the enchanted dawn of every existence; but whose is the destiny in which the first bliss of happiness is not interrupted by some storm whose fatal breath dissipates his beautiful illusions, whose fell lightning blasts his altar; and whose is the cruelly wounded soul that, on coming out of one of its tempests, does not seek repose for its memories in the sweet calm of life in the country? Yet man can hardly resign himself to enjoy long the beneficent tepidity which first charmed him in Nature's bosom; and, when 'the trumpet has sounded the alarm signal,' he rushes to his post of danger, no matter what the war that calls him to the ranks, to find again in fighting the full consciousness of himself and the entire possession of his strength."

After quoting this text, no elaborate analysis of the composition itself is necessary. Any one who follows the above quotation from Lamartine, while listening to the music, can hardly escape seeing the exact way in which Liszt has illustrated it musically. Both in respect to its poetic significance and to its musical development, "Les Preludes" is the clearest of all Liszt's twelve symphonic poems, as it is also the most widely popular. The work is scored for full modern orchestra, with all the instruments of percussion, but without any of the less usual wind instruments.

The Aeolian
A Parlor Orchestra.

The Greatest Musical Invention of modern times.

An Instrument for the Musician,

As well as those wholly uneducated in the divine Art.

Only those who use them can realize the perfect fascination their use inspires. Plays everything in music, and is so easily operated that a delicate lady can use with pleasure and success. Not Mechanical; yet all can use them. Tempo and expression are both perfectly under the control of the player.

The Aeolian opens wide the door hitherto closed to thousands of music lovers, who are without the power of producing harmony—yet whose every pulse vibrates in sympathy with it.

The Aeolian furnishes both entertainment and education. It brings to the home circle in music what the well-stocked library does in literature. The spiritual, the sublime, the marvelous in music are all portrayed with this wonderful parlor orchestra.

☞ A LARGE STOCK OF AEOLIANS KEPT CONSTANTLY ON EXHIBITION AT OUR WAREROOMS.

THE WHITNEY & CURRIER CO.,

GENERAL AGENTS,

217 & 219 Summit Street, TOLEDO, OHIO.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

THURSDAY MORNING, JUNE 15, 1893.

TO SAVE THE SYMPHONIES.

An Effort Made to Build a New Music Hall on the Back Bay.

The new rapid transit bill, which will become a law (in all probability) next autumn, destroys Music Hall, thus depriving the city of the only hall which can be used for concerts, public meetings or festivals of any kind, always excepting Mechanics' Hall, which is too large for ordinary use. This loss will interfere with the concerts heretofore given at Music Hall, viz., those of the Handel and Haydn, Apollo and Cecilia societies and of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as well as all occasional concerts.

The contracts for the symphony orchestra are now in process, and must be settled at once. If funds to build a new hall cannot be raised within 10 days the concerts of that orchestra must be abandoned.

It is therefore proposed to build a new hall or theatre, of which the plans will be put in the hands of a competent committee. An option on an excellent location at the corner of West Chester park and near Huntington ave. has been taken at a fair price. To this end it is desired to raise $400,000, and subscriptions may be sent to the office of T. D. Boardman, Ames Building.

instruments, u is called into of Handel's li

Aria: "Dich,

This exc properly be ca programmes:
an orchestral i to a passage i opera is as fol gia, has heard been in love w into the great contests are l other Minnesi
"I greet place! In the
When he left me, joy depart proud and maj
Be thou greete

"The Prelude

Andante
Andante
Allegro
Allegret
Allegro
Andante

The text, taken from La
"Is our li
the first solemi chanted dawn first bliss of l breath dissipat altar; and who of its tempests life in the coun
beneficent tepid
'the trumpet l danger, no mat in fighting the his strength."
After quo itself is neces
Lamartine, whi way in which I poetic significa clearest of all widely popular.
the instruments instruments.

Wm. Knabe & Co.

MANUFACTURERS OF

GRAND AND UPRIGHT PIANOS

EUGEN D'ALBERT.

From fullest conviction, I declare them to be the best instruments in America.

DR. HANS VON BÜLOW.

Their sound and touch are more sympathetic to my e and hands than all others of the country. I declare th the absolutely best in America.

ALFRED GRÜNFIELD.

I consider them the best instruments of our times.

P. TSCHAIKOVSKY.

Combines with great volume of tone, rare sympathetic and n tone color and perfect action.

THE WHITNEY & CURRIER CO.,
SOLE AGENTS,
217 and 219 SUMMIT STREET.

THE BEE JOB ROOMS, TOLEDO, O.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.

THURSDAY MORNING, JUNE 15, 1893.

TO SAVE THE SYMPHONIES.

An Effort Made to Build a New Music Hall on the Back Bay.

The new rapid transit bill, which will become a law (in all probability) next autumn, destroys Music Hall, thus depriving the city of the only hall which can be used for concerts, public meetings or festivals of any kind, always excepting Mechanics' Hall, which is too large for ordinary use. This loss will interfere with the concerts heretofore given at Music Hall, viz., those of the Handel and Haydn, Apollo and Cecilia societies and of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as well as all occasional concerts.

The contracts for the symphony orchestra are now in process, and must be settled at once. If funds to build a new hall cannot be raised within 10 days the concerts of that orchestra must be abandoned.

It is therefore proposed to build a new hall or theatre, of which the plans will be put in the hands of a competent committee. An option on an excellent location at the corner of West Chester park and near Huntington ave. has been taken at a fair price. To this end it is desired to raise $400,000, and subscriptions may be sent to the office of T. D. Boardman, Ames Building.

Boston Daily Globe.
THURSDAY, JUNE 15.

MAY LOSE MUSIC HALL.

Public-Spirited Men Have Begun a Movement with a View to the Erection of a New Building to Take Its Place.

Musical Boston's pride, the Symphony orchestra, will be disbanded unless a new music hall is guaranteed at once.

Music hall, the only place in Boston where public concerts can be given in a suitable way, will be destroyed if the rapid transit bill becomes a law at the special election in October.

It lies directly in the path of the new road so far as it is already outlined.

Mayor Matthews, in a conference with Col Henry L. Higginson, said that the probabilities are strong that the people will give their sanction to the bill and that Music hall will have to go.

In a fortnight Mr Higginson will have to present for signature the five year contract of the conductor and those of the 80 odd members of the Boston Symphony orchestra. This he will not do if he is not assured at once that they will have some suitable place in which to play.

A number of public spirited men have started a movement to raise the money necessary to build a new music hall, and they have issued the following appeal:

The new rapid transit bill, which will become a law, in all probability, next autumn, destroys Music hall, thus depriving the city of the only hall which can be used for concerts, public meetings, or festivals of any kind, always excepting Mechanics hall, which is too large for ordinary use.

This loss will interfere with the concerts heretofore given at Music hall, viz, those of the Handel and Haydn, Apollo and Cecilia societies, and of the Boston symphony orchestra, as well as all occasional concerts.

The contracts for the Symphony orchestra are now in process and must be settled at once. If funds to build a new hall cannot be raised within 10 days the concerts of that orchestra must be abandoned definitively.

It is therefore proposed to build a new hall or theater, of which the plans will be put in the hands of a competent committee. An option on an excellent location, at the corner of West Chester pk and near Huntington av, has been taken at a fair price.

To this end it is desired to raise $400,000, and subscriptions may be sent to the office of T. D. Boardman, Ames building.

A NEW HOME OF MUSIC.

If the new rapid transit plan is indorsed by our voters—and even the opponents of the project seem to concede its success—Boston, in gaining a new transit route, will lose its historic Music hall.

This means more than the loss of an audience room associated with many a pleasant memory, though that is no trifle. It implies, unless measures are promptly taken to assure the construction of another temple of music, the definite suspension of those offerings which have become such an established and notable feature of our seasons—the Boston symphony concerts.

Already something has been done in the way of securing subscriptions for a new and nobler music hall to serve the purpose which the old auditorium on Winter st has so well fulfilled. But there is need of haste in the matter. No such corps of musicians as that which makes up our symphony organization can be secured on an uncertainty—not to mention securing the services of a famous conductor.

There ought to be no doubt whatever as to the readiness and generosity of the response to the circular of appeal which has been issued calling for subscriptions towards a new music hall. Merely as an investment the enterprise is one to win favor. An eligible site is available on a main thoroughfare traversing the beautiful Back Bay district: and Boston's reputation as the home of generous lovers of the best in music will grievously suffer in the eyes of the world if the plan to "save the symphonies" and gain a new home for harmony is not an assured success before another week has gone by.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.
FRIDAY MORNING, JUNE 16, 1893.

NEW MUSIC HALL.

Plans Now Being Formed to Build One

ON WEST CHESTER PARK.

Colonel Higginson Explains—A Subscription Paper Opened in Mr. T. D. Boardman's Office—Contracts Waiting to Be Signed.

The plan to build a new Music Hall seems to be gaining favor with the people.

Everyone is sorry that the present one with its many old associations has to be given up, but, as outlined in yesterday's Post, there seems to be no other alternative.

The musical interests of Boston demand some hall in which the Haydn, Apollo and Cecilia Club concerts may be held, besides the symphony.

There is no other hall in Boston that [illegible] the requirements, and the only thing to do is to build a new one. [illegible] has been opened, and all those who love music and can afford it are requested to contribute to the fund for the new building. T. Dennie Boardman in the Ames building has this part of the undertaking in charge, and even at this early date has received assurances from a number of people that they are willing to contribute.

Mr. Boardman was seen yesterday by a Post reporter, and said that the scheme was going very well. He thought that without doubt the money could be raised to build the new hall.

LOOKING AT LAND.

Colonel H. L. Higginson, who has been for years the chief support of the Symphony Orchestra, has been thinking the problem over ever since the rapid transit plan was first agitated, and with other public spirited men has been looking around for a place to build.

He has finally decided upon the lot on the west corner of West Chester park, adjoining the children's hospital. The land is 225 feet on West Chester park, and runs back 150 feet on Huntington avenue and St. Stephen's street. It would allow of a much more spacious building than the present Music Hall, and room is what has been sadly needed of late years.

It will cost about $400,000 to insure the immediate erection of the building, but there is no doubt but that this will be forthcoming when people fully realize that the old familiar hall has got to go in the interest of rapid transit. The land can be obained for $100,000 and that will leave $300,000 for the building.

Colonel Higginson said yesterday: "This is the locality best adapted to our purpose. We will have good surroundings there, and the element of cost must be taken into consideration.

"I suppose we might get the sight of the old Public Library on Boylston street, but that would cost about $1,000,000. I think that the public will like the new location as well as the old. Of course the new building will have many advantages over the old.

"The rapid transit bill may not pass, but I think it will. In either contingency, it would hardly do for us to wait. If we are to have a symphony orchestra next season, we must get some hall now to put them in. The contracts are ready and waiting to be signed, but that I cannot do until I know I am to have a hall."

THE SITE FOR NEW MUSIC HALL.

There is some reason to question the wisdom of the site chosen for the proposed new Music Hall.

It is a long step from Winter street to the corner of Commonwealth avenue and West Chester park; but that is of little consequence if the place is found to be desirable when one gets there. To compare this site with that which is available for a public building on Copley square, however, one must acknowledge the superiority of the latter location.

The proposed new Music Hall is to be in a certain way monumental. It is to cost a great deal of money, to last a long time and to fill a large place in the life of Boston. Why not give it the best site that can be had?

If Boston is to have a new and great Music Hall, it should be placed where it will do the most good. And nowhere can it do better than in completing the architectural cluster of Copley square.

BOSTON HERALD — THURSDAY, JUNE 15, 1893.

A CRITICAL SITUATION.

Musical Boston Threatened with a Famine.

The Symphony Concerts and Rapid Transit—This Combination of Blessings Necessitates Immediate Action—$400,000 Must Be Raised in Ten Days for a New Music Hall.

A most critical situation in musical matters has been developed by the passage of the rapid transit bill by the Legislature.

It is assumed by many who are acquainted with such matters that the bill will be made a law by the vote of the people this fall.

The contracts for the Symphony orchestra are ready for next season, and that for the new conductor must necessarily extend for five years.

Now, if Music Hall is destroyed, the latter contract would involve a great loss for these concerts be discontinued indefinitely for the lack of a hall suited for such performances.

In addition to these concerts, those of the Handel and Haydn, Apollo and Cecelia clubs and all other affairs not designed for the big Mechanics' Hall are also threatened.

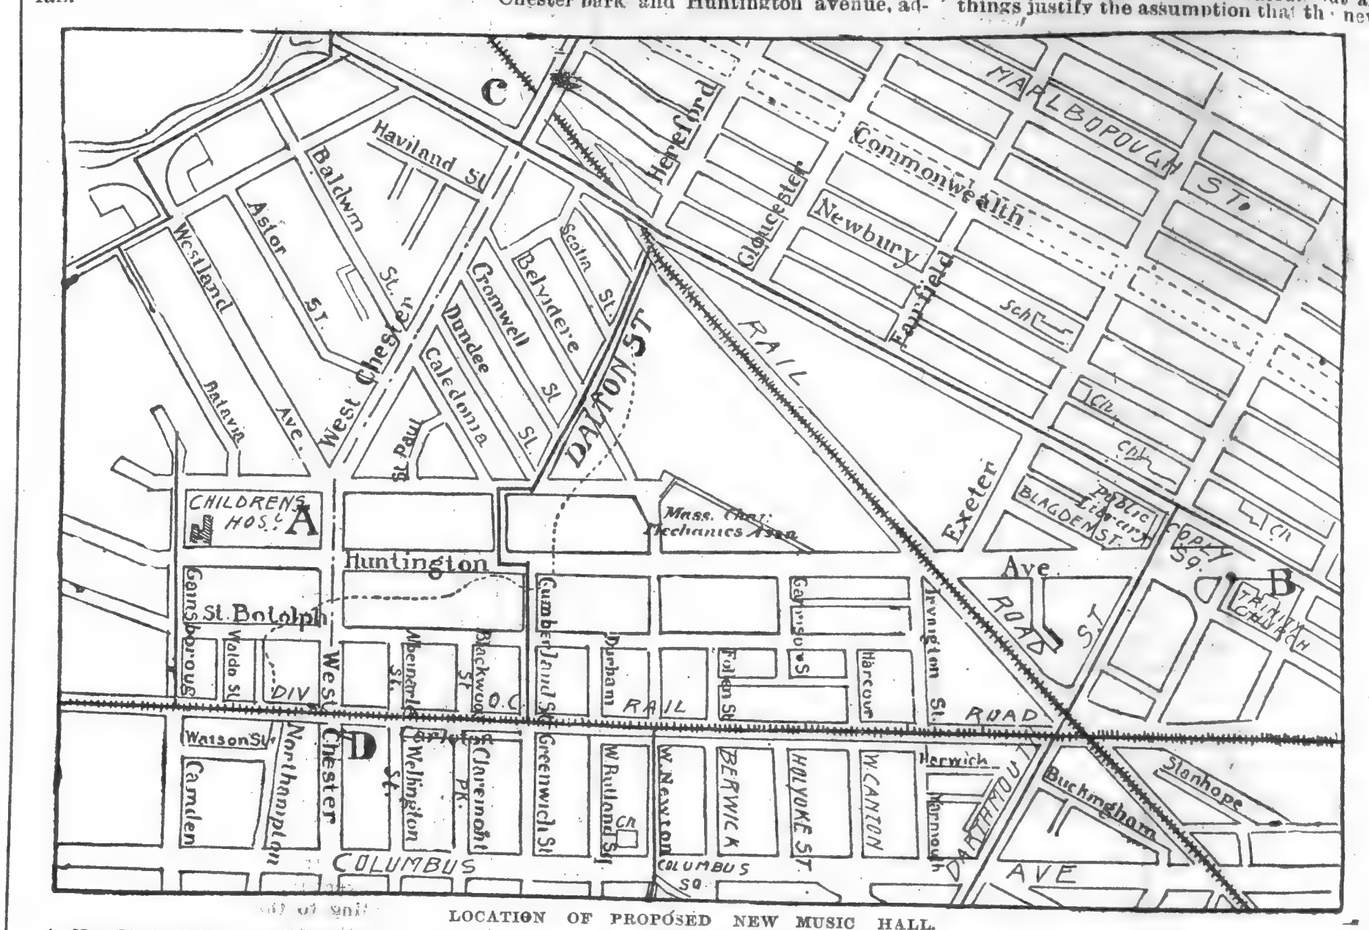
Col. H. L. Higginson, the founder and patron of the Boston Symphony orchestra had a consultation with Mayor Matthews this week, and was immediately convinced of the necessity of speedy action if he was to be sure of carrying on the concerts of the orchestra.

A number of the public spirited men who realize the abject poverty to which Boston would be reduced in musical matters if not immediately provided for by the supplying of a hall suited for the present uses of Music Hall have taken an option on the vacant land on the west corner of West Chester park and Huntington avenue, adjoining the Children's Hospital grounds, and have issued a call for subscriptions to the amount of $400,000 to insure the immediate building of a new Music Hall upon this site. The lot of land selected is shown on the map of the section given herewith. It measures 225 feet on West Chester park and 150 feet on Huntington avenue and St. Stevens street, being admirably adapted in its shape for the designed use. The present Music Hall site measures 125 feet long by 77 feet wide, so that the increased demands of a new building can be easily met.

It should be distinctly understood that with the new hall guaranteed, the Symphony orchestra will be continued; without such action Boston will lose the concerts which have given it such a position in the world of music during the last 12 years.

A slight study of the plan will remove many objections to the location which may at first arise. The Albany and Providence roads can both leave patrons within five minutes of the door. The Highlands and Dorchester patrons, as well as those of Cambridge and Brookline, are all from 10 to 20 minutes nearer the new location than the old.

Other advantages can easily be seen by a study of the situation. The possibilities of the future cannot be estimated, but all things justify the assumption that the new



LOCATION OF PROPOSED NEW MUSIC HALL.

A—New Music Hall site. B—Copley square. C—Proposed new station for the Albany railroad. D—Proposed new station for the Providence railroad.

If this assumption is correct, it means the early destruction of Music Hall.

Possibly this event might not cause great regret under certain circumstances, but as matters stand now it means a threatened musical famine for Boston.

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, JUNE 18, 1893.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Efforts Being Made to Secure a New Home for this Popular Form of Amusement—Subscriptions Needed.

The startling announcemont that the concerts of the Boston symphony orchestra will probably not be continued another season has made a sensation in musical circles.

It goes without saying that the cessation of these splendid concerts would be an inestimable loss to the community. For 12 years, through the liberality of Mr H. L. Higginson, Boston has enjoyed the opportunity of hearing as fine orchestral performances as are given in any city in the world, and it will be a lasting disgrace if the citizens allow these concerts to be given up.

No efforts should be spared to continue the life of an organization which has done so much for music and proved itself a source of pride and enjoyment to thousands of music lovers.

This can only be accomplished by providing at once a suitable auditorium in which the concerts can be given, and $400,000 is the sum required for this purpose.

Several public-spirited gentlemen have undertaken to raise this amount by subscription. The cooperation is asked of all who are interested in saving the orchestra and immediate action is necessary.

Unless the necessary sum is subscribed during the coming week the orchestra will be definitively disbanded.

To continue the concerts it is absolutely necessary within a few days for Mr Higginson to make contracts for future seasons with the musicians and with a conductor. These involve in the aggregate a very large sum of money, and the loss of Music hall, which will probably soon be sacrificed to the necessities of rapid transit, would leave the orchestra without a home.

Other societies, dear to the hearts of the public, such as the Handel and Haydn, Cecilia and Apollo, will, of course, find themselves in the same predicament.

Aside from the present combination of circumstances Boston has long been in need of a spacious, comfortable auditorium with all modern appliances for safety and ventilation and one which will be an ornament to the city.

An option has been secured on a lot which will be an almost ideal site for such a building, bounded by Huntington av, West Chester pk and Falmouth st.

Those who have the means should subscribe liberally, and above all, speedily, towards securing what is so manifestly needed at this time.

Mr T. Dennie Boardman of the Ames building has charge of the subscription.

[167]

Boston Journal.
TEN PAGES.
THURSDAY, JUNE 15, 1893.

MUSIC HALL MUST GO.

That Is, If the Rapid Transit Bill Is Sanctioned by the Voters—New Hall Wanted.

It seems to be assumed in State Street that the Rapid Transit bill, which is to be submitted to the voters in Boston at a special election in October next, will meet their sanction and become operative.

The chances are that the measure will be accepted by the voters of the city, and that the strip of land between Causeway Street and Franklin Park will soon be laid bare, preparatory to the building of the elevated road. Among the first public buildings to fall beneath this march of progress would be Boston Music Hall. A conference on Monday between Mr. Higginson and Mayor Matthews appears to have convinced Mr. Higginson that the probabilities are that the bill will receive the voters' sanction. At all events, the founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra feels so uncertain as to whether he will have a hall at his command for the winter of '94-95 that he has decided to abandon the concerts unless the funds for a new hall are at once provided. The time is short before he will be obliged to make a five years' engagement with a conductor and renew his contracts with the eighty odd members of his band. As the sum of these is large, it had become a very serious question by the first of the present week, as the decision must be reached within three or four days.

At this juncture a number of prominent and public-spirited gentlemen are trying to raise the money to build a new Music Hall worthy of Boston and its musical traditions. The sum of about half a million at least would be required for a fitting site and worthy structure. It should be understood that Col. Higginson is not among the subscribers—the Symphony concerts being considered his share.

ANOTHER MUSIC HALL!

Old Music Hall is one of the landmarks of Boston. Its present fame rests chiefly on its connection with the Symphony Orchestra. If the Rapid Transit law, which has just been enacted by the Legislature, is approved by popular vote and carried into operation, Music Hall will have to be demolished. It stands directly in the pathway of the proposed elevated railroad. If Music Hall goes, the Symphony concerts go with it, unless a new auditorium is provided. With this outlook before him, Mr. Higginson, the generous and public-spirited patron of the Symphony enterprise, is in a quandary. The time is approaching when he must make his five years' agreement with a new conductor and renew his contracts with his orchestra. But he cannot engage his artists unless he is assured of a place for them to play in. In this emergency Mr. Higginson has determined to continue the concerts only on condition that a new hall is guaranteed him for the winter of '94-'95, and a number of Boston gentlemen are endeavoring to secure the necessary funds for a site and a building of the proper size and dignity. It is said that a half million dollars will probably be required, and that the new location will be on the Back Bay.

Only a few days remain to decide the question. The project is an ambitious one, but there ought to be wealth and energy enough in Boston to carry it to a consummation if the present Music Hall has to be given up. Quite aside from the Symphony concerts, which have become a recognized Boston institution, and annually delighted thousands of people, there is need in this city of a first-class public hall of large dimensions to provide for other musical events. The plan is one which deserves the cordial sympathy of all Bostonians. But it should be said that there is still a strong likelihood that the old hall will not be disturbed, at least by the rapid transit legislation just enacted. If anything definite is done under the terms of the new law, it will surprise a good many of our citizens.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
FRIDAY MORNING, JUNE 16, 1893.

BACK BAY MUSIC HALL.

The Project Receiving a Great Degree o Encouragement.

The project for the building of a new music hall in the Back Bay is receiving the greatest amount of encouragement from people interested in such things. T. Dennie Boardman, at whose office a subscription paper has been opened, reports most encouraging success. "We are more than pleased," he said yesterday afternoon to an Advertiser representative. "The subscrpitions have come in in a very satisfactory manner and several thousand dollars already are subscribed. Still, at the present time I do not believe it wise to publish any list of present subscribers, or even to give the exact total already posted, as we wish to show the full strength of the movement in our list, and there are a number of important people, whose additions to the fund will no doubt be very large and to have whose names in the first list we are well able to wait a week or so, as they will more than add to the value of the paper."

A NEW MUSIC HALL?

The question of rapid transit, considered from the standpoint of the bill to be accepted or rejected next October, probably involves the present site of Music Hall. The route of the proposed elevated railroad runs through that site, and it is understood that if Music Hall goes, the symphony concerts will be abandoned, unless a new hall is forthcoming. This dictum is based on the belief that besides Music Hall, Boston has no fit place for holding such concerts.

The proposition has been made therefore that the people of Boston raise $400,000 to guarantee the construction of a new hall at the corner of West Chester pk. and Huntington ave. The sum mentioned is a large one to raise by popular subscription. It is doubtful whether the investment will prove a profitable one financially. The experience of the directors of the Metropolitan Opera House in New York can be cited, if any one thinks that such expenditures are likely to show a profit on the account books.

The situation of the proposed site, nearly a half-hour's journey from the northern depots, is not likely to please the residents of Charlestown, Chelsea, East Boston and the surburban towns to the north of this city. The residents in Cambridge, Brookline, Brighton, Jamaica Plain and Roxbury, however, will have a shorter distance to go than at present, if the new hall is built. The Albany road and the Providence division of the Old Colony have stations not far from the proposed site. Generally speaking the change, if made, will benefit the richer to the disadvantage of the poorer residents of Boston and the suburbs.

This fact ought to have an important bearing on the subscription list. The residents of Brookline, the Back Bay, Allston, Brighton, Roxbury, Newton, Jamaica Plain and Cambridge may be asked to bear the brunt of the expense, if the West Chester pk. site is chosen. After all, that is not an unfair proposition because those places or some of them, represent a large part of the wealth of this section. Residents of those sections probably compose a large part, perhaps the greater part, of the symphony audiences. The symphony concerts were not organized as a money-making scheme and have never been such. It is only proper that those who have great wealth should take some share in the proposed enterprise.

Of course all this depends somewhat on the action of the people on the rapid transit bill. The measure may be defeated at the October election. Yet the chances are the other way. As yet no opposition of much strength has been invoked against the bill, and as the verdict is to be delivered in a special election, it seems at least probable that the ayes will be more active than the noes in the absence of any popular agitation against the bill. But in the presence of even uncertainty as to the result, it is quite likely that no contracts for the next five years of symphony work will be signed. As the case now stands, unless a permanent hall can be assured the best orchestra in the United States may be disbanded.

That statement means a great deal to Boston. The splendid achievements of the symphony orchestra have been a matter of justifiable local pride. Boston will not willingly lose the honor of having the finest orchestra in the new world and one of the very best in all the world. In addition, Music Hall has been the concert hall of the Handel and Haydn, the Apollo and the Cecilia societies, and if the present building goes down a new music hall will be needed for those organizations. To the music lovers of Boston—and that means a large proportion of the people—the matter is very important.

Gazette
BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, JUNE 18.

A NEW MUSIC HALL.

It seems that the destruction of Music Hall is inevitable, in order to make way for the new rapid transit route through the city, and if another building of the same kind is not erected, Boston will be without a fitting place in which orchestral and choral works of importance can be heard to the best advantage. This means that unless a new hall be erected we shall lose, among other things, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, an event that no one who takes pride in the musical standing of Boston can anticipate without dismay. The concerts by this splendid organization have given the city an enviable place among the prominent music centres of the world, and their loss would be little short of a calamity. The situation is somewhat critical. Mr. Higginson cannot feel justified in reorganizing his orchestra, unless he has a proper place in which their performances can be given; nor can he make a contract with a new conductor, for the same reason. His future course must be decided within a very few days, and if some $400,000 be not subscribed for a new hall without delay, it is imperative that the concerts shall be abandoned. In this crying emergency a number of gentlemen have subscribed largely for a building to take the place of that which is to pass away. The site is already selected, but the subscriptions have not yet reached the amount called for. It would appear that Boston should contain enough of wealth and public-spirited music lovers to respond to the appeal made to them by the circular that has been issued. Mr. Higginson is content to contribute his share by maintaining the orchestra, and should not be expected to do more, considering the great expense and responsibility that fall on him in this connection. Time is an important element in the matter, for if the needed sum be not subscribed in a few days it is almost certain that the orchestra which has reflected such honor on Boston will have ceased to be, and it will be no credit to the reputation of the city as a rich and famous art home, that such a disaster should happen through lack of public spirit to avert it. The pulling down of Music Hall will leave us without any large concert room, and it is only a matter of time when another must be built to take its place, unless we are to be left wholly without a structure devoted to musical art of the highest order. The emergency might as well be met now as at any other date, especially in view of the certain disbanding of the symphony orchestra unless a proper home is provided for it. It is difficult to realize that the money will not be subscribed quickly and generously for a new Music Hall, but time presses; engagements with the orchestra are to be made, and a five years' contract with a conductor is to be signed. These important matters cannot be delayed beyond a week, and hence the situation is reduced to a consideration whether the symphony concerts are or are not to be continued. It would seem that an answer in the affirmative should be immediately given by the rapidity with which the money to build a new hall, is subscribed.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCIII, NO. 167.

FRIDAY, JUNE 16, 1893.

PROPOSED NEW MUSIC HALL.

Suggestion That It Shall Be Located on the Back Bay.

What Is Thought of the Plan by Mayor Matthews, Ex-Gov. Ames, Col. Henry L. Higginson and T. Dennie Boardman—Work on the Project Outlined in the Herald Begun.

The article in yesterday's HERALD, "A Critical Situation," in which was outlined the danger of suspension of our symphony concerts in view of the probable taking of the present Music Hall property for the proposed highway under the rapid transit system, excited a great deal of interest among the music loving people of Boston and those who have an interest in the general welfare of the city.

As in all new projects, there is, of course, a variety of opinions, but not a great diversity except as to the matter of location. There is, however, a great unanimity of expression favorable to securing some permanent, suitable and well located music hall, or music hall and opera house combined, in which the grand symphonies of the masters could be presented under the best conditions for reception and enjoyment.

A large number of gentlemen were called upon for an expression of opinion in relation to the matter, but many had not given the matter sufficient thought, and still others were too busy with the concerns of their business, and could not spare the time to think, perhaps much less to express their thought.

One of the busiest men in Boston, without a doubt, is

Mayor Matthews.

But, notwithstanding his cares, he gave enough time—a few minutes only—to talk of the project.

He said that he had the fullest and warmest sympathy with the project to build a new music hall and hoped it would be done, for he did not want to see our grand symphony concerts discontinued for want of an adequate hall in which to give them.

In regard to the proposed location on the Back Bay, however, his first thought was that it was rather too far removed from the centre of population. That section of the city, to be sure, was central to the populations of the Roxburys, the Newtons and Cambridge, but there were large and growing populations north, east and south of Boston that would be better accommodated if the new music hall were located nearer to the present business centre of Boston.

Why not, he said, take the public library property on Boylston street, which would be vacated by the city for its present purposes and be ready for delivery long enough before the present Music Hall would be demolished in any event.

It is true the cost of this property would be very great in comparison with that proposed for the new hall on Huntington avenue, but he believed that, as there was ample room on the library lot for an adequate auditorium in the rear, a very considerable front area could be utilized for business purposes, which would bring in a large revenue to the building association. The area was about 23,000 feet, and the depth about 300 feet.

Of course, the cost of this land would be very high, the lowest price that would be considered being about $35 per square foot, and he believed it would perhaps reach $40. Negotiations for its purchase had already begun, and it was, of course, only a question of a short time when such desirable and valuable property would be secured by some one.

Ex-Gov. Oliver Ames

was found at his office in the Ames building, and, on the subject being presented to him, said:

"The best location in the city of Boston, in my opinion, is the corner diagonally from where I live on Commonwealth avenue and West Chester park, right in the heart of the best residential portion of Boston. That is the best place also for Cambridge, Brookline and other towns. It is near the railroad, too—a large piece of property next to Henry D. Hyde's and Col. Pope's. It always seemed to me to be an ideal place.

"Another site is the corner of Dartmouth and Boylston streets, opposite the new Old South Church. There is a splendid place, central as well. I saw it mentioned some time ago, and it is really the grand spot. A proper building erected on that site and Boston would be proud of it. Of course the land would cost a good deal, but when you want an opera house or theatre, you want to put it where land is high-priced, and it pays to put it there. Such a building in that place could be used for a theatre if necessary.

"In the location proposed the cost would be, it is said, about $400,000. You could not get the land at the corner of Dartmouth street for less than $20 a foot. It is a valuable piece—the gem place in Boston for a building of that kind."

"Do you think the thing would pay there as a business operation?"

"I don't believe any music hall would pay as a business operation. The present one does not. But whoever goes into it does so with the idea that they are going to make a contribution to the public benefit."

"Do you think the moneyed men of Boston would be prepared to help a project of that kind along?"

"Oh, yes. I think so, if you make it fashionable."

"Don't you think they ought to?"

"Yes, I think so."

"What would the land cost near you?"

"I think it would cost from $12 to $13 a foot. Those corners are high. That is the only good corner there is left. You want to go where travel is. Travel by my house is perfectly immense. It is wonderful how it has increased since I have been there. There is a railway there and electric car lines to Brookline and Brighton."

"Would you be prepared, Mr. Ames, to help a project of that kind along?"

"I don't know. It depends altogether on how a fellow feels at the time. Sometimes you feel as poor as a crow; at other times you feel pretty well off. At this time I do not think a subscription would succeed, because everybody feels a little [illegible] by the trouble in the market."

"Do you think that under ordinary circumstances there would be a good show of [illegible] taste and they won't take anything. Of course, the best men get high wages and that is the reason it costs so much. The expenses go on, increasing from year to year."

"Do you think enough will be contributed to carry it through?"

"The first suggestion of it came from a gentleman outside who said that he would do so much, and he has given a handsome sum toward it. I hope there will be enough contributed, but I can't say much about it."

"Have you no assurances?"

"Oh, yes; we have $70,000 or $80,000 assured. It seems to me that the concerts are my share, after all. It has been a great risk and a great responsibility, as everybody knows. I think there is risk about it. I don't want to carry the load. I have it I can do anyway. There are enough other gentlemen interested in the plan to help it along."

Mr. T. Dennie Boardman,

in a brief interview, said:

"I feel that the Boylston street location is far better than the site at West Chester park and Commonwealth avenue, for the very reason that it is more central and that there is more means of conveyance near it. The great objection to having a music hall at the corner of West Chester park and Commonwealth avenue is the noise from the railway there. The situation is an admirable one—there can be no question about that—provided you cannot get a central position. If they could buy a lot of land in back of Copley square, where there is no noise, it would be a good thing. But they cannot. There is no land there. There is not room enough between the front of the street and the passageway. You would need 20,000 feet. This plan fills all the desirable conditions except centrality. The city is growing all the while; the site will be central in a few years, as population extends. We have got to grow to the south and west.

"I am going to have a very good conductor. The public have excellent musical another busy man, was found in his State street office. Of the project he said:

"Col. Henry L. Higginson,

"The plan is a very nice one, indeed. I like it. This matter is important with me, for I have to make my arrangements for the orchestra for the next five years, and in the next few days. I don't know of any other place. I have looked over the ground again and again, and I know of no other site. You have got to get far away from the railways, from the ringing of bells and from the sound of steam whistles. A man came to me two or three years ago with a plan for a music hall, but it was too noisy for me. I don't think Gov. Ames has taken that into account. The land will cost about $100,000, and the building will be erected for $300,000, perhaps for less. If you pay $100,000 or $200,000 for land, that makes it so much more to raise. It depends on what men will give. No doubt the condition of the market and the way people feel financially has something to do with it.

"This comes at an unfortunate minute for our orchestra, but it is necessary to decide. They can make the building both an opera house and a concert hall if they choose. You know it has taken a good deal of work and a good deal of money to get the orchestra together. We have not had so large an orchestra gathered before, nor has anybody else. There is no such orchestra merely for concert purposes in the world. They use orchestras in operas, and they play them in concerts, but ours is altogether devoted to concerts. In Vienna, Berlin, Paris and London all the great orchestras are used for opera purposes and for concerts, while ours is for concerts alone. I should be very sorry to see it go. I have spent a great deal of time and strength on it, and a great deal of money, and if the orchestra once goes apart, I don't know how we can get it together again.

"Well, we cannot play unless there is a place to play in, and I cannot engage the players unless I know I have a place. It won't do to wait a year, because I have to make my engagements for five years."

"Do you feel sanguine that the plan can be put through?"

"I don't know, but I think so. Every fellow has got to give a lift, or it won't be done. These gentlemen haven't got to put any money in now. The money would not have to be paid at once—not for some months, in fact. I think the people will do more if it is made perfectly clear that it will be only a few days before I shall have to throw up the sponge. I cannot keep people waiting. Today I got a cable from Europe asking what I had to say. I don't got know what I have to say. I have to take these men out of places where they are well placed. I want to know something tangible. If that place goes down, we want another place to go into.

"I am going to have a very good conductor. The public have excellent musical taste and they won't take anything. Of course, the best men get high wages and that is the reason it costs so much. The expenses go on, increasing from year to year."

"Do you think enough will be contributed to carry it through?"

"The first suggestion of it came from a gentleman outside who said that he would do so much, and he has given a handsome sum toward it. I hope there will be enough contributed, but I can't say much about it."

"Have you no assurances?"

"Oh, yes; we have $70,000 or $80,000 assured. It seems to me that the concerts are my share, after all. It has been a great risk and a great responsibility, as everybody knows. I think there is risk about it. I don't want to carry the load. I have it I can do anyway. There are enough other gentlemen interested in the plan to help it along."

Mr. T. Dennie Boardman,

in a brief interview, said:

"I feel that the Boylston street location is far better than the site at West Chester park and Commonwealth avenue, for the very reason that it is more central and that there is more means of conveyance near it. The great objection to having a music hall at the corner of West Chester park and Commonwealth avenue is the noise from the railway there. The situation is an admirable one—there can be no question about that—provided you cannot get a central position. If they could buy a lot of land in back of Copley square, where there is no noise, it would be a good thing. But they cannot. There is no land there. There is not room enough between the front of the street and the passageway. You would need 20,000 feet. This plan fills all the desirable conditions except centrality. The city is growing all the while; the site will be central in a few years, as population extends. We have got to grow to the south and west.

Boston Daily Globe.

MONDAY, JUNE 19.

COMMITTEE AT WORK.

Promise That Boston Will Speedily Have a New Music Hall.

That Boston will not be deprived of a suitable large hall for the symphony concerts during coming seasons is apparent from the fact that a committee on erecting a new building is working assiduously in the matter.

This committee has sent out the following communication:

We have been asked to act as a committee for the building of a new hall for music in Boston and also to receive subscriptions of money, and we shall attend to our duties in that respect. We have made Mr T. D. Boardman of the Ames building our agent, and are glad to answer any questions about the scheme.

The hall will be built under an act of incorporation and shares of $100 each will be issued. It is hard to find in Boston a square lot of 20,000 feet which offers good exits, quietness and cheapness.

The piece of land under option at the corner of Huntington av and West Chester pk combines all these points.

We think it the best site.

We beg to remind the public that great dispatch in subscriptions is needed in order to keep the Symphony orchestra together, and in order to finish the new hall by Oct 1, 1894, as before that date our city will be without a place for larger concerts.

(Signed) EDWARD W. HOOPER,
HENRY F. SEARS.
H. L. HIGGINSON.

SUNDAY HERALD

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCIII, NO. 169.

SUNDAY, JUNE 18, 1893.

THE SYMPHONIC CRISIS.

It is questionable if the public at large realizes the imminent danger which now exists as to the future of the Boston Symphony orchestra. Mr. H. L. Higginson, its founder and patron, is about as much a misunderstood man as any that can be named, but those who realize what a fashion he has of carrying out his agreements can hardly fail to have serious anxiety as to the future of the great organization he has so nobly sustained for 12 years.

In order to once again call attention to the matter it may be well to restate the situation. The contracts for the orchestra engagements must be signed at an early day, some of these extending for fully five years. Mr. Higginson, in common with many citizens, thinks that the Music Hall will be taken at an early day by rights granted under the rapid transit bill. Its destruction will make an orchestra an elephant upon his hands, for Boston possesses no other auditorium suited for such concerts as he desires to give.

The position that he takes is, therefore that unless he can be assured of the building a new Music Hall by others than himself suited for his uses in giving orchestral concerts, and unless this assurance can be had within a week's time, he will decline to continue the organization and abandon the Symphony orchestra once and for all.

It is, of course, difficult for the general public to realize this critical situation to its full extent, but it seems reasonable to suppose that those whose wealth has come to them in this city should take interest enough to study the position in which Mr. Higginson finds himself and come forward to extricate him from it.

The organization and maintenance of the Boston Symphony orchestra for 12 years is the greatest public spirited action in the cause of music known in the history of the world. Mr. Higginson has never asked or desired aid in this effort. He does not ask or desire aid now. He simply says that, if his fellow-citizens, many more able than he to do what he has done and is doing, will not guarantee him a place to give his concerts, he sees no necessity for assuming the immense financial obligations incidental to its maintenance.

An intelligent estimate of the extent of the risk assumed yearly by Mr. Higginson in this scheme of orchestral concerts puts the amount at from $200,000 to $250,000. In other words, if Mr. Higginson renews his contracts for the usual terms, and by the demolition of Music Hall and the failure of the plan to build a new one, has no place for his concerts during the season of '94-'95, he is liable to be called upon to pay a quarter of a million dollars for his adherence to his obligations of the last 12 years.

A very large proportion of the Saturday evening patrons of the Symphony concerts are wealthy, and it would be easy to name a dozen sets of a score each of these lovers of high-class music, who, by co-operation, could without personal loss, supply the financial assistance demanded.

The question, then, is, will the wealthy men and women of Boston by lack of action, cause the city the loss of the finest orchestral organization known anywhere in the world?

Boston Daily Globe.

SATURDAY, JUNE 17.

KEEP THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Must the famous Boston symphony concerts, founded through the generous enterprise of Mr H. L. Higginson, and now established as one of our city's great institutions, be suspended indefinitely?

Unless there is a very prompt and liberal response to the urgent appeal which has been made for subscriptions to provide for the erection of a new temple of harmony, the famous orchestra, which has been so justly the pride of Boston, must be disbanded, perhaps never to be brought together again.

The adoption of the rapid transit plan means the demolition of Music hall, and there is no other auditorium now in existence which can serve symphony uses in its stead.

No site for a new structure to be devoted to the interests of our music lovers can be found which will please everybody, but there are many points about the proposed location, on West Chester pk, which commend themselves. No doubt arrangements could readily be made for special stations near the hall on both the Providence and Albany railroad lines, and, although the residents of suburbs to the north would naturally much prefer a more central location, there ought to be no difficulty in the way of securing speedy and convenient transfer to the Back Bay from all quarters of the city.

Let our public-spirited men see to it without delay that the new Music hall shall be an assured fact. There is emolument as well as honor in the plan, and it will be to the lasting discredit of Boston's enterprise and zeal if its success is not speedily and amply assured.

Boston Journal.

TWELVE PAGES.

SATURDAY, JUNE 17, 1893.

THE NEW MUSIC HALL.

The success of the project for a new Music Hall will be a satisfactory test of Boston's interest in and devotion to the art of music. Mr. Higginson has done so much for music in Boston by his Symphony concerts that it is only just and equitable that he should not be called upon to be one of the contributors to the fund for the new building. It is the duty and it should be the pride of our men of wealth to start this enterprise without his assistance. Boston is a kind of Mecca for the music lovers of the country. The Symphony concerts are largely responsible for this fact, but it is also due to the excellent schools to be found here and the many accomplished teachers and the sympathetic appreciation which the community is reputed to give to music as to other forms of intellectual expression. It is fitting that such a city should have a modern structure distinctively a home of music, fulfilling all æsthetic requirements and the more prosaic but not less imperative demands of spaciousness and accessibility. The wonder is not that the city is now anticipating the erection of such a building, but that it has waited so long.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

SATURDAY MORNING, JUNE 17, '93.

THE MONEY COMES FIRST.

If Boston is to have a new Music Hall, the question of money comes a long way before the question of site.

This question has been placed before the public spirited men of Boston rather suddenly by the action of the Legislature in prescribing a plan for rapid transit. It comes at a season of the year when those who are most likely to take a substantial interest in such an enterprise are preparing for their summer leisure. And it is propounded with a demand for an instant answer.

Notwithstanding all this, the answer will come, and it will come promptly, unless the Boston of today has lost its traditional characteristics. With the assurance of the funds necessary to carry out the enterprise, the rest will follow easily and in due order.

The first requirement is provision for the purchase of a site and a guarantee for the erection of the building. The location can be considered later.

There is plenty of time to fight over the place for the new Music Hall after the money is raised.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCIII, NO. 168.

SATURDAY, JUNE 17, 1893.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Widespread Discussion Over the Situation.

No local topic has for years caused such widespread discussion in all circles as the possible loss of the concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra through the threatened destruction of Music Hall.

The solution of the difficulty, by the raising of the fund for the building of a new hall, is creating a desire for active participation in the work of securing the needed subscriptions, and much quiet canvassing was done "on the street" yesterday, and with very promising results.

The limited time afforded makes the holiday rest somewhat a misfortune, but it is safe to say that many "conversions" may be anticipated as the result of today's social gatherings.

Those who have taken the initiative in this effort to insure the future of the Symphony concerts are more familiar with such undertakings, and it is safe to say that whatever can be done will be done before the time expires.

All subscriptions may be mailed or delivered personally to Mr. T. Dennie Boardman, Ames building, corner Washington and Court streets.

[169]

BOSTON HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCIII, NO. 167.
FRIDAY, JUNE 16, 1893.

PROPOSED NEW MUSIC HALL.

Suggestion That It Shall Be Located on the Back Bay.

What Is Thought of the Plan by Mayor Matthews, Ex-Gov. Ames, Col. Henry L. Higginson and T. Dennie Boardman—Work on the Project Outlined in the Herald Begun.

The article in yesterday's HERALD, "A Critical Situation," in which was outlined the danger of suspension of our symphony concerts in view of the probable taking of the present Music Hall property for the proposed highway under the rapid transit system, excited a great deal of interest among the music loving people of Boston and those who have an interest in the general welfare of the city.

As in all new projects, there is, of course, a variety of opinions, but not a great diversity except as to the matter of location. There is, however, a great unanimity of expression favorable to securing some permanent, suitable and well located music hall, or music hall and opera house combined, in which the grand symphonies of the masters could be presented under the best conditions for reception and enjoyment.

A large number of gentlemen were called upon for an expression of opinion in relation to the matter, but many had not given the matter sufficient thought, and still others were too busy with the concerns of their business, and could not spare the time to think, perhaps much less to express their thought.

One of the busiest men in Boston, without a doubt, is

Mayor Matthews.

But, notwithstanding his cares, he gave enough time—a few minutes only—to talk of the project.

He said that he had the fullest and warmest sympathy with the project to build a new music hall and hoped it would be done, for he did not want to see our grand symphony concerts discontinued for want of an adequate hall in which to give them.

In regard to the proposed location on the Back Bay, however, his first thought was that it was rather too far removed from the centre of population. That section of the city, to be sure, was central to the populations of the Roxburys, the Newtons and Cambridge, but there were large and growing populations north, east and south of Boston that would be better accommodated if the new music hall were located nearer to the present business centre of Boston.

Why not, he said, take the public library property on Boylston street, which would be vacated by the city for its present purposes and be ready for delivery long enough before the present Music Hall would be demolished in any event.

It is true the cost of this property would be very great in comparison with that proposed for the new hall on Huntington avenue, but he believed that, as there was ample room on the library lot for an adequate auditorium in the rear, a very considerable front area could be utilized for business purposes, which would bring in a large revenue to the building association. The area was about 23,000 feet, and the depth about 300 feet.

Of course, the cost of this land would be very high, the lowest price that would be considered being about $35 per square foot, and he believed it would perhaps reach $40. Negotiations for its purchase had already begun, and it was, of course, only a question of a short time when such desirable and valuable property would be secured by some one.

Ex-Gov. Oliver Ames

was found at his office in the Ames building, and, on the subject being presented to him, said:

"The best location in the city of Boston, in my opinion, is the corner diagonally from where I live on Commonwealth avenue and West Chester park, right in the heart of the best residential portion of Boston. That is the best place also for Cambridge, Brookline and other towns. It is near the railroad, too—a large piece of property next to Henry D. Hyde's and Col. Pope's. It always seemed to me to be an ideal place.

"Another site is the corner of Dartmouth and Boylston streets, opposite the new Old South Church. There is a splendid place, central as well. I saw it mentioned some time ago, and it is really the grand spot. A proper building erected on that site and Boston would be proud of it. Of course the land would cost a good deal, but when you want an opera house or theatre, you want to put it where land is high-priced, and it pays to put it there. Such a building in that place could be used for a theatre if necessary.

"In the location proposed the cost would be, it is said, about $400,000. You could not get the land at the corner of Dartmouth street for less than $20 a foot. It is a valuable piece—the gem place in Boston for a building of that kind."

"Do you think the thing would pay there as a business operation?"

"I don't believe any music hall would pay as a business operation. The present one does not. But whoever goes into it does so with the idea that they are going to make a contribution to the public benefit."

"Do you think the moneyed men of Boston would be prepared to help a project of that kind along?"

"Oh, yes. I think so, if you make it fashionable."

"Don't you think they ought to?"

"Yes, I think so."

"What would the land cost near you?"

"I think it would cost from $12 to $13 a foot. Those corners are high. That is the only good corner there is left. You want to go where travel is. Travel by my house is perfectly immense. It is wonderful how it has increased since I have been there. There is a railway there and electric car lines to Brookline and Brighton."

"Would you be prepared, Mr. Ames, to help a project of that kind along?"

"I don't know. It depends altogether on how a fellow feels at the time. Sometimes you feel as poor as a crow; at other times you feel pretty well off. At this time I do not think a subscription would succeed, because everybody feels a little distressed by the trouble in the market."

"But you think that under ordinary circumstances there would be a good show of [illegible] depot. It [illegible] Chester park and to the Providence depot. There is talk that some time the Boston & Albany will have an extra station between Boylston street and Huntington avenue, and that would be equally near each of the sites I have spoken of. The other land is most valuable because there is nothing on it. You know they need a deep cellar in a theatre. That land is at least 20 feet above the track. So in making a building of that kind, where you have to have deep basements for scenery, you get an ideal place for that purpose. There would be hardly any digging. I don't know whether on Huntington avenue they would have to drive piles or not."

Col. Henry L. Higginson,

another busy man, was found in his State street office. Of the project he said:

"The plan is a very nice one, indeed. I like it. This matter is important with me, for I have to make my arrangements for the orchestra for the next five years, and in the next few days. I don't know of any other place. I have looked over the ground again and again, and I know of no other site. You have got to get far away from the railways, from the ringing of bells and from the sound of steam whistles. A man came to me two or three years ago with a plan for a music hall, but it was too noisy for me. I don't think Gov. Ames has taken that into account. The land will cost about $100,000, and the building will be erected for $300,000, perhaps for less. If you pay $100,000 or $200,000 for land, that makes it so much more to raise. It depends on what men will give. No doubt the condition of the market and the way people feel financially has something to do with it.

"This comes at an unfortunate minute for our orchestra, but it is necessary to decide. They can make the building both an opera house and a concert hall if they choose. You know it has taken a good deal of work and a good deal of money to get the orchestra together. We have not had so large an orchestra gathered before, nor has anybody else. There is no such orchestra merely for concert purposes in the world. They use orchestras in operas, and they play them in concerts, but ours is altogether devoted to concerts. In Vienna, Berlin, Paris and London all the great orchestras are used for opera purposes and for concerts, while ours is for concerts alone. I should be very sorry to see it go. I have spent a great deal of time and strength on it, and a great deal of money, and if the orchestra once goes apart, I don't know how we can get it together again.

"Well, we cannot play unless there is a place to play in, and I cannot engage the players unless I know I have a place. It won't do to wait a year, because I have to make my engagements for five years."

"Do you feel sanguine that the plan can be put through?"

"I don't know, but I think so. Every fellow has got to give a lift, or it won't be done. These gentlemen haven't got to put any money in now. The money would not have to be paid at once—not for some months, in fact. I think the people will do more if it is made perfectly clear that it will be only a few days before I shall have to throw up the sponge. I cannot keep people waiting. Today I got a cable from Europe asking what I had to say. I don't got know what I have to say. I have to take these men out of places where they are well placed. I want to know something tangible. If that place goes down, we want another place to go into.

"I am going to have a very good conductor. The public have excellent musical taste and they won't take anything. Of course, the best men get high wages and that is the reason it costs so much. The expenses go on, increasing from year to year."

"Do you think enough will be contributed to carry it through?"

"The first suggestion of it came from a gentleman outside who said that he would do so much, and he has given a handsome sum toward it. I hope there will be enough contributed, but I can't say much about it."

"Have you no assurances?"

"Oh, yes; we have $70,000 or $80,000 assured. It seems to me that the concerts are my share, after all. It has been a great risk and a great responsibility, as everybody knows. I think there is risk about it. I don't want to carry the load. I have all I can do anyway. There are enough other gentlemen interested in the plan to help it along."

Mr. T. Dennie Boardman,

in a brief interview, said:

"I feel that the Boylston street location is far better than the site at West Chester park and Commonwealth avenue, for the very reason that it is more central and that there is more means of conveyance near it. The great objection to having a music hall at the corner of West Chester park and Commonwealth avenue is the noise from the railway there. The situation is an admirable one—there can be no question about that—provided you cannot get a central position. If they could buy a lot of land in back of Copley square, where there is no noise, it would be a good thing. But they cannot. There is no land there. There is not room enough between the front of the street and the passageway. You would need 20,000 feet. This plan fills all the desirable conditions except centrality. The city is growing all the while; the site will be central in a few years, as population extends. We have got to grow to the south and west.

SUNDAY HERALD
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCIII, NO. 169.
SUNDAY, JUNE 18, 1893.

THE SYMPHONIC CRISIS.

It is questionable if the public at large realizes the imminent danger which now exists as to the future of the Boston Symphony orchestra. Mr. H. L. Higginson, its founder and patron, is about as much a misunderstood man as any that can be named, but those who realize what a fashion he has of carrying out his agreements can hardly fail to have serious anxiety as to the future of the great organization he has so nobly sustained for 12 years.

In order to once again call attention to the matter it may be well to restate the situation. The contracts for the orchestra engagements must be signed at an early day, some of these extending for fully five years. Mr. Higginson, in common with many citizens, thinks that the Music Hall will be taken at an early day by rights granted under the rapid transit bill. Its destruction will make an orchestra an elephant upon his hands, for Boston possesses no other auditorium suited for such concerts as he desires to give.

The position that he takes is, therefore that unless he can be assured of the building a new Music Hall by others than himself suited for his uses in giving orchestral concerts, and unless this assurance can be had within a week's time, he will decline to continue the organization and abandon the Symphony orchestra once and for all.

It is, of course, difficult for the general public to realize this critical situation to its full extent, but it seems reasonable to suppose that those whose wealth has come to them in this city should take interest enough to study the position in which Mr. Higginson finds himself and come forward to extricate him from it.

The organization and maintenance of the Boston Symphony orchestra for 12 years is the greatest public spirited action in the cause of music known in the history of the world. Mr. Higginson has never asked or desired aid in this effort. He does not ask or desire aid now. He simply says that, if his fellow-citizens, many more able than he to do what he has done and is doing, will not guarantee him a place to give his concerts, he sees no necessity for assuming the immense financial obligations incidental to its maintenance.

An intelligent estimate of the extent of the risk assumed yearly by Mr. Higginson in this scheme of orchestral concerts puts the amount at from $200,000 to $250,000. In other words, if Mr. Higginson renews his contracts for the usual terms, and by the demolition of Music Hall and the failure of the plan to build a new one, has no place for his concerts during the season of '94-'95, he is liable to be called upon to pay a quarter of a million dollars for his adherence to his obligations of the last 12 years.

A very large proportion of the Saturday evening patrons of the Symphony concerts are wealthy, and it would be easy to name a dozen sets of a score each of these lovers of high-class music, who, by co-operation, could without personal loss, supply the financial assistance demanded.

The question, then, is, will the wealthy men and women of Boston by lack of action, cause the city the loss of the finest orchestral organization known anywhere in the world?

Boston Daily Globe.
SATURDAY, JUNE 17.

KEEP THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Must the famous Boston symphony concerts, founded through the generous enterprise of Mr H. L. Higginson, and now established as one of our city's great institutions, be suspended indefinitely?

Unless there is a very prompt and liberal response to the urgent appeal which has been made for subscriptions to provide for the erection of a new temple of harmony, the famous orchestra, which has been so justly the pride of Boston, must be disbanded, perhaps never to be brought together again.

The adoption of the rapid transit plan means the demolition of Music hall, and there is no other auditorium now in existence which can serve symphony uses in its stead.

No site for a new structure to be devoted to the interests of our music lovers can be found which will please everybody, but there are many points about the proposed location, on West Chester pk, which commend themselves. No doubt arrangements could readily be made for special stations near the hall on both the Providence and Albany railroad lines, and, although the residents of suburbs to the north would naturally much prefer a more central location, there ought to be no difficulty in the way of securing speedy and convenient transfer to the Back Bay from all quarters of the city.

Let our public-spirited men see to it without delay that the new Music hall shall be an assured fact. There is emolument as well as honor in the plan, and it will be to the lasting discredit of Boston's enterprise and zeal if its success is not speedily and amply assured.

Boston Daily Globe.
MONDAY, JUNE 19.

COMMITTEE AT WORK.

Promise That Boston Will Speedily Have a New Music Hall.

That Boston will not be deprived of a suitable large hall for the symphony concerts during coming seasons is apparent from the fact that a committee on erecting a new building is working assiduously in the matter.

This committee has sent out the following communication:

We have been asked to act as a committee for the building of a new hall for music in Boston and also to receive subscriptions of money, and we shall attend to our duties in that respect. We have made Mr T. D. Boardman of the Ames building our agent, and are glad to answer any questions about the scheme.

The hall will be built under an act of incorporation and shares of $100 each will be issued. It is hard to find in Boston a square lot of 20,000 feet which offers good exits, quietness and cheapness.

The piece of land under option at the corner of Huntington av and West Chester pk combines all these points.

We think it the best site.

We beg to remind the public that great dispatch in subscriptions is needed in order to keep the symphony orchestra together, and in order to finish the new hall by Oct 1, 1894, as before that date our city will be without a place for larger concerts.

(Signed) EDWARD W. HOOPER,
HENRY F. SEARS.
H. L. HIGGINSON.

Boston Journal.
TWELVE PAGES.
SATURDAY, JUNE 17, 1893.

THE NEW MUSIC HALL.

The success of the project for a new Music Hall will be a satisfactory test of Boston's interest in and devotion to the art of music. Mr. Higginson has done so much for music in Boston by his Symphony concerts that it is only just and equitable that he should not be called upon to be one of the contributors to the fund for the new building. It is the duty and it should be the pride of our men of wealth to start this enterprise without his assistance. Boston is a kind of Mecca for the music lovers of the country. The Symphony concerts are largely responsible for this fact, but it is also due to the excellent schools to be found here and the many accomplished teachers and the sympathetic appreciation which the community is reputed to give to music as to other forms of intellectual expression. It is fitting that such a city should have a modern structure distinctively a home of music, fulfilling all æsthetic requirements and the more prosaic but not less imperative demands of spaciousness and accessibility. The wonder is not that the city is now anticipating the erection of such a building, but that it has waited so long.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.
SATURDAY MORNING, JUNE 17, '93.

THE MONEY COMES FIRST.

If Boston is to have a new Music Hall, the question of money comes a long way before the question of site.

This question has been placed before the public spirited men of Boston rather suddenly by the action of the Legislature in prescribing a plan for rapid transit. It comes at a season of the year when those who are most likely to take a substantial interest in such an enterprise are preparing for their summer leisure. And it is propounded with a demand for an instant answer.

Notwithstanding all this, the answer will come, and it will come promptly, unless the Boston of today has lost its traditional characteristics. With the assurance of the funds necessary to carry out the enterprise, the rest will follow easily and in due order.

The first requirement is provision for the purchase of a site and a guarantee for the erection of the building. The location can be considered later.

There is plenty of time to fight over the place for the new Music Hall after the money is raised.

BOSTON HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCIII, NO. 168.
SATURDAY, JUNE 17, 1893.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Widespread Discussion Over the Situation.

No local topic has for years caused such widespread discussion in all circles as the possible loss of the concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra through the threatened destruction of Music Hall.

The solution of the difficulty, by the raising of the fund for the building of a new hall, is creating a desire for active participation in the work of securing the needed subscriptions, and much quiet canvassing was done "on the street" yesterday, and with very promising results.

The limited time afforded makes the holiday rest somewhat a misfortune, but it is safe to say that many "conversions" may be anticipated as the result of today's social gatherings.

Those who have taken the initiative in this effort to insure the future of the Symphony concerts are more familiar with such undertakings, and it is safe to say that whatever can be done will be done before the time expires.

All subscriptions may be mailed or delivered personally to Mr. T. Dennie Boardman, Ames building, corner Washington and Court streets.

[169]

Boston Daily Globe.
FRIDAY, JUNE 16.

FOR A NEW MUSIC HALL.

Adoption of Rapid Transit Bill Means Much.

Present Building Would Have to be Abandoned for Music.

Col Higginson and Others are Preparing to Build Anew.

The passage of the rapid transit bill by the legislature and the assumption that the bill will be made a law by a vote of the people this fall has produced a critical condition in musical affairs.

If the bill becomes a law it signifies the destruction of Music hall, and until another suitable building is provided all symphony concerts, together with the Haydn, Apollo and Cecilia club concerts must be discontinued.

To meet this threatened emergency Col H. L. Higginson, the founder and patron of the Boston symphony orchestra, and other prominent and public-spirited men have carefully studied the situation and after scanning various localities, with a view to securing a new and desirable site for a music hall, have taken an option on the vacant land on the west corner of West Chester pk and Huntington av, adjoining the children's hospital grounds.

The lot measures 225 feet on West Chester pk, and 150 feet on Huntington av and St Stephen's st.

In location, shape and every other respect it is admirably adapted for the designed use, and adequate to the increased demands as regards dimensions over the present music hall.

The next step on the part of the promoters, who realize that immediate action is required if the Symphony orchestra is to continue, has been to issue a call for subscriptions, and this part of the undertaking has been entrusted to T. Dennie Boardman, whose office is in the Ames building. He has scarcely had time to do anything about it as yet, but no sooner was the call issued than the subscriptions began to flow in.

Already several thousand dollars of the sum total, $400,000, required to insure the immediate building of a new music hall upon the site of the Children's hospital have been subscribed, and the names of the donors will shortly be announced.

Col Higginson thinks that the land can be secured for $100,000, leaving $300,000 for the building, and says that of all the locations which might possibly be suggested, he knows of none so admirably adapted to the requirements of the case as the one here indicated.

"I presume we might be able to get the site of the old public library building on Boylston st," said Col Higginson, "but it would cost us $1,000,000.

"I am inclined to think that the public generally will favor the site on West Chester pk and Huntington av. It certainly is as convenient on the whole as the present music hall and the new hall will, of course, have many advantages peculiar to itself.

"It may be that the rapid transit bill will be defeated at the polls, but I am strongly inclined to think that it will be made a law.

"It would hardly do to wait, however, for if we are to have the Symphony orchestra immediate action is imperative.

"The contracts for the Symphony orchestra are ready for next season, and I can have the new conductor, but I am not going to close the contracts until I am sure that we shall have a suitable hall."

BOSTON HOME JOURNAL.

403 Washington Street, Boston, Mass.

June 17 '93

The prospect of a music famine in Boston is not pleasant, and the call for subscriptions for a new music hall in which can be given the Symphony concerts, the Apollo concerts and those of the Cecilia and Handel and Haydn societies, to say nothing of the hundred and one other concerts, should be promptly met by our public spirited citizens. The rapid transit bill sounds the death knell of the present building, and the directors of the Symphony Orchestra must immediately be assured of a place in which to give their concerts if contracts are to be made. The haste in the matter relates only to the securing of subscriptions, and $400,000 must be pledged within ten days. There is no question about this. Having the money in prospect, it will then be time enough to discuss fully how it can be best expended to meet all requirements, and this opens up a large question to which we shall give full attention. But the raising of the money must come first. Boston must wake to the situation.

Boston Transcript
MONDAY, JUNE 19, 1893.

READY FOR SUBSCRIPTIONS NOW.

A Committee Appointed to Receive Funds for the New Music Hall.

With Henry L. Higginson, Edward W. Hooper and Henry F. Sears as a committee to receive subscriptions and a continuance of the present public interest in the matter, a new and commodious Music Hall for Boston will soon become a reality. These gentlemen have agreed to act as a committee, accepting by the following letter:

We have been asked to act as a committee for the building of a new hall for music in Boston, and also to receive subscriptions of money, and we shall attend to our duties in that respect.

We have made T. Dennie Boardman of the Ames Building our agent, and are glad to answer any questions about the scheme. The hall will be built under an act of incorporation, and shares of $100 each will be issued.

It is hard to find in Boston a square lot of twenty thousand feet which offers good exits, quietness and cheapness. The piece of land under option at the corner of Huntington avenue and West Chester Park combines all these points. We think it the best site. We beg to remind the public that great despatch in subscriptions is needed in order to keep the Symphony Orchestra together and in order to finish the new hall by Oct. 1, 1894, as before that date our city will be without a place for large concerts.

[Signed] EDWARD W. HOOPER.
HENRY F. SEARS.
H. L. HIGGINSON.

Boston, June 17, 1893.

Mr. Boardman is meeting with good success in his efforts to raise the sum needed, but is not prepared to make any definite statement as to the amount subscribed.

SHALL BOSTON HAVE A MUSIC HALL OR NOT?

The connoisseurs of music in Boston generally appreciate the impending crisis in our means of musical enjoyment, the items of which are the demolition of the Music Hall and the dismemberment of the Symphony Orchestra. As chance will have it, however, they among us who are best able to appreciate the splendid opportunities for musical gratification the Symphony concerts afford are, as a rule, precisely the ones who are the least able to furnish the means for a new home for the orchestra. There are, however, citizens who possess both wealth and musical taste and who can sympathize with other music lovers in their anxiety over Mr. Higginson's present dilemma. There is but one way, however, to give expression to that sympathy, and that is to subscribe for stock in the new concert hall which must be built in order to save the orchestra. Furthermore, the emergency is pressing. Unless positive assurace that the hall will be built is in the hands of those who have already made a good start in this matter, within a week, the Symphony Orchestra will cease to be an institution and the city will also be without a proper, well-fitted, adequate hall for other high class concerts that demand a large apartment.

BOSTON EVENING RECORD.

June 19 '93

Entered at the Post Office as second class mail matter.

A new Music Hall. That means, of course, the destruction of the old one. By the time that is demolished and the city hall, with millions of other property, in order to make a roadway for the elevated to Franklin Pk., the bills will be a nice addition to the city debt. This road, however, will build up the southern suburbs, at the expense of those at the north, and still further emphasize the drift from Charlestown, E. Boston and Chelsea towards Dorchester and Jamaica Plain.

Whatever is done, we hope that it may be so arranged as surely to save the Symphony Orchestra. The outlook is not too rose-colored just at present. No conductor has been engaged and the men are waiting to sign contracts. No leader can be signed for one year alone. Mr. HIGGINSON must arrange for 10 years ahead. With any doubt at all of the occupancy of Music Hall he cannot proceed. Hence, the urgent need of settling the question of a new hall within 10 days. Elevated roads may come or not, but Boston wants to be sure of the Symphony Orchestra.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, JUNE 19, 1893.

THE NEW MUSIC HALL.

E. W. Hooper, H. F. Sears and H. L. Higginson Consent to Act as a Committee.

E. W. Hooper, H. F. Sears and H. L. Higginson, having been asked to act as a committee for the building of a new music hall and to receive subscriptions, have accepted and say:—

We have made Mr. T. D Boardman of the Ames Building our agent and are glad to answer any questions about the scheme. The hall will be built under an act of incorporation and shares of $100 each will be issued. It is hard to find in Boston a square lot of 20,000 feet which offers good exits, quietness and cheapness. The piece of land under option at the corner of Huntington ave. and West Chester pk. combines all these points. We think it the best site. We beg to remind the public that great despatch in subscriptions is needed in order to keep the Symphony Orchestra together and in order to finish the new hall by Oct. 1, 1894, as before that date our city will be without a place for larger concerts.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCIII, NO. 170.
MONDAY, JUNE 19, 1893.

THE NEW MUSIC HALL.

A Committee Appointed—A Stock Company Plan.

There seem to exist some misapprehensions as to the plan of those who are seeking to insure the future of the Boston Symphony orchestra by raising the fund of $400,000 needed to build a new Music Hall, and thus insure a future home for the organization in the event of the demolition of the present Music Hall.

The subscriptions asked for are not contributions for which no return is to be made, but rather guarantees that such amounts of the stock of a corporation, to be formed under Massachusetts laws, will be taken and paid for when issued in due form.

The shares will have a par value of $100, so that a very general subscription can be had, as any number of shares will be issued as they may be called for by the subscriptions.

It may be interesting to many to know that when the present Music Hall was built it was with money raised in the same way as is now being employed to secure its successor, and there is every reason to suppose that the stock in the new enterprise will prove, quite as good a financial investment as that has in the hall which has served the city so long as its principal concert auditorium.

The committee to whom has been intrusted the duty of securing the subscription to the stock is composed of Mr. E. W. Hooper, Dr. H. F. Sears, Mr. H. L. Higginson and Mr. T. Dennie Boardman, gentlemen whose names are a sufficient guarantee that the business will be advanced as rapidly and as successfully as is possible.

Only a few days remain for securing the subscriptions, and it may be well to again repeat the statement that unless the money needed to build the new hall is guaranteed to this committee the present week, the first of July will see the Boston Symphony orchestra an organization of the past and Boston put in the background among the musical cities of America.

It may also be well to call attention to what has been done and is being done in New York and other cities in this same direction.

New York has its great opera house, as a monument to the public spirit of its music-loving citizens, as well as the beautiful Carnegie Hall which has been provided by Andrew Carnegie as the home of the New York Symphony orchestra, an organization which is sustained by 50 subscribers instead of by a single citizen, as in the case of the Boston orchestra.

Chicago "points with pride" to her great Auditorium as a result of the public spirit of her citizens, and Cincinnati enjoys its own great Music Hall, provided by one of its liberal citizens.

A few more days only remain to determine whether Boston music lovers have the public spirit of their predecessors, and all who feel desirous of maintaining the credit of the Hub in this particular can call upon Mr. T. Dennie Boardman, 56 Ames building, today, and hand him their subscription for the stock of the new Music hall. Offers by mail may be addressed to the same gentleman.

The following circular has been issued by the gentlemen constituting the committee chosen to raise the sum required:

BOSTON, June 17, 1893.

We have been asked to act as a committee for the building of a new hall for music in Boston, and also to receive subscriptions of money, and we shall attend to our duties in that respect. We have made Mr. T. D. Boardman of the Ames building our agent, and are glad to answer any questions about the scheme. The hall will be built under an act of incorporation, and shares of $100 each will be issued. It is hard to find in Boston a square lot of 20,000 feet which offers good exits, quietness and cheapness. The piece of land under option at the corner of Huntington avenue and West Chester Park combines all these points. We think it the best site. We beg to remind the public that great dispatch in subscriptions is needed in order to keep the Symphony orchestra together, and in order to finish the new hall by Oct. 1, 1894, as before that date our city will be without a place for larger concerts.

EDWARD W. HOOPER.
HENRY F. SEARS.
H. L. HIGGINSON.

THE NEW MUSIC HALL.

We are glad to hear that the new Music Hall project is receiving favorable support from a number of influential citizens. The comment has been made that a site might be chosen that was more central than the one which has been selected for the new building, but when one takes into account the rapid growth of population toward the south and west and that in the future advances in methods of transportation will permit people to be carried from the north side to Chester park quite as readily as they now are to Berkeley street, the advantages of this location will not, we think, be seriously questioned. In less than twenty years from this time the district beyond Chester park will be densely populated, and many more people will be found in Boston living west and south of that line than are to be found north and east of it. The point has been made, and it is one deserving of attention, that any Bostonian who has been in Carnegie Hall, New York, will realize how beneficial it would be if we could have a hall of the same kind in Boston. This gives a seating accommodation of about 50 per cent. greater than is furnished by our Music Hall, is light and airy, has acoustic properties quite equal to those to be found in Music Hall, and, in fact, is in all respects what a great public hall should be. If we were to build one in accordance with this model, no one would have reason to regret the change that deprived our city of our time-honored place of amusement.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
TUESDAY MORNING, JUNE 20, 1893.

THE HALL SITE.

Some Valuable Suggestions and Facts From Mr. Jackson.

To the Editor of The Advertiser: You spoke today of the new music hall to be built, and commented on the location. Your remarks on this point are admirable, but it is fair that you should know why this particular place seemed best.

The new music hall must be far removed from steam railroads, because the whistles and ringing of bells, if near the hall, prevent the practice of the orchestra or choruses, as well as the performance of both.

The hall must be built on cheap land, as it is most difficult to get the money needed for it in any case. It must have ample and convenient exits; it must have a large lot of land. Copley sq. would be excellent, but the distance from the street to the alleyway is but 90ft., too small a space. Such land as can be had on Copley sq. is held at $20 a foot. The proposed land on the corner of Huntington ave. and W. Chester pk. is about $5 a foot. As the hall will require about 20,000ft. the price of land makes a great difference. The lot opposite ex-Gov. Ames' is too near the Albany road. The lot proposed by the mayor on Boylston st. and Van Rensselaer pl. is not quiet, and is far too dear. It can never have first rate exits. Mechanics Hall is to near the railroad.

It is not easy to find a large lot of land at the South End or West End which is not either dear or near the Providence or Albany railroads. On this lot on the corner of Huntington ave. and W. Chester pk. the hall would be behind shops, which would screen it to a certain extent from noise.

The truth is that several real estate people have been looking over this problem for five or six years, and have only two good lots—when quiet, exits and the size of the lot are considered—viz., the lot which is spoken of, on the corner of Huntington ave., W. Chester pk. and Falmouth st., and the lot just exactly opposite it to the north, which is far too large for this purpose. It is worth while, not only to get the hall well placed, but to be able to choose one's neighbors, and that can be done on the lot suggested, the hall occupying as much as is needed, say 20,000 ft. The expectation is that the land will cost $100,000 and that the hall will cost $300,000.

This question is still open, and if a better place can be suggested it will, no doubt, be gladly taken, but I think a careful study of the map of Boston, with the best desire to find a better place, will change your views.

Yours very truly, J. JACKSON.

Boston, June 16.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

WEDNESDAY MORNING, JUNE 21, '93.

SUBSCRIBE QUICK.

Colonel Higginson's Explanatory Letter About the New Music Hall.

There has been subscribed to date to the proposed new Music Hall $125,000, leaving $275,000 still needed, which must be subscribed before the close of the week if the Symphony Orchestra is to be saved.

The situation is clearly presented in this letter from Colonel Higginson:

To the Editor of the Post:

Sir—In order to avoid any mistake in the minds of the public as to the new hall for music, of which you have so kindly spoken during the past week, and of my relation to it, I ask leave to make the following statement:

I must engage a conductor for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, if at all, for five years, and musicians for one or more years, and before doing this must be sure of a hall in which to play. Still further, these engagements must be made at once, as the musicians cannot wait longer. In all probability the present Music Hall will be taken by the city within a year for the new street, and in any case it cannot be relied on for more than one season. There is no other hall in Boston which would fill the place of Music Hall for large concerts.

It has been a great pleasure for the past twelve years to plan for, to work for, and to support the Symphony Orchestra, which is the outcome of much artistic skill, knowledge and long and persistent work on the part of the musicians. No good orchestra can be got in any other way. I shall gladly carry on my work as regards the orchestra if a good hall be provided for it, but only on that condition.

The orchestra has this year reached a self-supporting stage, which it may or may not keep, for there is always a considerable risk each year as to the receipts. During these past years the total deficit has been large; but the expenses must always be met, and this risk falls on me, and may be fairly considered my share.

May I suggest that a new hall can readily, and without much greater expense, be so built as to be used for opera, and thus command a larger rental (it may well have open boxes, as in the Carnegie Hall in New York, and seats of various grades and at different prices) At the present time it is very difficult to get any theatre in Boston for opera, or other large occasional entertainments.

Every considerable city in our country has some such hall, and it is for the citizens of Boston and its neighborhood to decide whether they care enough for music in its different forms to build this hall; and for them to decide at once if they wish to keep the orchestra. Money will be wanted for the building later in the year, but the promise of it is needed now.

The building must be ready for use, so far as the Boston Symphony Orchestra is concerned, in October, 1894.

To sum up: The public may be sure that to make a good orchestra much work, much time, and much expense are required. All these elements have been contributed, and we have the orchestra as it now stands. Shall we keep it, or lose it for want of a proper hall? The decision cannot be postponed beyond a few days. Unless within that time a new hall is assured, I must disband the orchestra, and finally abandon the Symphony concerts.

HENRY L. HIGGINSON.

Boston, June 20.

[170]

Boston Daily Globe.
FRIDAY, JUNE 16.

FOR A NEW MUSIC HALL.

Adoption of Rapid Transit Bill Means Much.

Present Building Would Have to be Abandoned for Music.

Col Higginson and Others are Preparing to Build Anew.

The passage of the rapid transit bill by the legislature and the assumption that the bill will be made a law by a vote of the people this fall has produced a critical condition in musical affairs.

If the bill becomes a law it signifies the destruction of Music hall, and until another suitable building is provided all symphony concerts, together with the Haydn, Apollo and Cecilia club concerts must be discontinued.

To meet this threatened emergency Col H. L. Higginson, the founder and patron of the Boston symphony orchestra, and other prominent and public-spirited men have carefully studied the situation and after scanning various localities, with a view to securing a new and desirable site for a music hall, have taken an option on the vacant land on the west corner of West Chester pk and Huntington av, adjoining the children's hospital grounds.

The lot measures 225 feet on West Chester pk, and 150 feet on Huntington av and St Stephen's st.

In location, shape and every other respect it is admirably adapted for the designed use, and adequate to the increased demands as regards dimensions over the present music hall.

The next step on the part of the promoters, who realize that immediate action is required if the Symphony orchestra is to continue, has been to issue a call for subscriptions, and this part of the undertaking has been entrusted to T. Dennie Boardman, whose office is in the Ames building. He has scarcely had time to do anything about it as yet, but no sooner was the call issued than the subscriptions began to flow in.

Already several thousand dollars of the sum total, $400,000, required to insure the immediate building of a new music hall upon the site of the Children's hospital have been subscribed, and the names of the donors will shortly be announced.

Col Higginson thinks that the land can be secured for $100,000, leaving $300,000 for the building, and says that of all the locations which might possibly be suggested, he knows of none so admirably adapted to the requirements of the case as the one here indicated.

"I presume we might be able to get the site of the old public library building on Boylston st," said Col Higginson, "but it would cost us $1,000,000.

"I am inclined to think that the public generally will favor the site on West Chester pk and Huntington av. It certainly is as convenient on the whole as the present music hall and the new hall will, of course, have many advantages peculiar to itself.

"It may be that the rapid transit bill will be defeated at the polls, but I am strongly inclined to think that it will be made a law.

"It would hardly do to wait, however, for if we are to have the Symphony orchestra immediate action is imperative.

"The contracts for the Symphony orchestra are ready for next season, and I can have the new conductor, but I am not going to close the contracts until I am sure that we shall have a suitable hall."

BOSTON HOME JOURNAL.
403 Washington Street, Boston, Mass.
June 17—93

The prospect of a music famine in Boston is not pleasant, and the call for subscriptions for a new music hall in which can be given the Symphony concerts, the Apollo concerts and those of the Cecilia and Handel and Haydn societies, to say nothing of the hundred and one other concerts, should be promptly met by our public spirited citizens. The rapid transit bill sounds the death knell of the present building, and the directors of the Symphony Orchestra must immediately be assured of a place in which to give their concerts if contracts are to be made. The haste in the matter relates only to the securing of subscriptions, and $400,000 must be pledged within ten days. There is no question about this. Having the money in prospect, it will then be time enough to discuss fully how it can be best expended to meet all requirements, and this opens up a large question to which we shall give full attention. But the raising of the money must come first. Boston must wake to the situation.

Boston Transcript
MONDAY, JUNE 19, 1893.

READY FOR SUBSCRIPTIONS NOW.

A Committee Appointed to Receive Funds for the New Music Hall.

With Henry L. Higginson, Edward W. Hooper and Henry F. Sears as a committee to receive subscriptions and a continuance of the present public interest in the matter, a new and commodious Music Hall for Boston will soon become a reality. These gentlemen have agreed to act as a committee, accepting by the following letter:

We have been asked to act as a committee for the building of a new hall for music in Boston, and also to receive subscriptions of money, and we shall attend to our duties in that respect.

We have made T. Dennie Boardman of the Ames Building our agent, and are glad to answer any questions about the scheme. The hall will be built under an act of incorporation, and shares of $100 each will be issued.

It is hard to find in Boston a square lot of twenty thousand feet which offers good exits, quietness and cheapness. The piece of land under option at the corner of Huntington avenue and West Chester Park combines all these points. We think it the best site. We beg to remind the public that great despatch in subscriptions is needed in order to keep the Symphony Orchestra together and in order to finish the new hall by Oct. 1, 1894, as before that date our city will be without a place for large concerts.

[Signed] EDWARD W. HOOPER.
HENRY F. SEARS.
H. L. HIGGINSON.

Boston, June 17, 1893.

Mr. Boardman is meeting with good success in his efforts to raise the sum needed, but is not prepared to make any definite statement as to the amount subscribed.

SHALL BOSTON HAVE A MUSIC HALL OR NOT?

The connoisseurs of music in Boston generally appreciate the impending crisis in our means of musical enjoyment, the items of which are the demolition of the Music Hall and the dismemberment of the Symphony Orchestra. As chance will have it, however, they among us who are best able to appreciate the splendid opportunities for musical gratification the Symphony concerts afford are, as a rule, precisely the ones who are the least able to furnish the means for a new home for the orchestra. There are, however, citizens who possess both wealth and musical taste and who can sympathize with other music lovers in their anxiety over Mr. Higginson's present dilemma. There is but one way, however, to give expression to that sympathy, and that is to subscribe for stock in the new concert hall which must be built in order to save the orchestra. Furthermore, the emergency is pressing. Unless positive assurace that the hall will be built is in the hands of those who have already made a good start in this matter, within a week, the Symphony Orchestra will cease to be an institution and the city will also be without a proper, well-fitted, adequate hall for other high class concerts that demand a large apartment.

BOSTON EVENING RECORD.
June 19—93
Entered at the Post Office as second class mail matter.

A new Music Hall. That means, of course, the destruction of the old one. By the time that is demolished and the city hall, with millions of other property, in order to make a roadway for the elevated to Franklin Pk., the bills will be a nice addition to the city debt. This road, however, will build up the southern suburbs, at the expense of those at the north, and still further emphasize the drift from Charlestown, E. Boston and Chelsea towards Dorchester and Jamaica Plain.

Whatever is done, we hope that it may be so arranged as surely to save the Symphony Orchestra. The outlook is not too rose-colored just at present. No conductor has been engaged and the men are waiting to sign contracts. No leader can be signed for one year alone. Mr. HIGGINSON must arrange for 10 years ahead. With any doubt at all of the occupancy of Music Hall he cannot proceed. Hence, the urgent need of settling the question of a new hall within 10 days. Elevated roads may come or not, but Boston wants to be sure of the Symphony Orchestra.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
MONDAY MORNING, JUNE 19, 1893.

THE NEW MUSIC HALL.

E. W. Hooper, H. F. Sears and H. L. Higginson Consent to Act as a Committee.

E. W. Hooper, H. F. Sears and H. L. Higginson, having been asked to act as a committee for the building of a new music hall and to receive subscriptions, have accepted and say:—

We have made Mr. T. D Boardman of the Ames Building our agent and are glad to answer any questions about the scheme. The hall will be built under an act of incorporation and shares of $100 each will be issued. It is hard to find in Boston a square lot of 20,000 feet which offers good exits, quietness and cheapness. The piece of land under option at the corner of Huntington ave. and West Chester pk. combines all these points. We think it the best site. We beg to remind the public that great despatch in subscriptions is needed in order to keep the Symphony Orchestra together and in order to finish the new hall by Oct. 1, 1894, as before that date our city will be without a place for larger concerts.

BOSTON HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCIII, NO. 170.
MONDAY, JUNE 19, 1893.

THE NEW MUSIC HALL.

A Committee Appointed—A Stock Company Plan.

There seem to exist some misapprehensions as to the plan of those who are seeking to insure the future of the Boston Symphony orchestra by raising the fund of $400,000 needed to build a new Music Hall, and thus insure a future home for the organization in the event of the demolition of the present Music Hall.

The subscriptions asked for are not contributions for which no return is to be made, but rather guarantees that such amounts of the stock of a corporation, to be formed under Massachusetts laws, will be taken and paid for when issued in due form.

The shares will have a par value of $100, so that a very general subscription can be had, as any number of shares will be issued as they may be called for by the subscriptions.

It may be interesting to many to know that when the present Music Hall was built it was with money raised in the same way as is now being employed to secure its successor, and there is every reason to suppose that the stock in the new enterprise will prove, quite as good a financial investment as that has in the hall which has served the city so long as its principal concert auditorium.

The committee to whom has been intrusted the duty of securing the subscription to the stock is composed of Mr. E. W. Hoopes, Dr. H. F. Sears, Mr. H. L. Higginson and Mr. T. Dennie Boardman, gentlemen whose names are a sufficient guarantee that the business will be advanced as rapidly and as successfully as is possible.

Only a few days remain for securing the subscriptions, and it may be well to again repeat the statement that unless the money needed to build the new hall is guaranteed to this committee the present week, the first of July will see the Boston Symphony orchestra an organization of the past and Boston put in the background among the musical cities of America.

It may also be well to call attention to what has been done and is being done in New York and other cities in this same direction.

New York has its great opera house, as a monument to the public spirit of its music-loving citizens, as well as the beautiful Carnegie Hall which has been provided by Andrew Carnegie as the home of the New York Symphony orchestra, an organization which is sustained by 50 subscribers instead of by a single citizen, as in the case of the Boston orchestra.

Chicago "points with pride" to her great Auditorium as a result of the public spirit of her citizens, and Cincinnati enjoys its own great Music Hall, provided by one of its liberal citizens.

A few more days only remain to determine whether Boston music lovers have the public spirit of their predecessors, and all who feel desirous of maintaining the credit of the Hub in this particular can call upon Mr. T. Dennie Boardman, 56 Ames building, today, and hand him their subscription for the stock of the new Music hall. Offers by mail may be addressed to the same gentleman.

The following circular has been issued by the gentlemen constituting the committee chosen to raise the sum required:

BOSTON, June 17, 1893.

We have been asked to act as a committee for the building of a new hall for music in Boston, and also to receive subscriptions of money, and we shall attend to our duties in that respect. We have made Mr. T. D. Boardman of the Ames building our agent, and are glad to answer any questions about the scheme. The hall will be built under an act of incorporation, and shares of $100 each will be issued. It is hard to find in Boston a square lot of 20,000 feet which offers good exits, quietness and cheapness. The piece of land under option at the corner of Huntington avenue and West Chester Park combines all these points. We think it the best site. We beg to remind the public that great dispatch in subscriptions is needed in order to keep the Symphony orchestra together, and in order to finish the new hall by Oct. 1, 1894, as before that date our city will be without a place for larger concerts.

EDWARD W. HOOPER.
HENRY F. SEARS.
H. L. HIGGINSON.

THE NEW MUSIC HALL.

We are glad to hear that the new Music Hall project is receiving favorable support from a number of influential citizens. The comment has been made that a site might be chosen that was more central than the one which has been selected for the new building, but when one takes into account the rapid growth of population toward the south and west and that in the future advances in methods of transportation will permit people to be carried from the north side to Chester park quite as readily as they now are to Berkeley street, the advantages of this location will not, we think, be seriously questioned. In less than twenty years from this time the district beyond Chester park will be densely populated, and many more people will be found in Boston living west and south of that line than are to be found north and east of it. The point has been made, and it is one deserving of attention, that any Bostonian who has been in Carnegie Hall, New York, will realize how beneficial it would be if we could have a hall of the same kind in Boston. This gives a seating accommodation of about 50 per cent. greater than is furnished by our Music Hall, is light and airy, has acoustic properties quite equal to those to be found in Music Hall, and, in fact, is in all respects what a great public hall should be. If we were to build one in accordance with this model, no one would have reason to regret the change that deprived our city of our time-honored place of amusement.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
TUESDAY MORNING, JUNE 20, 1893.

THE HALL SITE.

Some Valuable Suggestions and Facts From Mr. Jackson.

To the Editor of The Advertiser: You spoke today of the new music hall to be built, and commented on the location. Your remarks on this point are admirable, but it is fair that you should know why this particular place seemed best.

The new music hall must be far removed from steam railroads, because the whistles and ringing of bells, if near the hall, prevent the practice of the orchestra or choruses, as well as the performance of both.

The hall must be built on cheap land, as it is most difficult to get the money needed for it in any case. It must have ample and convenient exits; it must have a large lot of land. Copley sq. would be excellent, but the distance from the street to the alleyway is but 90ft., too small a space. Such land as can be had on Copley sq. is held at $20 a foot. The proposed land on the corner of Huntington ave. and W. Chester pk. is about $5 a foot. As the hall will require about 20,000ft. the price of land makes a great difference. The lot opposite ex-Gov. Ames' is too near the Albany road. The lot proposed by the mayor on Boylston st. and Van Rensselaer pl. is not quiet, and is far too dear. It can never have first rate exits. Mechanics Hall is to near the railroad.

It is not easy to find a large lot of land at the South End or West End which is not either dear or near the Providence or Albany railroads. On this lot on the corner of Huntington ave. and W. Chester pk. the hall would be behind shops, which would screen it to a certain extent from noise.

The truth is that several real estate people have been looking over this problem for five or six years, and have only two good lots—when quiet, exits and the size of the lot are considered—viz., the lot which is spoken of, on the corner of Huntington ave., W. Chester pk. and Falmouth st., and the lot just exactly opposite it to the north, which is far too large for this purpose. It is worth while, not only to get the hall well placed, but to be able to choose one's neighbors, and that can be done on the lot suggested, the hall occupying as much as is needed, say 20,000 ft. The expectation is that the land will cost $100,000 and that the hall will cost $300,000.

This question is still open, and if a better place can be suggested it will, no doubt, be gladly taken, but I think a careful study of the map of Boston, with the best desire to find a better place, will change your views.

Yours very truly, J. JACKSON.

Boston, June 16.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.
WEDNESDAY MORNING, JUNE 21, '93.

SUBSCRIBE QUICK.

Colonel Higginson's Explanatory Letter About the New Music Hall.

There has been subscribed to date to the proposed new Music Hall $125,000, leaving $275,000 still needed, which must be subscribed before the close of the week if the Symphony Orchestra is to be saved.

The situation is clearly presented in this letter from Colonel Higginson:

To the Editor of the Post:

Sir—In order to avoid any mistake in the minds of the public as to the new hall for music, of which you have so kindly spoken during the past week, and of my relation to it, I ask leave to make the following statement:

I must engage a conductor for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, if at all, for five years, and musicians for one or more years, and before doing this must be sure of a hall in which to play. Still further, these engagements must be made at once, as the musicians cannot wait longer. In all probability the present Music Hall will be taken by the city within a year for the new street, and in any case it cannot be relied on for more than one season. There is no other hall in Boston which would fill the place of Music Hall for large concerts.

It has been a great pleasure for the past twelve years to plan for, to work for, and to support the Symphony Orchestra, which is the outcome of much artistic skill, knowledge and long and persistent work on the part of the musicians. No good orchestra can be got in any other way. I shall gladly carry on my work as regards the orchestra if a good hall be provided for it, but only on that condition.

The orchestra has this year reached a self-supporting stage, which it may or may not keep, for there is always a considerable risk each year as to the receipts. During these past years the total deficit has been large; but the expenses must always be met, and this risk falls on me, and may be fairly considered my share.

May I suggest that a new hall can readily, and without much greater expense, be so built as to be used for opera, and thus command a larger rental (it may well have open boxes, as in the Carnegie Hall in New York, and seats of various grades and at different prices) At the present time it is very difficult to get any theatre in Boston for opera, or other large occasional entertainments.

Every considerable city in our country has some such hall, and it is for the citizens of Boston and its neighborhood to decide whether they care enough for music in its different forms to build this hall; and for them to decide at once if they wish to keep the orchestra. Money will be wanted for the building later in the year, but the promise of it is needed now.

The building must be ready for use, so far as the Boston Symphony Orchestra is concerned, in October, 1894.

To sum up: The public may be sure that to make a good orchestra much work, much time, and much expense are required. All these elements have been contributed, and we have the orchestra as it now stands. Shall we keep it, or lose it for want of a proper hall? The decision cannot be postponed beyond a few days. Unless within that time a new hall is assured, I must disband the orchestra, and finally abandon the Symphony concerts.

HENRY L. HIGGINSON.

Boston, June 20.

[170]

BOSTON HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCIII, NO. 172.
WEDNSDAY, JUNE 21, 1893.

THE FUTURE OF THE SYMPHONIES.

Mr. Henry L. Higginson on the Need of a New Music Hall.

To the Editor of the Herald: In order to avoid any mistake in the minds of the public as to the new hall for music, of which you have so kindly spoken during the past week, and of my relation to it, I ask leave to make the following statement:

I must engage a conductor for the Boston Symphony orchestra, if at all, for five years, and musicians for one or more years, and before doing this must be sure of a hall in which to play. Still further, these engagements must be made at once, as the musicians cannot wait longer. In all probability the present Music Hall will be taken by the city within a year for the new street, and in any case it cannot be relied on for more than one season. There is no other hall in Boston which would fill the place of Music Hall for large concerts.

It has been a great pleasure for the past 12 years to plan for, to work for and to support the Symphony orchestra, which is the outcome of much artistic skill, knowledge and long, persistent work on the part of the musicians. No good orchestra can be got in any other way. I shall gladly carry on my work as regards the orchestra if a good hall be provided for it, but only in that condition.

The orchestra has this year reached a self-supporting stage, which it may or may not keep, for there is always a considerable risk each year as to the receipts. During these past years the total deficit has been large; but the expenses must always be met, and this risk falls on me, and may be fairly considered my share.

May I suggest that a new hall can readily and without much greater expense be built so as to be used for opera, and thus command a larger rental (it may well have open boxes, as in the Carnegie Hall in New York, and seats of various grades and at different prices). At the present time it is very difficult to get any theatre in Boston for opera or other large occasional entertainments.

Every considerable city in our country has some such hall, and it is for the citizens of Boston and its neighborhood to decide whether they care enough for music in its different forms to build this hall; and for them to decide at once if they wish to keep the orchestra. Money will be wanted for the building later in the year, but the promise of it is needed now.

The building must be ready for use, so far as the Boston Symphony orchestra is concerned, in October, 1894.

To sum up: The public may be sure that to make a good orchestra much work, much time and much expense are required. All these elements have been contributed, and we have the orchestra as it now stands. Shall we keep it, or lose it for want of a proper hall? The decision cannot be postponed beyond a few days. Unless within that time a new hall is assured, I must disband the orchestra, and finally abandon the Symphony concerts.

HENRY L. HIGGINSON.

Boston, June 20, 1893.

THE MUSIC HALL SITE.

It will be a mistake to estimate the site for a Music Hall as we should estimate the site for a theatre. A Music Hall is built for a long time, for the use of audiences who come out less constantly than do those who attend theatres, and who come on occasions when the matter of distances is comparatively of little consequence. The theatres meet large present rivalry, and are so arranged that there are facilities for special audiences in different parts of the city. A Music Hall such as is proposed to be built will take a comparatively limited audience in view of the combined theatre audiences. The point is to accommodate as many of them as possible in its position. The opportunity to reach it by railroad is an important factor here. The South end site seems best of all fitted to this end, as it is accessible from Cambridge, as well as from Newton, Brookline, Dorchester and the Roxburys. There will be good railroad facilities for carrying people even farther north east than Cambridge. Of course the centre of the city would relieve some of these latter from what may seem long travel, but the expense of land would be enormously greater here, and there would be street inconveniences in gathering and dispersing audiences that would not exist farther out. We are inclined to believe that the site proposed is very near the centre of population of concert audiences now, and with an eye to the future it seems impossible that such will not be more and more the case as time progresses.

Boston Transcript
WEDNESDAY, JUNE 21, 1893.

THE NEW MUSIC HALL.

To the Editor of the Transcript: The citizens of Boston seem strangely to fail to appreciate the public importance of completing at once the subscriptions for a new building to take the place of Music Hall, for it is hardly probable that the sum needed—$400,000—would be wanting long if the matter were rightly understood. Briefly stated, the facts of the case are these:

Even were there no question of the removal of the present building, Music Hall has certain obvious defects which prevent its being at all adequate to its uses or worthy of the splendid series of concerts which are given there. The entrances are awkward, and its enclosed position prevents their being improved. The same cause, together with the character of the building, renders proper ventilation impossible; and every frequenter of the Symphony concerts has suffered from the bad air of the the auditorium. Both these considerations are of importance; and it is to be added that it is a shame to Boston that it has so long failed to provide a proper hall for the concerts which are at once a delight and an inspiration to every music-lover, and an object not only of civic pride, but of interest to every man who has a wholesome pleasure in seeing an American city take its place in the front ranks of the musical centres of the world.

The proposed building is to be owned by a corporation—an advantage not to be overlooked—and will afford a hall not only for the symphonies, but for opera, which now seeks in vain for proper accommodation in Boston. If there were a suitable place here, it is not to be doubted that we should have far more opera, and hear it under better conditions, than at present. This would also be likely to insure an income from the house, so that the investment, although a long one, would not be in the end a losing one. Those who subscribe to the fund are not necessarily giving their money to a philanthropic scheme, although under the circumstances there should be no difficulty in raising $400,000 in Boston for a purpose which so vitally affects the best interests of the city.

The thing which complicates the question is the necessity of completing the subscription at once. The contracts with the members of the orchestra for five years must be signed by the first of July. The leading musicians cannot be kept waiting in uncertainty, and Colonel Higginson naturally cannot afford to risk the loss of a quarter of a million by taking the chance of having the orchestra on his hands for four years, with no place in which to give concerts should Music Hall be pulled down next summer. The shares are $100 each, and there should be many among the large body of concert-goers and the music lovers in the city who are able to take a few shares if they cannot do more. Something must be decided within the next week, and it will be cause for lasting regret and shame should our noble orchestra be disbanded because the moneyed men of Boston will not rally to the support of the finest and most disinterested art enterprise which has ever been seen in America, and of which it is not too much to say that it has not had its parallel in the history of music. It is certainly not possible that Bostonians are so insensible to generosity, public spirit and the influence of art as to fail now that a practical test is applied to their appreciation. The response must be instant to be effective. It should be abundant alike from a sense of the merits of the case and from simple justice.

A. B.

Boston Journal.
TEN PAGES.
WEDNESDAY, JUNE 21, 1893.

COL. HIGGINSON'S WORD.

The New Music Hall Must Be Quickly Guaranteed Or the Symphony Orchestra Disbands — An Opera House Urged as Desirable.

BOSTON, June 20, 1893.

To the Editor of the Boston Journal:

In order to avoid any mistake in the minds of the public as to the new hall for music, of which you have so kindly spoken during the past week, and of my relation to it, I ask leave to make the following statement:

I must engage a conductor for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, if at all, for five years, and musicians for one or more years, and before doing this must be sure of a hall in which to play. Still further, these engagements must be made at once, as the musicians cannot wait longer. In all probability the present Music Hall will be taken by the city within a year for the new street, and in any case it cannot be relied on for more than one season. There is no other hall in Boston which would fill the place of Music Hall for large concerts.

It has been a great pleasure for the past twelve years to plan for, to work for, and to support the Symphony Orchestra, which is the outcome of much artistic skill, knowledge and long persistent work on the part of the musicians. No good orchestra can be got in any other way. I shall gladly carry on my work as regards the orchestra, if a good hall be provided for it, but only on that condition.

The orchestra has this year reached a self-supporting stage, which it may or may not keep, for there is always a considerable risk each year as to the receipts. During these past years the total deficit has been large; but the expenses must always be met, and this risk falls on me, and may be fairly considered my share.

May I suggest that a new hall can readily and without much greater expense be built so as to be used for opera, and thus command a larger rental? It may well have open boxes, as in the Carnegie Hall in New York, and seats of various grades and at different prices. At the present time it is very difficult to get any theatre in Boston for opera or other large occasional entertainments.

Every considerable city in our country has some such hall, and it is for the citizens of Boston and its neighborhood to decide whether they care enough for music in its different forms to build this hall; and for them to decide at once if they wish to keep the orchestra. Money will be wanted for the building later in the year, but the promise of it is needed now.

The building must be ready for use, so far as the Boston Symphony Orchestra is concerned, in October, 1894.

To sum up: The public may be sure that to make a good orchestra much work, much time and much expense are required. All these elements have been contributed, and we have the orchestra as it now stands. Shall we keep it or lose it for want of a proper hall? The decision cannot be postponed beyond a few days. Unless within that time a new hall is assured, I must disband the orchestra and finally abandon the Symphony concerts.

H. L. Higginson.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
WEDNESDAY MORNING, JUNE 21, 1893.

HIGGINSON'S OWN WORD.

He Speaks Frankly About the New Music Hall.

H. L. Higginson has written a letter to The Advertiser in which he speaks his mind freely about the new Music Hall.

"In order," says he, "to avoid any mistake in the minds of the public as to the new hall for music, of which you have so kindly spoken during the past week and of my relation to it, I ask leave to make the following statement:—

"I must engage a conductor for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, if at all, for five years, and musicians for one or more years, and before doing this must be sure of a hall in which to play. Still further, these engagements must be made at once, as the musicians cannot wait longer. In all probability the present Music Hall will be taken by the city within a year for the new street, and in any case it cannot be relied on for more than one season. There is no other hall in Boston which would fill the place of Music Hall for large concerts.

"It has been a great pleasure for the past 12 years to plan for, to work for and to support the Symphony Orchestra, which is the outcome of much artistic skill, knowledge, and long persistent work on the part of the musicians. No good orchestra can be got in any other way. I shall gladly carry on my work as regards the orchestra, if a good hall be provided for it, but only on that condition.

"The orchestra has this year reached a self-supporting stage, which it may or may not keep, for there is always a considerable risk each year as to the receipts. During these past years the total deficit has been large, but the expenses must always be met, and this risk falls on me and may be fairly considered my share.

"May I suggest that a new hall can readily and without much greater expense be built so as to be used for opera, and thus command a larger rental. (It may well have open boxes, as in the Carnegie Hall in New York, and seats of various grades and at different prices.) At the present time it is very difficult to get any theatre in Boston for opera, or other large occasional entertainments.

"Every considerable city in our country has some such hall, and it is for the citizens of Boston and its neighborhood to decide whether they care enough for music in its different forms to build this hall, and for them to decide at once if they wish to keep the orchestra. Money will be wanted for the building later in the year, but the promise of it is needed now.

"The building must be ready for use, so far as the Boston Symphony Orchestra is concerned, in October, 1894.

"To sum up: The public may be sure that to make a good orchestra much work, much time, and much expense are required. All these elements have been contributed, and we have the orchestra as it now stands. Shall we keep it or lose it for want of a proper hall?

"The decision cannot be postponed beyond a few days. Unless within that time a new hall is assured I must disband the orchestra, and finally abandon the symphony concerts."

BOSTON EVENING RECORD.
73

BOSTON'S BEST NAMES

Back of One More Appeal for Music Hall.

The Music Hall subscriptions must be made within a week.

Everybody is interested and hopeful.

A new appeal for it is given out today. It is signed by the best names in Boston. One group includes Martin Brimmer, Senator Lodge, W. E. Russell, Patrick Donahoe, C. W. Eliot, Mrs. Louis Agassiz, Miss Alice Longfellow, Ex-Gov. J. D. Long, Eben Jordan, Matthew Luce, L. A. Johnson, G. O. Shattuck, Solomon Lincoln, J. K. Paine, C. E. Norton, H. S. Grew, George Wheatland, C. L. Pierson, F. Haven, jr., J. L. Gardner, John Lowell, O. H. Durrell, N. W. Rice, T. E. Proctor, Barthold Schlesinger, Roger Wolcott.

Another group includes Mrs. Henry Whitman, A. Shuman, W. T. Winslow, H. M. Whitney, Miss Pauline Shaw, Mrs. George Tyson, G. C. Lee, Robert Bacon, Mrs. S. T. Morse, Miss Frances R. Morse, C. F. Choate, R. H. White, G. F. Fabyan, D. P. Kimball, E. W. Donald, S. E. Peabody, N. W. Jordan, C. A. Coffin, F. G. Webster, W. L. Chase, G. A. Gordon, S. L. Thorndike, F. H. Manning, Henry Parkman, H. L. Morse, J. W. Eliot.

$175,000 FOR HALL.

Funds for the new music hall are coming in quite rapidly, the amount this morning being nearly $175,000. The gentlemen having the matter in charge feel quite encouraged at the outlook, but wish The Record to state that the entire amount must be forthcoming within three days, or the project will have to be abandoned.

The fund increased yesterday from $125,000 to $175,000 this morning, and if the fund continues to grow in this way success is assured on the lines contemplated.

BOSTON HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCIII, NO. 173.
THURSDAY, JUNE 22, 1893.

THE SITE FOR OUR MUSIC HALL.

A Chance to Build One of the Most Beautiful Buildings in the World.

To the Editor of the Herald: The American is peculiar in his attitude toward time; he has no just conception of its relation to things, excepting in so far that he assumes that it can be made to bear twice the fruit that should be expected of it. This is especially true when it is a question of an important project—demanding careful study—but which he deliberately chooses to treat flippantly.

When this disregard of the necessity of time is associated on the one hand with a very excellent object and on the other with a very stupid habit of action, the situation becomes aggravating.

The case in point is that of the proposed Music Hall.

The conditions which have been considered are these:

A possibility, but not a certainty, that the old hall will be destroyed.

A consequent strong need of a new hall.

A hearty response to this need on the part of certain citizens.

A tight money market.

The usual worthy but blind New England thrift.

The conditions unconsidered are these:

That, as far as precedence in the arts is concerned, music is Boston's forlorn hope. Painting, sculpture and literature have some time since migrated to New York.

That, if music is to be pre-eminent here, it should be worthily enshrined.

That, apart from the Public Library, and possibly the new City Hall, it is the only remaining chance to redeem our almost proverbial stupidity in the matter of public buildings.

Boston has apparently no conception of the fact that it numbers 500,000 people. It has for years been in the habit of treating its streets and its buildings as those of a small town.

There is a lamentably long chapter of foolishly lost opportunies due to timidity, penuriousness and ignorance — blunders that will be paid heavily for by coming generations.

Boston's wharves should long since have become quays; its railroads should long since have been massed, and now that this is being done upon Causeway street, it is being done in a thrifty and consequently very extravagant fashion as far as the future is concerned. The banks of the Charles, though now receiving attention, have long been neglected, and are now only half attacked. There is not now, and there never has been, any intelligent system of laying out streets, boulevards or squares. There is not now, and there never has been, any land taken at important points in different parts of the city and reserved for city buildings at a future date.

Not one important public building, excepting those on Copley square and the postoffice, has a dignified approach or is surrounded by or placed upon adequate grounds. All the theatres are upon narrow streets and are difficult of approach excepting on foot. The court house is badly placed. The City Hall is outgrown. The Institute of Technology is housed in isolated, utilitarian buildings in spite of its thousand pupils, and, finally, the Harvard bridge is built lightly of iron, with a plank roadway, instead of being of stone or brick throughout.

Can a similar series of blunders be found in any other city of equal pretensions?

And now it is proposed to build the new music hall, equivalent with us to the opera in Paris, upon a corner in a district devoted to small apartments and to storage warehouses; and it is proposed to raise money for this purpose, the subscibers to be committed to this choice of site.

In Boston the music hall should be the most monumental building in the city. It should be the best placed building and the most beautiful. It should receive all the study and the money required for such an attainment, and until that can be obtained some temporary building should be used, until the city awakened to its indebtedness to music and its supporters in the past.

There are but two sites in Boston to be thought of in this connection. One is the north side of Copley square, which is good.

The other is better. It is at the end of Commonwealth avenue, on its axis, near where the Leif Ericson statue now stands. The avenue now feebly twists to the right and blossoms into two diminutive patches of grass. The land at the south is largely unbuilt upon. There should be as a termination to the avenue, before its direction is changed, an oval or circle similar to those in London—and in the centre of this, with broad, high approaches, with east and west facades and with side portals, there should rise a building which, seen down the long vista of the avenue, would be not only the most important building in Boston, but the most beautiful temple of music in the new world.

C. HOWARD WALKER.

Boston, June 20, 1893.

Boston Daily Globe.
SATURDAY, JUNE 24, 1893.

AN OPPORTUNITY NOT TO BE LOST.

Up to the present time $268,000 have been subscribed to the proposed new Music hall. This sum falls very decidedly short of reaching the amount which is necessary to assure the realization of the project.

Will our merchants and business men permit the present opportunity to pass unimproved? It means much to them.

Surely they cannot fail to realize the advantage which the establishment of a permanent home of music in this city must bring to pecuniary as well as artistic interests in Boston. There is no room to doubt that a new Music hall, fitted up for grand opera as well as concert uses, would prove from every point of view a paying investment.

We look to see the subscriptions come in rapidly and generously on this last day of opportunity. Save the symphony orchestra! Give to Boston, in place of the historic hall doomed to be sacrificed to rapid transit, a newer and worthier temple of the art harmonic.

The money for the new Music hall must be raised immediately. If Boston has any rich men who are fond of music here is an opportunity for them to give expression to their melodious taste in a practical manner. It is fabled that music from the hand of Orpheus would draw wild beasts from the forest to listen. Can modern music draw wallets from the pockets of rich men? We are waiting to see.

[171]

Boston Transcript

THURSDAY, JUNE 22, 1893.

FIFTY THOUSAND DOLLARS YESTERDAY

Generous Subscriptions to the Music Hall Fund—But $225,000 More Needed.

The success of the new Music Hall enterprise is almost assured, for only $225,000 is needed now by the gentlemen having the matter in charge. Fifty thousand dollars were subscribed yesterday, bringing the amount up to $175,000, and as much more is hoped for today. Still as only two days remain for the securing of the amount needed in order to retain the Symphony concerts, it is necessary for all who contemplate giving their aid to the enterprise to do so at once.

The following circular has been issued in regard to the new Music Hall:

BOSTON, June 21, 1893.

We think that the appeal for a new hall for music in Boston is just, and we urge upon our fellow-citizens the necessity for prompt action. Boston is to lose its Music Hall, and must, in justice to its high name for devotion to education and to art, replace this old hall with a new and better one. The choral societies must have a good home or fade away, and the Symphony Orchestra, which has been called into existence by the long, hard work of so many men, which represents the expenditure of $250,000 voluntarily given by Mr. Higginson, in addition to the receipts from tickets, and which is now fully equipped for the best kind of service to a large and excellent public, must very soon disband, unless a home for it is assured.

We are aware that this is a bad time to start such an undertaking, but circumstances force it upon us. We cannot allow Boston to lose its prestige in these matters without an effort to save it. It is proposed to organize a corporation with a capital of $400,000, divided into 4000 shares of $100 each. It is most important that this money should be assured without delay, although it will not be wanted for a number of months; and it is to be hoped that everybody will take stock according to his means.

Subscriptions may be sent to T. Dennie Boardman, esq., Ames Building, Boston.

Martin Brimmer, Henry Cabot Lodge, William E. Russell, Patrick Donahoe, Charles W. Eliot, Mrs. Louis Agassiz, Miss Alice Longfellow, John D. Long, Eben Jordan, Matthew Luce, Lesley A. Johnson, George O. Shattuck, Solomon Lincoln, J. K. Paine, Charles Eliot Norton, Henry S. Grew, George Wheatland, C. L. Pierson, F. Haven, Jr., John L. Gardner, John Lowell, Oliver H. Durrell, N. W. Rice, Thomas E. Proctor, Barthold Schlesinger, Roger Wolcott, Mrs. Henry Whitman, A. Shuman & Co., Walter T. Winslow, Henry M. Whitney, Miss Pauline Shaw, Mrs. George Tyson, George C. Lee, Robert Bacon, Mrs. Samuel T. Morse, Miss Francis R. Morse, Charles F. Choate, R. H. White, George F. Fabyan, David P. Kimball, E. Winchester Donald, S. Endicott Peabody, N. W. Jordan, C. A. Coffin, F. G. Webster, William L. Chase, George A. Gordon, S. Lothrop Thorndike, Francis H. Manning, Henry Parkman, Henry L. Morse, John W. Eliot.

THE MERCANTILE SIDE of the Music Hall question has already been stated in this column, but it can do no harm to urge it again. Many merchants, possibly, are not aware how many people come to the city to hear first-class concerts or opera. The incoming swarms on Friday and Saturday afternoons are enormous, and there is not one in a hundred of these invaders who does not buy something in a Boston store before going home. It is not claimed that these thousands would not come were there no concerts to invite them, but it is sure that without music, plays and other diversions there would be very many less in these frequent additions to our floating population. To a less degree, but still large enough to make their presence felt, the visitors from a distance who pass at least a week here at a time affect matters and form a factor that cannot be slighted. We may be sure of one thing, that if there is no decent home here for symphony, oratorio and opera, a large part of the travel to this city from places more than fifty miles off will be diverted to New York. It is difficult to believe that our merchants will commit financial suicide by neglecting to furnish the city with a music hall and opera house.

MUSIC HALL AS AN INVESTMENT.

We have taken pains to look up the pecuniary results of the first Boston Music Hall investment, and find that if the corporation were to be wound up today the shares which were obtained at $100 apiece forty years ago have averaged over six per cent as an investment. The shares are probably worth nearer $400 per share than par today, after paying off all obligations and incumbrances. The cash dividends on each share have amounted to $127.20. The increase in the investor's principal is nearly three hundred per cent. Now, wherein is the outlook for a new music hall today less promising than that of forty-one years ago?

To be sure, the cost of the real estate bought and occupied in 1852 was comparatively light, owing to the wise selection of the interior of a block where existed no properties of any great value. This point is of the first and greatest importance. In fact it virtually disposes of all those picturesque projects which insist on the choice of such sites as those suggested on Copley Square or Commonwealth avenue as the base of operations for the creation of a new hall. However desirable such sites would be for the new house, and however ornamental that structure might be made for the city, the success of the project in hand depends on its commending itself to our public-spirited capitalists as an investment. The lot of land that has been bonded on Huntington avenue and West Chester Park, though not in every quality the most fitting, certainly has the merit of rendering the scheme practicable as a fairly promising investment.

We have in mind, however, a lot which in our view combines reasonableness in price and sightliness of situation—namely the land now occupied by the Union Boat Club and the private and livery stables adjacent. The grand and beautiful Charles River Embankment improvement can reach this spot in another year and in the course of one more year extend the whole length of the Back Bay [illegible] authorized by the last Legislature provides for the extension and ornamentation of this river esplanade under the direction of the Park Commission as far as the Charlesgate. Why should not Boston utilize this noble water-front so long neglected and despised, except from the back parlors and dining-rooms of the mansions on the water side of Beacon and Brimmer streets, for some of its best public buildings, theatres, halls and hotels, as is done in London and every other European city which enjoys the advantages of such embankments? The projectors of the rapid transit subway on Tremont street have always contemplated a lateral branch to the Back Bay and Brookline, via tunnel and Mt. Vernon street and the Charles River water front, and that branch would bring an opera house or hall on the Embankment into direct connection with the entire system of city transportation.

But this is a detail to be settled according to the maturer conclusions of the best judges. The point we are pressing is that to be a reasonably safe and promising investment the new Music Hall must begin with a reasonably cheap lot of land, as did the Music Hall project of forty years ago, with the very satisfactory results to the investors above stated on the best authority.

THE NEW MUSIC HALL SHARES.

"Fiddle-de-dee, what's a hundred thousand dollars!" exclaimed a visiting Chicagoan, on hearing that somewhere near this sum is in hand towards the necessary $400,000 for the new Music Hall. "Why, in Chicago, half a dozen men would have offered $100,000 apiece by this time! I'm not asking where's your rich men's devotion to music and to civilization and culture generally, what I want to know is, where's their business hustle? Why, a stranger can see with one eye shut and both hands tied behind him that real estate is moving right down in the direction of the site for your new Music Hall, and it's money in a man's pocket to get shares in the new hall. We built our Auditorium because we wanted the biggest Music Hall in the country, but great Scott! we knew we should make money! If you'll excuse my language you can't boom æsthetics anywhere unless you tackle the problem the way we do in Chicago and look your so much per cent right in the eye along with your high and holy convictions about this or that art or t' other. I heard a man say that it is a shame to let your General Higginson—well, Colonel, then; a man that has given a quarter of a million for music is a fine enough fellow to be called General or anything else—my friend said that it's a shame he should have to disband the Symphony Orchestra for lack of a house to put it in. I said just what I should like to say to every man with a hundred dollars to invest in and around Boston, "What are you going to do about it? What makes you even consider a possibility of disbanding the Symphony Orchestra for one single minute? Where is your æsthetic horse-sense? "Where in time's your hustle?"

+++

The following note is received about the Music Hall site. The Listener may say, by the way, that he has no objection at all to this site:

Dear Listener—We think here at the South End that we are some of the people, and I, for one, confess I feel counted out by a remark in your column to the effect that the placing of the new Music Hall at the corner of Huntington avenue and West Chester Park will make it no longer "a people's music hall." Hundreds of people at the South End, including many students of music, as well as other students and workers for wages like me, will have a much shorter walk to the corner of Huntington avenue than to the old Music Hall. And car fare counts for a good many of us "gallery haunters" even on a Saturday night, after we have been paid. Respectfully yours,

WEST NEWTON STREET.

"MONEY TALKS."

To the Editor of the Transcript: Will you give an old croaker space for a few lines on a matter of passing general interest—the imminent danger of losing the Symphony Orchestra. "Thank heaven," said an eminent writer when told of Mrs. Browning's death, "there will be no more Aurora Leighs." The old Music Hall is to go. Thank heaven, say I, there will be no more Symphony concerts. I am tired of being tugged around by Mrs. Grundy to the old hall. I always said to my family that this adoration of classical music was in large part affectation. And here comes a card from the founder of the orchestra in the morning papers which proves me right. For this adoration does not yet go far enough to induce the lovers to provide a home for their beloved. And yet I have never been to one of the old symphony concerts when it was not possible to count up the wealth of one's neighbors to, in the aggregate, forty millions.

PONS.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.
SATURDAY MORNING, JUNE 24, 1893.

FOR THE NEW MUSIC HALL.

The subscriptions to the stock for the proposed new Music Hall reached $268,000 yesterday afternoon. This leaves $132,000 to be raised before today is over.

THE HOME STRETCH.

The Music Hall subscription must be closed tonight if it is to be available for the purpose intended. Yesterday it rose to nearly three-quarters of the required sum, and although Saturday is not a full business day there is no reason why the 4000 shares cannot be subscribed before our rich men start for their Sunday summer homes.

The encouraging feature of the situation is the evidence of movement among those having the matter in hand.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
FRIDAY MORNING, JUNE 23, 1893.

BOSTON'S BEST NAMES

Are Back of One More Appeal for the New Music Hall.

The Music Hall subscriptions must be made within a week. Everybody is interested and hopeful.

A new appeal for it is given out. It is signed by the best names in Boston. One group includes Martin Brimmer, Senator Lodge, W. E. Russell, Patrick Donahoe, C. W. Eliot, Mrs. Louis Agassiz, Miss Alice Longfellow, Ex-Gov. J. D. Long, Eben Jordan, Matthew Luce, L. A. Johnson, G. O. Shattuck, Solomon Lincoln, J. K. Paine, C. E. Norton, H. S. Grew, George Wheatland, C. L. Pierson, F. Haven, jr., J. L. Gardner, John Lowell, O. H. Durrell, N. W. Rice, T. E. Proctor, Barthold Schlesinger, Roger Wolcott.

Another group includes Mrs. Henry Whitman, A. Shuman, W. T. Winslow, H. M. Whitney, Miss Pauline Shaw, Mrs. George Tyson, G. C. Lee, Robert Bacon, Mrs. S. T. Morse, Miss Frances R. Morse, C. F. Choate, R. H. White, G. F. Fabyan, D. P. Kimball, E. W. Donald, S. E. Peabody, N. W. Jordan, C. A. Coffin, F. G. Webster, W. L. Chase, G. A. Gordon, S. L. Thorndike, F. H. Manning, Henry Parkman, H. L. Morse, J. W. Eliot.

The appeal says: "We think that the appeal for a new hall for music in Boston is just, and we urge upon our fellow-citizens the necessity for prompt action. Boston is to lose its music hall, and must, in justice to its high name for devotion to education and to art, replace this old hall with a new and better one.

"The choral societies must have a good home or fade away, and the Symphony Orchestra, which has been called into existence by the long, hard work of so many men, which represents the expenditure of $250,000 voluntarily given by Mr. Higginson, in addition to the receipts from tickets, and which is now fully equipped for the best kind of service to a large and excellent public, must very soon disband, unless a home for it is assured.

"It is most important that this money should be assured without delay, although it will not be wanted for a number of months, and it is to be hoped that everybody will take stock according to his means."

Funds for the new music hall are coming in quite rapidly, the amount yesterday being nearly $175,000. The gentlemen having the matter in charge feel quite encouraged at the outlook, but wish The Advertiser to say that the entire amount must be forthcoming within three days, or the project will have to be abandoned.

The fund increased Wednesday from $125,000 to $175,000 yesterday, and if the fund continues to grow in this way success is assured on the lines contemplated.

FILE THE SUBSCRIPTIONS.

We are surprised that only $175,000 of the $400,000 required for the proposed new music hall is subscribed. People feel poor, whether they are or not. Then, again, the whole affair is so uncertain. No one knows that the present music hall will have to be abandoned. The chances are, we are sorry to say, that way. If it is to be swept away by an elevated road the money should be ready and the plans all made to go ahead with the new hall. The committee in charge can be trusted to act wisely, and, although the circumstances are perplexing, we trust that those who have hesitated will do so no longer, but join the list of our best citizens, who have signified their desire to be counted as among the subscribers to the new enterprise.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.
FRIDAY MORNING, JUNE 23, 1893.

THE NEW MUSIC HALL.

Unless Boston is to step down from the pedestal of musical supremacy which this city has occupied even since music was counted for anything in America, the guaranty of a new Music Hall must be furnished at once.

The gentlemen having this matter especially at heart say in their circular that they are "aware that this is a bad time to start such an undertaking." But it never ought to be a bad time if the prestige of the city demands it. The effort in which these public-spirited citizens are engaged is one that has a claim upon the bank account of every man of wealth here resident.

A good many have already responded. But the sum needed to assure the carrying out of the scheme is not yet half subscribed, and the days are passing with great rapidity.

When it is considered that the failure or the incompletion of this plan within a comparatively short time means the deprivation of Boston of its essential resources for the production of the higher class of music, it seems astonishing that the 4000 shares in the proposed corporation remain untaken for a single day.

Gentlemen, to secure prompt success it is necessary to "hustle."

Boston Daily Globe.

FRIDAY, JUNE 23, 1893.

MINIATURE ALMANAC.....June 23

HOME FOR THE SYMPHONY.

Text of an Appeal Issued, with Well-Known Names Attached, for Funds for the New Music Hall.

The movement in behalf of a new music hall for Boston, which was started about a fortnight ago, is gradually gaining strength financially and otherwise, and the following appeal has been issued from the office of Col H. L. Higginson:

BOSTON, June 21, 1893.

We think that the appeal for a new hall for music in Boston is just, and we urge upon our fellow-citizens the necessity for prompt action. Boston is to lose its Music hall, and must, if justice to its high name for devotion to education and to art, replace this old hall with a new and better one.

The choral societies must have a good home or fade away, and the symphony orchestra, which has been called into existence by the long, hard work of so many men, which represents the expenditure of $250,000 voluntarily given by Mr Higginson, in addition to the receipts from tickets, and which is now fully equipped for the best kind of service to a large and excellent public, must very soon "disband, unless a home for it is assured.

We are aware that this is a bad time to start such an undertaking, but circumstances force it upon us. We cannot allow Boston to lose its prestige in these matters without an effort to save it.

It is proposed to organize a corporation with a capital of $400,000, divided into 4000 shares of $100 each.

It is most important that this money should be assured without delay, although it will not be wanted for a number of months, and it is to be hoped that everybody will take stock according to his means.

Subscriptions may be sent to T. Dennie Boardman, Ames building, Boston.

Martin Brimmer	John D Long
Henry Cabot Lodge	Eben Jordan
William E Russell	Matthew Luce
Patrick Donahoe	Lesly A Johnson
Charles W Eliot	George O Shattuck
Mrs Louis Agassiz	Solomon Lincoln
Miss Alice Longfellow	J K Paine
Charles Eliot Norton	John Lowell
Henry S Grew	Oliver H Durrell
George Wheatland	N W Rice
C L Pierson	Thomas E Proctor
F Haven Jr	Barthold Schlesinger
John L Gardner	Roger Wolcott
Mrs Henry Whitman	Robert Bacon
A Shuman & Co	Mrs Samuel T Morse
Walter T Winslow	Miss Frances R Morse
Henry M Whitney	Charles F Choate
Miss Pauline Shaw	R H White
Mrs George Tyson	George F Fabyan
George C Lee	David P Kimball
E Winchester Donald	George A Gordon
S Endicott Peabody	S Lothrop Thorndike
N W Jordan	Francis H Manning
C A Coffin	Henry Parkman
F G Webster	Henry L Morse
William L Chase	John W Eliot

Boston Journal.

FRIDAY, JUNE 23, 1893.

FOR A MUSIC HALL.

A Corporation With a Capital of $400,000 Recommended and Prompt Action Necessary.

Many prominent citizens urge upon the public the necessity of a new hall for music and in a circular just issued consider that prompt action is necessary. It is inevitable that Boston must lose its Music Hall, and should in justice to its high name for devotion to education and to art, replace this old hall with a new and better one. The choral societies must have a good home or fade away, and the Symphony Orchestra, which has been called into existence by the long, hard work of so many men, which represents the expenditure of $250,000 voluntarily given by Mr. Higginson, in addition to the receipts from tickets, and which is now fully equipped for the best kind of service to a large and excellent public, must very soon disband, unless a home for it is assured.

While they are aware that this is a bad time to start such an undertaking, circumstances they say force it upon them, for they cannot allow Boston to lose its prestige in these matters without an effort to save it. It is proposed to organize a corporation with a capital of $400,000, divided into 4000 shares of $100 each. It is most important that this money should be assured without delay, although it will not be wanted for a number of months; and it is to be hoped that everybody will take stock according to his means. Subscriptions may be sent to T. Dennie Boardman, Ames Building, Boston.

Among the names appended to the appeal are those of Hon. Martin Brimmer, Prof. J. K. Paine, David P. Kimball, Hon. Henry Cabot Lodge, Hon. William E. Russell, Patrick Donahoe, Prof. Charles W. Eliot, Mrs. Louis Agassiz, Miss Alice Longfellow, Hon. John D. Long, Eben Jordan, Solomon Lincoln, Prof. Charles Eliot Norton, John L. Gardner, Hon. John Lowell, Oliver H. Durrell, N. W. Rice, Thomas E. Proctor, Barthold Schlesinger, Hon. Roger Wolcott, Henry M. Whitney, Hon. Charles F. Choate, R. H. White, George F. Fabyan, Rev. E. Winchester Donald, S. Endicott Peabody, C. A. Coffin, F. G. Webster, Wm. L. Chase, Rev. George A. Gordon, S. Lothrop Thorndike and Hon. Henry Parkman.

Mr. C. Howard Walker says there are but two sites in Boston to be thought of in connection with Music Hall; one is the north side of Copley Square, "which is good," and the other is at the end of Commonwealth Avenue, near the Ericson statue, "which is better." The proposed site on the corner of Huntington Avenue and West Chester Park is dismissed contemptuously as in "a district devoted to small apartments and to storage warehouses."

BOSTON EVENING RECORD.
June 23 93
Entered at the Post Office as second class mail matter

In the four real working days the Music Hall subscriptions have averaged $50,000 a day, and the conditional promises carry the amount well over the danger line. Still the $400,000 is not raised, and the work cannot be dropped.

[172]

Boston Transcript

THURSDAY, JUNE 22, 1893.

FIFTY THOUSAND DOLLARS YESTERDAY

Generous Subscriptions to the Music Hall Fund—But $225,000 More Needed.

The success of the new Music Hall enterprise is almost assured, for only $225,000 is needed now by the gentlemen having the matter in charge. Fifty thousand dollars were subscribed yesterday, bringing the amount up to $175,000, and as much more is hoped for today. Still as only two days remain for the securing of the amount needed in order to retain the Symphony concerts, it is necessary for all who contemplate giving their aid to the enterprise to do so at once.

The following circular has been issued in regard to the new Music Hall:

BOSTON, June 21, 1893.

We think that the appeal for a new hall for music in Boston is just, and we urge upon our fellow-citizens the necessity for prompt action. Boston is to lose its Music Hall, and must, in justice to its high name for devotion to education and to art, replace this old hall with a new and better one. The choral societies must have a good home or fade away, and the Symphony Orchestra, which has been called into existence by the long, hard work of so many men, which represents the expenditure of $250,000 voluntarily given by Mr. Higginson, in addition to the receipts from tickets, and which is now fully eqnipped for the best kind of service to a large and excellent public, must very soon disband, unless a home for it is assured.

We are aware that this is a bad time to start such an undertaking, but circumstances force it upon us. We cannot allow Boston to lose its prestige in these matters without an effort to save it. It is proposed to organize a corporation with a capital of $400,000, divided into 4000 shares of $100 each. It is most important that this money should be assured without delay, although it will not be wanted for a number of months; and it is to be hoped that everybody will take stock according to his means.

Subscriptions may be sent to T. Dennie Boardman, esq., Ames Building, Boston.

Martin Brimmer, Henry Cabot Lodge, William E. Russell, Patrick Donahoe, Charles W. Eliot, Mrs. Louis Agassiz, Miss Alice Longfellow, John D. Long, Eben Jordan, Matthew Luce, Lesley A. Johnson, George O. Shattuck, Solomon Lincoln, J. K. Paine, Charles Eliot Norton, Henry S. Grew, George Wheatland, C. L. Pierson, F. Haven, Jr., John L. Gardner, John Lowell, Oliver H. Durrell, N. W. Rice, Thomas E. Proctor, Barthold Schlesinger, Roger Wolcott, Mrs. Henry Whitman, A. Shuman & Co., Walter T. Winslow, Henry M. Whitney, Miss Pauline Shaw, Mrs. George Tyson, George C. Lee, Robert Bacon, Mrs. Samuel T. Morse, Miss Francis R. Morse, Charles F. Choate, R. H. White, George F. Fabyan, David P. Kimball, E. Winchester Donald, S. Endicott Peabody, N. W. Jordan, C. A. Coffin, F. G. Webster, William L. Chase, George A. Gordon, S. Lothrop Thorndike, Francis H. Manning, Henry Parkman, Henry L. Morse, John W. Eliot.

THE MERCANTILE SIDE of the Music Hall question has already been stated in this column, but it can do no harm to urge it again. Many merchants, possibly, are not aware how many people come to the city to hear first-class concerts or opera. The incoming swarms on Friday and Saturday afternoons are enormous, and there is not one in a hundred of these invaders who does not buy something in a Boston store before going home. It is not claimed that these thousands would not come were there no concerts to invite them, but it is sure that without music, plays and other diversions there would be very many less in these frequent additions to our floating population. To a less degree, but still large enough to make their presence felt, the visitors from a distance who pass at least a week here at a time affect matters and form a factor that cannot be slighted. We may be sure of one thing, that if there is no decent home here for symphony, oratorio and opera, a large part of the travel to this city from places more than fifty miles off will be diverted to New York. It is difficult to believe that our merchants will commit financial suicide by neglecting to furnish the city with a music hall and opera house.

MUSIC HALL AS AN INVESTMENT.

We have taken pains to look up the pecuniary results of the first Boston Music Hall investment, and find that if the corporation were to be wound up today the shares which were obtained at $100 apiece forty years ago have averaged over six per cent as an investment. The shares are probably worth nearer $400 per share than par today, after paying off all obligations and incumbrances. The cash dividends on each share have amounted to $127.20. The increase in the investor's principal is nearly three hundred per cent. Now, wherein is the outlook for a new music hall today less promising than that of forty-one years ago?

To be sure, the cost of the real estate bought and occupied in 1852 was comparatively light, owing to the wise selection of the interior of a block where existed no properties of any great value. This point is of the first and greatest importance. In fact it virtually disposes of all those picturesque projects which insist on the choice of such sites as those suggested on Copley Square or Commonwealth avenue as the base of operations for the creation of a new hall. However desirable such sites would be for the new house, and however ornamental that structure might be made for the city, the success of the project in hand depends on its commending itself to our public-spirited capitalists as an investment. The lot of land that has been bonded on Huntington avenue and West Chester Park, though not in every quality the most fitting, certainly has the merit of rendering the scheme practicable as a fairly promising investment.

We have in mind, however, a lot which in our view combines reasonableness in price and sightliness of situation—namely the land now occupied by the Union Boat Club and the private and livery stables adjacent. The grand and beautiful Charles River Embankment improvement can reach this spot in another year and in the course of one more year extend the whole length of the Back Bay. The act passed by the last Legislature provides for the extension and ornamentation of this river esplanade under the direction of the Park Commission as far as the Charlesgate. Why should not Boston utilize this noble water-front so long neglected and despised, except from the back parlors and dining-rooms of the mansions on the water side of Beacon and Brimmer streets, for some of its best public buildings, theatres, halls and hotels, as is done in London and every other European city which enjoys the advantages of such embankments? The projectors of the rapid transit subway on Tremont street have always contemplated a lateral branch to the Back Bay and Brookline, via tunnel and Mt. Vernon street and the Charles River water front, and that branch would bring an opera house or hall on the Embankment into direct connection with the entire system of city transportation.

But this is a detail to be settled according to the maturer conclusions of the best judges. The point we are pressing is that to be a reasonably safe and promising investment the new Music Hall must begin with a reasonably cheap lot of land, as did the Music Hall project of forty years ago, with the very satisfactory results to the investors above stated on the best authority.

THE NEW MUSIC HALL SHARES.

"Fiddle-de-dee, what's a hundred thousand dollars!" exclaimed a visiting Chicagoan, on hearing that somewhere near this sum is in hand towards the necessary $400,000 for the new Music Hall. "Why, in Chicago, half a dozen men would have offered $100,000 apiece by this time! I'm not asking where's your rich men's devotion to music and to civilization and culture generally, what I want to know is, where's their business hustle? Why, a stranger can see with one eye shut and both hands tied behind him that real estate is moving right down in the direction of the site for your new Music Hall, and it's money in a man's pocket to get shares in the new hall. We built our Auditorium because we wanted the biggest Music Hall in the country, but great Scott! we knew we should make money! If you'll excuse my language you can't boom æsthetics anywhere unless you tackle the problem the way we do in Chicago and look your so much per cent right in the eye along with your high and holy convictions about this or that art or t' other. I heard a man say that it is a shame to let your General Higginson—well, Colonel, then; a man that has given a quarter of a million for music is a fine enough fellow to be called General or anything else—my friend said that it's a shame he should have to disband the Symphony Orchestra for lack of a house to put it in. I said just what I should like to say to every man with a hundred dollars to invest in and around Boston, "What are you going to do about it? What makes you even consider a possibility of disbanding the Symphony Orchestra for one single minute? Where is your æsthetic horse-sense? "Where in time's your hustle?"

+++

The following note is received about the Music Hall site. The Listener may say, by the way, that he has no objection at all to this site:

Dear Listener—We think here at the South End that we are some of the people, and I, for one, confess I feel counted out by a remark in your column to the effect that the placing of the new Music Hall at the corner of Huntington avenue and West Chester Park will make it no longer "a people's music hall." Hundreds of people at the South End, including many students of music, as well as other students and workers for wages like me, will have a much shorter walk to the corner of Huntington avenue than to the old Music Hall. And car fare counts for a good many of us "gallery haunters" even on a Saturday night, after we have been paid. Respectfully yours,

WEST NEWTON STREET.

"MONEY TALKS."

To the Editor of the Transcript: Will you give an old croaker space for a few lines on a matter of passing general interest—the imminent danger of losing the Symphony Orchestra. "Thank heaven," said an eminent writer when told of Mrs. Browning's death, "there will be no more Aurora Leighs." The old Music Hall is to go. Thank heaven, say I, there will be no more Symphony concerts. I am tired of being tugged around by Mrs. Grundy to the old hall. I always said to my family that this adoration of classical music was in large part affectation. And here comes a card from the founder of the orchestra in the morning papers which proves me right. For this adoration does not yet go far enough to induce the lovers to provide a home for their beloved. And yet I have never been to one of the old symphony concerts when it was not possible to count up the wealth of one's neighbors to, in the aggregate, forty millions.

PONS.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SATURDAY MORNING, JUNE 24, 1893.

FOR THE NEW MUSIC HALL.

The subscriptions to the stock for the proposed new Music Hall reached $268,000 yesterday afternoon. This leaves $132,000 to be raised before today is over.

THE HOME STRETCH.

The Music Hall subscription must be closed tonight if it is to be available for the purpose intended. Yesterday it rose to nearly three-quarters of the required sum, and although Saturday is not a full business day there is no reason why the 4000 shares cannot be subscribed before our rich men start for their Sunday summer homes.

The encouraging feature of the situation is the evidence of movement among those having the matter in hand.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.

FRIDAY MORNING, JUNE 23, 1893.

BOSTON'S BEST NAMES

Are Back of One More Appeal for the New Music Hall.

The Music Hall subscriptions must be made within a week. Everybody is interested and hopeful.

A new appeal for it is given out. It is signed by the best names in Boston. One group includes Martin Brimmer, Senator Lodge, W. E. Russell, Patrick Donahoe, C. W. Eliot, Mrs. Louis Agassiz, Miss Alice Longfellow, Ex-Gov. J. D. Long, Eben Jordan, Matthew Luce, L. A. Johnson, G. O. Shattuck, Solomon Lincoln, J. K. Paine, C. E. Norton, H. S. Grew, George Wheatland, C. L. Pierson, F. Haven, jr., J. L. Gardner, John Lowell, O. H. Durrell, N. W. Rice, T. E. Proctor, Barthold Schlesinger, Roger Wolcott.

Another group includes Mrs. Henry Whitman, A. Shuman, W. T. Winslow, H. M. Whitney, Miss Pauline Shaw, Mrs. George Tyson, G. C. Lee, Robert Bacon, Mrs. S. T. Morse, Miss Frances R. Morse, C. F. Choate, R. H. White, G. F. Fabyan, D. P. Kimball, E. W. Donald, S. E. Peabody, N. W. Jordan, C. A. Coffin, F. G. Webster, W. L. Chase, G. A. Gordon, S. L. Thorndike, F. H. Manning, Henry Parkman, H. L. Morse, J. W. Eliot.

The appeal says: "We think that the appeal for a new hall for music in Boston is just, and we urge upon our fellow-citizens the necessity for prompt action. Boston is to lose its music hall, and must, in justice to its high name for devotion to education and to art, replace this old hall with a new and better one.

"The choral societies must have a good home or fade away, and the Symphony Orchestra, which has been called into existence by the long, hard work of so many men, which represents the expenditure of $250,000 voluntarily given by Mr. Higginson, in addition to the receipts from tickets, and which is now fully equipped for the best kind of service to a large and excellent public, must very soon disband, unless a home for it is assured.

"It is most important that this money should be assured without delay, although it will not be wanted for a number of months, and it is to be hoped that everybody will take stock according to his means."

Funds for the new music hall are coming in quite rapidly, the amount yesterday being nearly $175,000. The gentlemen having the matter in charge feel quite encouraged at the outlook, but wish The Advertiser to say that the entire amount must be forthcoming within three days, or the project will have to be abandoned.

The fund increased Wednesday from $125,000 to $175,000 yesterday, and if the fund continues to grow in this way success is assured on the lines contemplated.

FILE THE SUBSCRIPTIONS.

We are surprised that only $175,000 of the $400,000 required for the proposed new music hall is subscribed. People feel poor, whether they are or not. Then, again, the whole affair is so uncertain. No one knows that the present music hall will have to be abandoned. The chances are, we are sorry to say, that way. If it is to be swept away by an elevated road the money should be ready and the plans all made to go ahead with the new hall. The committee in charge can be trusted to act wisely, and, although the circumstances are perplexing, we trust that those who have hesitated will do so no longer, but join the list of our best citizens, who have signified their desire to be counted as among the subscribers to the new enterprise.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

FRIDAY MORNING, JUNE 23, 1893.

THE NEW MUSIC HALL.

Unless Boston is to step down from the pedestal of musical supremacy which this city has occupied even since music was counted for anything in America, the guaranty of a new Music Hall must be furnished at once.

The gentlemen having this matter especially at heart say in their circular that they are "aware that this is a bad time to start such an undertaking." But it never ought to be a bad time if the prestige of the city demands it. The effort in which these public-spirited citizens are engaged is one that has a claim upon the bank account of every man of wealth here resident.

A good many have already responded. But the sum needed to assure the carrying out of the scheme is not yet half subscribed, and the days are passing with great rapidity.

When it is considered that the failure or the incompletion of this plan within a comparatively short time means the deprivation of Boston of its essential resources for the production of the higher class of music, it seems astonishing that the 4000 shares in the proposed corporation remain untaken for a single day.

Gentlemen, to secure prompt success it is necessary to "hustle."

Boston Daily Globe.

FRIDAY, JUNE 23, 1893.

MINIATURE ALMANAC.....June 23

HOME FOR THE SYMPHONY.

Text of an Appeal Issued, with Well-Known Names Attached, for Funds for the New Music Hall.

The movement in behalf of a new music hall for Boston, which was started about a fortnight ago, is gradually gaining strength financially and otherwise, and the following appeal has been issued from the office of Col H. L. Higginson:

BOSTON, June 21, 1893.

We think that the appeal for a new hall for music in Boston is just, and we urge upon our fellow-citizens the necessity for prompt action. Boston is to lose its Music hall, and must, if justice to its high name for devotion to education and to art, replace this old hall with a new and better one.

The choral societies must have a good home or fade away, and the symphony orchestra, which has been called into existence by the long, hard work of so many men, which represents the expenditure of $250,000 voluntarily given by Mr Higginson, in addition to the receipts from tickets, and which is now fully equipped for the best kind of service to a large and excellent public, must very soon disband, unless a home for it is assured.

We are aware that this is a bad time to start such an undertaking, but circumstances force it upon us. We cannot allow Boston to lose its prestige in these matters without an effort to save it.

It is proposed to organize a corporation with a capital of $400,000, divided into 4000 shares of $100 each.

It is most important that this money should be assured without delay, although it will not be wanted for a number of months, and it is to be hoped that everybody will take stock according to his means.

Subscriptions may be sent to T. Dennie Boardman, Ames building, Boston.

Martin Brimmer	John D Long
Henry Cabot Lodge	Eben Jordan
William E Russell	Matthew Luce
Patrick Donahoe	Lesly A Johnson
Charles W Eliot	George O Shattuck
Mrs Louis Agassiz	Solomon Lincoln
Miss Alice Longfellow	J K Paine
Charles Eliot Norton	John Lowell
Henry S Grew	Oliver H Durrell
George Wheatland	N W Rice
C L Pierson	Thomas E Proctor
F Haven Jr	Barthold Schlesinger
John L Gardner	Roger Wolcott
Mrs Henry Whitman	Robert Bacon
A Shuman & Co	Mrs Samuel T Morse
Walter T Winslow	Miss Frances R Morse
Henry M Whitney	Charles F Choate
Miss Pauline Shaw	R H White
Mrs George Tyson	George P Fabyan
George C Lee	David P Kimball
E Winchester Donald	George A Gordon
S Endicott Peabody	S Lothrop Thorndike
N W Jordan	Francis H Manning
C A Coffin	Henry Parkman
F G Webster	Henry L Morse
William L Chase	John W Eliot

Boston Journal.

FRIDAY, JUNE 23, 1893.

FOR A MUSIC HALL.

A Corporation With a Capital of $400,000 Recommended and Prompt Action Necessary.

Many prominent citizens urge upon the public the necessity of a new hall for music and in a circular just issued consider that prompt action is necessary. It is inevitable that Boston must lose its Music Hall, and should in justice to its high name for devotion to education and to art, replace this old hall with a new and better one. The choral societies must have a good home or fade away, and the Symphony Orchestra, which has been called into existence by the long, hard work of so many men, which represents the expenditure of $250,000 voluntarily given by Mr. Higginson, in addition to the receipts from tickets, and which is now fully equipped for the best kind of service to a large and excellent public, must very soon disband, unless a home for it is assured.

While they are aware that this is a bad time to start such an undertaking, circumstances they say force it upon them, for they cannot allow Boston to lose its prestige in these matters without an effort to save it. It is proposed to organize a corporation with a capital of $400,000, divided into 4000 shares of $100 each. It is most important that this money should be assured without delay, although it will not be wanted for a number of months; and it is to be hoped that everybody will take stock according to his means. Subscriptions may be sent to T. Dennie Boardman, Ames Building, Boston.

Among the names appended to the appeal are those of Hon. Martin Brimmer, Prof. J. K. Paine, David P. Kimball, Hon. Henry Cabot Lodge, Hon. William E. Russell, Patrick Donahoe, Prof. Charles W. Eliot, Mrs. Louis Agassiz, Miss Alice Longfellow, Hon. John D. Long, Eben Jordan, Solomon Lincoln, Prof. Charles Eliot Norton, John L. Gardner, Hon. John Lowell, Oliver H. Durrell, N. W. Rice, Thomas E. Proctor, Barthold Schlesinger, Hon. Roger Wolcott, Henry M. Whitney, Hon. Charles F. Choate, R. H. White, George F. Fabyan, Rev. E. Winchester Donald, S. Endicott Peabody, C. A. Coffin, F. G. Webster, Wm. L. Chase, Rev. George A. Gordon, S. Lothrop Thorndike and Hon. Henry Parkman.

Mr. C. Howard Walker says there are but two sites in Boston to be thought of in connection with Music Hall; one is the north side of Copley Square, "which is good," and the other is at the end of Commonwealth Avenue, near the Ericson statue, "which is better." The proposed site on the corner of Huntington Avenue and West Chester Park is dismissed contemptuously as in "a district devoted to small apartments and to storage warehouses."

BOSTON EVENING RECORD.
June 23 93
Entered at the Post Office as second class mail matter.

In the four real working days the Music Hall subscriptions have averaged $50,000 a day, and the conditional promises carry the amount well over the danger line. Still the $400,000 is not raised, and the work cannot be dropped.

---

[172]

BOSTON HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCIII, NO. 174.
FRIDAY, JUNE 23, 1893.

THE NEW MUSIC HALL.

Some Quiet "Hustling," with Gratifying Results.

The Danger Line Passed—With Earnest Work the Symphonies Safe—A Chicago Man's Ideas—An Appeal Notably Signed—Some Financial Views.

A Chicago man, upon being told the situation as regards the raising of money to build a new Music Hall, is said to have delivered himself in the following eminently characteristic fashion:

"Why, in Chicago, half a dozen men would have offered $100,000 apiece by this time! I'm not asking where's your rich men's devotion to music and to civilization and culture generally; what I want to know is, where's their business hustle? Why, a stranger can see with one eye shut and both hands tied behind him that real estate is moving right down in the direction of the site for your new Music Hall, and it's money in a man's pocket to get shares in the new hall. If you'll excuse my language, you can't boom æsthetics anywhere unless you tackle the problem the way we do in Chicago and look your so much per cent. right in the eye along with your high and holy convictions about this or that art or t' other. I heard a man say that it is a shame to let your Gen. Higginson—well, colonel, then; a man that has given a quarter of a million for music is a fine enough fellow to be called general or anything else—my friend said that it's a shame he should have to disband the Symphony orchestra for lack of a house to put it in. I said just what I should like to say to every man with a hundred dollars to invest in and around Boston: 'What are you going to do about it? Where is your æsthetic horse-sense? Where in time's your hustle?'"

However lacking the native born Bostonian is in the element of "hustle," there has been the best possible evidence of an ability to "get there" in this matter.

It is only eight days since it was generally known that Boston must have a new Music Hall.

About everybody takes a day off on the seventeenth, and this year there was an unusual exodus from the city on account of the Massachusett's day at the World's fair.

Then again, many business men are already at their summer homes and do not come to town with any regularity, so that there have been hardly more than four good working days since the idea of a new hall was suggested to the musical public.

Possibly the committee to whom the duty of getting the funds has been entrusted may object to being classified as "hustlers," but the result of their labors thus far certainly brings them within this classification.

It looks very much as if they would have some "coasting" in their future experience in this undertaking. People are now beginning to realize that the stock in the new hall may be a bit safer investment than some "giltedge" railroad and other securities that have been popular in this section in recent years.

One conservative gentleman remarked in regard to the stock: "It's always a satisfaction to me to see where my money is spent."

The experience of investors in the stock of the present Music Hall is worth quoting at this time. The stock in this corporation was put at $100 a share, and if the affairs of the corporation were to be wound up today, the shares which were obtained 40 years ago have averaged over 6 per cent. as an investment. The shares are probably worth nearer $400 per share than par today, after paying off all obligations and incumbrances. The cash dividends on each share have amounted to $127.20. The increase in the investor's principal is nearly 300 per cent.

It is extremely gratifying to know that for the four real working days the subscriptions have averaged $50,000 a day, and that the conditional promises carry the amount well over the danger line. The people who ought to subscribe have done so; that is, the list already has the names of many of those who are known as patrons of all that is best in music. Many wealthy subscribers have left the committee a wide margin to assess them as the needs of the situation may demand. A peculiarly pleasing feature of the subscription is that there have been a large number of names put down for a single share, thus showing the widespread interest among small investors.

"Nothing succeeds like success," and undoubtedly the fact that the idea is approved by such stanch friends of music as those already "listed" will make the future efforts of the committee far easier than they have been.

The necessity for active energetic and successful effort is still imperative. The total amount needed should be subscribed by tomorrow night. This result can easily be accomplished. It is entirely unnecessary to question the expenditure of the money to be put into this investment. The committee are thoroughly competent to deal with all the details.

A NOTABLE APPEAL.

A number of music lovers of this city propose to organize a stock corporation to erect a suitable building to replace the present Music Hall, which is soon to be lost to the public as a place of enjoyment. They have issued the following appeal:

We think that the appeal for a new hall for music in Boston is just, and we urge upon our fellow-citizens the necessity for prompt action. Boston is to lose its Music Hall, and must, in justice to its high name for devotion to education and to art, replace this old hall with a new and better one. The choral societies must have a good home or fade away, and the Symphony orchestra, which has been called into existence by the long, hard work of so many men, which represents the expenditure of $250,000 voluntarily given by Mr. Higginson, in addition to the receipts from tickets, and which is now fully equipped for the best kind of service to a large and excellent public, must very soon disband unless a home for it is assured.

We are aware that this is a bad time to start such an undertaking, but circumstances force it upon us. We cannot allow Boston to lose its prestige in these matters without an effort to save it.

It is proposed to organize a corporation with a capital of $400,000, divided into 4000 shares of $100 each.

It is most important that this money should be assured without delay, although it will not be wanted for a number of months; and it is to be hoped that everybody will take stock according to his means.

Subscriptions may be sent to T. Dennie Boardman, Ames building, Boston.

Signed: Martin Brimmer, Henry Cabot Lodge, William E. Russell, Patrick Donahoe, Charles W. Eliot, Mrs. Louis Agassiz, Miss Alice Longfellow, John D. Long, Eben Jordan, Matthew Luce, Leslie Jackson, George O. Shattuck, Solomon Lincoln, H. Parker, S. W. Bridge, Thomas R. Proctor, Barthold Schlesinger, Robert Wolcott, Mrs. Henry Whitman, A. Shuman & Co., Walter T. Winslow, Henry M. Whitney, Miss Pauline Shaw, Mrs. George Tyson, George C. Lee, Robert Bacon, Mrs. Samuel T. Morse, Miss Frances R. Morse, Charles F. Choate, R. H. White, George F. Fabyan, David P. Kimball, E. Winchester Donald, S. Endicott Peabody, N. W. Jordan, C. A. Coffin, F. G. Webster, William L. Chase, George A. Gordon, S. Lothrop Thornike, Francis H. Manning, Henry Parkman, Henry L. Morse, John W. Eliot.

Boston, June 21, 1893.

AN INDORSEMENT.

To the Editor of the Herald: In today's HERALD you print a letter from Mr. C. Howard Walker on the subject of our public buildings, and particularly the new music hall. This letter criticises so truthfully and justly our past action in this respect, and points out so sensibly and wisely the path to follow if we wish to shun the mistakes of the past, that it deserves a prominent place in the thought of our citizens.

Mr. Walker's summary of our lost opportunities, of our mistakes, of the trouble and expense they will cause our city in the future, is not exaggerated. Any one of our citizens who stands upon one of the many fine bridges which cross the Seine at Paris will think in humiliation of that plank and iron walk from Cambridge to Boston—a lost opportunity! For a bridge, of all things, seems to offer an easy chance to combine beauty and strength. Will his mind go back in pride to the banks of the Charles as he treads the Victoria embankment at London? And in the place de l'Opera at Paris, will he think with pleasure of the facade of Music Hall and the Boston Theatre? Not alone in "effete" Europe must he suffer thus, for in the West he will see an evidence of forest ourht and confidence in the future of cities and towns to which his own city seems a stranger.

In the Fine Arts palace at Chicago, in the United States department, is a part of Mr. Abbey's decoration for our new Public Library. This decoration adds a dignity to the American exhibit, and it will enrich that building we have built for so noble a purpose. We are going to feel very proud of that building, as well as of the treasures it will contain. It will stand a monument to our public spirit, our intelligence, our generosity. Let us then try to build for music as beautiful, as worthy a home. Why not? Perhaps the answer will come, "We lack the land; we cannot afford it." And this from a people who boast the greatest, the richest country on God's earth.

Mr. Walker's advice is valuable. It comes from an artist, it is then common sense. It comes from an architect, it is therefore intelligent, the knowledge of an expert. It will probably prevail, though perhaps not now.

Several years ago the Paint and Clay Club petitioned the city government that the Cogswell fountain be removed. They were permitted to withdraw their petition, it was hardly considered. They recommended a commission of fine arts. They had leave to withdraw. Yet it all came in time. And some time at great expense and trouble Boston will build a fine bridge across the Charles; some time Boston will build a temple worthy of music. Why not now?

E. H. GARRETT.

Winchester, June 22, 1893.

THE NEW MUSIC HALL.

We publish, elsewhere, an appeal for subscriptions for the erection of a new Music Hall in Boston, to take the place of the building now probably doomed to demolition by the requirements of rapid transit. The appeal bears scores of influential signatures—names that represent culture, wealth and public spirit in high development. We have so fully and so recently set forth the claims of this undertaking to prompt and generous support that it is not necessary to repeat the many cogent reasons in its favor. The gentlemen who have the enterprise in charge propose to organize a corporation with a capital of $400,000, divided into 4000 shares of $100 each.

The money will not be needed for some months, but it is essential that the stock shall be subscribed for at once, so that immediate arrangements may be made for a continuance of the Symphony orchestra. As we pointed the other day, it is thought that the property will earn a sufficient income to give a fair return upon the investment. Aside, however, from its business aspect, the enterprise deserves to be supported, not only by lovers of music, but by all Bostonians who can afford to give expression in this way to their desire for the embellishment of our city, a feeling which is the traditional characteristic of its inhabitants. We learn with pleasure that a large amount of stock has already been taken up, and that the managers are especially encouraged by the fact that a number of subscriptions for single shares have been received, a feature very welcome to them, as it evidences the wide popularity of the project.

BOSTON HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCIII, NO. 175.
SATURDAY, JUNE 24, 1893.

A NEW MUSIC HALL SURE.

Boston business men and the friends of music did not allow the downpour of yesterday to hinder their efforts in aid of the Music Hall fund.

They "hustled" in true western fashion, and when the day's labors were done found that nearly $100,000 had been added to the amount of the subscriptions, making the total at 5 o'clock $268,000, which, with the provisional promises, made sure the round sum of $300,000.

It is gratifying to know that as the amount of the subscription increases the workers in its interest increase also, and those who bore the burden of the first day or two unaided now find able assistance on all sides.

It is not alone the wealthy who are aiding this cause, there are many subscribers to a single share, and these promise to grow more numerous today.

The effort is to be made to finish up the undertaking today so as to announce definitely the completion of the fund in tomorrow's papers.

If yesterday's experience is repeated, this can be accomplished without difficulty. A much better knowledge of the undertaking has been generally gained during the last two days. It is now realized that there is every probability that the stock in the new hall will be as substantial and good paying an investment as that of the old hall has proved, and a 6 per cent. return for 40 consecutive years, with real estate security is about as good as conservative operators expect.

Being a public spirited citizen at 6 per cent on the investment is a combination of desirable results rarely surpassed in these later days.

Any one who has failed to be made aware of how to enjoy this double blessing will be informed by calling upon Mr. T. Dennie Boardman at 56 Ames building, this morning. A call after 12 o'clock may not be altogether as satisfactory.

WITHIN TOUCH OF SUCCESS.

An addition yesterday of nearly $100,000 to the amount of the subscriptions to the stock of the proposed new Music Hall corporation, bringing the total last evening close upon $300,000, seems to make certain the carrying out of the plans for the new structure. In case of any difficulty in securing the balance of the amount needed within the limited time set, would it not be well for the trustees of the permanent fund of the Handel and Haydn Society to subscribe to $25,000 of the stock? This fund, now amounting to over $30,000, is being accumulated with the avowed intention of building a hall. What better investment could be made than in the stock of the new hall? If Mr. Henry L. Higginson, acting as a member of the committee on ways and means to build the new hall, can convince himself as a member of the board of trustees of the Handel and Haydn fund that the action suggested is a wise one, it is reasonable to suppose that he could win over his associate trustees to his own view of the case. Such a subscription today would, without doubt, complete the amount needed before this evening, and within the time originally set by Mr. Higginson.

Boston Journal.
MONDAY, JUNE 19, 1893.

A NEW MUSIC HALL.

Plan on Foot for Supplying the Public With a Substitute for the Present Hall.

The loss of Music Hall, which will probably soon be sacrificed to the necessities of rapid transit, will occasion no regret if it serves to provide the city with a new and better building for musical performances.

Boston has long needed a spacious, comfortable auditorium with all modern appliances for safety and ventilation, and one which shall be an ornament to the city. Under ordinary circumstances it ought not to be difficult to raise funds for the erection of such a building, and this should be accomplished in short order in the emergency which threatens to deprive the city of the splendid concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The following note explains itself:

BOSTON, June 17, 1893.

We have been asked to act as a committee for the building of a new hall for music in Boston and also to receive subscriptions of money, and we shall attend to our duties in that respect.

We have made Mr. T. D. Boardman of the Ames Building our agent, and are glad to answer any questions about the scheme. The hall will be built under an act of incorporation, and shares of $100 each will be issued. It is hard to find in Boston a square lot which offers good exits, quietness and cheapness. The piece of land under option at the corner of Huntington Avenue and West Chester Park combines all these points. We think it the best site.

We beg to remind the public that great dispatch in subscriptions is needed in order to keep the Symphony Orchestra together and in order to finish the new hall by Oct. 1, 1894, as before that date our city will be without a place for larger concerts.

(Signed) EDWARD W. HOOPER.
HENRY F. SEARS.
H. L. HIGGINSON.

BOSTON HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCIII, NO. 175.
SATURDAY, JUNE 24, 1893.

WAS IT A DREAM?

Some Strange Experiences of a Herald Man.

What Might, Could, Would or Should Be Shown—The Dissolving Views of an Evening at Music Hall—A Conversion—News of the Music Hall Fund—Nearly $100,000 Added Yesterday.

A HERALD man had some strange experiences last evening.

He was sitting in a corner of Music Hall, and the last strains of the Waldteufel waltz had floated up to his ravished ears. He had been kept on duty for many nights, and just as he thought of moving on toward the office the atmosphere about him had a peculiar effect. He looked about him, and the walls of the hall disappeared, presenting in their stead to this vision the familiar Ames building, with a crowd all up and down Washington and Court streets, peering up into the air and listening intently.

Giving attention to these words he heard: "Now, then, ladies and gentlemen, music lovers and all who take a pride in this old city, now is your opportunity, walk right up and put your names down for the new Music Hall stock. Its going, going, and it will be gone if you don't hurry. Take any elevator, and stop at 56. The crowd were surging into the building, and the women were as energetic in getting into the car for the upward journey as the men.

Suddenly the scene changed, and the HERALD man saw Mr. T. Dennie Boardman at the telephone of his own inner office in the Ames building. This is what he heard: Hello, give me 58—pause—Yes—pause—Ask Henry L. to come to the phone—pause—That you Henry?—pause—What shall I do, they are mobbing me for a chance at the stock?—pause—Well, come up yourself if you don't—pause—Say, Henry, how many halls do you want built? We can get the money for a dozen now if you say the word—pause—Well, good day.

As the scene suddenly faded the HERALD man's attention was attracted to a crowd just in front of Rogers' building, and there right in the centre was Assistant Manager Fred R. Comee of the Symphony orchestra, and all about him were the various railroad agents of all the lines, all talking at once and offering all sorts of inducements for a renewal of last year's contracts. Just as Fred was about to utter the word that caused the cantain in "Pinafore" so much trouble this scene dissolved, and was followed by one that startled even the HERALD man.

Coming up State street, dragging a trustee of the permanent fund of the Handel and Haydn society by either hand, was the portly (?) form of E. B. Hagar, and as he then persuaded his victim toward the Ames building he was heard to argue after the following fashion:

"I tell you, two of you can do it. You have the right, under the deed of trust. I'll act as temporary secretary and draw up the votes. Only get there in time or it will all be gone. You can put us down for $25,000, and then we shall have more than we ought to, but we will give some performances next winter for a quarter, and that will make us so popular that we will get the $25,000 back twice over in 10 years.

While rubbing his eyes to make sure he had made no mistake, the HERALD man lost the outline of this picture and found it replaced by the dim outline of a great banner hung across Copley square, upon which appeared at the top the line, "The next conductor of the symphonies." The face was indistinct and the artist had not completed the name beyond the prefix "Herr."

The banner in turn faded into vapor, and in its place appeared a gorgeously fitted business office. All sorts of new contrivances were noticed about the manager's desk. There were electric buttons, one for each newspaper office, with pneumatic tubes running direct to the desks of the critics, and switches to the night editors' desks. Speaking tubes running to the seats of all the newspaper men, were also there. An indicator prominently placed recorded the degree of heat and humidity in every part of the hall above with automatic connections to wake up or put asleep the firemen and other hall attendants at will. There were three buttons there also marked "light," "more light," "some more light," each calculated to regulate the illumination of the hall above. Seated in a gold framed chair with satin upholstery in a Turkish lounging jacket was the familiar figure of Manager Charles A. Ellis, and all about him piled high on every side were telegrams reading "duplicate last year's engagements, name your terms, the ochestra will go whoever the conductor is. Shall be satisfied with choice made." Just as Manager Ellis was about to start the electric motor which was to operate the new typewriting machine and accept all the offers in duplicate, a shambling sort of a New York Bowery tough entered and said: "Say, boss, we wants the hall for Sullivan tomorrow night, see?" A dazed expression passed over the handsome face of the genial manager, but quickly recovering himself he said: "Ah, pardon, me, my dear sir, you are looking for the athletic club's quarters, fourth block down on your left. This is Music Hall."

Lost in wonder, the HERALD man was about to retire, when the picture caught his intention, and saved him the trouble, another one taking its place. It seemed to be inside a vast hall, filled with staging. Upon the platform in the midst of all the confusion stood two figures, one a well known interior decorator, the other the representative of the Fifty Associates and other corporations. Only a few words caught the HERALD man's ear as he tried to study at the proportions, and these were the words: "Well, I hope you will give them all the white and gold they want this time, put in electrics by the dozen, and see if you can't get a hall that the blind women of Boston can see across."

Some dust dropped into the HERALD man's eye just then, and when he had removed it he found himself standing in the middle of the big room down at 44 State street. Up in the corner stood the usual occupant of the desk there, reading from the HERALD, "the whole amount needed to secure a continuance of the Symphony concerts by building a new music hall has been subscribed." Just as the HERALD man was about to leave the room, with his usual crushed feeling after visits to that locality, he was astonished to hear a very familiar voice cry out: "Say, boys, if I ever cuss the newspapers for meddling with my affairs again just some one nit me, will you?"

The unanimous shout "we will" startled the HERALD man and he groped his way down stairs in the dark just as "Mac" was about to lock the outer door of Music Hall for the night.

[173]

Boston Daily Globe.
FRIDAY, JULY 7, 1893.

PAUR COMING TO LEAD.

Leipsic Director Soon to Succeed Nikisch.

Has Exceptional Talent in the Line of Concert Music.

Is Young, Married, Has Two Sons and Wears His Hair Long.

A conductor for the Boston symphony orchestra has been found, and from every source of information it seems that Bostonians have reason to be very grateful that the man is Emil Paur of the opera house at Leipsic.

Mr Paur has been selected after a very careful consideration of all well-known available conductors. Col Higginson found able men who were particularly superior in various ways, but none seemed to be the best man for concert leadership save Paur.

There is no doubt now but that Mr Paur will be in Boston in the fall ready for his season's task.

From cable dispatches, the management here understand that Mr Paur has obtained a release and has signed the contract with the Symphony orchestra.

Emil Paur is about 38 years old, and is known as one of the ablest conductors of today.

He is an Austrian, and was born at Czernowitz, in Bukowina, a province of the Austrian empire. He showed himself as a boy to be so highly gifted that his father, himself a fine musician and the director of the Musikverein of Czernowitz, sent him to the conservatory of music in Vienna when he was 14 years of age. He remained there for about six years, studying composition under Dessoff and the violin under Hellmesberger. Among his fellow students were Arthur Nikisch, Felix Motte and Eugene Gruenberg.

Emil Paur was one of the brightest students in his class and though quick enough to accomplish his tasks easily always applied himself very closely. He showed such

Marked Talent as a Conductor

when a very young man that he was chosen for the position of court conductor at Cassel. Shortly afterward he became court conductor at Konigsberg, but only remained there a short time before he was called to the still more important position as court conductor at Mannheim. In such a musical center as Mannheim Mr Paur's success means a great deal.

Mr Slagemann, director of the opera house at Leipsic, tried for some time to get Mr Paur from Mannheim, and finally succeeded when Mr Nikisch left that position for Boston.

It is rather odd that he should succeed Mr Nikisch again in his next change.

Mr Paur is a fine pianist and a master of the violin. He graduated with high honors, receiving the large medal for his superior work, and immediately secured the chair of first violin in the orchestra of the Vienna opera house. At this time he composed a number of concertos for violins.

When at the opera house in Vienna he was under Richter and Herbeck. He has made a good impression from the beginning, not only with the public, but with very harsh critics.

Speaking of the Italian benevolent concert, in his Leipsic letter to the New York Musical Courier, August Guesbacher says:

"The Bruckner symphony, 7, E major, filled the first part of the program of the Liszt Verein, and also tested the endurance of the audience, the performance of that work requiring about 1 hour and 10 minutes. Mr Paur conducted and the interpretation this pretentious composition received was wonderful, considering his material (the orchestra of the 134th regiment at best can only be ranked as second class). In this work, as well as in the closing number, Liszt's symphonic poem 'Tasso,' the precision of attack and accuracy in obedience to the conductor's interpretation, showed the best drilling of all the orchestra concerts heard here this season.

In another portion of his letter Guesbacher says:

"'If director Paur can obtain his leave, I most heartily congratulate America, and Boston in particular, on securing so worthy a successor to Nikisch. That the American public should wish to see their best institutions in the hands of flickering great lights, for the sake of beholding an illustrious name at the head of their programs, has been a source of regret to me. Paur or Weingartner were names that came to my mind from the first, and with director Paur at the helm the Boston Symphony orchestra will be in the hands of ann conscientious conductors of the present time.

One of the Most Thorough

"Paur's talents are especially for concert conducting, his disposition being a little too nervous for the opera, while his thoroughness, magnetism and generalship qualify him particularly for concerts.

"Of the numerous orchestra concerts here during the past season the two conducted by Paur for the Liszt-Verein and his part in the benefit concerts at the Gewandhaus were incomparably superior gems.

"That Americans are willing to encourage rising talent and genius is one of the most gratifying indications of their rapid advancement in music. That the greatest disappointment would have been in store for the Boston public if some of the gentlemen first considered had accepted I was convinced of by some of their recent exhibitions in conducting. For once, circumstances were kinder to the attendants of Boston Symphony concerts than the good will of the managers."

Mr Paur is married and has two sons. He is of medium height, light complexion, with light hair, rather long. He wears a full beard, cut square. He is said to be a somewhat exacting conductor, but agreeable and mild.

His wife is described as being a very bright woman, with unusual ability as a pianist.

Mr Paur is said to be a broad-minded, progressive man. He has composed many beautiful pieces, but does not put them forward very often. His bent in composition has a strong leaning toward concert music.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
FRIDAY MORNING, JULY 7, 1893.

IT IS EMIL PAUR,

WHO WILL CONDUCT THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Is at Present at the Leipsic Opera House—A Thorough Musician.

It is authoritatively stated that Mr. Emil Paur is to be the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next season. A despatch from Leipsic, which has just been received by Col. H. L. Higginson, contains the welcome news.

The new conductor is the successor of Arthur Nikisch in the conduct of the opera house at Leipsic, and a man whose unusual abilities, both as a musical director and composer, have already gained him hearty commendation from the severest of the critics of that musical-loving city. He is about 38 years of age. Col. Higginson had him in mind 10 years ago, when he was in Vienna.

Director Paur was born in Czernowitz, Austria, and received his education in Vienna. He studied violin with Hellmesberger and composition with Dessoff, and played first violin in the Court opera, Vienna, under Richter and Herbeck.

He early developed extraordinary talent as a conductor in so marked a degree that without influential friends he was chosen, while still a young man, for the fine position of court conductor in Cassel. His superior work at Cassel soon brought him a better offer from Koenigsberg, at the leading theatre of eastern Prussia.

His stay here was also short, as he was wanted for the more important position at the head of the court opera in Mannheim. His success with the critical public of this city was very great and he held the position for many years.

Director Staegemann of the Leipsic opera is a great admirer of Conductor Paur, and for many years had desired to secure his services for that city. He succeeded in engaging him when Arthur Nikisch left for America, and for the last four years Mr. Paur has conducted the opera and most important orchestral concerts there.

Mr. Paur is an accomplished piano virtuoso and a master of the violin. His compositions possess great merit, though he modestly refrains from playing them in public. He is, it is said, broad minded and progressive.

While at Mannheim Paur married, and he now has two sturdy-looking little sons. His wife, who has a keenly intelligent and expressive face, is an unusually fine piano player, but is prouder of her reputation as a good housewife than of her artistic success. Paur himself is a broad-shouldered, thickset man of medium height, with regular features and light hair and beard. His character is a sterling one; he is earnest and energetic, and at the same time kind-hearted and tolerant. While firm, strict even exacting, as a conductor, he is invariably courteous and courteous in per-

The Beacon.
BOSTON, SATURDAY, JULY 8, 1893.

A CONDUCTOR FOR THE SYMPHONIES.

At last the much-mooted question as to who will lead the Symphony orchestra the coming season has been settled by the selection of Mr. Emil Paur of the Opera House at Leipsig. After a careful consideration of the qualifications of all the available conductors, Mr. Higginson has chosen Mr. Paur, not, perhaps, because he could be called the greatest, but on account of his special talents for concert conducting, his disposition being a little too nervous for the opera, while his thoroughness, magnetism and generalship qualify him particularly for concert work. Mr. Paur is also a fine composer, his beat in composition having a strong leaning toward concert music. He is a finished pianist, and a master of the violin. Mr. Paur is about thirty-eight years of age, of medium height, light complexion, with light hair, worn long. He wears a full beard, cut square. His wife is described as being a very bright woman, with unusual ability as a pianist, It is rather odd that Mr. Paur should have succeeded Mr. Nikisch as conductor at the Opera House in Leipsig when the latter came to Boston, and now succeeds him again in his next change. The selection meets the hearty approval of all music-lovers here.

TEN PAGES.
SATURDAY, JULY 8, 1893.

PAUR'S METHODS.

Characteristics of the Symphony's New Leader.

He Is a Strict Disciplinarian, but Kind Hearted.

His Orchestra Must Follow Him Closely and Never Drag.

Mr. Eugene Gruenberg of the Boston Conservatory of Music is a most intimate friend of Emil Paur, the new conductor of the Symphony Orchestra. Perhaps no one, certainly no one in this country, can speak with greater authority in regard to Mr. Paur's ideals and methods.

"You want to know something about the new conductor, do you?" said Mr. Gruenberg to a Journal representative yesterday. "I have had many talks with Mr. Paur on musical questions, and especially on the ideals which the great conductor should always have before him and the end which he should strive to reach. Mr. Paur is a strict disciplinarian, I remember he said to me once:

EMIL PAUR AT THE AGE OF 24.
(From a photograph taken in 1879.)

On Discipline.

"'It seems to me that orchestra leaders are, as a rule, better liked if they are less strict, and act like machines rather than as intelligent men with an end to reach. This I noticed when I began my musical career at Vienna, and also while I had charge of the orchestras in Cassel, Berlin, Hanover, Konigsberg and Mannheim. I, personally, care nothing for popularity bought at such a cost. As long as a player in my orchestra does his best, says the proper attention and follows closely my leadership, he will find in me, if he cares for it, a true friend, who is willing to aid him in every possible way.'

"Mr. Paur," continued Mr. Gruenberg, "has a strong, energetic will, and is able by his overpowering personality to mold his orchestra and carry through his artistic wishes and plans. He also believes in knowing the men under him as individuals. Speaking to me at another time in regard to his experience with one of his orchestras he said:

"'When I took it in hand, I found many things in a condition which were far from pleasing, especially in regard to dynamic expression. But in a half year I was happy to see that my men understood, almost intuitively it seemed at times, the slightest hint which a movement of the hand or the expression of the face might give, and followed it immediately.

Leader Must Be in Touch With His Men.

"'The constant change of leaders, usual in so many places, especially in opera orchestras, is a thing which works destruction, and there is certainly nothing worse for an orchestra, in my opinion, than to be led by a self-conceited, automatic dilettante who happens by some mischance to wave the sceptre of power. There ought to be a law to compel an orchestra to remain under one man. "Too many cooks spoil the broth," as the saying goes.'

"You might say also," said Mr. Gruenberg, after a little pause, "that Mr. Paur as a conductor is full of fire and swing, but without ec-

EMIL PAUR AT THE AGE OF 35.
[From a photograph taken in 1890.]

centricity or affectation. He has been remarkably successful in inspiring his orchestra with this same feeling.

Above All Fire and Swing.

"'It is often difficult,' he remarked once, 'to get fire and swing into an orchestra, but I must have it. Why, I would rather, even in the great works, to drop a few notes, than to lose this fire. Above all I hate heavy, tedious playing. Even the great B—— is often too pedagogical for me, and makes too prominent the principles which belong to theory rather than to practice. I don't mean of course to play hurriedly, but you know our Herbeck, and so you know what a conductor ought to be.

"'Everybody, who is honest, will try to do his best, but even the best and wisest of us err at times. I like young men in my orchestras. They are so flexible and willing to be guided. This does not mean, of course, that I cannot appreciate experience.'

"Mr. Paur," continued Mr. Gruenburg, "is by no means what you would call a society man. He is too frank and outspoken for that. But while his manner may seem a little brusque he has a warm heart. He has a strong and powerful voice, and even when he speaks softly it sounds almost like thunder. His physique, also, is large and powerful, and he is a man who inspires confidence at first sight, and one believes in him intuitively.

"He is a fine pianist, but she is rather [illegible] than otherwise, and [illegible] before the public, though [illegible]

FRIDAY, JULY 7, 1893.

SUCCEEDS NIKISCH.

Emil Pauer to Lead the Symphony Orchestra.

Has Been Director of the Leipsic Opera.

A Young Austrian 38 Years of Age.

Emil Pauer is the man that will stand as conductor before the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall Oct. 14.

And who is Pauer?

The musical dictionaries know him not.

There is Ernst Pauer, the celebrated pianist and editor of classical compositions for the piano; but Emil Pauer is not his kinsman, according to report.

The other men mentioned, or sought, for the position, are described by musical biographers at greater or lesser length; Richter, Weingartner, Mottl, Levi, et al.

But Pauer is not even spoken of by Riemann in his "Musik-Lexikon" of '87.

He comes from Leipsic, a town that is to-day of little authority in Germany, so far as music is concerned.

But Pauer is said to be greater than his surroundings.

Now Emil Pauer was born at Czernowitz, Austria, and he is about 38 years old. He was educated at the Vienna Conservatory, where he studied the violin with Hellmesberger and composition with Dessoff.

From the first he was a brilliant student, and although his capacity enabled him to accomplish his tasks easily, he proved himself capable of application and effort. It is related of him that just before a vacation his father would suggest that if he composed something good his effort would be remembered him in a way that would enable him to spend his vacation much more pleasantly than he otherwise might; whereupon he would compose a string quartette. He graduated from the Conservatory with high honors, receiving the large medal, and he secured the chair of first violin in the orchestra of the Vienna Opera House.

He early developed talent for conducting. This became so marked that without the aid of influential friends, and while still a young man, he was given the position of Court Conductor at Cassel. His good work there brought him a better offer from Koenigsberg. His stay in Koenigsberg was short, as he was wanted at the Court Opera in Mannheim.

Director Staegemann of the Leipzig Opera desired the services of Mr. Paur, and finally succeeded in securing him four years ago when Mr. Nikisch left for America. Besides his duties as Conductor of the opera he has conducted important concerts in that city and with uniform success. He is an accomplished pianist, a master of the violin, and his compositions are said to possess merit, though he modestly refrains from performing them in public.

Mr. August Guesbacher in the Musical Courier of July 1, has this to say concerning Mr. Paur. The letter is dated Leipsic, June 13:

"The Bruckner symphony, No. 7, E major, filled the first part of the programme of the Liszt Verein, and also tested the endurance of the audience, the performance of that work requiring about one hour and ten minutes. Mr. Paur conducted and the interpretation this pretentious composition received was wonderful, considering his material (the orchestra of the One Hundred and Thirty-fourth Regiment at best can only be ranked as second-class). In this work, as well as in the closing number, Liszt's symphonic poem, 'Tasso,' the precision of attack and accuracy in obedience to the conductor's interpretation, showed the best drilling of all the orchestra concerts heard here this season.

"'Paur is going to America' I was informed a few days ago. If Director Paur can obtain his leave, I most heartily congratulate America, and Boston in particular, on securing so worthy a successor to Nikisch. That the American public should wish to see their best institutions in the hands of flickering great lights, for the sake of beholding an illustrious name at the head of their programmes, has been a source of regret to me. Paur or Weingartner were names that came to my mind from the first, and with Director Paur at the helm the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be in the hands of one of the most thorough and conscientious conductors of the present time.

"'Paur's talents are especially for concert conducting, his disposition being a little too nervous for the opera, while his thoroughness, magnetism and generalship qualify him particularly for concerts. Of the numerous orchestra concerts here during the past season the two conducted by Paur for the Liszt Verein and his part in the benefit concert at the Gewandhaus were incomparably superior gems. That Americans are willing to encourage rising talent and genius is one of the most gratifying indications of their rapid advancement in music. That the greatest disappointment would have been in store for the Boston public if some of the gentlemen first considered had accepted I was convinced of by some of their recent exhibitions in conducting. For once circumstances were kinder to the attendants of the Boston Symphony concerts than the good will of the managers."

Mr. Paur is married and has two children.

Boston Daily Globe.
FRIDAY, JULY 7, 1893.

PAUR COMING TO LEAD.

Leipsic Director Soon to Succeed Nikisch.

Has Exceptional Talent in the Line of Concert Music.

Is Young, Married, Has Two Sons and Wears His Hair Long.

A conductor for the Boston symphony orchestra has been found, and from every source of information it seems that Bostonians have reason to be very grateful that the man is Emil Paur of the opera house at Leipsic.

Mr Paur has been selected after a very careful consideration of all well-known available conductors. Col Higginson found able men who were particularly superior in various ways, but none seemed to be the best man for concert leadership save Paur.

There is no doubt now but that Mr Paur will be in Boston in the fall ready for his season's task.

From cable dispatches, the management here understand that Mr Paur has obtained a release and has signed the contract with the Symphony orchestra.

Emil Paur is about 38 years old, and is known as one of the ablest conductors of today.

He is an Austrian, and was born at Czernowitz, in Bukowina, a province of the Austrian empire. He showed himself as a boy to be so highly gifted that his father, himself a fine musician and the director of the Musikverein of Czernowitz, sent him to the conservatory of music in Vienna when he was 14 years of age. He remained there for about six years, studying composition under Dessoff and the violin under Hellmesberger. Among his fellow students were Arthur Nikisch, Felix Motte and Eugene Grunberg.

Emil Paur was one of the brightest students in his class and though quick enough to accomplish his tasks easily always applied himself very closely. He showed such when a very young man that he was chosen for the position of court conductor at Cassel. Shortly afterward he became court conductor at Konigsberg, but only remained there a short time before he was called to the still more important position as court conductor at Mannheim. In such a musical center as Mannheim Mr Paur's success means a great deal.

Marked Talent as a Conductor

Mr Slagemann, director of the opera house at Leipsic, tried for some time to get Mr Paur from Mannheim, and finally succeeded when Mr Nikisch left that position for Boston.

It is rather odd that he should succeed Mr Nikisch again in his next change.

Mr Paur is a fine pianist and a master of the violin. He graduated with high honors, receiving the large medal for his superior work, and immediately secured the chair of first violin in the orchestra of the Vienna opera house. At this time he composed a number of concertos for violins.

When at the opera house in Vienna he was under Richter and Herbeck. He has made a good impression from the beginning, not only with the public, but with very harsh critics.

Speaking of the Italian benevolent concert, in his Leipsic letter to the New York Musical Courier, August Gussbacher says:

"The Bruckner symphony, 7, E major, filled the first part of the program of the Liszt Verein, and also tested the endurance of the audience, the performance of that work requiring about 1 hour and 10 minutes. Mr Paur conducted and the interpretation this pretentious composition received was wonderful, considering his material (the orchestra of the 134th regiment at best can only be ranked as second class). In this work, as well as in the closing number, Liszt's symphonic poem 'Tasso,' the precision of attack and accuracy in obedience to the conductor's interpretation, showed the best drilling of all the orchestra concerts heard here this season.

In another portion of his letter Gussbacher says:

"'If director Paur can obtain his leave, I most heartily congratulate America, and Boston in particular, on securing so worthy a successor to Nikisch. That the American public should wish to see their best institutions in the hands of flickering great lights, for the sake of beholding an illustrious name at the head of their programs, has been a source of regret to me. Paur or Weingartner were names that came to my mind from the first, and with director Paur at the helm the Boston Symphony orchestra will be in the hands of ann conscientious conductors of the present time.

One of the Most Thorough

"Paur's talents are especially for concert conducting, his disposition being a little too nervous for the opera, while his thoroughness, magnetism and generalship qualify him particularly for concerts.

"Of the numerous orchestra concerts here during the past season the two conducted by Paur for the Liszt-Verein and his part in the benefit concerts at the Gewandhaus were incomparably superior gems.

"That Americans are willing to encourage rising talent and genius is one of the most gratifying indications of their rapid advancement in music. That the greatest disappointment would have been in store for the Boston public if some of the gentlemen first considered had accepted I was convinced of by some of their recent exhibitions in conducting. For once, circumstances were kinder to the attendants of Boston Symphony concerts than the good will of the managers."

Mr Paur is married and has two sons. He is of medium height, light complexion, with light hair, rather long. He wears a full beard, cut square. He is said to be a somewhat exacting conductor, but agreeable and mild.

His wife is described as being a very bright woman, with unusual ability as a pianist.

Mr Paur is said to be a broad-minded, progressive man. He has composed many beautiful pieces, but does not put them forward very often. His bent in composition has a strong leaning toward concert music.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
FRIDAY MORNING, JULY 7, 1893.

IT IS EMIL PAUR,

WHO WILL CONDUCT THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Is at Present at the Leipsic Opera House—A Thorough Musician.

It is authoritatively stated that Mr. Emil Paur is to be the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next season. A despatch from Leipsic, which has just been received by Col. H. L. Higginson, contains the welcome news.

The new conductor is the successor of Arthur Nikisch in the conduct of the opera house at Leipsic, and a man whose unusual abilities, both as a musical director and composer, have already gained him hearty commendation from the severest of the critics of that musical-loving city. He is about 38 years of age. Col. Higginson had him in mind 10 years ago, when he was in Vienna.

Director Paur was born in Czernowitz, Austria, and received his education in Vienna. He studied violin with Hellmesberger and composition with Dessoff, and played first violin in the Court opera, Vienna, under Richter and Herbeck.

He early developed extraordinary talent as a conductor in so marked a degree that without influential friends he was chosen, while still a young man, for the fine position of court conductor in Cassel. His superior work at Cassel soon brought him a better offer from Koenigsberg, at the leading theatre of eastern Prussia.

His stay here was also short, as he was wanted for the more important position at the head of the court opera in Mannheim. His success with the critical public of this city was very great and he held the position for many years.

Director Staegemann of the Leipsic opera is a great admirer of Conductor Paur, and for many years had desired to secure his services for that city. He succeeded in engaging him when Arthur Nikisch left for America, and for the last four years Mr. Paur has conducted the opera and most important orchestral concerts there.

Mr. Paur is an accomplished piano virtuoso and a master of the violin. His compositions possess great merit, though he modestly refrains from playing them in public. He is, it is said, broad minded and progressive.

While at Mannheim Paur married, and he now has two sturdy-looking little sons. His wife, who has a keenly intelligent and expressive face, is an unusually fine piano player, but is prouder of her reputation as a good housewife than of her artistic success. Paur himself is a broad-shouldered, thick-set man of medium height, with regular features and light hair and beard. His character is a sterling one; he is earnest and energetic, and at the same time kind-hearted and tolerant. While firm, strict and even exacting as a conductor, he is invariably agreeable and courteous in personal intercourse.

Now and then Mr. Paur has delighted his Leipsic audiences by having one of his own compositions played, but he has done this only on special occasions; and his modest disposition inclines him rather to keep back than to push it to the front. Unlike Weingartner, Strauss and [illegible] have a bent toward the composi[illegible] Paur has a strong leaning to[illegible]

The Beacon.
BOSTON, SATURDAY, JULY 8, 1893.

A CONDUCTOR FOR THE SYMPHONIES.

At last the much-mooted question as to who will lead the Symphony orchestra the coming season has been settled by the selection of Mr. Emil Paur of the Opera House at Leipsig. After a careful consideration of the qualifications of all the available conductors, Mr. Higginson has chosen Mr. Paur, not, perhaps, because he could be called the greatest, but on account of his special talents for concert conducting, his disposition being a little too nervous for the opera, while his thoroughness, magnetism and generalship qualify him particularly for concert work. Mr. Paur is also a fine composer, his best in composition having a strong leaning toward concert music. He is a finished pianist, and a master of the violin. Mr. Paur is about thirty-eight years of age, of medium height, light complexion, with light hair, worn long. He wears a full beard, cut square. His wife is described as being a very bright woman, with unusual ability as a pianist. It is rather odd that Mr. Paur should have succeeded Mr. Nikisch as conductor at the Opera House in Leipsig when the latter came to Boston, and now succeeds him again in his next change. The selection meets the hearty approval of all music-lovers here.

Boston Journal.
TEN PAGES.
SATURDAY, JULY 8, 1893.

PAUR'S METHODS.

Characteristics of the Symphony's New Leader.

He Is a Strict Disciplinarian, but Kind Hearted.

His Orchestra Must Follow Him Closely and Never Drag.

Mr. Eugene Gruenberg of the Boston Conservatory of Music is a most intimate friend of Emil Paur, the new conductor of the Symphony Orchestra. Perhaps no one, certainly no one in this country, can speak with greater authority in regard to Mr. Paur's ideals and methods.

"You want to know something about the new conductor, do you?" said Mr. Gruenberg to a Journal representative yesterday. "I have had many talks with Mr. Paur on musical questions, and especially on the ideals which the great conductor should always have before him and the end which he should strive to reach. Mr. Paur is a strict disciplinarian. I remember he said to me once:

EMIL PAUR AT THE AGE OF 24.
(From a photograph taken in 1879.)

On Discipline.

"'It seems to me that orchestra leaders are, as a rule, better liked if they are less strict, and act like machines rather than as intelligent men with an end to reach. This I noticed when I began my musical career at Vienna, and also while I had charge of the orchestras in Cassel, Berlin, Hanover, Konigsberg and Mannheim. I, personally, care nothing for popularity bought at such a cost. As long as a player in my orchestra does his best, pays the proper attention and follows closely my leadership, he will find in me, if he cares for it, a true friend, who is willing to aid him in every possible way.'

"Mr. Paur," continued Mr. Gruenberg, "has a strong, energetic will, and is able by his overpowering personality to mold his orchestra and carry through his artistic wishes and plans. He also believes in knowing the men under him as individuals. Speaking to me at another time in regard to his experience with one of his orchestras he said:

"'When I took it in hand, I found many things in a condition which were far from pleasing, especially in regard to dynamic expression. But in a half year I was happy to see that my men understood, almost intuitively it seemed at times, the slightest hint which a movement of the hand or the expression of the face might give, and followed it immediately.

Leader Must Be in Touch With His Men.

"'The constant change of leaders, usual in so many places, especially in opera orchestras, is a thing which works destruction, and there is certainly nothing worse for an orchestra, in my opinion, than to be led by a self-conceited, automatic dilettante who happens by some mischance to wave the sceptre of power. There ought to be a law to compel an orchestra to remain under one man. "Too many cooks spoil the broth," as the saying goes.'

"You might say also," said Mr. Gruenberg, after a little pause, "that Mr. Paur as a conductor is full of fire and swing, but without eo-

EMIL PAUR AT THE AGE OF 35.
[From a photograph taken in 1890.]

centricity or affectation. He has been remarkably successful in inspiring his orchestra with this same feeling.

Above All Fire and Swing.

"'It is often difficult,' he remarked once, 'to get fire and swing into an orchestra, but I must have it. Why, I would rather, even in the great works, to drop a few notes, than to lose this fire. Above all I hate heavy, tedious playing. Even the great B—— is often too pedagogical for me, and makes too prominent the principles which belong to theory rather than to practice. I don't mean of course to play hurriedly, but you know our Herbeck, and so you know what a conductor ought to be.

"'Everybody, who is honest, will try to do his best, but even the best and wisest of us err at times. I like young men in my orchestras. They are so flexible and willing to be guided. This does not mean, of course, that I cannot appreciate experience.'

"Mr. Paur," continued Mr. Gruenburg, "is by no means what you would call a society man. He is too frank and outspoken for that. But while his manner may seem a little brusque he has a warm heart. He has a strong and powerful voice, and even when he speaks softly it sounds almost like thunder. His physique, also, is large and powerful, and he is a man who inspires confidence at first sight, and one believes in him intuitively.

"His wife is a fine pianist, but she is rather domestic in her tastes than otherwise, and rarely appears before the public, though amply qualified to do so. She much prefers to devote herself to her husband and her two boys."

Boston Journal.
FRIDAY, JULY 7, 1893.

SUCCEEDS NIKISCH.

Emil Pauer to Lead the Symphony Orchestra.

Has Been Director of the Leipsic Opera.

A Young Austrian 38 Years of Age.

Emil Pauer is the man that will stand as conductor before the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall Oct. 14.

And who is Pauer?

The musical dictionaries know him not.

There is Ernst Pauer, the celebrated pianist and editor of classical compositions for the piano; but Emil Pauer is not his kinsman, according to report.

The other men mentioned, or sought, for the position, are described by musical biographers at greater or lesser length: Richter, Weingartner, Mottl, Levi, et al.

But Pauer is not even spoken of by Riemann in his "Musik-Lexikon" of '87.

He comes from Leipsic, a town that is to-day of little authority in Germany, so far as music is concerned.

But Pauer is said to be greater than his surroundings.

Now Emil Pauer was born at Czernowitz, Austria, and he is about 38 years old. He was educated at the Vienna Conservatory, where he studied the violin with Hellmesberger and composition with Dessoff.

From the first he was a brilliant student, and although his capacity enabled him to accomplish his tasks easily, he proved himself capable of application and effort. It is related of him that just before a vacation his father would suggest that if he composed something good his effort would be remembered him in a way that would enable him to spend his vacation much more pleasantly than he otherwise might; whereupon he would compose a string quartette. He graduated from the Conservatory with high honors, receiving the large medal, and he secured the chair of first violin in the orchestra of the Vienna Opera House.

He early developed talent for conducting. This became so marked that without the aid of influential friends, and while still a young man, he was given the position of Court Conductor at Cassel. His good work there brought him a better offer from Koenigsberg. His stay in Koenigsberg was short, as he was wanted at the Court Opera in Mannheim.

Director Staegemann of the Leipzig Opera desired the services of Mr. Paur, and finally succeeded in securing him four years ago when Mr. Nikisch left for America. Besides his duties as Conductor of the opera he has conducted important concerts in that city and with uniform success. He is an accomplished pianist, a master of the violin, and his compositions are said to possess merit, though he modestly refrains from performing them in public.

Mr. August Guessbacher in the Musical Courier of July 1, has this to say concerning Mr. Paur. The letter is dated Leipsic, June 13:

"The Bruckner symphony, No. 7, E major, filled the first part of the programme of the Liszt Verein, and also tested the endurance of the audience, the performance of that work requiring about one hour and ten minutes. Mr. Paur conducted and the interpretation this pretentious composition received was wonderful, considering his material (the orchestra of the One Hundred and Thirty-fourth Regiment at best can only be ranked as second-class). In this work, as well as in the closing number, Liszt's symphonic poem, 'Tasso,' the precision of attack and accuracy in obedience to the conductor's interpretation, showed the best drilling of all the orchestra concerts heard here this season.

"'Paur is going to America' I was informed a few days ago. If Director Paur can obtain his leave, I most heartily congratulate America, and Boston in particular, on securing so worthy a successor to Nikisch. That the American public should wish to see their best institutions in the hands of flickering great lights, for the sake of beholding an illustrious name at the head of their programmes, has been a source of regret to me. Paur or Weingartner were names that came to my mind from the first, and with Director Paur at the helm the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be in the hands of one of the most thorough and conscientious conductors of the present time.

"Paur's talents are especially for concert conducting, his disposition being a little too nervous for the opera, while his thoroughness, magnetism and generalship qualify him particularly for concerts. Of the numerous orchestra concerts here during the past season the two conducted by Paur for the Liszt Verein and his part in the benefit concert at the Gewandhaus were incomparably superior gems. That Americans are willing to encourage rising talent and genius is one of the most gratifying indications of their rapid advancement in music. That the greatest disappointment would have been in store for the Boston public if some of the gentlemen first considered had accepted I was convinced of by some of their recent exhibitions in conducting. For once circumstances were kinder to the attendants of the Boston Symphony concerts than the good will of the managers."

Mr. Paur is married and has two children.

[174]

CONDUCTOR PAUR.

A Leipsic Man to Lead the Symphony.

He Succeeded Nikisch There—A Thorough Musician.

It is authoritatively stated that Mr. Emil Paur is to be the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next season. A despatch from Leipsic, which has just been received by Col. H. L. Higginson, contains the welcome news.

The new conductor is the successor of Arthur Nikisch in the conduct of the opera house at Leipsic, and a man whose unusual abilities, both as a musical director and composer, have already gained him hearty commendation from the severest of the critics of that musical-loving city. He is about 38 years of age. Col. Higginson had him in mind 10 years ago, when he was in Vienna.

Director Paur was born in Czernowitz, Austria, and received his education in Vienna. He studied violin with Hellmesberger and composition with Dessoff, and played first violin in the Court opera, Vienna, under Richter and Herbeck.

He early developed extraordinary talent as a conductor in so marked a degree that without influential friends he was chosen, while still a young man, for the fine position of court conductor in Cassel. His superior work at Cassel soon brought him a better offer from Koenigsberg, at the leading theatre of eastern Prussia.

His stay here was also short, as he was wanted for the more important position at the head of the court opera in Mannheim. His success with the critical public of this city was very great and he held the position for many years.

Director Staegemann of the Leipsic opera is a great admirer of Conductor Paur, and for many years had desired to secure his services for that city. He succeeded in engaging him when Arthur Nikisch left for America, and for the last four years Mr. Paur has conducted the opera and most important orchestral concerts there.

Mr. Paur is an accomplished piano virtuoso and a master of the violin. His compositions possess great merit, though he modestly refrains from playing them in public. He is, it is said, broad minded and progressive.

While at Mannheim Paur married, and he now has two sturdy-looking little sons. His wife, who has a keenly intelligent and expressive face, is an unusually fine piano player, but is prouder of her reputation as a good housewife than of her artistic success. Paur himself is a broad-shouldered, thick-set man of medium height, with regular features and light hair and beard. His character is a sterling one; he is earnest and energetic, and at the same time kind-hearted and tolerant. While firm, strict and even exacting as a conductor, he is invariably agreeable and courteous in personal intercourse.

Now and then Mr. Paur has delighted his Leipsic audiences by having one of his own compositions played, but he has done this only on rare occasions; and his modest disposition inclines him rather to keep back his work than to push it to the front. Unlike Mahler, Weingartner, Strauss and Mottl, who have a bent toward the composition of opera, Paur has a strong leaning toward concert music.

American Art Journal.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JULY 15, 1893.

Emil Paur Appoint d Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

No event of late in the musical world has attracted as much attention or has been fraught with as much interest as the selection of Emil Paur as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Not only the unrivaled reputation of this superb orchestral organization has been at stake depending upon Colonel Higginson's choice, but Boston's musical future seems to have been especially uncertain, depending in good part upon the provision made for a new music hall. Both subjects seem to have been satisfactorily disposed of, and Boston can once more dream in peace and adjust its spectacles with an air of extreme satisfaction and contentment.

It is not known how soon Herr Paur will come to this country, but it is hoped before the opening of the season of the Symphony Orchestra in October.

Emil Pauer was born in Czernowitz, Austria, and is now about 37 years old He is a man of large physique. He received his musical education in Vienna, studying the violin under Hellmsberger and composition under Dessorf. His advancement was rapid, and soon he was playing first violin in the court opera in Vienna under Richter, and also under Herbeck. His ability as a conductor soon showed itself, and in so marked degree that he was appointed leader at Cassel, and his excellence there soon led to his promotion to the leadership at Koenigsberg. From Koenigsberg he went to the court opera at Mannheim, and was there many years, until Nikisch left Leipsic for America, when he succeeded Nikisch at Leipsic, where he now is. Pauer has also played with success as a piano virtuoso, while his ability as a violinist is of high order.

Herr Paur has seemed to follow Nikisch with ermarkable persistence. When the latter resigned the post of conductor of the Leipsic Opera House to come to this country Pauer succeeded him, and the position he still retains. He now takes the baton that Nikisch so successfully wielded for so many years.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCIV. NO. 8.

SATURDAY, JULY 8, 1893.

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The collection of the money needed to build the new music hall, and the engagement of Herr Emil Paur as conductor, remove entirely the doubt that a short time ago existed as to the continuance of the Boston Symphony orchestra. One may be sure that our townsman, Mr. Henry L. Higginson, has done everything that an extraordinarily discriminating and liberal spirit could suggest in the way of procuring as leader of his orchestra the best available person. The man who has the highest reputation in Europe as the conductor of an orchestra would have been secured if his official relations had permitted him to make the needed engagement. Failing in him, the choice has fallen upon Herr Paur, who, if he does not hold the highest position, ranks closely after the one who stands at the head. There is every reason for thinking that the Boston Symphony orchestra will continue in the immediate future, as it has in the past, to steadily improve, on account of a management which spares no expense in order to obtain the best results, and because the policy of control is directed by a love of the highest class of music.

THE NEW HALL.

A Way to Make It a Benefit to All the People of Boston.

To the Editor of the Herald: This Music Hall scheme which is now being so much discussed seems to me to afford a fine chance to do something for the benefit of the entire public, and not only for the comparative few who can afford to pay high prices for the weekly Symphony concert.

In the first place, the sum of $400,000 is inadequate to make a building of the noble monumental and architectural character which befits our community, for are we not going to build for 50 years hence, as well as for the present generation? In addition to the sum above named, several hundred thousand dollars more would be needed to make the building worthy of us.

Why could we not have popular concerts given two or three evenings each week almost the whole year round under somewhat the same conditions as the present popular concerts are given, thereby giving the multitude a chance to get an improving and innocent amusement at prices within the reach of all. I am sure that these concerts would pay a profit, as the present populars do, and this profit could be devoted to paying the interest and part of the principal required over and above the $400,000 now being talked about. It would not be necessary to have as expensive a lot of performers as compose the Symphony orchestra.

I admire the orchestra as now organized as much as anybody, but its scope is limited and the public at large derive no benefit. Let us have a music hall for the whole population of the community.

W. W.

[175]

MR.

GEORGE GROSSMITH'S

• • First American Tour • •

Under the Direction of Mr. N. VERT.

Friday Evening, Nov. 25,
At Eight.

MUSIC HALL,
BOSTON.

Tickets, with reserved seats, $1.50 and $1.00, according to location.
Sale of seats opens at Music Hall, Friday, November 18.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Friday Evening, Nov. 25,
At Eight.

MUSIC HALL,
BOSTON.

First appearance in Boston of . the distinguished Comedian .

MR. GEORGE GROSSMITH,

IN HIS ORIGINAL

HUMOROUS AND MUSICAL RECITAL.

PROGRAMME.

• Part I. •

A Musical Sketch entitled

"SOCIETY UP TO DATE."

General advice to "Go with the Times."— A hint for very old and very young gentlemen.— Mammas past and present.— Music past and present.— The secret of a Sonata.— An extremely short Modern German Piece.— An "Up to Date" Love Song, with a sample of modern Poetry.— "Thou of my Thou."— Influence of G. R. Sims on the "Modern Reciter."— A Colloquial and Confidential Recitation, "Brokers Ahead, or the Old Armchair."— The Modern Comic Irish Song.— The Ball-room of to-day and the Ball-room of the past.— The "Up to Date" Waltz and the Dances of years ago.

AN INTERVAL OF FIVE MINUTES.

• Part II. •

A Humorous Sketch on the Drama entitled

"PLAY ACTING,"

Including Examples of Acting ON and OFF the Stage.— Holding the Mirror up to Nature.— How to play a Comic Countryman, a Villager, a Heroine, a Villain, an Earnest Lover, a Stage Child, etc.— Italian Opera, with a very long Recitative.

AN INTERVAL OF THREE MINUTES.

• Part III. •

Numerous Illustrations and Imitations.

SONG, "THE OLD ORGAN MAN," "LADIES' SHOPPING."

RECITATION (with music), "THE MOTHER AND THE CHILD WERE THERE."

GEORGE GROSSMITH.

George Grossmith, the subject of this slight sketch, was born in London, in 1847. His father was for many years one of the best entertainers known to London. He possessed the extraordinary power of keeping an audience in roars of laughter with a succession of stories, imitations, dramatic illustrations, or recitals from Dickens, etc., without any aid from the theatrical costumier or peruquier. No better raconteur was to be met with. He was a universal favorite, and was esteemed and honored by all who had the pleasure of his acquaintance. His son, George Grossmith, inherits his father's talents; but the style of his entertainments is entirely different, inasmuch as he sings and plays the piano, and relies almost entirely on his own writings and compositions for his répertoire. During his early days, and when in his teens, he and his younger brother Weedon (whose success in America a few years ago as a member of Miss Vokes's company is pleasantly remembered) were allowed to give entertainments at home, and even at that time showed that both possessed the proper sort of stuff that goes towards the making of good actors.

The list of guests who occasionally witnessed these performances, and who were intimate friends of Mr. Grossmith's parents, embraced many well-known persons, among them Henry Irving, John Toole, J. Clarke, H. J. Byron, author, John Oxenford, of the Times newspaper, Kate and Ellen Terry, Madame Celeste, Miss Woolgar (Mrs. Alfred Mellon), Andrew Halliday, Artemus Ward, Charles Wyndham, Lionel Brough, Luke Fieldes, Royal Academician, Joseph Hatton, author, Dillon Croker, J. Prowse, Fred Barnard, Mrs. Eilvort, Eliza Winstanley, Emma Stanley, the entertainer, W. S. Woodin, entertainer, Arthur Sketchley, Tom Hood, Jr., T. W. Robertson, author, Miss Furtado, Paul Bedford, Frank Burnand, editor of Punch, John Hollingshead, manager, Alhambra Theatre, London, etc.

About this time, 1868, Mr. Grossmith began to give sketches (which were almost always written by himself) in public, and continued to do so until November, 1869, when he was offered an appointment under Professor Pepper at the Royal Polytechnic Institution, London, where he gave his entertainment consisting of "Human Oddities" and other sketches.

Mr. Grossmith also helped his father in making reports of the cases heard at the Metropolitan Police Court, Bow Street, and remained at this post until 1877, when he appeared at the Opera Comique Theatre.

It was in the month of November, 1877, that Mr. Grossmith received the following letter from Sir Arthur Sullivan, which was to cause such a great change in his vocation and life,—a change which was to bring him into almost immediate prominence among London actors:—

BEEF STEAK CLUB,
KING WILLIAM STREET, STRAND,
Tuesday Night.

DEAR MR. GROSSMITH,—Are you inclined to go on the stage for a time? There is a part in the new piece I am doing with Gilbert which I think you would play admirably. I can't find a good man for it. Let me have a line, or come to 9 Albert Mansions to-morrow after 4, or Thursday before 2.30.

Yours sincerely,

ARTHUR SULLIVAN.

Mr. Grossmith was naturally much delighted at receiving so kind a letter, and great was the conflict in his mind as to whether he should go on the stage or continue an entertainer. His father and a whole host of friends were very much against his going on the stage, and thought he was very foolish to give up his entertainments for the uncertainties of the stage. Others, however, advised him strongly to become an actor; and, after weighing the matter seriously for a week, and having obtained a guarantee from Mr. D'Oyley Carte of a six weeks' engagement certain, he finally agreed, after having seen Sir Arthur Sullivan and Mr. W. S. Gilbert, to become one of their company. He made his début at the Opera Comique Theatre in December, 1877, in the character of John Wellington Wells, in the Sullivan and Gilbert opera of "The Sorcerer," produced at that theatre by Mr. D'Oyley Carte, who was responsible for the whole of the productions of the united operas at the above-named theatre and also at the Savoy Theatre. How Mr. Grossmith took the town by storm, achieving a tremendous success, is well known to every theatre-goer; and, as most of the public are theatre-goers, the public knew it also. Then came the extraordinary Sullivan and Gilbert run. Mr. Grossmith created successively the parts of Sir Joseph Porter in H.M.S. "Pinafore," General Stanley in the "Pirates of Penzance," Bunthorne in "Patience," the Lord Chancellor in "Iolanthe," King Goma in "Princess Ida," Ko-Ko, the Lord High Executioner, in "The Mikado," Robin Oakapple in "Ruddigore," and last, but not least, Jack Point in the "Yeomen of the Guard." For a month in 1884, when "Trial by Jury" was played with the revival of "The Sorcerer," Mr. Grossmith played the Judge. It will therefore be seen that during an engagement terminating in August, 1889, lasting nearly twelve years, this actor had only played ten parts. The personation of those parts in the very able provincial companies sent out by Mr. D'Oyley Carte were all modelled on the Savoy productions. Twelve years was a long time for one actor to remain in the same theatre; and Mr. Grossmith began to feel that he was getting too cramped in his acting, and was seriously thinking of making a change. He had sometimes, on very rare occasions, taken two or three parts at some special benefit matinées, but, as a rule, at these entertainments he generally gave a short sketch at the piano. He gave some of his sketches regularly after some of the Gilbert and Sullivan operas, both at the Opera Comique and the Savoy Theatres, among those specially written for this purpose being "The Musical Nightmare," "The Juvenile Party," "Five Hamlets," "The Drama on Crutches," "Homburg; or, Haunted by the Mikado," and "Holiday Hall." Mr. Grossmith has written and composed some fifty of the sketches, and included in them are some forty of his own published songs. During the period between 1877 and 1889 Mr. Grossmith's evenings were often (after the theatre) devoted to giving entertainments in drawing-rooms at all the very best houses in London society. He was then an immense public favorite, and he found his drawing-room audiences most delightful. At last, in the early part of 1889, he decided to sever his connection with the Savoy and start on tour with his entertainment, consisting, as Mr. Grossmith humorously puts it, of "himself and a Brinsmead grand piano." A London leading newspaper thus describes his last appearance at the Savoy: "Nothing has become Mr. George Grossmith more than his manner of leaving (for the present) the Savoy. No flourish of trumpets attended it. The audience that evening was not exceptional in proportion, but it was very appreciative; and at the close Mr. Grossmith was the object of a special demonstration. At first, he only bowed his thanks; but, called out again, he addressed the public in a few remarks, judiciously conceived and humorously delivered. When Mr. Grossmith said that he felt 'fit' for his country engagements, one of the 'gods' called out 'Good old Grossmith,' to which the ever-ready actor responded with an equally cheery 'Good old

BLANK PAGE

END OF VOLUME

VOLUME 6

BSO
KNEISEL QUARTET

1893 - 1894

Invoice & Scrap BOOK

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR.

THIRTEENTH SEASON, 1893-94. EIGHTH SEASON IN NEW YORK.

- - Five Concerts in - - Music Hall

(Seventh Avenue and Fifty-seventh Street),

Wednesday Evening, November 8,
Thursday Evening, December 14,
Thursday Evening, January 11,
Thursday Evening, February 8,
Thursday Evening, March 29.

SOLOISTS.

Mme. EMMA EAMES, Mme. LILLIAN NORDICA,
Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL,

And others to be announced.

Subscription tickets, with reserved seats for the series of five concerts, $7.50, $6.00, $5.00, and $4.00, according to location. Boxes (seating six), $50.00.

The sale of subscription tickets opens Thursday, Oct. 12, at Messrs. E. Schuberth & Co.'s, 23 Union Square.

☞ Programme books, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed, will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of subscription tickets.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

The Kneisel Quartet

NINTH SEASON, 1893-94

FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin.
OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin.
L. SVECENSKI, Viola.
ALWIN SCHROEDER, Violoncello.

EIGHT CONCERTS

IN

CHICKERING HALL, 152 Tremont St.

ON

MONDAY EVENINGS, October 23, November 13, December 4, January 1, January 22, February 12, March 5, and March 19.

Assisting Artists to be announced.

PROGRAMME OF FIRST CONCERT.

BEETHOVEN . . . . Quartet in F major, Op. 59
HAYDN . . . . . Quartet in G minor
BRAHMS . . . . . Quintet in F major, Op. 88
(Second Viola, MR. ZACH.)

Later programmes will include the Quartet in E minor, Smetana; Quartet in E-flat major, D'Albert; Quartet in A minor, Op. 132, Beethoven; Quartet in E-flat, Op. 127, Beethoven; Septet, Beethoven; Piano Quintet in F minor, Brahms, etc.

Subscription tickets, with reserved seats for the series, $8.

Sale opens at the Box Office, Music Hall, Monday morning, October 16.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR.

SEASON 1893-94.

TEN CONCERTS

. . IN . .

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge,

. . ON . .

THURSDAY EVENINGS, October 19, November 2, November 16, December 7, January 4, January 25, February 15, March 8, April 5, April 26.

SOLOISTS:

MME. NORDICA. MR. LEO SCHULZ.

MR. MAX HEINRICH. MR. FRANZ KNEISEL.

And others to be announced.

Season tickets, with reserved seats for the series of ten concerts, $7.50.

☞ The sale of season tickets opens at the University Bookstore, Cambridge, Saturday, October 14, at 8 A.M.

A limited number of seats have been reserved for College officers and invited guests.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR.

Thirteenth Season, 1893-94. Eighth Season in Philadelphia.

~ FIVE CONCERTS
~ ACADEMY OF MUSIC

Thursday Evening, November 9.

Wednesday Evening, December 13.

Wednesday Evening, January 10.

Wednesday Evening, February 7.

Wednesday Evening, March 28.

SOLOISTS.

Mme. EMMA EAMES, Mr. MAX HEINRICH,

Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL,

AND OTHERS TO BE ANNOUNCED.

Subscription tickets, with reserved seats for the series of five concerts, $3.50, $5.00, and $7.00, according to location.

Experience has shown the unfairness of accepting orders for seats in advance of the public sale, and the custom has caused great dissatisfaction in the past. For this reason orders cannot be accepted. To save patrons the annoyance of waiting in line at the Box Office, and to insure a fair distribution of tickets,

The $5 and the $7 seats will be sold at auction in the Academy of Music on Monday morning, October 30, beginning at 10 o'clock.

Bids will be the premium on each seat, and will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for choice. No more than six seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a large diagram erected on the stage, and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered at once, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be resold.

The seats not taken at the auction, and all the $3.50 seats, will be on sale at regular prices at 1221 Chestnut Street, on Tuesday, October 31, at 8 A.M.

☞ Programme books, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed, will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of subscription tickets.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Thirteenth Season.

Boston Symphony Orchestra,

MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR.

SIX GRAND CONCERTS

. . IN . .

Infantry Hall, Providence

. . ON . .

WEDNESDAY EVENINGS, October 25, November 22, December 20, 1893, January 17, February 28, and April 11, 1894.

☞ Mme. Nordica,
Mr. Loeffler,

And other artists will appear as soloists.

Season tickets, with reserved seats for the series of six concerts, Five Dollars.

☞ The sale of season tickets opens at the Box Office, Infantry Hall, Monday morning, October 16, at 9 o'clock.

To insure a fair distribution of tickets, no more than ten will be sold to any one person.

C. A. ELLIS,
Manager.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR.

Thirteenth Season, 1893-94. Eighth Season in Washington.

FIVE CONCERTS IN METZEROTT MUSIC HALL

Monday Evening, November 6.

Monday Evening, December 11.

Monday Evening, January 8.

Monday Evening, February 5.

Monday Evening, March 26.

. . SOLOISTS . .

MME. LILLIAN NORDICA, MR. FRANZ KNEISEL,

AND OTHERS TO BE ANNOUNCED.

Subscription tickets, with reserved seats for the series of five concerts, $5 and $7, according to location.

The sale of subscription tickets opens Monday, October 30, at Metzerott's Music Store.

☞ Programme books, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed, will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of subscription tickets.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

THIRTEENTH SEASON, 1893-94.

UNDER THE AUSPICES OF THE Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn.

FIVE CONCERTS,
FIVE PUBLIC REHEARSALS,
ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

Friday Afternoon, November 10.
Saturday Evening, November 11.
Friday Afternoon, December 15.
Saturday Evening, December 16.
Friday Afternoon, January 12.
Saturday Evening, January 13.
Friday Afternoon, February 9.
Saturday Evening, February 10.
Friday Afternoon, March 30.
Saturday Evening, March 31.

AFTERNOONS AT 3. EVENINGS AT 8.

Soloists.

Mme. EMMA EAMES, Mme. LILLIAN NORDICA,
Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL,
and others to be announced.

Subscription tickets, with reserved seats for the series of five concerts, $3.00, $5.00, and $6.50, according to location, and for the Rehearsals, $3.00, $4.00, and $5.00, according to location.

The sale of subscription tickets for both series opens at Chandler's, 300 Fulton St., Thursday, October 26, at 8 A. M.

☞ Programme books, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed, will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of subscription tickets.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

Thirteenth Season, 1893-94. Eighth Season in Baltimore.

FIVE CONCERTS,
FORD'S OPERA HOUSE,

TUESDAY AFTERNOONS at three o'clock, NOVEMBER 7th, DECEMBER 12th, JANUARY 9th, FEBRUARY 6th, and MARCH 27th.

SOLOISTS:

Mme. LILLIAN NORDICA,

Mr. MAX HEINRICH,

Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL,

And others to be announced.

Subscription tickets with reserved seats for the series of five concerts, $5.00 and $7.00, according to location.

The sale of subscription tickets opens at ALBERT'S TICKET OFFICE, 13 N. Charles Street, TUESDAY MORNING, OCTOBER 31st.

Programme books with descriptive notes on the works to be performed will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of subscription tickets.

C. A. ELLIS,
Manager.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

13th SEASON, 1893-94.

November Itinerary.

Leave Boston Sunday, November 5, at 7.30 P.M. Providence Depot.
Breakfast Philadelphia, Monday, November 6, at 7, A.M. Broad St. Station Penn. R. R.
Arrive Baltimore, Camden Street Station B. & O. R. R. at 9.45 A.M.
CARROLLTON HOTEL.
Leave Baltimore, Camden Street Station B. & O. R. R. at 6 P.M.
Arrive Washington 7.05 P.M.
Concert at Metzerott's Music Hall, 1110 F Street, at 8 P.M.
Leave Washington at 10.45 P.M.
Arrive Baltimore at 11.30 P.M. SUPPER at Carrollton Hotel.
Concert at Ford's Opera House, Baltimore, Tuesday, November 7, at 3 P.M.
Leave Baltimore, Camden Street Station, B. & O. R. R. 5.55 P.M. directly after matinee.
Arrive New York, 10.55 P.M.
PARK AVENUE HOTEL.
Wednesday, November 8, Rehearsal at Music Hall, 7th Avenue and 57th Street, at 11.30 A.M.
Concert at Music Hall at 8, P.M.
Leave New York, B. & O. R. R. Ferry foot of Liberty Street, Thursday, November 9, at 10 A.M.
Arrive Philadelphia, 12th and Market Streets, 12.33 P.M.
CONTINENTAL HOTEL.
Concert at Academy of Music at 8, P.M.
Leave Philadelphia, Friday, November 10, 12th and Market Streets, 8 30 A.M.
Arrive New York, 10.55 A.M.
PARK AVENUE HOTEL.
Public Rehearsal at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Friday, November 10, at 3 P.M.
Concert at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Saturday, November 11, at 8.15. P.M.
Leave New York, Saturday, November 11, midnight. Grand Central Depot.
Arrive Boston, Sunday, November 12, at 7 A.M. Providence Depot.
Instruments must be ready and marked to-night, (Saturday), after the Concert.

C. A. ELLIS, MANAGER.
F. R. COMEE, ASS'T MANAGER.

SATURDAY, November 4, 1893.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

THIRTEENTH SEASON, 1893-94.

HOTEL LIST.

E. Paur.

F. R. Comee.
C. M. Loeffler.

Fr. Kneisel.

T. Adamowski.
J. Adamowski.

A. Schroeder.

C. Mole.

A. Hackebarth.

L. Svecenski.
O. Roth.

E. Grunberg.
M. Zach.

W.W. Swornsbourne.
F. E. Schuchmann.

D. Kuntz.
H. Eichheim.

J. Akeroyd,
H. A. Greene.

I. Schnitzler.
P. Fiumara.

H. D. Simpson.
E. B. Marble.

E. Fiedler.
A. Moldauer.

J. Edw. Eichler.
W. Krafft.

E. Golde.
W. A. Field.

H. Schuecker.
J. Hoffmann.

F. Mahn.
H. Berger.

G. Strube.
F. E. Hahn.

G. Goldschmidt.
A. Gutter.

J. Knecht.

A. Goldstein.
S. Goldstein.

P. Metzger.
F. Muller.

A. Kolster.
M. Kluge.

E. M. Heindl.
Jul. E. Eichler.

C. Schumann.

G. Bareither.
L. Jennewein.

G. Gerhardt.
H. Hoyer.

C. Reibl.

H. J Butler.
R. Kurth.

A. Rigg.

A. Heindl.

PERSONNEL of the . . . . .

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Thirteenth Season, 1893-94.

MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR.

FIRST VIOLINS.

Kneisel, Fr., Concertmeister.

Loeffler, C. M.	Fiedler, E.	Eichheim, H.	Knecht, J.
Adamowski, T.	Moldauer, A.	Hoffmann, J.	Krafft, W.
Roth, O.	Kuntz, D.	Strube, G.	Hahn, F. E.
Schnitzler, I.	Ondricek, K.	Mahn, F.

SECOND VIOLINS.

Akeroyd, J.	Schuchman, F. E.	Kurth, R.	Eichler, Jul. E.
Fiumara, P.	Kneisel, Jos.	Zahn, F.	Eichler, J. Edw.
Swornsbourne, W. W.		Goldstein, S.	Michael, J.
Marble, E. B.	Tischer-Zeitz, H.	Berger, H.

VIOLAS.

Svecenski, L.	Rietzel, W.	Grunberg, E.	Kluge, M.
Zach, M.	Kolster, A.	Hoyer, H.	Taubert, O.
Heindl, H.			Post, L.

VIOLONCELLOS.

Schroeder, A.	Adamowski, J.	Rose, E.	Reibl, C.
Schulz, L.	Mingels, E. F.	Loeffler, E.	Heindl, A.

BASSES.

Goldstein, A.	Bareither, G.	Jennewein, L.	Butler, H. J.
Greene, H. A.	Boernig, H.	Gerhardt, G.	Barth, C.

FLUTES.			OBOE.
Mole, C.	Heindl, E. M.	Fox, Paul.	Sautet, A.	Demuth, L.

ENGL. HORN.	CLARINETS.		BASS CLARINET.
Muller, F.	Goldschmidt, G.	Metzger, P.	Strasser, E.

BASSOONS.

Gutter, A. Gunzel, F. H.

HORNS.

Hackebarth, A. Hein, Fr. Lorbeer, H. Schumann, C.

TRUMPETS.		TROMBONES.
Muller, P.	Mann, Jos.	Hampe, C.	Abloescher, J.	Rigg, A.

HARP.	TUBA.	TYMPANI.	DRUMS.
Schuecker, H.	Golde, E.	Ludwig, C. R.	Simpson, H. D.

CYMBALS, TRIANGLE, ETC.	TAMBOUR AND CASTENETS.	LIBRARIAN.
Field, W. A.	Senia, T. B.	Sauerquell, J.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

Thirteenth Season, 1893-94. Eighth Season in Baltimore.

FIVE CONCERTS,

FORD'S OPERA HOUSE,

TUESDAY AFTERNOONS at three o'clock, NOVEMBER 7th, DECEMBER 12th, JANUARY 9th, FEBRUARY 6th, and MARCH 27th.

SOLOISTS:

Mme. LILLIAN NORDICA,

Mr. MAX HEINRICH,

Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL,

And others to be announced.

Subscription tickets with reserved seats for the series of five concerts, $5.00 and $7.00, according to location.

The sale of subscription tickets opens at ALBERT'S TICKET OFFICE, 13 N. Charles Street, TUESDAY MORNING, OCTOBER 31st.

Programme books with descriptive notes on the works to be performed will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of subscription tickets.

C. A. ELLIS,
Manager.

[4]

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

13th SEASON, 1893-94.

November Itinerary.

Leave Boston Sunday, November 5, at 7.30 P.M. Providence Depot.
Breakfast Philadelphia, Monday, November 6, at 7, A.M. Broad St. Station Penn. R. R.
Arrive Baltimore, Camden Street Station B. & O. R. R. at 9.45 A.M.
CARROLLTON HOTEL.
Leave Baltimore, Camden Street Station B. & O. R. R. at 6 P.M.
Arrive Washington 7.05 P.M.
Concert at Metzerott's Music Hall, 1110 F Street, at 8 P.M.
Leave Washington at 10.45 P.M.
Arrive Baltimore at 11.30 P.M. SUPPER at Carrollton Hotel.
Concert at Ford's Opera House, Baltimore, Tuesday, November 7, at 3 P.M.
Leave Baltimore, Camden Street Station, B. & O. R. R. 5.55 P.M. directly after matinee.
Arrive New York, 10.55 P.M.
PARK AVENUE HOTEL.
Wednesday, November 8, Rehearsal at Music Hall, 7th Avenue and 57th Street, at 11.30 A.M.
Concert at Music Hall at 8, P.M.
Leave New York, B. & O. R. R. Ferry foot of Liberty Street, Thursday, November 9, at 10 A.M.
Arrive Philadelphia, 12th and Market Streets, 12.33 P.M.
CONTINENTAL HOTEL.
Concert at Academy of Music at 8, P.M.
Leave Philadelphia, Friday, November 10, 12th and Market Streets, 8 30 A.M.
Arrive New York, 10.55 A.M.
PARK AVENUE HOTEL.
Public Rehearsal at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Friday, November 10, at 3 P.M.
Concert at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Saturday, November 11, at 8.15. P.M.
Leave New York, Saturday, November 11, midnight. Grand Central Depot.
Arrive Boston, Sunday, November 12, at 7 A.M. Providence Depot.
Instruments must be ready and marked to-night, (Saturday), after the Concert.

C. A. ELLIS, MANAGER.
F. R. COMEE, ASS'T MANAGER.

SATURDAY, November 4, 1893.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

THIRTEENTH SEASON, 1893-94.

HOTEL LIST.

E. Paur.

F. R. Comee.
C. M. Loeffler.

Fr. Kneisel.

T. Adamowski.
J. Adamowski.

A. Schroeder.

C. Mole.

A. Hackebarth.

L. Svecenski.
O. Roth.

E. Grunberg.
M. Zach.

W.W. Swornsbourne.
F. E. Schuchmann.

D. Kuntz.
H. Eichheim.

J. Akeroyd,
H. A. Greene.

I. Schnitzler.
P. Fiumara.

H. D. Simpson.
E. B. Marble.

E. Fiedler.
A. Moldauer.

J. Edw. Eichler.
W. Krafft.

E. Golde.
W. A. Field.

H. Schuecker.
J. Hoffmann.

F. Mahn.
H. Berger.

G. Strube.
F. E. Hahn.

G. Goldschmidt.
A. Gutter.

J. Knecht.

A. Goldstein.
S. Goldstein.

P. Metzger.
F. Muller.

A. Kolster.
M. Kluge.

E. M. Heindl.
Jul. E. Eichler.

C. Schumann.

G. Bareither.
L. Jennewein.

G. Gerhardt.
H. Hoyer.

C. Reibl.

H. J Butler.
R. Kurth.

A. Rigg.

A. Heindl.

PERSONNEL of the . . . . .
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Thirteenth Season, 1893-94.

MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR.

FIRST VIOLINS.

Kneisel, Fr., Concertmeister.

Loeffler, C. M. — Fiedler, E. — Eichheim, H. — Knecht, J.
Adamowski, T. — Moldauer, A. — Hoffmann, J. — Krafft, W.
Roth, O. — Kuntz, D. — Strube, G. — Hahn, F. E.
Schnitzler, I. — Ondricek, K. — Mahn, F.

SECOND VIOLINS.

Akeroyd, J. — Schuchman, F. E. — Kurth, R. — Eichler, Jul. E.
Fiumara, P. — Kneisel, Jos. — Zahn, F. — Eichler, J. Edw.
Swornsbourne, W. W. — Goldstein, S. — Michael, J.
Marble, E. B. — Tischer-Zeitz, H. — Berger, H.

VIOLAS.

Svecenski, L. — Rietzel, W. — Grunberg, E. — Kluge, M.
Zach, M. — Kolster, A. — Hoyer, H. — Taubert, O.
Heindl, H. — Post, L.

VIOLONCELLOS.

Schroeder, A. — Adamowski, J. — Rosé, E. — Reibl, C.
Schulz, L. — Mingels, E. F. — Loeffler, E. — Heindl, A.

BASSES.

Goldstein, A. — Bareither, G. — Jennewein, L. — Butler, H. J.
Greene, H. A. — Boernig, H. — Gerhardt, G. — Barth, C.

FLUTES.

Molé, C. — Heindl, E. M. — Fox, Paul.

OBOE.

Sautet, A. — Demuth, L.

ENGL. HORN.

Müller, F.

CLARINETS.

Goldschmidt, G. — Metzger, P.

BASS CLARINET.

Strasser, E.

BASSOONS.

Gütter, A. — Gunzel, F. H.

HORNS.

Hackebarth, A. — Hein, Fr. — Lorbeer, H. — Schumann, C.

TRUMPETS.

Müller, P. — Mann, Jos.

TROMBONES.

Hampe, C. — Abloescher, J. — Rigg, A.

HARP.

Schuecker, H.

TUBA.

Golde, E.

TYMPANI.

Ludwig, C. R.

DRUMS.

Simpson, H. D.

CYMBALS, TRIANGLE, ETC.

Field, W. A.

TAMBOUR AND CASTENETS.

Senia, T. B.

LIBRARIAN.

Sauerquell, J.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

Thirteenth Season, 1893-94. — Eighth Season in Baltimore.

FIVE CONCERTS,

FORD'S OPERA HOUSE,

TUESDAY AFTERNOONS at three o'clock, NOVEMBER 7th, DECEMBER 12th, JANUARY 9th, FEBRUARY 6th, and MARCH 27th.

SOLOISTS:

Mme. LILLIAN NORDICA,

Mr. MAX HEINRICH,

Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL,

And others to be announced.

Subscription tickets with reserved seats for the series of five concerts, $5.00 and $7.00, according to location.

The sale of subscription tickets opens at ALBERT'S TICKET OFFICE, 13 N. Charles Street, TUESDAY MORNING, OCTOBER 31st.

Programme books with descriptive notes on the works to be performed will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of subscription tickets.

C. A. ELLIS,
Manager.

CHAMBER MUSIC HALL

(57th Street and Seventh Avenue.)

SEASON 1893–94.

FIRST CONCERT

— BY —

The Kneisel Quartet

OF BOSTON.

FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin. L. SVECENSKI, Viola.

OTTO ROTH, 2nd Violin. ALVIN SCHROEDER, Violoncello.

WITH THE ASSISTANCE OF

MR. MAX ZACH.

FRIDAY EVENING, NOVEMBER 10, at 8.15.

Programme:

BEETHOVEN. QUARTET in F major, op. 59, No. 1.
Allegro.—Allegretto vivace e sempre scherzando.—
Adagio molto e mesto.—Theme Russe, (Allegro.)

HAYDN. QUARTET in G minor, op. 74, No. 3.
Allegro.—Largo assai.—Menuetto (allegretto).—
Finale. (Allegro con brio).

BRAHMS. QUINTET in F major, op. 88.
Allegro non troppo ma con brio.—
Grave ed appassionato.—Allegro.

Second Violo: Mr. ZACH.

Second Concert, Friday Evening, December 15.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

13th SEASON, 1893-94.

January Itinerary.

Leave Boston Sunday, January 7, at 7.30 P.M. Providence Depot.
Breakfast Philadelphia, Monday, January 8, at 7, A.M. Broad St. Station Penn. R. R.
Arrive Baltimore, Union Depot, Penn. R. R. at 9.45 A.M.
CARROLLTON HOTEL.
Leave Baltimore, Camden Street Station B. & O. R. R. at 6 P.M.
Arrive Washington 7.05 P.M.
Concert at Metzerott's Music Hall, 1110 F Street, at 8 P.M.
Leave Washington at 10.45 P.M.
Arrive Baltimore at 11.30 P.M. SUPPER at Carrollton Hotel.
Concert at Ford's Opera House, Baltimore, Tuesday, January 9, at 3 P.M.
Leave Baltimore, Camden Street Station, B. & O. R. R. Wednesday, January 10, at 8. 50 A.M.
Arrive Philadelphia, 12th and Market Streets, 11.31 A.M.
CONTINENTAL HOTEL.
Concert at Academy of Music at 8, P.M.
Leave Philadelphia, Thursday, January 11, 12th and Market Streets, 9.45 A.M.
Arrive New York, 12.10 P.M.
PARK AVENUE HOTEL.
Concert at Music Hall, at 8 P.M.
Public Rehearsal at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Friday, January 12, at 3 P.M.
Concert at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Saturday, January 13, at 8.15. P.M.
Leave New York, Saturday, January 13, midnight. Grand Central Depot.
Arrive Boston, Sunday, January 14, at 7 A.M. Providence Depot.
Instruments must be ready and marked to-night, (Saturday), after the Concert.

C. A. ELLIS, MANAGER.
F. R. COMEE, ASS'T MANAGER.

SATURDAY, January 6, 1894.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

13th SEASON, 1893-94.

December Itinerary.

Leave Boston Sunday, December 10, at 7.30 P.M. Providence Depot.
Breakfast Philadelphia, Monday, December 11, at 7, A.M. Broad St. Station Penn. R. R.
Arrive Baltimore, Union Depot, Penn. R. R. at 9.45 A.M.
CARROLLTON HOTEL.
Leave Baltimore, Camden Street Station B. & O. R. R. at 6 P.M.
Arrive Washington 7.05 P.M.
Concert at Metzerott's Music Hall, 1110 F Street, at 8 P.M.
Leave Washington at 10.45 P.M.
Arrive Baltimore at 11.30 P.M. SUPPER at Carrollton Hotel.
Concert at Ford's Opera House, Baltimore, Tuesday, December 12, at 3 P.M.
Leave Baltimore, Camden Street Station, B. & O. R. R. Wednesday, December 13, at 8. 50 A.M.
Arrive Philadelphia, 12th and Market Streets, 11.31 A.M.
CONTINENTAL HOTEL.
Concert at Academy of Music at 8, P.M.
Leave Philadelphia. Thursday, December 14, 12th and Market Streets, 9 45 A.M.
Arrive New York, 12.10 P.M.
PARK AVENUE HOTEL.
Concert at Music Hall, at 8 P.M.
Public Rehearsal at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Friday, December 15, at 3 P.M.
Concert at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Saturday, December 16, at 8.15. P.M.
Leave New York, Saturday, December 16, midnight. Grand Central Depot.
Arrive Boston, Sunday, December 17, at 7 A.M. Providence Depot.
Instruments must be ready and marked to-night, (Saturday), after the Concert.

C. A. ELLIS, MANAGER.
F. R. COMEE, ASS'T MANAGER.

SATURDAY, December 9, 1893.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

13th SEASON, 1893-94.

February Itinerary.

Leave Boston Sunday, February 4, 12, midnight. Providence Depot.
Arrive New York, Monday, February 5, at 7 A.M.
Leave New York, B. & O. R. R. Ferry foot of Liberty Street, 9 A.M.
Arrive Baltimore, at 2.05 P.M.
CARROLLTON HOTEL.
Leave Baltimore, Camden Street Station B. & O. R. R. at 6 P.M.
Arrive Washington 7.05 P.M.
Concert at Metzerott's Music Hall, 1110 F Street, at 8 P.M.
Leave Washington at 10.45 P.M.
Arrive Baltimore at 11.30 P.M. SUPPER at Carrollton Hotel.
Concert at Ford's Opera House, Baltimore, Tuesday, February 6, at 3 P.M.
Leave Baltimore, Camden Street Station, B. & O. R. R. Wednesday, February 7, at 8.50 A.M.
Arrive Philadelphia, 12th and Market Streets, 11.31 A.M.
CONTINENTAL HOTEL.
Concert at Academy of Music at 8, P.M.
Leave Philadelphia, Thursday, February 8, 12th and Market Streets, 9.45 A.M.
Arrive New York, 12.10 P.M.
PARK AVENUE HOTEL.
Concert at Music Hall, at 8 P.M.
Public Rehearsal at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Friday, February 9, at 3 P.M.
Concert at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Saturday, February 10, at 8.15. P.M.
Leave New York, Saturday, February 10, midnight. Grand Central Depot.
Arrive Boston, Sunday, February 11, at 7 A.M. Providence Depot.
Instruments must be ready and marked to-night, (Saturday), after the Concert.

C. A. ELLIS, MANAGER.
F. R. COMEE, ASS'T MANAGER.

SATURDAY, February 3, 1894.

CHAMBER MUSIC HALL

(57th Street and Seventh Avenue.)

SEASON 1893–94.

FIRST CONCERT

— BY —

The Kneisel Quartet

OF BOSTON.

FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin. L. SVECENSKI, Viola.

OTTO ROTH, 2nd Violin. ALVIN SCHROEDER, Violoncello.

WITH THE ASSISTANCE OF

MR. MAX ZACH.

FRIDAY EVENING, NOVEMBER 10, at 8.15.

Programme:

BEETHOVEN. QUARTET in F major, op. 59, No. 1.
Allegro.—Allegretto vivace e sempre scherzando.—Adagio molto e mesto.—Theme Russe, (Allegro.)

HAYDN. QUARTET in G minor, op. 74, No. 3.
Allegro.—Largo assai.—Menuetto (allegretto).—Finale. (Allegro con brio).

BRAHMS. QUINTET in F major, op. 88.
Allegro non troppo ma con brio.—Grave ed appassionato.—Allegro.

Second Violo: Mr. ZACH.

Second Concert, Friday Evening, December 15.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

13th SEASON, 1893-94.

December Itinerary.

Leave Boston Sunday, December 10, at 7.30 P.M. Providence Depot.
Breakfast Philadelphia, Monday, December 11, at 7, A.M. Broad St. Station Penn. R. R.
Arrive Baltimore, Union Depot, Penn. R. R. at 9.45 A.M.
CARROLLTON HOTEL.
Leave Baltimore, Camden Street Station B. & O. R. R. at 6 P.M.
Arrive Washington 7.05 P.M.
Concert at Metzerott's Music Hall, 1110 F Street, at 8 P.M.
Leave Washington at 10.45 P.M.
Arrive Baltimore at 11.30 P.M. SUPPER at Carrollton Hotel.
Concert at Ford's Opera House, Baltimore, Tuesday, December 12, at 3 P.M.
Leave Baltimore, Camden Street Station, B. & O. R. R. Wednesday, December 13, at 8. 50 A.M.
Arrive Philadelphia, 12th and Market Streets, 11.31 A.M.
CONTINENTAL HOTEL.
Concert at Academy of Music at 8, P.M.
Leave Philadelphia. Thursday, December 14, 12th and Market Streets, 9 45 A.M.
Arrive New York, 12.10 P.M.
PARK AVENUE HOTEL.
Concert at Music Hall, at 8 P.M.
Public Rehearsal at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Friday, December 15, at 3 P.M.
Concert at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Saturday, December 16, at 8.15. P.M.
Leave New York, Saturday, December 16, midnight. Grand Central Depot.
Arrive Boston, Sunday, December 17, at 7 A.M. Providence Depot.
Instruments must be ready and marked to-night, (Saturday), after the Concert.

C. A. ELLIS, MANAGER.
F. R. COMEE, ASS'T MANAGER.

SATURDAY, December 9, 1893.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

13th SEASON, 1893-94.

January Itinerary.

Leave Boston Sunday, January 7, at 7.30 P.M. Providence Depot.
Breakfast Philadelphia, Monday, January 8, at 7, A.M. Broad St. Station Penn. R. R.
Arrive Baltimore, Union Depot, Penn. R. R. at 9.45 A.M.
CARROLLTON HOTEL.
Leave Baltimore, Camden Street Station B. & O. R. R. at 6 P.M.
Arrive Washington 7.05 P.M.
Concert at Metzerott's Music Hall, 1110 F Street, at 8 P.M.
Leave Washington at 10.45 P.M.
Arrive Baltimore at 11.30 P.M. SUPPER at Carrollton Hotel.
Concert at Ford's Opera House, Baltimore, Tuesday, January 9, at 3 P.M.
Leave Baltimore, Camden Street Station, B. & O. R. R. Wednesday, January 10, at 8. 50 A.M.
Arrive Philadelphia, 12th and Market Streets, 11.31 A.M.
CONTINENTAL HOTEL.
Concert at Academy of Music at 8, P.M.
Leave Philadelphia. Thursday, January 11, 12th and Market Streets, 9.45 A.M.
Arrive New York, 12.10 P.M.
PARK AVENUE HOTEL.
Concert at Music Hall, at 8 P.M.
Public Rehearsal at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Friday, January 12, at 3 P.M.
Concert at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Saturday, January 13, at 8.15. P.M.
Leave New York, Saturday, January 13, midnight. Grand Central Depot.
Arrive Boston, Sunday, January 14, at 7 A.M. Providence Depot.
Instruments must be ready and marked to-night, (Saturday), after the Concert.

C. A. ELLIS, MANAGER.
F. R. COMEE, ASS'T MANAGER.

SATURDAY, January 6, 1894.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

13th SEASON, 1893-94.

February Itinerary.

Leave Boston Sunday, February 4, 12, midnight. Providence Depot.
Arrive New York, Monday, February 5, at 7 A.M.
Leave New York, B. & O. R. R. Ferry foot of Liberty Street, 9 A.M.
Arrive Baltimore, at 2.05 P.M.
CARROLLTON HOTEL.
Leave Baltimore, Camden Street Station B. & O. R. R. at 6 P.M.
Arrive Washington 7.05 P.M
Concert at Metzerott's Music Hall, 1110 F Street, at 8 P.M.
Leave Washington at 10.45 P.M.
Arrive Baltimore at 11.30 P.M. SUPPER at Carrollton Hotel.
Concert at Ford's Opera House, Baltimore, Tuesday, February 6, at 3 P.M.
Leave Baltimore, Camden Street Station, B. & O. R. R. Wednesday, February 7, at 8.50 A.M.
Arrive Philadelphia, 12th and Market Streets, 11.31 A.M.
CONTINENTAL HOTEL.
Concert at Academy of Music at 8, P.M.
Leave Philadelphia. Thursday, February 8, 12th and Market Streets, 9.45 A.M.
Arrive New York, 12.10 P.M.
PARK AVENUE HOTEL.
Concert at Music Hall, at 8 P.M.
Public Rehearsal at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Friday, February 9, at 3 P.M.
Concert at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Saturday, February 10, at 8.15. P.M.
Leave New York, Saturday, February 10, midnight. Grand Central Depot.
Arrive Boston, Sunday, February 11, at 7 A.M. Providence Depot.
Instruments must be ready and marked to-night, (Saturday), after the Concert.

C. A. ELLIS, MANAGER.
F. R. COMEE, ASS'T MANAGER.

SATURDAY, February 3, 1894.

BRATTLE HALL . . . CAMBRIDGE

Three Concerts by the . . .

Kneisel Quartet

FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin.
OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin.
L. SVECENSKI, Viola.
ALWIN SCHROEDER, Violoncello.

Wednesday Evening, March 21

Tuesday Evening, April 3 . . . . At . . 8 o'clock

Tuesday Evening, April 24 . .

ASSISTING ARTISTS:

Mrs. EMIL PAUR,

Miss MARIE GESELSCHAP,

and

MLLE. ANTOINETTE TREBELLI.

WEDNESDAY EVENING, MARCH 21

PROGRAMME

HAYDN, ... Quartet in G minor

BRAHMS, . . . Trio for Pianoforte, Violin, and Violoncello
Mrs. PAUR, Mr. KNEISEL, and Mr. SCHROEDER.

DVORAK, ... Quartet in F major

Season Tickets, with reserved seats, for the series of three Concerts, $3.00. Subscription list now open at the University Bookstore, Cambridge. Tickets will be delivered to subscribers only on Saturday, March 17. Public sale opens Monday, March 19.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

13th SEASON, 1893-94.

March Itinerary.

Leave Boston Sunday, March 25, 12, midnight. Providence Depot.
Arrive New York, Monday, March 26, at 7 A.M.
Leave New York, B. & O. R. R. Ferry foot of Liberty Street, 9 A.M.
Arrive Baltimore, at 2.05 P.M.
CARROLLTON HOTEL.
Leave Baltimore, Camden Street Station B. & O. R. R. at 6 P.M.
Arrive Washington 7.05 P.M.
Concert at Metzerott's Music Hall, 1110 F Street, at 8 P.M.
Leave Washington at 10.30 P.M.
Arrive Baltimore at 11.30 P.M. SUPPER at Carrollton Hotel.
Concert at Ford's Opera House, Baltimore, Tuesday, March 27, at 3 P.M.
Leave Baltimore, Camden Street Station, B. & O. R. R. Wednesday, March 28, at 8.50 A.M.
Arrive Philadelphia, 12th and Market Streets, 11.31 A.M.
CONTINENTAL HOTEL.
Concert at Academy of Music at 8, P.M.
Leave Philadelphia, Thursday, March 29, 12th and Market Streets, 9.45 A.M.
Arrive New York, 12.10 P.M.
PARK AVENUE HOTEL.
Concert at Music Hall, at 8 P.M.
Public Rehearsal at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Friday, March 30, at 3 P.M.
Concert at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Saturday, March 31, at 8.15. P.M.
Leave New York, Saturday, March 31, midnight. Grand Central Depot.
Arrive Boston, Sunday, April 1, at 7 A.M. Providence Depot.
Instruments must be ready and marked to-night, (Saturday), after the Concert.

C. A. ELLIS, MANAGER.
F. R. COMEE, ASS'T MANAGER.

SATURDAY, March 24, 1894.

BOSTON, MASS.,

April 9, 1894.

To the Ladies of the Cecilia:

Mr. Lang desires to be blamed for this late request for your kind services in singing the two choruses for female voices in the performances of Mendelssohn's music to the "Midsummer-Night's Dream," at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of this week, under the conductorship of Mr. Paur. The invitation is most earnestly extended by Mr. Paur, and warmly seconded by the President and by the conductor of the Cecilia.

If you are willing to sing this delightful music, will you be in your seats at seven o'clock promptly, on Thursday evening, and rehearse it during the half-hour preceding the usual rehearsal? It will be understood that those who are present at seven are willing to sing. With the hope for a favorable response from all, this invitation is sent you from Mr. Thorndike, Mr. Paur, and Mr. Lang.

BOSTON MUSIC HALL

THIRTEENTH SEASON, 1893-94

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

TWENTY-FOUR CONCERTS

ON CONSECUTIVE SATURDAY EVENINGS, FROM OCTOBER 14, 1893, TO APRIL 28, 1894, OMITTING NOV. 11, DEC. 16, 1893, JAN. 13, FEB. 10, AND MARCH 31, 1894, AND

TWENTY-FOUR PUBLIC REHEARSALS

ON CONSECUTIVE FRIDAY AFTERNOONS, FROM OCTOBER 13, 1893, TO APRIL 27, 1894, OMITTING NOV. 10, DEC. 15, 1893, JAN. 12, FEB. 9, AND MARCH 30, 1894.

TICKETS for the series of Concerts and for the series of Rehearsals, $12.00 and $7.50, according to location.

The $12 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, MONDAY, September 25th, at 10 A.M.

The $7.50 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, TUESDAY, September 26th, at 10 A.M.

The $12 Seats for the Concerts will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, on THURSDAY, September 28th, at 10 A.M.

The $7.50 Seats for the Concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place, on FRIDAY, September 29th, at 10 A.M.

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

Tickets will be delivered in the Hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be immediately resold.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

1893-94.

NOTICE TO SUBSCRIBERS.

Subscribers of last year may secure seats for the coming season in advance of the public sale by applying at Schuberth's, 23 Union Square, before Wednesday evening, October 11.

C. A. ELLIS,

Manager.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

BOSTON, September 25th, 1893.

AUCTION SALE of $12 Season Tickets for the Friday Afternoon PUBLIC REHEARSALS at Music Hall this (Monday) morning, beginning at ten o'clock.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.
SEASON 1893-94. 132
REHEARSALS.
No.
Premium.
Name.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.
SEASON 1893-94. 239
REHEARSALS.
No.
Premium.
Name.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.
SEASON 1893-94. 536
CONCERTS.
No.
Premium.
Name.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.
SEASON 1893-94. 553
CONCERTS.
No.
Premium.
Name.

COLORED PAPER

[8]

BOSTON MUSIC HALL

THIRTEENTH SEASON, 1893-94

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

TWENTY-FOUR CONCERTS

ON CONSECUTIVE SATURDAY EVENINGS, FROM OCTOBER 14, 1893, TO APRIL 28, 1894, OMITTING NOV. 11, DEC. 16, 1893, JAN. 13, FEB. 10, AND MARCH 31, 1894, AND

TWENTY-FOUR PUBLIC REHEARSALS

ON CONSECUTIVE FRIDAY AFTERNOONS, FROM OCTOBER 13, 1893, TO APRIL 27, 1894, OMITTING NOV. 10, DEC. 15, 1893, JAN. 12, FEB. 9, AND MARCH 30, 1894.

TICKETS for the series of Concerts and for the series of Rehearsals, $12.00 and $7.50, according to location.

The $12 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, MONDAY, September 25th, at 10 A.M.

The $7.50 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, TUESDAY, September 26th, at 10 A.M.

The $12 Seats for the Concerts will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, on THURSDAY, September 28th, at 10 A.M.

The $7.50 Seats for the Concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place, on FRIDAY, September 29th, at 10 A.M.

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

Tickets will be delivered in the Hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be immediately resold.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

1893-94.

NOTICE TO SUBSCRIBERS.

Subscribers of last year may secure seats for the coming season in advance of the public sale by applying at Schuberth's, 23 Union Square, before Wednesday evening, October 11.

C. A. ELLIS,

Manager.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

BOSTON, September 25th, 1893.

AUCTION SALE of $12 Season Tickets for the Friday Afternoon PUBLIC REHEARSALS at Music Hall this (Monday) morning, beginning at ten o'clock.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.
SEASON 1893-94. 432
REHEARSALS.

No. .....
Premium, ...
Name, ...

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.
SEASON 1893-94. 239
REHEARSALS.

No. .....
Premium, ...
Name, ...

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.
SEASON 1893-94.
CONCERTS.

No.
Premium.
Name,

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.
SEASON 1893-94. 383
CONCERTS.

No. .....
Premium, ...
Name, ...

COLORED PAPER

[8]

Boston Transcript

SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 9, 1893.

The thirteenth season of concerts in the Music Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin on Oct. 1 with the customary public rehearsal on the afternoon before. As usual there will be twenty-four concerts and as many public rehearsals, at weekly intervals, with some lapses to be hereafter announced. The engagements of solo artists include several who have not before been heard here. Some particulars of the purposes of the new conductor in the matter of programmes will be made known soon after the arrival here of Mr. Paur. The sales by auction of the season tickets are thus appointed: Monday, Sept. 25, higher priced seats for the public rehearsals; Sept. 26, lower priced rehearsal seats; Sept. 28, higher priced concert seats; Sept. 29, lower priced concert seats. The prices will be $12 and $7.50, and the bids will be for premiums. As formerly not more than four consecutive seats will be sold to a single bidder, and payment for the tickets must immediately follow the sale. The sales will be held in the Music

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, SEPT. 10, 1893.

Symphony Orchestra Season.

The Boston Symphony orchestra will enter upon its 13th season under conditions which promise to make it exceedingly interesting. The change in conductor is already known to all who follow current musical events, and the appearance of Mr Emil Paur at the head of the orchestra will be awaited with the liveliest interest.

All accounts agree that he is the possessor of great qualities as a conductor. His undoubted ability and his achievements in the positions which he has held abroad give assurance of satisfactory results when he shall have assumed the duties of his high position. The orchestra long ago assumed the leading place among musical organizations of the country, and the management will leave nothing undone to maintain its position and to make the concerts of the coming season artistically the equal of any in the world.

The magnificent body of instrumentalists, so carefully selected during the last 12 years, will remain practically unchanged. A notable addition to the ranks of the first violins is Mr Oudricek, formerly concertmeister of the Prague orchestra. Mr Kneisel will again lead the violins, supported by Mr Loeffler, Mr Adamowski and other able violinists.

Messrs Svecenski, Schroder, Goldstein, Mole, Sautet, Goldschmidt, Gutter, Hackebarth, Ablocscher, Golde and Ludwig will as before head their respective departments. Mr Schnecker has been reengaged as harpist.

The season will consist as usual of 24 public rehearsals on Friday afternoons, and 24 concerts on Saturday evenings. The dates of the first performances will be Oct 13 and 14.

The soloists already engaged include several artists of great reputation who have never been heard here. The list is said to be the strongest ever presented in these concerts, and will add greatly to the attractions of the season.

The season tickets will be sold at auction at Music hall, Sept 25, 26, 28 and 29. The rehearsal seats will be sold on Monday and Tuesday, Sept 25 and 26, and the concert tickets on Thursday and Friday, Sept 28 and 29.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, SEPT. 10.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

Will begin its thirteenth season at Music Hall, on October 14. Both in an artistic sense and considered as a popular attraction, this organization has long held first place among the musical enterprises of this country. Its coming series of performances will excite more than usual interest for many reasons. They will introduce a new conductor, who has won high honors in more than one important position in Europe, and who will infuse new blood into the undertaking. The selection of Mr. Emil Paur was made after a careful consideration of the merits of nearly a score of eminent conductors who were available for the place. The position he is to assume is a most difficult one; but Mr. Paur is said to possess abilities which especially qualify him for its duties. He will find at his command an orchestra second to none in the world, and every incentive for the best work of his life. The members of the orchestra, with very few exceptions, will be the same as last year. A notable addition to the first violins will be Mr. Oudricek, formerly concert meister at Prague. Mr. Kneisel will again lead the violins, and will be ably supported by Mr. Loeffler, Mr. Adamowski and the unrivalled section of violinists. Messrs. Svecenski, Schroeder, Goldstein, Molé, Sautet, Goldschmidt, Gutter, Hackebarth, Ablocscher, Golde and Ludwig will, as before, head their respective departments of the orchestra, and Mr. Schuecker has been re-engaged as harpist. Little can be said about the programmes, pending the arrival of Mr. Paur. Negotiations are in progress with many soloists of distinction, and a partial list will be announced later. The sales of season tickets will take place at Music Hall on September 25, 26, 28 and 29, and will be by auction, as usual. The Rehearsal tickets will be sold on Monday and Tuesday, Sept. 25 and 26. The Concert tickets on Thursday and Friday, Sept. 28 and 29.

— Herr Emil Pauer, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Concerts, will sail from Europe for this country on the 19th inst.

GENERAL HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCIV. NO. 66.

SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 10, 1893.

The Symphony Concerts. Comic Opera Productions.

It is doubtful if any one topic is now more generally discussed by returning patrons of musical entertainments than the concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and every detail of the season's arrangements as it becomes known is a new theme of general public interest.

An hour at the Music Hall during the last week would convince the most sceptical of the widespread interest in this important branch of the season's attractions. For every few minutes a new applicant for information regarding some feature of the season's scheme has presented herself or himself, and the same answers have been given with the courtesy possible only by men who have sold the tickets to these concerts for years.

The coming of the new conductor, Herr Emil Paur, has opened up a new field of inquiry this season, and the chief events of his career, his age, the probabilities as to his programmes and the hundred and one possibilities of his advent have been stated with unfailing patience to all inquiring minds.

In some ways, of course, the new conductor is an unknown quantity, but the time since his contract was signed has been well improved by those familiar with his record during his musical career, and among the many contributions to this stock of information the following, by an eminent writer upon musical matters in Leipsic, will be read with general interest.

Conductor Emil Paur.

Some weeks ago the report was spread in a local paper that Mr. Paur, the conductor of our theatre orchestra, had been offered an excellent engagement in Boston as conductor of the famous Symphony orchestra there, and had already accepted it. The hope that this report would be contradicted was not fulfilled, for full confirmation of it soon followed. Why should Mr. Paur refuse so favorable an offer? Such a splendid position as leader of the best and most celebrated symphony orchestra in America was for him equal to winning the great prize in the lottery, while the leadership of the theatre orchestra here—a not well-salaried and very troublesome post—promised nothing higher. So he exchanged tinsel for gold.

As he is in the prime of life, and as full confidence can be placed in his well known great capacity for work and genial talent, in the new home his efforts and abilities will no doubt have full play and be crowned with success. For the second time Emil Paur has been chosen successor of Arthur Nikisch, first here in Leipsic at the theatre, now in Boston. Four years ago he began as leader of the orchestra in a performance of "Tannhauser" with triumphant success. No puffing, no blowing of trumpets preceded him, only a short notice of his activity in Mannheim. His predecessor, Nikisch, had not only been enthusiastically, almost idolatrously, receive at the farewell evening in the theatre, but also at farewell festivities in private circles.

The partisans of Nikisch coldly declared such a conductor could never be replaced. What a surprise was the first appearance of Mr. Paur! Unexampled applause, loud recalls, glowing enthusiasm! The musicians in the orchestra declared never to have felt so animated, overpowered and carried away as then. It was a perfect victory. It was very interesting to observe how the new conductor differed in externals from his predecessor. If Nikisch impressed by his solemn manner, quiet and almost stiff demeanor, one might almost say, his stony calmness, Paur led with youthful fire and glowing inspiration. The former held his head, framed in black, with immovable pale face, always high, but the latter moved in a lively way, his fair curly hair strayed about, and every movement betrayed his south German temperament. One would see he was quite taken up by his artistic office, that he wished every tone to be given with full effect, and that with his whole soul he seemed to play himself alone on every instrument.

With the sparkling look of his eyes he inspired the performers in the orchestra, and forced them to the highest exercise of their powers. The greatest energy was produced by peculiar movements of the arm in crescendi and forte passages, while by picturesque gestures he plainly showed piano passages, especially a sudden change to piano. No wonder if all shades were successful when by the contrasts in the music light and shadow were thrown out in the best way. So at the very outset the conductor's eminent talent for leading made a good impression, which nothing since has dimmed. It remains bright and clear in our memory.

We have numbered in the last decades many very talented artists among the conductors of our opera, of whom we will only name Seid, Sneker, and Nickish. None of these certainly famous conductors equalled our Emil Paur in musical variety and conscientiousness, as well as in ideality of conception and in heroic endurance. He bestowed the same care on the works of the great masters of the past as on the modern ones. Beethoven's "Fidelia," Mozart's "Don Juan," and "Zauberflote," Cherubini's "Wasserträger," Weber's "Freischutz," and "Euryanthe," he treated as lovingly as Richard Wagner's "Ring der Nibelungen," "Meistersinger," "Tristam and Isolde," "Tannhauser," and "Lohengrin."

Whatever is beautiful and sublime, full of majesty and genius, filled his artistic heart with delight and joy, fired and inspired him. He was free from all national prejudice. He conducted the operas of the old and new French and Italian composers just as carefully, spiritedly and ingeniously as the German ones. The mutilation of masterpieces, as is unfortunately the custom, through unscrupulous leaders and careless singers, he thoroughly condemned. He reproduced them, as in the original, however much it annoyed the indolent singers and members of the orchestra. So we have to thank the meritorious conductor for many beautiful parts in operas which were formerly left out.

The Ticke Sales.

The plans for the sales of seats for the rehearsals and concerts of the season have been completed upon substantially the lines which have proved so generally satisfactory for many years.

The $12 seats for the 24 public rehearsals, beginning Oct. 14, will be offered at auction on Monday, Sept. 25, no more than four seats being sold to one bidder. The $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold on Tuesday, Sept. 26, with the same limitation.

The $12 seats for the 24 Saturday evening concerts, beginning Oct. 15, will be sold at auction on Thursday, Sept. 28, with the same limitation as to numbers, and the $7.50 seats for the concerts will be sold on Friday, Sept. 29. The seats will, as usual, be sold in the regular order, beginning with the front row. No bid of less than 25 cents will be taken, and the division lines regulating the prices will be the same as in former years.

The general testimony of those who have to do with the selling of these seats is that the interest in the concerts shows no abatement, orders having been received in many instances immediately after the close of last season's concerts, while the question of Mr. Nikisch's successor was yet involved in mystery, all showing that the concerts have become a fixed institution with a numerous portion of the Boston public.

One statement has to be made annually. Ladies can not attend the sale of seats in person, but all letters, always with [illegible]

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, SEPT. 10, 1893

The Boston Symphony Orchestra enters upon its thirteenth season at Music Hall, Oct. 13 and 14, the first public rehearsal being on Friday, the 13th, and the Saturday evening concert on the 14th. The change in conductors has already been announced and the appearance of Mr. Emil Paur at the head of the orchestra will be awaited with much interest. From all accounts at hand he is the possessor of great qualities as a conductor. There will be few changes in the makeup of the orchestra.

Mr. Kneisel will again be concertmeister and will be ably supported by Mr. Loeffler, Mr. Adamowski and the unrivalled section of violinists. Able soloists have already been engaged, who have never been heard here. Season tickets will be sold as usual at auction commencing on Sept. 25 and continuing on the 26th, 28th and 29th. The rehearsal seats will be sold on Monday and Tuesday, Sept. 25-26, and the concert tickets on Thursday and Friday, Sept. 28-29.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, SEPT. 10, 1893.

The thirteenth season of concerts in Music hall by the Boston Symphony orchestra will begin on Oct. 1 with the customary public rehearsal on the afternoon before. As usual there will be twenty-four concerts and as many public rehearsals, at weekly intervals, with some lapses to be hereafter announced. The engagements of solo artists include several who have not before been heard here. Some particulars of the purposes of the new conductor in the matter of programmes will be made known soon after the arrival here of Mr. Paur The sales by auction of the season tickets are thus appointed: Monday, Sept. 25, higher priced seats for the public rehearsals; Sept. 26, lower priced rehearsal seats; Sept. 28, higher priced concert seats; Sept. 29, lower priced concert seats. The prices will be $12 and $7.50, and the bids will be for premiums. As formerly not more than four consecutive seats will be sold to a single bidder, and payments for the tickets must immediately follow the sale. The sales will be held in Music hall.

Boston Transcript

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 16, 1893.

The thirteenth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Music Hall will begin on Oct. 13, Friday afternoon, public rehearsal, and Oct. 14, Saturday night. It will, as usual, include twenty-four concerts and as many public rehearsals, at weekly intervals, with some lapses to be hereafter announced. The sales by auction of the season tickets are thus appointed: Monday, Sept. 25, twelve-dollar seats for the public rehearsals; Sept. 26, seven dollar and a half rehearsal seats; Sept. 28, twelve-dollar concert seats; Sept. 29, seven dollar and a half concert seats. The bids will be for premiums, not more than four consecutive seats will be sold to a single bidder, and payment for the tickets must immediately follow the sale. The sales will be held in the Music Hall.

MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

Thirteenth Season. 1893-94.

TWENTY-FOUR CONCERTS

On consecutive Saturday Evenings, from Oct. 14, 1893, to April 28, 1894, omitting Nov. 11, Dec. 16, 1893, Jan. 13, Feb. 10, and March 31, 1894, and

TWENTY-FOUR PUBLIC REHEARSALS

On consecutive Friday Afternoons, from Oct. 13, 1893, to April 27, 1894, omitting Nov. 10, Dec. 15, 1893, Jan. 12, Feb. 9 and March 30, 1894.

Tickets for the series of Concerts and for the series of Rehearsals $12 and $7.50 according to location.

The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, MONDAY, Sept. 25, at 10 A. M.
The $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, TUESDAY, Sept. 26, at 10 A. M.
The $12 seats for the concerts will be sold at auction at Music Hall, on THURSDAY, Sept. 28, at 10 A. M.
The $7.50 seats for the concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place on FRIDAY, Sept. 29, at 10 A. M.

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

Tickets will be delivered in the Hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be resold. 7t(A) s 16

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, SEPT. 16, 1893.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Thirteenth Season beginning Oct. 14

Auction Sales of Season Tickets at Music Hall Sept. 25, 26, 28 and 29.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, SEPT. 17, 1893.

MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

Thirteenth Season. 1893-4.

TWENTY-FOUR CONCERTS

On consecutive Saturday Evenings, from Oct. 14, 1893, to April 28, 1894, omitting Nov. 11, Dec. 16, 1893, Jan. 13, Feb. 10, and March 31, 1894, and

TWENTY-FOUR PUBLIC REHEARSALS

On consecutive Friday Afternoons, from Oct. 13, 1893, to April 27, 1894, omitting Nov. 10, Dec. 15, 1893, Jan. 12, Feb. 9 and March 30, 1894.

Tickets for the series of Concerts and for the series of Rehearsals $12 and $7 50 according to location.

The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, MONDAY, Sept. 25, at 10 A. M.
The $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, TUESDAY, Sept. 26, at 10 A. M.
The $12 seats for the concerts will be sold at auction at Music Hall, on THURSDAY, Sept. 28, at 10 A. M.
The $7.50 seats for the concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place on FRIDAY, Sept. 29, at 10 A. M.
Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

Tickets will be delivered in the Hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought or they will be resold.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The thirteenth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts will comprise twenty-four performances, given on consecutive Saturday evenings from Oct. 14, 1893, to April 28, 1894, omitting Nov. 11, Dec. 16, Jan. 13, Feb. 10 and March 31; and twenty-four public rehearsals on consecutive Friday afternoons, from Oct. 13, 1893, to April 27, 1894, omitting Nov. 10, Dec. 15, Jan. 12, Feb. 9 and March 30. Tickets for the series of concerts and for the series of rehearsals will be sold for $12 and $7.70 according to location. The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, Monday, Sept. 25, at 10 A. M. The $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction at the same place Tuesday, Sept. 26, at 10 A. M. The $12 seats for the concerts will be sold at auction on Thursday, Sept. 28, at 10 A. M. The $7.50 seats for the concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place on Friday, Sept. 29, at 10 A. M. Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered in the hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be resold.

Herr Emil Paur writes: "I am anticipating with much satisfaction my coming to Boston to take the direction of the Symphony orchestra. It is pleasant for me to learn that American people have a taste for all that is best in music, and show judicious criticism in separating real art from dilettanteism." Herr Paur will sail from Bremen on the steamship Aller, Sept. 19, for New York.

Manager Schoefiel is expected home from Chicago on Monday. He writes that the enormous success of "[illegible]

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, SEPT. 17.

Symphony Auction Sales.

The annual auction sale of season tickets for the twenty-four public Rehearsals, and twenty-four Saturday evening Concerts, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Emil Paur, conductor, will take place at Music Hall on September 25, 26, 28 and 29, beginning at 10 o'clock each morning. The $12.00 seats for the Rehearsals will be sold on Monday, Sept. 25; the $7.50 seats for the Rehearsals on Tuesday, Sept. 26. On Thursday, Sept. 28, the $12.00 seats for the Concerts will be sold, and on Friday, Sept. 29, the $7.50 seats. As in past years, bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats to be sold will be shown on a diagram and marked off, as sold.

[9]

Boston Transcript

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 9, 1893.

The thirteenth season of concerts in the Music Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin on Oct. 1 with the customary public rehearsal on the afternoon before. As usual there will be twenty-four concerts and as many public rehearsals, at weekly intervals, with some lapses to be hereafter announced. The engagements of solo artists include several who have not before been heard here. Some particulars of the purposes of the new conductor in the matter of programmes will be made known soon after the arrival here of Mr. Paur. The sales by auction of the season tickets are thus appointed: Monday, Sept 25, higher priced seats for the public rehearsals; Sept. 26, lower priced rehearsal seats; Sept. 28, higher priced concert seats; Sept. 29, lower priced concert seats. The prices will be $12 and $7.50, and the bids will be for premiums. As formerly not more than four consecutive seats will be sold to a single bidder, and payment for the tickets must immediately follow the sale. The sales will be held in the Music Hall.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, SEPT. 10, 1893.

Symphony Orchestra Season.

The Boston Symphony orchestra will enter upon its 13th season under conditions which promise to make it exceedingly interesting. The change in conductor is already known to all who follow current musical events, and the appearance of Mr Emil Paur at the head of the orchestra will be awaited with the liveliest interest.

All accounts agree that he is the possessor of great qualities as a conductor. His undoubted ability and his achievements in the positions which he has held abroad give assurance of satisfactory results when he shall have assumed the duties of his high position. The orchestra long ago assumed the leading place among musical organizations of the country, and the management will leave nothing undone to maintain its position and to make the concerts of the coming season artistically the equal of any in the world.

The magnificent body of instrumentalists, so carefully selected during the last 12 years, will remain practically unchanged. A notable addition to the ranks of the first violins is Mr Oudricek, formerly concertmeister of the Prague orchestra. Mr Kneisel will again lead the violins, supported by Mr Loeffler, Mr Adamowski and other able violinists.

Messrs Svecenski, Schroder, Goldstein, Mole, Sautet, Goldschmidt, Gutter, Hackebarth, Abloescher, Golde and Ludwig will as before head their respective departments. Mr Schnecker has been reengaged as harpist.

The season will consist as usual of 24 public rehearsals on Friday afternoons, and 24 concerts on Saturday evenings. The dates of the first performances will be Oct 13 and 14.

The soloists already engaged include several artists of great reputation who have never been heard here. The list is said to be the strongest ever presented in these concerts, and will add greatly to the attractions of the season.

The season tickets will be sold at auction at Music hall, Sept 25, 26, 28 and 29. The rehearsal seats will be sold on Monday and Tuesday, Sept 25 and 26, and the concert tickets on Thursday and Friday, Sept 28 and 29.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, SEPT. 10.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

Will begin its thirteenth season at Music Hall, on October 14. Both in an artistic sense and considered as a popular attraction, this organization has long held first place among the musical enterprises of this country. Its coming series of performances will excite more than usual interest for many reasons. They will introduce a new conductor, who has won high honors in more than one important position in Europe, and who will infuse new blood into the undertaking. The selection of Mr. Emil Paur was made after a careful consideration of the merits of nearly a score of eminent conductors who were available for the place. The position he is to assume is a most difficult one; but Mr. Paur is said to possess abilities which especially qualify him for its duties. He will find at his command an orchestra second to none in the world, and every incentive for the best work of his life. The membere of the orchestra, with very few exceptions, will be the same as last year. A notable addition to the first violins will be Mr. Oudricek, formerly concert meister at Prague. Mr. Kneisel will again lead the violins, and will be ably supported by Mr. Loeffler, Mr. Adamowski and the unrivalled section of violinists. Messrs. Svecenski, Schroeder, Goldstein, Molé, Sautet, Goldschmidt, Gutter, Hackebarth, Ablocscher, Goldo and Ludwig will, as before, head their respective departments of the orchestra, and Mr. Schuecker has been re-engaged as harpist. Little can be said about the programmes, pending the arrival of Mr. Paur. Negotiations are in progress with many soloists of distinction, and a partial list will be announced later. The sales of season tickets will take place at Music Hall on September 25, 26, 28 and 29, and will be by auction, as usual. The Rehearsal tickets will be sold on Monday and Tuesday, Sept. 25 and 26. The Concert tickets on Thursday and Friday, Sept. 28 and 29.

—— Herr Emil Pauer, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Concerts, will sail from Europe for this country on the 19th inst.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCIV, NO. 66.

SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 10, 1893.

The Symphony Concerts. Comic Opera Productions.

It is doubtful if any one topic is now more generally discussed by returning patrons of musical entertainments than the concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and every detail of the season's arrangements as it becomes known is a new theme of general public interest.

An hour at the Music Hall during the last week would convince the most sceptical of the widespread interest in this important branch of the season's attr. ctions. For every few minutes a new applicant for information regarding some feature of t e season's scheme has presented herself or himself, and the s me answers have been give with the courtesy possible only by men who have sold the tickets to these concerts for years.

The coming of the new conductor, Herr Emil Paur, has opened up a new field of inquiry this seaso , and the chief events of his career, his age, the probabilities as to his programmes and the hundred and one possibilities of his advent have been s ated with unfailing patience to all inquiring minds.

In some ways, of course, the new conductor is an unknown quantity, but the time since his contract was igned has been well improved by those familiar with his record during his musical career, and among the many contributions to this stock of information the following, by an eminent writer upon musical matters in Leipsic, will be read with general interest:

Conductor Emil Paur.

Some weeks ago the report was spread in a local paper that Mr. Paur, the conductor of our theatre or hestra, had been offered an excellent engagement in Boston as conductor of the famous Symphony orchestra there, and had already accepted it. The hope t at this report would be contradicted was not fulfilled, for full confirmation of it soon followed. Why should Mr. Paur refuse so favorable an offer? Such a splendid position as leader of the best and most celebrated symphony orchestra in America was for him equal to wi ning the great prize in the lo tery, while the leadership of the theatre orchestra here—a not well-salaried and very trou lesome post—promised nothing higher. So he exchanged tinsel for gold.

As he is in the prime of life, and as full confidence can be placed in his well known great capacity for work and ge ial talent, in the new home his efforts and abilities wi l no doubt have full play and be crowned with success. For the second time Emil Paur has been chosen successor of Arthur Nikisch, first here in Leipsic at the theatre, now in Boston. Four years ago he began as leader of the orc estra in a performance of "Tannhauser" with triumphant success. No puffing, no blowing of trumpets preceded him, only a short notice of his activity in Mannheim. His predecessor, Nikisch, had not only been enthusiastically, almost idolatreusly, receive at the farewell evening in the theatre, but also at farewell festivities in private circles.

The partisans of Nikisch coldly declared such a conductor could never be replaced. What a surpr se was the first appearan e of Mr. Paur! Unexampled applause, loud recalls, glowing enthusiasm! The musicians in the orchestra dec ared never to have felt so animated, overpowered and carried away as then. It was a perfect victory. It was very interesting to observe how the new conductor differed in externals from his predecessor. If Nikisch impressed by his solemn manner, quiet and almost stiff demeanor, one might almost say, his stony calmness, Paur led with youthful fire and glowing inspiration. The former held his ead, framed in black, with immovable pale face, always high, but the latter moved in a lively way, his fair curly hair strayed about, and every movement betrayed his south German temperament. One would see he was quite taken up by his artistic office, that he wished every tone to be given with full effect, and that with his w ole soul he seemed to play himself alone on every instrument.

With the sparkling look of his eyes he inspired the performers in the orchestra, and forced them to the highest exercise of their powers. The greatest energy was produced by peculiar movements of the arm in crescendi and forte passages, while by picturesque gestures he, plainly showe piano passages, especially a sudden cha ge to piano. No won er if all shades were successful when by the contras s in the music light and shadow were thrown out in the best way. So at the very outset the conductor's eminent talent for leading ma le a good impression, which nothi g since ha dimmed. It remains bright and clear in our memory.

We have numbered in the last decades many very ta ented artists amo g the conductors of our opera, o whom we will only name Seid , Sneker, and Nickish. None of these certai ly famous conductors equalled our Emil Paur in musical var ety and conscientiousness, as well as in idealty of conception and in heroic endurance. He bestowed the same care on the works of the great masters of the past as on the mo ern ones. Beethoven's "Fidelia," Mozart's "Don Juan," an l "Zaub rflote," Cherubini's "Was ertrager," Weber's "Freischutz," and "Eu yanthe," he reated as lovingly as Richard Wagner's "Ring der Nibelungen," "Meistersinger," "Tristam a d Isolde," "Tan hauser," and "Lohengrin."

Whatever is beautiful and sublime, full of majesty and genius, filled his artistic heart with delight and joy, fired and inspired him. He was free from all national prejudice. He con ducted the operas of the old and new Fre ch and Italian composers just as carefully, spiritedly and ingeniously as the German ones. The mutilation of masterpieces, as is unfortunately the custom, through unscrupulous leaders and careless singers, he thoroughly condemned. He reproduced them, as in the original, however much it annoyed the indolent singers and members of the orchestra. So we have to t ank the meritorious conductor for many beautiful parts in operas which were formerly left out.

The T cke Sales.

The plans for the sales of seats for the rehearsals and concerts of the se son have been completed upon substantially the lines which hav proved so generally satisfactory for many years.

The $12 seats for the 24 public rehearsals, beginning Oct. 14, will be offered at auction on Monday, Sept. 25, no more than four seats b ing sold to one bidder. The $7.50 seats for the rehears als will be sold on Tuesday, Sept. 26, with the same limitation.

The $12 seats for the 24 Saturday evening concerts, beginning Oct. 15, will be sold at auction on Thursday, Sept. 28, with the same limitation as to numbers, and the $7.50 seats for the concerts will be sold on Fri ay, Sept. 29. The seats will, as usual, be sold in the regular order, beginning with the front row. No bid of less than 25 cents will be taken, and the division lines regulating the prices will be the same as in former years.

The general testimony of those who have to do with t e selling of these seats is that the interest in the concerts shows no diminution, orders having been received in many instanc s immedi tely after the close of last season's concerts, while the question of Mr. Nikisch's successor was yet involved in mystery, all showing that the concerts have become a fixed institution with an immense portion of the Boston public.

One statement has to be made annually, ladies can and do attend the sales of seats in large numbers, and their bids are always watched for by Auctioneer Jackson.

BOSTON POST.

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, SEPT. 10, 1893

The Boston Symphony Orchestra enters upon its thirteenth season at Music Hall, Oct. 13 and 14, the first public rehearsal being on Friday, the 13th, and the Saturday evening concert on the 14th. The change in conductors has already been announced and the appearance of Mr. Emil Paur at the head of the orchestra will be awaited with much interest. From all accounts at hand he is the possessor of great qualities as a conductor. There will be few changes in the makeup of the orchestra.

Mr. Kneisel will again be concertmeister and will be ably supported by Mr. Loeffler, Mr. Adamowski and the unrivalled section of violinists. Able soloists have already been engaged, who have never been heard here. Season tickets will be sold as usual at auction commencing on Sept. 25 and continuing on the 26th, 28th and 29th. The rehearsal seats will be sold on Monday and Tuesday, Sept. 25-26, and the concert tickets on Thursday and Friday, Sept. 28-29.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, SEPT. 10, 1893.

The thirteenth season of concerts in Music hall by the Boston Symphony orchestra will begin on Oct. 1 with the customary public rehearsal on the afternoon before. As usual there will be twenty-four concerts and as many public rehearsals, at weekly intervals, with some lapses to be hereafter announced. The engagements of solo artists include several who have not before been heard here. Some particulars of the purposes of the new conductor in the matter of programmes will be made known soon after the arrival here of Mr. Paur The sales by auction of the season tickets are thus appointed: Monday, Sept. 25, higher priced seats for the public rehearsals; Sept. 26, lower priced rehearsal seats; Sept. 28, higher priced concert seats; Sept. 29. lower priced concert seats. The prices will be $12 and $7.50, and the bids will be for premiums. As formerly not more than four consecutive seats will be sold to a single bidder, and payments for the tickets must immediately follow the sale. The sales will be held in Music hall.

Boston Transcript

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 16, 1893.

The thirteenth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Music Hall will begin on Oct. 13, Friday afternoon, public rehearsal, and Oct. 14, Saturday night. It will, as usual, include twenty-four concerts and as many public rehearsals, at weekly intervals, with some lapses to be hereafter announced. The sales by auction of the season tickets are thus appointed: Monday, Sept. 25, twelve-dollar seats for the public rehearsals; Sept. 26, seven dollar and a half rehearsal seats; Sept. 28, twelve-dollar concert seats; Sept. 29, seven dollar and a half concert seats. The bids will be for premiums, not more than four consecutive seats will be sold to a single bidder, and payment for the tickets must immediately follow the sale. The sales will be held in the Music Hall.

MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

Thirteenth Season. 1893-94.

TWENTY-FOUR CONCERTS

On consecutive Saturday Evenings, from Oct. 14, 1893, to April 28, 1894, omitting Nov. 11, Dec. 16, 1893, Jan. 13, Feb. 10, and March 31, 1894, and

TWENTY-FOUR PUBLIC REHEARSALS

On consecutive Friday Afternoons, from Oct. 13, 1893, to April 27, 1894, omitting Nov. 10, Dec. 15, 1893, Jan. 12, Feb. 9 and March 30, 1894.

Tickets for the series of Concerts and for the series of Rehearsals $12 and $7.50 according to location.

The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, MONDAY, Sept. 25, at 10 A. M.
The $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, TUESDAY, Sept. 26, at 10 A. M.
The $12 seats for the concerts will be sold at auction at Music Hall, on THURSDAY, Sept. 28, at 10 A. M.
The $7.50 seats for the concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place on FRIDAY, Sept. 29, at 10 A. M.
Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

Tickets will be delivered in the Hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be resold. 7t[A] s 16

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, SEPT. 16, 1893.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Thirteenth Season beginning Oct. 14

Auction Sales of Season Tickets at Music Hall Sept. 25, 26, 28 and 29.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, SEPT. 17, 1893.

MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

Thirteenth Season. 1893-4.

TWENTY-FOUR CONCERTS

On consecutive Saturday Evenings, from Oct. 14, 1893, to April 28, 1894, omitting Nov. 11, Dec. 16, 1893, Jan. 13, Feb. 10, and March 31, 1894, and

TWENTY-FOUR PUBLIC REHEARSALS

On consecutive Friday Afternoons, from Oct. 13, 1893, to April 27, 1894, omitting Nov. 10, Dec. 15, 1893, Jan. 12, Feb. 9 and March 30, 1894.

Tickets for the series of Concerts and for the series of Rehearsals $12 and $7 50 according to location.

The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, MONDAY, Sept. 25, at 10 A. M.
The $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, TUESDAY, Sept. 26, at 10 A. M.
The $12 seats for the concerts will be sold at auction at Mustc Hall, on THURSDAY, Sept. 28. at 10 A. M.
The $7.50 seats for the concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place on FRIDAY, Sept. 29, at 10 A. M.
Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

Tickets will be delivered in the Hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought or they will be resold.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The thirteenth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts will comprise twenty-four performances, given on consecutive Saturday evenings from Oct. 14, 1893, to April 28, 1894, omitting Nov. 11, Dec. 16, Jan. 13, Feb. 10 and March 31; and twenty-four public rehearsals on consecutive Friday afternoons, from Oct. 13, 1893, to April 27, 1894, omitting Nov. 10, Dec. 15, Jan. 12, Feb. 9 and March 30. Tickets for the series of concerts and for the series of rehearsals will be sold for $12 and $7.70 according to location. The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, Monday, Sept. 25, at 10 A. M. The $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction at the same place Tuesday, Sept. 26, at 10 A. M. The $12 seats for the concerts will be sold at auction on Thursday, Sept. 28, at 10 A. M. The $7.50 seats for the concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place on Friday, Sept. 29, at 10 A. M. Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered in the hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be resold.

Herr Emil Paur writes: "I am anticipating with much satisfaction my coming to Boston to take the direction of the Symphony orchestra. It is pleasant for me to learn that American people have a taste for all that is best in music, and show judicious criticism in separating real art from dilettanteism." Herr Paur will sail from Bremen on the steamship Aller, Sept. 19, for New York.

Manager Schoeffel is expected home from Chicago on Monday. He writes that the enormous success of "A merica"

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, SEPT. 17.

Symphony Auction Sales.

The annual auction sale of season tickets for the twenty-four public Rehearsals, and twenty-four Saturday evening Concerts, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Emil Paur, conductor, will take place at Music Hall on September 25, 26, 28 and 29, beginning at 10 o'clock each morning. The $12.00 seats for the Rehearsals will be sold on Monday, Sept. 25; the $7.50 seats for the Rehearsals on Tuesday, Sept. 26. On Thursday, Sept. 28, the $12.00 seats for the Concerts will be sold, and on Friday, Sept. 29, the $7.50 seats. As in past years, bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats to be sold will be shown on a diagram and marked off, as sold.

[9]

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCIV. NO. 79.
SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 17, 1893.

BOSTON MUSIC HALL.
THIRTEENTH SEASON.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR.
WILL GIVE A SERIES OF

TWENTY-FOUR CONCERTS

On Consecutive Saturday Evenings, from Oct. 14, 1893, to April 28, 1894, Omitting Nov. 11, Dec. 16, 1893, Jan. 13, Feb. 10 and March 31, 1894, and

TWENTY-FOUR PUBLIC REHEARSALS

ON CONSECUTIVE FRIDAY AFTERNOONS, from Oct. 13, 1893, to April 27, 1894, omitting Nov. 10, Dec. 15, 1893, Jan. 12, Feb. 9 and March 30, 1894.

TICKETS for the series of Concerts and for the series of Rehearsals, $12.00 and $7.50, according to location.

The $12 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, Monday, Sept. 25, at 10 A. M.
The $7.50 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, Tuesday, Sept. 26, at 10 A. M.
The $12 Seats for the Concerts will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, on Thursday, Sept. 28, at 10 A. M.
The $7.50 Seats for the Concerts will be sold in like manner, at the same place, on Friday, Sept. 29, at 10 A. M.
Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

Tickets will be delivered in the Hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be resold.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Inquiries continue to be made daily at Music Hall concerning the ticket sales for the Symphony rehearsals and concerts of the coming season, and ample evidence is given that the Boston orchestra is held to be an institution commanding the stanchest support from all resident music lovers.

It is questionable if there was ever a more practical test of the estimation of an organization by a public than that proven to exist hereabout for this orchestra, by the subscription to the stock of the corporation which is to provide it with a new home in readiness.

The raising of nearly $500,000, in sums of from $100 to $25,000, showed that all classes are alike alive to the value of the Symphony orchestra in the musical life of Boston, and so there is no need to question the future support of its concerts.

It is announced by Manager Ellis that the 13th season of the orchestra, with Mr. Emil Paur as conductor, will consist of 24 concerts on consecutive Saturday evenings, from Oct. 14, 1893, to April 28, 1894, omitting Nov. 11, Dec. 16, 1893, Jan. 13, Feb. 10 and March 31, 1894, and 24 public rehearsals on consecutive Friday afternoons, from Oct. 13, 1893, to April 27, 1894, omitting Nov. 10, Dec. 15, 1893, Jan. 12, Feb. 9 and March 30, 1894.

The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction at Music Hall, Monday, Sept. 25, at 10 A. M. The $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction at Music Hall, Tuesday, Sept. 26, at 10 A. M. The $12 seats for the concerts will be sold at auction at Music Hall on Thursday, Sept. 28, at 10 A. M. The $7.50 seats for the concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place on Friday, Sept. 29, at 10 A. M. Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

Negotiations concluded and pending indicate that the orchestral features of the season will be supplemented by the appearance of many notable soloists aside from those included in the organization, and prominent on the list of singers engaged are Mme. Lillian Nordica and Mme. Emma Eames, both of whom have an early appearance.

EMIL PAUR IN THE CONCERT HALL.

One of Leipsic's best critics writes of Emil Paur in the concert hall as follows: Emil Paur has only been four years in Leipsic, and yet he has succeeded in gaining laurels of fame and crosses of honor as incomparable conductor in large concerts; namely, in the new Gewandhaus for the benefit of the orchestra aspirants, in the Liszt Vereine, etc. In studying great symphonies and difficult novelties he endeavored to interpret the composer correctly, to leave nothing doubtful, and to impress everything thoroughly till perfection was attained. No commanding "Sir volo, sir jubeo," did the musicians hear from him, but they were convinced in a friendly tone of the correctness of his instructions.

They all learned from him, and they all must thank him for it. We had never before heard Liszt's "Faust Symphony," the same composer's symphonic poem, "Tasso," R. Wagner's overture to "Faust," Berlioz's "Symphony Fantastique" performed with such swing and force as under Paur's genial leading. He conducted lately, in the last concerts of the Liszt Vereine, the powerful "Seventh Symphony" (E dur), by J. Bruckner, a book with seven seals for many conductors who did not venture to attack it, and earned brilliant success.

The same symphony, which had been unfavorably criticised in the Gewandhaus concerts and been received with tokens of disapproval, now suddenly appeared in quite a new light and found universal approbation. That was called forth by the divine spark of real inspiration, which the impulsive conductor, Mr. Paur, bears in him and radiates. Pedantic and mediocre minds cannot do that.

As to the virtuosoship of the pianist and violinist. Mr. Paur has seldom, but always with success, appeared here as pianist. He played brilliantly in the Gewandhaus concerts Beethoven's great "E's dur Concert," and later on Brahm's "B dur Concert," etc. The pieces on two pianos which Mr. Paur with his congenial wife, a highly intelligent and talented pianiste, played in different concerts, as well as at their own house before a distinguished audience (matinee), were unique in their kind.

We remember with pleasure these excellent matinees in Mr. Paur's house. Here was first heard many a good new work (chamber music) which helped to bring it into notice. Here Brahm's beautiful "Clarinet Quintet" (op. 15) was played for the first time in Leipsic. Not even a first rate violinist could have played the first violin part better than Mr. Paur did then. His melting melodious tone in adagio delighted every hearer. One felt the whole soul of the player was turned into music.

The fresh south German temperament, and the pleasant, unconstrained, natural behavior of the conductor Paur caused him to be liked in every circle in which he associated. No hypocrite and no paragon, no kid-gloved drawing room visitor and no maker of fine speeches in self interest, but a healthy, honest and jovial German, with his heart in the right place, but also a great artist, soaring to the highest aims with justifiable, self-consciousness; in this light Mr. Paur has shown and maintained himself always here. May fortune smile on him in his more distant artist career! His genius will everywhere find admiration and bring him success.

THE WORCESTER FESTIVAL.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, SEPT. 17, 1893.

The auction sales for the concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra, the thirteenth season of which is to begin Oct. 14, will be held at Music hall, Sept. 25, 26, 28 and 29. Great interest is already manifested in these concerts, and that the seats will meet with a rapid sale is already indicated.

Herr Emil Paur, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony concerts, will sail from Europe for this country next Tuesday.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

MONDAY MORNING, SEPT. 18, 1893.

SYMPHONY TICKET SALES.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its thirteenth season on Oct. 14 and will give, as usual, twenty-four concerts on Saturday evenings and twenty-four public rehearsals on Friday afternoons. The auction sales of season tickets for both series will be held at Music Hall next week. The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold on Monday, Sept. 25, and the $7.50 seats for the same series on Tuesday, Sept. 26. The $12 seats for the concerts will be sold on Thursday, Sept. 28, and the cheaper seats for the concerts on Friday, Sept. 29. The sales will be conducted by Auctioneer H. W. Jackson and will begin each day at 10 a. m.

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice, and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered in the hall and must be paid for as soon as bought or they will be resold.

The advent of the famous conductor, Emil Paur of Leipsic, the attractive soloists engaged for the concerts and the great popularity of the orchestra have aroused extraordinary interest in the approaching season.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, SEPT. 18, 1893.

SYMPHONY TICKET SALES.

The prospectus of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for its 13th season announces 24 concerts on Saturday evenings and 24 public rehearsals on Friday afternoons, beginning Oct. 13 and 14. The sales of season tickets for both series will be held at Music Hall next week. The tickets will be sold at auction as usual, this method having proved the fairest that can be devised and one which suits all purses. The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold on Monday, Sept. 25, at 10 o'clock. The $7 50 seats for the same series will be sold on Tuesday, Sept. 26, at the same hour. The $12 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be offered on Thursday, Sept. 28, and the cheaper seats for the concerts on Friday, Sept. 29.

The sales will be conducted by Auctioneer H. W. Jackson. Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only and not for the choice, and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered in the hall and must be paid for as soon as bought or they will be resold.

The orchestra will be the same in size and membership as last season. In the individual excellence of the players there seems to be little room for improvement, while long association has produced an ensemble not easily acquired with new material.

Nothing but good things are heard of Emil Paur of Leipzic, the newly-engaged conductor. He possesses many sterling qualities which especially adapt him for the position, and his achievements abroad in the important posts which he has filled stamp him as a worthy successor of Henschel, Gericke and Nikisch.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 18, 1893.

SYMPHONY TICKET SALES.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its thirteenth season on October 14, and will give as usual twenty-four concerts on Saturday evenings and twenty-four public rehearsals on Friday afternoons.

The sales of season tickets for both series will be held at Music Hall next week. The tickets will be sold by auction, this method being the fairest that can be devised and one which suits all purses.

The $12 tickets for the rehearsals will be sold on Monday, Sept. 25, and the $7 50 tickets for the same series on Tuesday, Sept. 26.

The $12 seats for the concerts will be offered on Thursday, Sept. 28 and the cheaper seats for the concerts on Friday, Sept. 29. The sales will be conducted by Auctioneer H. W. Jackson and will begin at 10 A. M. each day. Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only and not for the choice, and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered in the hall and must be paid for as soon as bought or they will be resold. The number of inquiries now being daily received at Music Hall office give evidence of the deep interest felt in these concerts. It is not unlikely that the conditions existing a few weeks ago, which threatened the continued existence of the orchestra, caused the public to realize as never before how important a place it holds in the musical life of the city. The organization will be the same in size and in membership as last year.

Mr. Emil Paur, the newly engaged conductor, comes to America with the indorsement of many of the highest European musical authorities and with a record of brilliant achievements in the important positions he has held. He will find at his command one of the best orchestras of the world, and will doubtless fully maintain the high standard established by his predecessors.

BOSTON IDEAS

SEPTEMBER 17, 1893.

MUSIC HALL—Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Emil Paur, conductor (13th season, 1893-94), 24 public rehearsals on Friday afternoons beginning Oct. 13, 24 concerts on Saturday evenings beginning Oct. 14. Nov. 21 and 25 (mat.), Madame Adelina Patti.

Boston Daily Globe.

TUESDAY, SEPT. 19.

Symphony Concerts.

The Boston symphony orchestra under its new conductor, Emil Paur, will begin its 13th season on Oct 14. Twenty-four concerts will be given on Saturday evenings and 24 public rehearsals on Friday afternoons, as usual. The auction sales of season tickets for both series will be held at Music hall next week.

The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold on Monday, Sept 25, and the $7.50 seats on Tuesday, Sept 26. The $12 seats for the concerts will be sold on Thursday, Sept 28, and the cheaper seats for the concerts on Friday, Sept 29. The sales will begin each day at 10 a m.

The advent of Mr Paur, the attractive soloists engaged for the concerts and the great popularity of the orchestra have combined to excite the liveliest interest of the musical public in the coming season.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The advent of the new conductor, Mr. Emil Paur of Leipsic, will add to the interest always taken in the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. All accounts agree that in Mr. Paur a worthy successor to Henschel, Gericke and Nikisch has been found, and that the most satisfactory results may be expected from his leadership. Mr. Paur is due in Boston before the end of this month, and will at once begin rehearsals for the coming season. The concerts will open on Oct. 14. The auction sales of season tickets for the public rehearsals and concerts will be held at Music Hall on Monday, Tuesday, Thursday and Friday of next week. Circulars giving full information may be obtained on application at Music Hall.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.

TUESDAY MORNING, SEPT. 19, 1893.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Mr. Emil Paur of Leipzic, the new conductor of the Symphony Orchestra is due in Boston next week and will at once begin rehearsals for the coming season. Private letters from high critical authorities and the testimony of those who have lately heard performances in Leipzic under Mr. Paur's direction agree that he will prove a most valuable acquisition to the orchestra and that brilliant results may be expected from his leadership.

The popularity of the orchestra, the advent of a famous director new to Boston and the attractive soloists engaged will make the coming season a memorable one in the history of the organization.

The auction sales of season tickets for the public rehearsals and concerts will be held at Music Hall on Monday, Tuesday, Thursday and Friday of next week. Circulars giving full particulars may be had on application at Music Hall.

Boston Journal.

TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 19, 1893.

MUSIC HALL.

Thirteenth Season - - 1893-94.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

Twenty-four Concerts
On Saturday Evenings, beginning Oct. 14.
Twenty-four Public Rehearsals
On Friday Afternoons, beginning Oct. 13.

REHEARSALS.

Auction Sale of $12.00 seats, Monday, Sept. 25
Auction Sale of $7.50 seats, Tuesday, Sept. 26

CONCERTS.

Auction Sale of $12 seats, Thursday, Sept. 28
Auction Sale of $7.50 seats, Friday, Sept. 29

The sales will be held in Music Hall, and will begin each day at 10 A. M. 1t sep19

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The advent of Mr. Emil Paur of Leipzic, the newly chosen conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will add to the interest always taken in the concerts of this superb organization. Private letters from high musical authorities and the testimony of those who have lately heard Mr. Paur's performances in Leipzig all bear witness to his great abilities and his fitness for his new position.

Mr. Paur is due in Boston before the end of this month, and will at once begin rehearsals for the season. The auction sales of season tickets for the public rehearsals and concerts will be held at Music Hall on Monday, Tuesday, Thursday and Friday of next week. Circulars giving full information may be had on application at Music Hall.

[10]

...day Globe.

...AY, SEPT. 17, 1893.

BOSTON MUSIC HALL.
THIRTEENTH SEASON.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR,

WILL GIVE A SERIES OF

TWENTY-FOUR CONCERTS

ON CONSECUTIVE SATURDAY EVENINGS FROM OCT. 14, 1893, TO APRIL 28, 1894, OMITTING NOV 11, DEC. 16, 1893, JAN. 13, FEB. 10 AND MARCH 31, 1894, AND

TWENTY-FOUR PUBLIC REHEARSALS

ON CONSECUTIVE FRIDAY AFTERNOONS, FROM OCT. 13, 1893, TO APRIL 27, 1894, OMITTING NOV. 10, DEC. 15, 1893, JAN. 12, FEB. 9 AND MARCH 30, 1894.

TICKETS for the series of Concerts and for the series of Rehearsals, $12.00 and $7.50, according to location.

The $12 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, Monday, Sept. 25, at 10 A. M.
The $7.50 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, Tuesday, Sept. 26, at 10 A. M.
The $12 Seats for the Concerts will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, on Thursday, Sept. 28, at 10 A. M.
The $7.50 Seats for the Concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place, on Friday, Sept. 29, at 10 A. M.
Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

Tickets will be delivered in the Hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought or they will be resold.

Symphony Concerts.

The earliest announcement to be made regarding the coming musical season and of foremost importance is that of the Boston symphony orchestra. The combination of circumstances of a few weeks ago when, for a time, it was extremely doubtful if the concerts by this splendid organization could be continued no doubt caused the public to realize, as never before, their importance in the musical life of the city.

No better evidence of genuine interest could be shown than in the speedy closing of the subscription for providing a new building for these concerts.

The orchestra will give 24 public rehearsals on Friday afternoons, and 24 concerts on Saturday evenings at Music hall, beginning Oct 13 and 14.

Season tickets for these performances will be sold by auction at Music hall, Sept 25, 26, 28 and 29. The sales will begin at 10 o'clock each day, and will be conducted under the usual rules. Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice, and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a large diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

Tickets will be delivered in the hall and must be paid for as soon as bought or they will be resold.

The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold Monday, Sept 25, and the $7.50 seats for the same series on Tuesday, Sept 26. The $12 seats for the concerts will be sold on Thursday, Sept 28, and the $7.50 concert seats on Friday, Sept 29.

The innumerable inquiries received at Music hall augur well for the success of the sales and indicate that the new conditions under which the concerts are to be given have aroused extraordinary interest. The orchestra itself will be practically the same as last year. In the individual excellence of the players there is little room for improvement and long association has produced an "ensemble" not easily acquired with new men.

Patrons of the concerts are naturally interested to know about the personality and and musical tastes of Mr Emil Paur, the new conductor in whose hands the artistic conduct of the performances will rest.

The successor of Mr Nikisch will find at his command one of the best orchestras of the world. He has shown by his achievements in Europe that he is worthy the high position to which he is called and that he possesses many qualities which fit him for its exacting duties.

He is but 38 years of age. A reliable musical authority in Leipzic has this to say of him:

"In losing Emil Paur we lose an executive artist of extraordinary manysidedness, a director of eminent endowments, a musician of the most thorough education, and a man full of energy, strength of character, and firm faith in the ideal in our great art. How our orchestra esteemed him, how highly it valued him as musician and as man, there are thousands of testimonies.

"What distinguishes him as a director? The piercing keenness of his perceptions, his direct sentiment, the fire of his generous spirit. He held in honor every work of genius. The masters of the past as well as the present found in him the warmest admirer, certain to secure the best execution for their works. Not only the theater but the concert hall bears witness to his masterly direction. Need we mention how among other things he conducted Wagner's 'Faust' overture as no one but Hans von Bulow had done before in Leipzig?

"Need we point to the performances of the Liszt society and his interpretations of Berlioz, Liszt and Bruckner? How admirable were his performances! The best masters of all follow him in his new career."

No announcement can be made as to programs until the arrival of Mr Paur. These remarks are in no wise intended to exploit new artists, but care will be taken to secure the best soloists available and only those worthy to appear with the orchestra. Among those already engaged are Mme Emma Eames and Mme Lillian Nordica.

...OSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCIV. NO. 81.

TUESDAY, SEPT. 19, 1893.

...constant inquiries at Music Hall regarding the Symphony concerts and the public rehearsals of the same show an intense interest in the coming season's work of the Boston orchestra, under Mr. Emil Paur's direction. The rehearsal tickets are to be sold at auction on Monday and Tuesday next week, and those for the concerts on the following Thursday and Friday. No advance has been made in the prices for either the rehearsals or concerts.

[11]

Boston Transcript

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 16, 1893.

The thirteenth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Music Hall will begin on Oct. 13, Friday afternoon, public rehearsal, and Oct. 14, Saturday night. It will, as usual, include twenty-four concerts and as many public rehearsals, at weekly intervals, with some lapses to be hereafter announced. The sales by auction of the season tickets are thus appointed: Monday, Sept, 25, twelve-dollar seats for the public rehearsals; Sept. 26, seven dollar and a half rehearsal seats; Sept. 28, twelve-dollar concert seats; Sept. 29, seven dollar and a half concert seats. The bids will be for premiums, not more than four consecutive seats will be sold to a single bidder, and payment for the tickets must immediately follow the sale. The sales will be held in the Music Hall.

Boston Journal.

THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 21, 1893.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have become indispensable features of each musical season. The public do not need to be reminded of the quality of these performances, which are now recognized as the best that are given in any city of the world.

The interest always taken in this organization will be increased this year by the change in conductors, and if the accounts received of Mr. Paur's achievements and ability prove correct, patrons of the concerts are to be congratulated on his engagement.

The opening concert of the season will be given on Saturday evening, Oct. 14. The auction sales of season tickets for the 24 public rehearsals and 24 concerts will be held at Music Hall on Monday, Tuesday, Thursday and Friday of next week.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

THURSDAY MORNING, SEPT. 21, 1893.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The coming series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra bid fair to be quite as successful as those of any previous year, and there are elements which will give them exceptional attractiveness. The debut of the new conductor, Mr. Emil Paur, is awaited with much interest. His brilliant record in Europe leads to the belief that the most gratifying results may be expected from his directorship. Soloists of distinction are promised, among them Mme. Lillian Nordica and Mme. Emma Eames, two artists in whom Boston takes especial pride. The great attraction of the concerts, however, is always the playing of the grand orchestra, which has reached a degree of perfection that can probably not be equalled by any similar organization in the world. The first concert of the season will be given on Saturday evening, Oct. 14. The auction sale of season tickets for the twenty-four public rehearsals and twenty-four concerts will be held at Music Hall on Monday, Tuesday, Thursday and Friday of next week, beginning each day at 10 A.M. Circulars giving full information may be had on application at Music Hall.

Boston Journal.

TEN PAGES.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 23, 1893.

SYMPHONY AUCTION SALE.

Judging from the large number of inquiries by the musical people of Boston and vicinity regarding the annual auction sale of Symphony season tickets, there will be the usual large audience at Music Hall next Monday evening, when Auctioneer Jackson offers for sale the $12 seats for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals.

Much interest is centred in the new conductor, Mr. Emil Paur, who is expected to arrive in Boston from Leipsic in about one week. Many are the favorable reports constantly reaching us of the great ability of Mr. Paur and of his successes as a conductor of large orchestras.

On Tuesday, Sept. 26, the $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold. Thursday, Sept. 28, the $12 seats for Saturday evening concerts will be sold, and on Friday, Sept. 29, the $7.50 seats.

Boston Transcript

FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 22, 1893.

Soloists for the Symphony Concerts.

Music lovers have got in the habit of looking to the symphony concerts for the appearances here of the leading soloists of the world. This year the list of artists who will appear with the matchless orchestra under the direction of Emil Paur is unusually strong, and includes such favorites as Emma Eames, Lillian Nordica, Miss Adele Aus der Ohe, Max Heinrich and Plunket Greene.

The auction sales of season tickets for rehearsals and concerts will be held next week at Music Hall. The $12 tickets for the rehearsals will be sold on Monday—the $7.50 tickets for the rehearsals on Tuesday. The $12 and $7.50 tickets for the concerts will be sold on Thursday and Friday, respectively. The sales will begin each day at 10 A. M. Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice, and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid.

Tickets will be delivered in the hall and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be resold. The auction method has proved itself the fairest way of disposing of the tickets for these concerts. It creates a wide range of prices suited to all purses. Intending patrons will do well to attend the sales personally when possible. Ladies will find no difficulty in making their own purchases.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

SATURDAY MORNING, SEPT. 23, 1893.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's announcement for the coming season is most attractive, and there is every indication that its concerts will prove as popular as in any previous year. In material and equipment our Symphony Orchestra ranks with the best in the world and no other city offers so important a series of concerts of the highest musical value to connoisseurs and students. The management has been especially fortunate this year in the engagement of soloists among whom are Mme. Lillian Nordica and Mme. Emma Eames. The season ticket sales for the public rehearsals will be held on Monday and Tuesday of next week and for the Saturday evening concerts on Thursday and Friday. The sales will be by auction beginning each day at 10 o'clock.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SATURDAY MORNING, SEPT. 23, 1893.

SYMPHONY TICKETS.

The demand for season tickets to the Boston Symphony Orchestra's series of twenty-four Friday afternoon public rehearsals and twenty-four Saturday evening concerts is fully up to that of past seasons, judging from inquiries received at Music Hall through the mail and in person. Emil Paur, the talented conductor of the orchestra at Leipsic, and who succeeds Mr. Arthur Nikisch, is expected to arrive in Boston next week. The auction sale of tickets for these concerts opens at Music Hall next Monday morning at 10 o'clock, when the $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold. On Tuesday, Sept. 26, the $7.50 seats will be sold. Thursday, Sept. 28, the $12 seats for concerts, and on Friday, Sept. 29, the $7.50 seats will be sold.

Boston Daily Globe.

SATURDAY, SEPT. 23.

The arrangements for the coming season of the Boston symphony orchestra justify the prediction that it will be quite as successful as in any former year. The distinguished soloists, Mme Lillian Nordica and Mme Emma Eames, will appear. The auction sales of season tickets for the public rehearsals and concerts will be held next week at Music hall.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

FRIDAY MORNING, SEPT. 22, 1893.

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra have quite naturally come to be looked upon as the central attraction of the local musical season, and the preliminary announcement of each year's series is accepted as the signal for the opening up of all sorts of musical enterprises for the fall and winter months. The make-up of the orchestra for the season of 1893-'94 will be practically the same as last season, with Mr. Franz Kneisel as concertmeister, and the same unsurpassed body of strings, including Loeffler, Adamowski, Roth and many other favorites. Much interest is felt among the musical public regarding the coming of the new conductor, Mr. Emil Paur, who succeeds Mr. Nikisch, and judging from press comments and those who have seen him conduct in Leipsic and other European cities, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is fortunate in securing so able a leader to succeed Henschel, Gericke and Nikisch. The annual auction sale for the twenty-four concerts and like number of Friday afternoon public rehearsals begins in Music Hall next Monday morning, Sept. 25th, at 10 o'clock, when the $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold. On Tuesday the $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold. Thursday, Sept. 28th, the $12 seats and on Friday, Sept. 29th, the $7.50 seats for the Saturday evening concerts.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, SEPT. 23, 1893.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Never since the Symphony orchestra was founded has there been so much interest in the sale of tickets for any season as at present. The knowledge that one of the most eminent conductors of Europe is to direct the orchestra this season, and the idea that he is more eclectic in his methods than his predecessors, have combined to excite our musical public beyond their normal condition.

The auction sale of the $12 seats for the rehearsals will begin at ten o'clock next Monday forenoon at Music Hall. On Tuesday, at the same hour, the other seats for the rehearsals will be sold. On Thursday the $12 seats for the concerts will be disposed of, and on Friday the remaining seats for the concerts will be sold. No more than four tickets will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

BOSTON HOME JOURNAL.

The Saturday Evening Paper.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 23, 1893.

THE MUSICAL SEASON of Boston for 1893-4 is now fairly started, and will soon be in full swing. Then there will be offered to music lovers a continuous stream of good things, and each may choose that which seems best for him. In some instances he will get what he desires, and in others not, unless he is a Croesus. I am thinking of the Symphony concerts and the opera season. The conductor of the former has arrived, and already the speculators are sending out diagrams of Music Hall, and suggesting that they would be "pleased to secure your tickets for you," and that it might be wise to mark more than one location in which you would be willing to sit for the season, so I presume the fashionable people will, as usual, occupy the seats at the concerts, and the students and musical people generally will stand or cling at such uncertain anchorage as offers in the way of stairs, etc.

.....

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, SEPT. 24.

Symphony Ticket Sales.

The auction sales of season tickets, for the twenty-four public rehearsals and twenty-four concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin at Music Hall, tomorrow when the $12 tickets for the rehearsals will be sold. The $7.50 tickets for the rehearsals will be sold at auction on Tuesday, and the $12 and $7.50 tickets for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold on Thursday and Friday respectively. The sales will begin each day at 10 o'clock. The date of the first concert is Saturday, October 14.

The arrangements made for the coming concerts promise to make them equal in attractiveness to the most brilliant of past years. The orchestra will be in the best possible form before the time of the first concert. Of the new conductor, Mr. Emil Paur, nothing but good things are heard, and the best results may be anticipated from his leadership. Among the soloists promised are Mme. Nordica, Mme. Eames, Miss Aus der Ohe, Mr. Max Heinrich and Mr. Plunket Greene.

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, SEPT. 17, 1893.

BOSTON MUSIC HALL.
THIRTEENTH SEASON.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR,

WILL GIVE A SERIES OF

TWENTY-FOUR CONCERTS

ON CONSECUTIVE SATURDAY EVENINGS FROM OCT. 14, 1893, TO APRIL 28, 1894, OMITTING NOV 11, DEC. 16, 1893, JAN. 13, FEB. 10 AND MARCH 31, 1894, AND

TWENTY-FOUR PUBLIC REHEARSALS

ON CONSECUTIVE FRIDAY AFTERNOONS, FROM OCT. 13, 1893, TO APRIL 27, 1894, OMITTING NOV. 10, DEC. 15, 1893, JAN. 12, FEB. 9 AND MARCH 30, 1894.

TICKETS for the series of Concerts and for the series of Rehearsals, $12.00 and $7.50, according to location.

The $12 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, Monday, Sept. 25, at 10 A. M.
The $7.50 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, Tuesday, Sept. 26, at 10 A. M.
The $12 Seats for the Concerts will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, on Thursday, Sept. 28, at 10 A. M.
The $7.50 Seats for the Concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place, on Friday, Sept. 29, at 10 A. M.
Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

Tickets will be delivered in the Hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought or they will be resold.

Symphony Concerts.

The earliest announcement to be made regarding the coming musical season and of foremost importance is that of the Boston symphony orchestra. The combination of circumstances of a few weeks ago when, for a time, it was extremely doubtful if the concerts by this splendid organization could be continued no doubt caused the public to realize, as never before, their importance in the musical life of the city.

No better evidence of genuine interest could be shown than in the speedy closing of the subscription for providing a new building for these concerts.

The orchestra will give 24 public rehearsals on Friday afternoons, and 24 concerts on Saturday evenings at Music hall, beginning Oct 13 and 14.

Season tickets for these performances will be sold by auction at Music hall, Sept 25, 26, 28 and 29. The sales will begin at 10 o'clock each day, and will be conducted under the usual rules. Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice, and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a large diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

Tickets will be delivered in the hall and must be paid for as soon as bought or they will be resold.

The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold Monday, Sept 25, and the $7.50 seats for the same series on Tuesday, Sept 26. The $12 seats for the concerts will be sold on Thursday, Sept 28, and the $7.50 concert seats on Friday, Sept 29.

The innumerable inquiries received at Music hall augur well for the success of the sales and indicate that the new conditions under which the concerts are to be given have aroused extraordinary interest. The orchestra itself will be practically the same as last year. In the individual excellence of the players there is little room for improvement and long association has produced an "ensemble" not easily acquired with new men.

Patrons of the concerts are naturally interested to know about the personality and and musical tastes of Mr Emil Paur, the new conductor in whose hands the artistic conduct of the performances will rest.

The successor of Mr Nikisch will find at his command one of the best orchestras of the world. He has shown by his achievements in Europe that he is worthy the high position to which he is called and that he possesses many qualities which fit him for its exacting duties.

He is but 38 years of age. A reliable musical authority in Leipzic has this to say of him:

"In losing Emil Paur we lose an executive artist of extraordinary manysidedness, a director of eminent endowments, a musician of the most thorough education, and a man full of energy, strength of character, and firm faith in the ideal in our great art. How our orchestra esteemed him, how highly it valued him as musician and as man, there are thousands of testimonies.

"What distinguishes him as a director? The piercing keenness of his perceptions, his direct sentiment, the fire of his generous spirit. He held in honor every work of genius. The masters of the past as well as the present found in him the warmest admirer, certain to secure the best execution for their works. Not only the theater but the concert hall bears witness to his masterly direction. Need we mention how among other things he conducted Wagner's 'Faust' overture as no one but Hans von Bulow had done before in Leipzic.

"Need we point to the performances of the Liszt society and his interpretations of Berlioz, Liszt and Bruckner? How admirable were his performances! The best wishes of all follow him in his new career."

No announcement can be made as to programs until the arrival of Mr Paur. These concerts are in no wise intended to exploit "star" artists, but care will be taken to secure the best soloists available and only those worthy to appear with the orchestra. Among those already engaged are Mme Emma Eames and Mme Lillian Nordica.

BOSTON HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCIV. NO. 61.

TUESDAY, SEPT. 19, 1893.

Constant inquiries at Music Hall regarding the Symphony concerts and the public rehearsals of the same show an intense interest in the coming season's work of the Boston orchestra under Mr. Emil Paur's direction. The rehearsal tickets are to be offered at auction on Monday and Tuesday of next week, and those for the concerts on the following Thursday and Friday. No advance has been made in the prices for either the rehearsals or concerts.

[11]

Boston Transcript
SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 16, 1893.

The thirteenth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Music Hall will begin on Oct. 13, Friday afternoon, public rehearsal, and Oct. 14, Saturday night. It will, as usual, include twenty-four concerts and as many public rehearsals, at weekly intervals, with some lapses to be hereafter announced. The sales by auction of the season tickets are thus appointed: Monday, Sept. 25, twelve-dollar seats for the public rehearsals; Sept. 26, seven dollar and a half rehearsal seats; Sept. 28, twelve-dollar concert seats; Sept. 29, seven dollar and a half concert seats. The bids will be for premiums, not more than four consecutive seats will be sold to a single bidder, and payment for the tickets must immediately follow the sale. The sales will be held in the Music Hall.

Boston Journal.
THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 21, 1893.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have become indispensable features of each musical season. The public do not need to be reminded of the quality of these performances, which are now recognized as the best that are given in any city of the world.

The interest always taken in this organization will be increased this year by the change in conductors, and if the accounts received of Mr. Paur's achievements and ability prove correct, patrons of the concerts are to be congratulated on his engagement.

The opening concert of the season will be given on Saturday evening, Oct. 14. The auction sales of season tickets for the 24 public rehearsals and 24 concerts will be held at Music Hall on Monday, Tuesday, Thursday and Friday of next week.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
THURSDAY MORNING, SEPT. 21, 1893.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The coming series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra bid fair to be quite as successful as those of any previous year, and there are elements which will give them exceptional attractiveness. The debut of the new conductor, Mr. Emil Paur, is awaited with much interest. His brilliant record in Europe leads to the belief that the most gratifying results may be expected from his directorship. Soloists of distinction are promised, among them Mme. Lillian Nordica and Mme. Emma Eames, two artists in whom Boston takes especial pride. The great attraction of the concerts, however, is always the playing of the grand orchestra, which has reached a degree of perfection that can probably not be equalled by any similar organization in the world. The first concert of the season will be given on Saturday evening, Oct. 14. The auction sale of season tickets for the twenty-four public rehearsals and twenty-four concerts will be held at Music Hall on Monday, Tuesday, Thursday and Friday of next week, beginning each day at 10 A.M. Circulars giving full information may be had on application at Music Hall.

Boston Journal.
TEN PAGES.
SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 23, 1893.

SYMPHONY AUCTION SALE.

Judging from the large number of inquiries by the musical people of Boston and vicinity regarding the annual auction sale of Symphony season tickets, there will be the usual large audience at Music Hall next Monday evening, when Auctioneer Jackson offers for sale the $12 seats for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals.

Much interest is centred in the new conductor, Mr. Emil Paur, who is expected to arrive in Boston from Leipsic in about one week. Many are the favorable reports constantly reaching us of the great ability of Mr. Paur and of his successes as a conductor of large orchestras.

On Tuesday, Sept. 26, the $7 50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold. Thursday, Sept. 28, the $12 seats for Saturday evening concerts will be sold, and on Friday, Sept. 29, the $7 50 seats.

Boston Transcript
FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 22, 1893.

Soloists for the Symphony Concerts.

Music lovers have got in the habit of looking to the symphony concerts for the appearances here of the leading soloists of the world. This year the list of artists who will appear with the matchless orchestra under the direction of Emil Paur is unusually strong, and includes such favorites as Emma Eames, Lillian Nordica, Miss Adele Aus der Ohe, Max Heinrich and Plunket Greene.

The auction sales of season tickets for rehearsals and concerts will be held next week at Music Hall. The $12 tickets for the rehearsals will be sold on Monday—the $7.50 tickets for the rehearsals on Tuesday. The $12 and $7.50 tickets for the concerts will be sold on Thursday and Friday, respectively. The sales will begin each day at 10 A. M. Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice, and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid.

Tickets will be delivered in the hall and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be resold. The auction method has proved itself the fairest way of disposing of the tickets for these concerts. It creates a wide range of prices suited to all purses. Intending patrons will do well to attend the sales personally when possible. Ladies will find no difficulty in making their own purchases.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
SATURDAY MORNING, SEPT. 23, 1893.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's announcement for the coming season is most attractive, and there is every indication that its concerts will prove as popular as in any previous year. In material and equipment our Symphony Orchestra ranks with the best in the world and no other city offers so important a series of concerts of the highest musical value to connoisseurs and students. The management has been especially fortunate this year in the engagement of soloists among whom are Mme. Lillian Nordica and Mme. Emma Eames. The season ticket sales for the public rehearsals will be held on Monday and Tuesday of next week and for the Saturday evening concerts on Thursday and Friday. The sales will be by auction beginning each day at 10 o'clock.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.
SATURDAY MORNING, SEPT. 23, 1893.

SYMPHONY TICKETS.

The demand for season tickets to the Boston Symphony Orchestra's series of twenty-four Friday afternoon public rehearsals and twenty-four Saturday evening concerts is fully up to that of past seasons, judging from inquiries received at Music Hall through the mail and in person. Emil Paur, the talented conductor of the orchestra at Leipsic, and who succeeds Mr. Arthur Nikisch, is expected to arrive in Boston next week. The auction sale of tickets for these concerts opens at Music Hall next Monday morning at 10 o'clock, when the $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold. On Tuesday, Sept. 26, the $7.50 seats will be sold. Thursday, Sept. 28, the $12 seats for concerts, and on Friday, Sept. 29, the $7.50 seats will be sold.

Boston Daily Globe.
SATURDAY, SEPT. 23.

The arrangements for the coming season of the Boston symphony orchestra justify the prediction that it will be quite as successful as in any former year. The distinguished soloists, Mme Lillian Nordica and Mme Emma Eames, will appear. The auction sales of season tickets for the public rehearsals and concerts will be held next week at Music hall.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.
FRIDAY MORNING, SEPT. 22, 1893.

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra have quite naturally come to be looked upon as the central attraction of the local musical season, and the preliminary announcement of each year's series is accepted as the signal for the opening up of all sorts of musical enterprises for the fall and winter months. The make-up of the orchestra for the season of 1893-'94 will be practically the same as last season, with Mr. Franz Kneisel as concertmeister, and the same unsurpassed body of strings, including Loeffler, Adamowski, Roth and many other favorites. Much interest is felt among the musical public regarding the coming of the new conductor, Mr. Emil Paur, who succeeds Mr. Nikisch, and judging from press comments and those who have seen him conduct in Leipsic and other European cities, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is fortunate in securing so able a leader to succeed Henschel, Gericke and Nikisch. The annual auction sale for the twenty-four concerts and like number of Friday afternoon public rehearsals begins in Music Hall next Monday morning, Sept. 25th, at 10 o'clock, when the $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold. On Tuesday the $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold. Thursday, Sept. 28th, the $12 seats and on Friday, Sept. 29th, the $7.50 seats for the Saturday evening concerts.

The Beacon.
BOSTON, SATURDAY, SEPT. 23, 1893.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Never since the Symphony orchestra was founded has there been so much interest in the sale of tickets for any season as at present. The knowledge that one of the most eminent conductors of Europe is to direct the orchestra this season, and the idea that he is more eclectic in his methods than his predecessors, have combined to excite our musical public beyond their normal condition.

The auction sale of the $12 seats for the rehearsals will begin at ten o'clock next Monday forenoon at Music Hall. On Tuesday, at the same hour, the other seats for the rehearsals will be sold. On Thursday the $12 seats for the concerts will be disposed of, and on Friday the remaining seats for the concerts will be sold. No more than four tickets will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

BOSTON HOME JOURNAL.
The Saturday Evening Paper.
SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 23, 1893.

THE MUSICAL SEASON of Boston for 1893-4 is now fairly started, and will soon be in full swing. Then there will be offered to music lovers a continuous stream of good things, and each may choose that which seems best for him. In some instances he will get what he desires, and in others not, unless he is a Croesus. I am thinking of the Symphony concerts and the opera season. The conductor of the former has arrived, and already the speculators are sending out diagrams of Music Hall, and suggesting that they would be "pleased to secure your tickets for you," and that it might be wise to mark more than one location in which you would be willing to sit for the season, so I presume the fashionable people will, as usual, occupy the seats at the concerts, and the students and musical people generally will stand or cling at such uncertain anchorage as offers in the way of stairs, etc.

.....

Gazette
BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, SEPT. 24.

Symphony Ticket Sales.

The auction sales of season tickets, for the twenty-four public rehearsals and twenty-four concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin at Music Hall, tomorrow when the $12 tickets for the rehearsals will be sold. The $7.50 tickets for the rehearshls will be sold at auction on Tuesday, and the $12 and $7.50 tickets for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold on Thursday and Friday respectively. The sales will begin each day at 10 o'clock. The date of the first concert is Saturday, October 14.

The arrangements made for the coming concerts promise to make them equal in attractiveness to the most brilliant of past years. The orchestra will be in the best possible form before the time of the first concert. Of the new conductor, Mr. Emil Paur, nothing but good things are heard, and the best results may be anticipated from his leadership. Among the soloists promised are Mme. Nordica, Mme. Eames, Miss Aus der Ohe, Mr. Max Heinrich and Mr. Plunket Greene.

BOSTON DAILY TRAVELLER.

SATURDAY, SEPT. 23, 1893.

Sales of Symphony Seats—Mr. Guilmant's Recitals.

On Monday morning at 10 o'clock the sale of the $12 seats for the symphony rehearsals will begin at Music Hall. The tickets will be sold at auction, and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. To those unacquainted with these sales it may be mentioned that the seats are sold in their regular order and not from choice, and a large diagram is erected on the stage showing the exact location of each seat.

The $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold on Tuesday morning, Sept. 26, at 10 A.M. The sale of the $12 concert seats and the $7.50 concert seats will take place at 10 o'clock on the mornings of Thursday, Sept. 28, and Friday, Sept. 29, respectively. It has become the custom now for ladies to go to these sales and bid upon the seats; consequently any lady wishing to get the advantage of the sale at first hand should feel perfectly at liberty to attend, and thus save the extra expense of a speculator's commission. Mr. Jackson, the auctioneer, is particularly clear in his announcements, and attentive to the bidder, making it a very comfortable matter for those even unacquainted with auction sales to follow him and secure their choice.

The interest of the public, judging from every indication, will be quite as great this season as during any of the past seasons. The numerous inquiries of patrons at the Music Hall office have convinced Manager Elles and his staff that the public is more eager than ever to attend these concerts, and that the bidding upon the seats will be as lively as ever before. The fact that we are to have a new conductor, and that Mr. Paur is undoubtedly an able and enthusiastic leader, will no doubt excite an extra interest. So our readers will see that it is advisable to be on hand and secure their seats at the earliest opportunity. It must be remembered that the tickets are delivered in the hall and must be paid for as soon as bought, otherwise they will be immediately resold.

Boston Transcript

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 23, 1893.

Sale of Symphony Concert Tickets.

The auction sales of season tickets for the public rehearsals and concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be held on Monday, Tuesday, Thursday and Friday of next week, at Music Hall. The arrangements for the sales are as follows:

Public Rehearsals—$12 seats by auction Monday, Sept. 25; $7.50 seats by auction Tuesday, Sept. 26.

Concerts—$12 seats by auction Thursday, Sept. 28; $7.50 seats by auction Friday, Sept. 29.

The sales will begin each day at 10 A. M. Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice, and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered in the hall and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be resold.

The orchestra will give twenty-four public rehearsals and twenty-four concerts as usual on Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings, beginning Oct. 14.

The coming season will have an added interest through the advent of a famous conductor new to America. Mr. Emil Paur was chosen from a score of distinguished directors who were available, as being possessor of qualities that especially fit him for this position.

For the last four years he has conducted opera and concerts in Leipzig with complete satisfaction to the critical public of that city and to the management, who part with him with sincere regret. He should prove a worthy successor of Henschel, Gericke and Nikisch, and the best artistic results may be expected under his leadership.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, SEPT. 24, 1893.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

A very important thing to remember in regard to the approaching series of Symphony concerts is the fact that the sales of tickets by auction will commence tomorrow morning at Music hall at 10 a. m. on which occasion the $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold. On Tuesday at 10 a. m. the $7.50 seats will be sold. On Thursday, the $12 seats for the concerts will be sold and on Friday the $7.50 tickets for the concerts will be sold. All of the sales will begin at 10 a. m. Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold and will be delivered in the hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be immediately resold.

The concerts will be under the able direction of Mr. Emil Paur and will consist of twenty-four concerts and twenty-four public rehearsals. The concerts will be given on consecutive Saturday evenings, from Oct. 14, 1893, to April 28, 1894, omitting Nov. 11, Dec. 16, 1893, Jan. 13, Feb. 10, and March 31, 1894, and the twenty-four public rehearsals will be given on consecutive Friday afternoons, from Oct. 13, 1893, to April 27, 1894, omitting Nov. 10, Dec. 15, 1893, Jan. 12, Feb. 9, and March 30, 1894.

Tickets for either the concerts or the rehearsals are $12 or $7.50, according to the location.

The new conductor of the Symphony orchestra and his family sailed for New York last Tuesday. They will come directly to Boston.

Mr. and Mrs. Franz Kneisel, who have been in Europe all summer, are now at their home at Jamaica Plain.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCIV. NO. 86.

SUNDAY, SEPT. 24, 1893.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

THIRTEENTH SEASON, 1893-94.

Auction Sale of $12 Seats for the Friday Afternoon Public Rehearsals at Music Hall Tomorrow (Monday), Beginning at 10 o'clock.

Auction Sale of $7.50 Seats for Rehearsals, Tuesd y, Sept. 26, at 10 A. M.
Auction Sale of 12.00 Seats for Concerts, Thursday, Sept. 28, at 10 A. M.
Auction Sale of 7.50 Seats for Concerts, Friday, Sept. 29, at 10 A. M.

Great Interest in the Symphony Concert Ticket Sales.

The general confidence shown in all the announcements made in regard to the Boston Symphony orchestra by its business manager, Charles A. Ellis, who represents the founder and patron of this great organization, Henry L. Higginson, is one of the best evidences of the uniform appreciation of the public spirit of this liberal supporter of this grand musical enterprise by the music lovers of this section.

EMIL PAUR.
(His latest photograph.)

Despite the changes made in the leader and members of the orchestra during the 12 seasons of its existence the public has never wavered in its support of the concerts given, and the character of the patrons of each season has shown that the Symphony orchestra's public is made up of the most intelligent classes in this community.

As each season brings many to this city who are unfamiliar with this history of the Symphony orchestra, it may be well to again state that the organization owes its permanent character to Mr. Henry L. Higginson, who makes himself personally responsible for its maintenance without regard to the extent of the liability so incurred. He occupies a unique position in assuming this responsibility, and during 12 years he has shown himself equal to all emergencies and willing to meet any expense that should add to the value of the Boston Symphony orchestra or increase the interest in its concerts.

There is, therefore, every reason to have firm faith in the good judgment shown in the selection of Mr. Emil Paur as the conductor of the orchestra for the coming season.

He sailed for New York on the 19th inst., and comes directly to Boston for a visit at the home of Mr. Higginson preparatory to beginning his season's labors.

He has been made fully acquainted with the character of the concerts of former seasons, the resources of the library, and other matters calculated to enable him to outline his plans with a full understanding of the demands of the Boston public.

His familiarity with the present prominent composers of Europe, insure a hearing of all the best music of the modern school, and there is every reason to suppose that he will continue the policy of later years in these concerts in giving an opening to native born and resident musicians who have meritorious works awaiting a public performance.

The orchestral programmes will undoubtedly be varied with choice solo work, and the engagements already made with Mme. Lilian Nordica, Mme Emma Eames, Mlle. Aus Der Ohe, Plunkett Greene and Mr. Max Heinrichs indicate that Manager Ellis will maintain the high standard of the concerts in this particular.

The 24 concerts of the season will be on consecutive Saturday evenings, from Oct. 14, 1893, to April 28, 1894, omitting Nov. 11, Dec. 16, 1893, Jan. 13, Feb. 10 and March 31, 1894, and the 24 public rehearsals on consecutive Friday afternoons, from Oct. 13, 1893, to April 27, 1894, omitting Nov. 10, Dec. 15, 1893, Jan. 12, Feb. 9 and March 30, 1894. Tickets for the series of concerts and for the series of rehearsals are $12 and $7.50, according to location.

The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, Monday, Sept. 25, beginning at 10 A. M. The $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, Tuesday, Sept. 26, at 10 A. M. The $12 seats for the concerts will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, on Thursday, Sept. 28, at 10 A. M. The $7.50 seats for the concerts will be sold in like manner, at the same place, on Friday, Sept. 29, at 10 A. M. Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice, and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

The popularity of the sales by auction for a series of years has been fully shown, and with Auctioneer Jackson in charge there is no cause to anticipate other than further satisfaction in the coming sales.

Ladies who are unfamiliar with auction sales need not hesitate to attend these, for their bids will be carefully watched for, and, it is unnecessary to say, every advantage will be given them by their gentlemen competitors.

MME. LILIAN NORDICA.

MME. EMMA EAMES.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, SEPT. 24, 1893.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The announcement of the prospectus of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for its thirteenth season meets an ever increasing interest in these unrivalled concerts. The newly engaged conductor, Herr Emil Paur of Leipsic, brings with him a fine record of work in the important positions he has held abroad, and there is no fear that he will not keep to the high standard set by his predecessors. On Monday, Sept. 25, auctioneer Jackson will begin the sale of season tickets, and judging from the interest already manifest, prices for the best seats will bring even larger figures than ever. The orchestra is in fine condition, and the season of 1893-94 is destined to be one of the most remarkable in the history of the concerts.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, SEPT. 24, 1893.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The sale of seats for the thirteenth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin at Music Hall tomorrow morning.

The series this year promise to be unusually interesting and brilliant, for there will be the new conductor Mr. Emil Paur, and a marked curiosity will be shown in the musical selections he will make. The first public rehearsal will take place on Friday afternoon, Oct. 13, and the first concert on Saturday, Oct. 14. The same plan for the sale of seats which has been employed in years past will be used and is as follows: The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, tomorrow, at 10 a. m.

The $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, Tuesday, at 10 a. m.

The $12 seats for the concerts will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, on Thursday, at 10 a. m.

The $7.50 seats for the concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place, on Friday, at 10 a. m.

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered at the hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be immediately resold

[12]

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, SEPT 24, 1893.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

THIRTEENTH SEASON, 1893-94.

Auction Sale of $12 Seats for the Friday Afternoon Public Rehearsals at Music Hall Tomorrow (Monday), Beginning at 10 o'clock.

Auction Sale of $7.50 Seats for Rehearsals, Tuesday, Sept. 26, at 10 A. M.
Auction Sale of 12.00 Seats for Concerts, Thursday, Sept. 28, at 10 A. M.
Auction Sale of 7.50 Seats for Concerts, Friday, Sept. 29, at 10 A. M.

Symphony Concerts Soon to Begin—The

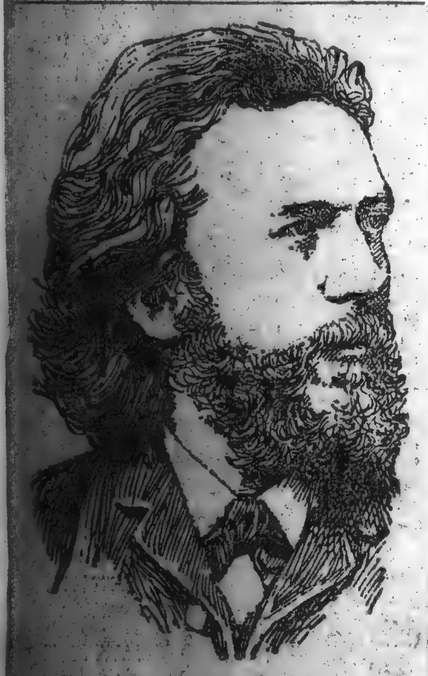
Now that the autumn days have brought back to town most of its musical public a considerable portion of this community eagerly turns its attention to what is to be offered for its entertainment during the winter.

The concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra naturally receive first consideration. No public entertainments inaugurated in this city have ever given more genuine satisfaction, and no organization could have a more loyal clientele than this enterprise has deservedly won. The liberal ideas of the founder of the orchestra, and his determination to present only the best music in the very best way is no doubt the secret of its success.

It is certainly true that no disappointment has been experienced in the past by subscribers to the concerts, and the number of admirers of the organization grows larger each year.

The plans made for the coming season promise the most brilliant year of its existence.

The orchestra enters on its 13th season in better form than ever before after years of training under its able conductors. Mr Emil Paur of Leipzic, who will assume the artistic direction of the concerts, is a young man who has his spurs to win, so far as America is concerned, but he comes with a splendid record of success in European cities.



HERR EMIL PAUR.

The professors with whom he studied in Vienna early discovered his preeminent abilities as a conductor and the highest musical authorities of Leipzic, the musicians who have played under him and Boston connoisseurs who have heard him, all agree that the selection of Mr Paur is a wise one.

His catholic tastes, his enthusiam for his art and profound musical knowledge, give promise of the most satisfactory results.

The management has been especially fortunate in securing worthy soloists for the coming concerts. The list is not yet complete, but among the artists who will have a hearing are Mme Lillian Nordica, Mme Emma Eames, Miss Adele Aus der Ohe, Mr Max Heinrich and Mr Plunket Greene.

The sales of season tickets for the 24 public rehearsals, and 24 concerts, will begin at Music Hall tomorrow, when the $12 tickets for the rehearsals will be sold at auction.

The auction sale of $7.50 tickets for the rehearsals will be held on Tuesday and the auction sales of $12 and $7.50 tickets for the concerts will take place on Thursday and Friday, respectively.

The sales will begin each day at 10 o'clock. Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice, and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid.

Intending purchasers will do well to attend the sales personally if possible. Ladies will find no difficulty in making purchases. The ticket brokers report a great number of orders, and there is every indication of the usual demand for seats.

The Kneisel quartet will give eight concerts of chamber music during the season, at Chickering hall.

Emil Paur, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will arrive with his family next week.

—Herr Emil Paur, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, possesses social qualities of the highest order. He is said to anticipate his coming artistic activity in this country with much satis-

---

BOSTON DAILY TRAVELLER

MONDAY, SEPT. 25, 1893.

HIGHEST PRICE $65.

Sale of Symphony Seats at Music Hall This Morning.

The auction sale of $12.50 Symphony Orchestra seats began this morning at 10 o'clock.

At 9 o'clock the doors of Music Hall were opened, and the people slowly began to assemble. Towards 10 o'clock the carriages began to land their freight at the door, and as the auctioneer took the platform to make his opening speech of explanation of the nature of the sale, about 500 people were in the hall.

The tickets were sold in order and not by the old system that the highest bidder had the choice of seats. The new arrangement seemed to work very well and the sales were made rapidly.

The first seat went to Mr. Barr of the Custom House at a premium of $14. Mr. Newhall of Lynn, the well known shoe and leather man, got the next two at a premium of $13.

The premiums increased after the sale of the front row so that the average price for the first 10 rows was between $25 and $35. Not all the seats in this space, however, brought as high as the average, one enterprising young woman securing four good sittings at a premium of 13.50. The very next seats to these brought $19, and the next bid was $37.

So the prices fluctuated. Some of the bidders were nervous and failed to purchase to the best advantage. Others becoming piqued at the bids of a rival, ran up the price to a good figure simply for the sake of not being outdone.

Bids by women were not infrequent. One lady caused a slight ripple of laughter by her failure to comprehend just what she was doing. She had bid $20, and the auctioneer knocked them down to her. She made no movement, did not give her name, and looked dazed. Somewhat irritated, the auctioneer said: "Did you bid $20? Well, I knocked 'em down to you. How many do you take?" The lady recovered her presence of mind and replied: "Four," which she went forward and paid for.

Connelly, the ticket agent at the Adams House, bought a good many seats, and up to 12 o'clock had paid the highest price, which was $65.

After getting their seats, people as a rule left the hall. Others were coming in continually, however, so that the sale went on briskly.

Not a few well-known society people did their own bidding. Others were represented by their clerks or by agents. It was noticeable that Nos. 8 and 9 in H," which have always been Mrs. "Jack" Gardner's seats, were crossed with the blue mark before the sale began, so that those who expected a lively time over those seats were disappointed.

The sale of $7.50 rehearsal tickets takes place tomorrow, and on Thursday and Friday the Saturday night tickets will be sold.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 25, 1893.

SYMPHONY TICKET SALES.

Patrons of the Symphony concerts are reminded that the auction sales of season tickets will begin this morning at Music Hall. The $12 tickets for the public rehearsals only will be sold to-day. The $7 50 tickets for the rehearsals will be sold to-morrow, and the Saturday evening concert tickets on Thursday and Friday. The sales begin each day at 10 o'clock. The announcements already made in regard to the coming season have excited great interest, and a large attendance is expected.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

MONDAY MORNING, SEPT. 25, 1893.

SYMPHONY TICKET SALES.

Beginning this morning at 10 o'clock the annual auction sale of $12 season tickets for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals will begin in Music Hall. On Tuesday the $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold, and on Thursday and Friday the concert seats.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

TUESDAY MORNING, SEPT. 26, 1893.

THE SYMPHONY SALE.

Satisfactory Average Prices and a Large Attendance.

The loss which speculators suffered last year greatly influenced the bidding yesterday at the sale of seats for the rehearsals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Many more individual buyers, however, were present. The average prices were fully as satisfactory as usual.

The sale was of the $12 seats, and all bids were for the premium above that price. As a new conductor is to lead the orchestra this year, whose reputation as yet is only established to the musical people of Boston and not to many patrons of Symphony rehearsals, who go as a matter of good form, it was interesting to see how the prices would compare with those paid last year. The highest price paid was $66, three seats being bought on the right aisle in row K for that amount.

Eight seats were bought for the Welds, four in row H, on the right aisle, for $37 a seat, and four one row back for $65. Mrs. John L. Gardner bought her customary seats in G at a premium of $45, and those directly across the aisle from her sold for $47.

Last year a man paid over $300 for the "privilege," it is said, of occupying the seat nearest those of Mrs. Gardner.

The prices varied extraordinarily, the differences between the prices paid for seats next to each other often being ridiculous.

The bidding began at first rather slowly, the first seat sold, No. 1, in A, bringing $14. Other seats in that row sold from $10 to $19, the former price being the lowest premium paid during the early sale. In row B, the extreme right end seat sold for $11, but others brought as high as $33. A single seat in the next row brought $39, and in row D two seats sold for $45 premium each. For six or eight rows now the prices bid averaged quite a little higher, though an end seat in row F brought only $16. The seats at the ends of rows G, H, I and J averaged about $21, some of them selling, however, much higher. In row L two seats sold for $15, and the next two to them for $44. From $14 to $54 were paid for seats in this row, and in the row back of this not less than $16, and as high as $55.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, SEPT. 25, 1893.

SYMPHONY TICKET SALES.

The announcements made regarding the thirteenth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have aroused a widespread interest in the coming concerts of the organization and a large attendance is expected at the auction sales of season tickets which begin this morning at Music Hall. The $12 tickets for the public rehearsals only will be sold today. The $7 50 tickets for the rehearsals will be sold tomorrow and the Saturday evening concert seats on Thursday and Friday. The sales begin each day at 10 o'clock.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

THIRTEENTH SEASON.

AUCTION SALE OF $12 SEATS FOR THE FRIDAY AFTERNOON PUBLIC REHEARSALS AT MUSIC HALL, THIS (MONDAY) MORNING, AT 10 O'CLOCK, CONTINUING THROUGH THE DAY.

Auction sale of $7.50 seats for Friday Afternoon Public Rehearsals tomorrow (Tuesday.) Auction Sale of $12 Seats for Concerts, Thursday, Sept. 28. Auction Sale of $7.50 Seats for Concerts, Friday, Sept. 29. 1t&

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

TUESDAY MORNING, SEPT. 26, 1893.

SALE OF SYMPHONY CONCERT SEATS.

At Music Hall yesterday occurred the sale of the Symphony seats for the Friday afternoon rehearsals.

Auctioneer Jackson had his hands full, as the seats went off briskly.

The speculators did not buy so many as last year, but they got possession of a big number. Agents Connelly and Herrick bought a lot, acting for a good many people who prefer to have their purchasing done through agents to getting the publicity themselves.

Mrs. J. L. Gardner was on hand, looking as charming as ever in a modest dark gown, and captured four seats in "G" for the low price of $44 each.

As this is only the premium, her seats cost her just $56. All seats were $12 apiece, with the bid added.

An agent for "Mrs. Weld" got eight seats, four in "I" and four two rows back, for $65 each. This was the largest sum bid.

The lowest sum bid was $10, which was what "A-32" brought. Several in the first row brought from $10 to $13.

A great many seats brought in the neighborhood of $50, but few climbed into the sixties.

One young fellow patiently waited, bidding and bidding, but always stopping at just $38. At last, however, he captured the prize, and got "9-P" at his figure, which with the regular price, made his symphony expenses for the season just $50.

Henry Hyde, Asa Potter's friend, got a couple of good seats after some bidding.

A little girl in blue, after waiting a good while, got an end seat for $14, a very reasonable figure.

Taken all in all the sale was a good one, and very successful.

The sale of $7 50 seats will take place at 10 A.M. today.

BOSTON DAILY TRAVELLER

SATURDAY, SEPT. 23, 1893.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Sales of Symphony Seats—Mr. Gullmant's Recitals.

On Monday morning at 10 o'clock the sale of the $12 seats for the symphony rehearsals will begin at Music Hall. The tickets will be sold at auction, and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. To those unacquainted with these sales it may be mentioned that the seats are sold in their regular order and not from choice, and a large diagram is erected on the stage showing the exact location of each seat.

The $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold on Tuesday morning, Sept. 26, at 10 A.M. The sale of the $12 concert seats and the $7.50 concert seats will take place at 10 o'clock on the mornings of Thursday, Sept. 28, and Friday, Sept. 29, respectively. It has become the custom now for ladies to go to these sales and bid upon the seats; consequently any lady wishing to get the advantage of the sale at first hand should feel perfectly at liberty to attend, and thus save the extra expense of a speculator's commission. Mr. Jackson, the auctioneer, is particularly clear in his announcements, and attentive to the bidder, making it a very comfortable matter for those even unacquainted with auction sales to follow him and secure their choice.

The interest of the public, judging from every indication, will be quite as great this season as during any of the past seasons. The numerous inquiries of patrons at the Music Hall office have convinced Manager Elles and his staff that the public is more eager than ever to attend these concerts, and that the bidding upon the seats will be as lively as ever before. The fact that we are to have a new conductor, and that Mr. Paur is undoubtedly an able and enthusiastic leader, will no doubt excite an extra interest. So our readers will see that it is advisable to be on hand and secure their seats at the earliest opportunity. It must be remembered that the tickets are delivered in the hall and must be paid for as soon as bought, otherwise they will be immediately resold.

[13]

Boston Journal.
TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 26, 1893.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

THIRTEENTH SEASON.

AUCTION SALE OF $7.50 SEATS FOR THE FRIDAY AFTERNOON PUBLIC REHEARSALS AT MUSIC HALL, THIS (TUESDAY) MORNING, AT 10 O'CLOCK, CONTINUING THROUGH THE DAY.

Auction Sale of $12 Seats for Concerts, Thursday, Sept. 28. Auction Sale of $7.50 Seats for Concerts, Friday, Sept. 29.
1t sep26

ONLY $66 PREMIUM.

That Was the Highest Price at the Symphony Sale—Premiums Nowhere Near Last Year's.

The twelve-dollar seats for the 24 public rehearsals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra were disposed of Monday, and, considering the average price paid for a single seat, the result, affected to a great extent by Auctioneer Jackson's persuasiveness and by the rivalry of a few speculators, can be said to be better than was expected. The prices, representing the premium paid on each seat, varied extraordinarily, the difference between the prices paid for seats next to each other often being ridiculous.

Mr. Jackson called for a bid on seat No. 1 of row A promptly at 10 o'clock, and two minutes later the seat was sold for $14. Perhaps these corner seats are not very desirable, for the people, rather more numerous than usual, responded slowly. The lowest premium of the morning was paid on Seat No. 32 of the first row, a seat to the extreme left. The premium paid was $10. But after this the people began to watch one another more closely. In a seat in row L, at the corner of the second aisle to the right, sat Mrs. "Jack" Gardner, engaged alternately in conversing with the young lady to her left, and in watching the auctioneer; and she herself was the watched of all. But she was biding her time, and took no active interest in the bidding until the first few rows of seats were entirely sold. A few seats in the middle of rows C and D brought good premiums, $45 or so. The seats in the middle of row F finally attracted her attention. A bid of $25 was quickly augmented, and alternately with some one who sat at the extreme left, Mrs. Gardner raised her programme. At $45 she indicated her bid more slowly, and when it was her turn to bid—it would have been $48—she did not respond to the call.

The seats directly behind, in row G, numbered 14, 15, 16, 17, went to her at a premium of $45 on each seat. The bidding thereafter, singularly enough, became livelier, but the interest of the curious was centered in the purchase of the seats behind, in row H. No one paid such premiums on seats in this select vicinity as were paid last year, however. Mrs. Weld, the widow of the ex-Commodore of the Eastern Yacht Club, procured, through her agent, the four seats behind at a premium of $37 on each seat. Last year a man paid over $300 for the privilege—privilege, it is said—of occupying the seat nearest those of Mrs. Gardner. Mrs. Weld's agent also bought the four seats in the next row back, row I, and on these he paid a premium of $65.

There were no distractions after this. Mrs. Gardner left the hall, and so did Mrs. Weld's agent, and all the liveliness became confined to the two arch speculators, Mr. Connelly and Mr. Herrick. Mr. Connelly's agent would want a particular seat, and Mr. Herrick not infrequently had his eye on it, too. They would bid until it looked as if something exciting might result, but a hurried consultation of the two generally effected a quiet settlement.

As the sale progressed the people began to run around more and more. A few evidently thought it delightful to worry others who were so unfortunate as to occupy the seats which the few had secured possession of. And some times, if the worrying failed, the few were so bold as to show by certain signs which could not fail to attract the attention of those who occupied the seats, that there were a number of unoccupied places in the hall, and that these—generally indicated by a loudly whispered, "I wish we could sit in our seats," or something equally suggestive—were especially desirable. When possession was gotten the happy purchasers settled themselves comfortably and gazed about, no doubt wondering who would sit here and who would sit there. One young lady, faultlessly though somewhat severely dressed, sat in a seat two rows in front of that temporarily occupied by a Journal man, the possession of which she had diplomatically essayed to get for quite a while. She let her eyelids gently shut out her vision, and listening or musing, began to smile. Nothing seemed to disturb her, and her smile, ecstatic perhaps, never lessened. The dream must have been delicious. She may have reflected on past enjoyments, or have imagined pleasures to come. Her release from the dream power was so sudden that Mr. Jackson missed a bid from some one in the other side of the hall.

Mr. Connelly's agent bought three seats at a premium of $66, and this premium was the highest recorded up to the early afternoon recess. A very fair average price was paid for seats in the middle of the hall.

The sale ended about half-past four. Thirty or forty seats under the balcony were not sold, though the premiums got as low as 50 cents. The seats left over may be reserved for sale singly at $1 50 apiece, or they may be offered to the public for their value as season tickets, $12.

Manager Ellis is quite satisfied with yesterday's sale. "Of course," he said to a Journal man, "no such awful premiums as last year's were paid, but the bidding started higher."

To-day the $7 50 rehearsal seats will be sold. The sale begins at 10 o'clock.

Boston Evening Record.
SEPTEMBER 25, Mon.

MRS. JACK WAS THERE.

At Music Hall this afternoon occurred the sale of the Symphony seats for the Friday afternoon rehearsals.

Auctioneer Jackson had his hands full, as the seats went off like hot cakes.

The speculators did not buy so many as last year, but they got possession of a big number. Agents Connelly and Herrick bought a lot, acting for a good many people who prefer to have their purchasing done through agents to getting the publicity themselves.

Mrs. Jack Gardner was on hand, looking as charming as ever in a modest dark gown, and captured four seats in "G" for the low price of $44.

As this is only the premium, her seats cost her just $56. All seats were $12 apiece, with the bid added.

An agent for "Mrs. Weld" got eight seats, four in "I" and four two rows back, for $65 each. This was the largest sum bid.

The lowest sum bid was $10, which was what "A-32" brought. Several in the first row brought from $10 to $13.

A great many seats brought in the neighborhood of $50, but few climbed into the sixties.

One young fellow patiently waited, bidding and bidding, but always stopping at just $38. At last, however, he captured the prize, and got "9-P" at his figure, which with the regular price, made his symphony expenses for the season just $50.

Henry Hyde, Asa Potter's friend, got a couple of good seats after some bidding.

A little girl in blue, after waiting a good while, got an end seat for $14, a very reasonable figure.

One woman when Auctioneer Jackson requested an opening bid, promptly held up her hand. That's all right a little later in the game, but it really is a bit indefinite when no bids have been made.

Taken all in all today's sale was a good one, and very successful.

Boston Daily Globe.
MONDAY, SEPT. 25.

SYMPHONY SEATS SOLD.

Bidding Not Very Sharp Today—Speculators Got Some Large Blocks at Comparatively Low Figures.

The auction sale of $12 season tickets for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals of the Boston symphony orchestra began at 10 a m in Music hall today.

There was a large crown present, but at no time was the bidding spirited nor the competition very keen.

The highest price paid this year was $65 for four seats in the centre of I, bought by an agent for a Mrs Weld, as against $380 for a single seat last year, the highest price.

The best seats in the hall brought from $40 to $55, and there were many good seats sold for $15, $20 and $25.

Contrary to her usual custom, Mrs Jack Gardner was present and bought a block of four seats, 14, 15, 16 and 17 in G, paying but $44 premium. She bid on seats in F, but they brought $46 and were knocked down to some one else.

The scale of prices was very erratic.

For instance, 21 to 20 in F, right next to the seats which brought the highest prices of the morning, $65, sold for the comparatively small premium of $28. All the end seats went cheap, averaging from $14 to $21.

A 2, the first seat sold this morning brought $14, and the lowest price of the morning was A 32, which only brought $10.

The speculators were on hand and many blocks of seats were bought by them at low figures.

BOSTON EVENING RECORD.
SEPTEMBER 26, Tuesday.

SALE OF SYMPHONY CONCERT SEATS.

At Music Hall yesterday occurred the sale of the Symphony seats for the Friday afternoon rehearsals.

Auctioneer Jackson had his hands full, as the seats went off briskly.

The speculators did not buy so many as last year, but they got possession of a big number. Agents Connelly and Herrick bought a lot, acting for a good many people who prefer to have their purchasing done through agents to getting the publicity themselves.

Mrs. J. L. Gardner was on hand, looking as charming as ever in a modest dark gown, and captured four seats in "G" for the low price of $44 each.

As this is only the premium, her seats cost her just $56. All seats were $12 apiece, with the bid added.

An agent for "Mrs. Weld" got eight seats, four in "I" and four two rows back, for $65 each. This was the largest sum bid.

The lowest sum bid was $10, which was what "A-32" brought. Several in the first row brought from $10 to $13.

A great many seats brought in the neighborhood of $50, but few climbed into the sixties.

One young fellow patiently waited, bidding and bidding, but always stopping at just $38. At last, however, he captured the prize, and got "9-P" at his figure, which with the regular price, made his symphony expenses for the season just $50.

Henry Hyde, Asa Potter's friend, got a couple of good seats after some bidding.

A little girl in blue, after waiting a good while, got an end seat for $14, a very reasonable figure.

Taken all in all the sale was a good one, and very successful.

The sale of $7 50 seats will take place at 10 A.M. today.

Boston Transcript
TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 26, 1893.

SYMPHONY SALE CONTINUED.

Premiums for the $7.50 Seats Ranged Low—No Bids for Some Tickets.

This morning the $7.50 seats for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's rehearsals were sold by auction at Music Hall, and the prices bid were pretty low, some seats however selling at as high a premium as $25. The location of these seats was on the floor under the gallery, and in the back rows of the first balcony, some of the seats being as good as any in the hall. The bidding began with the seats under the gallery, the first one sold bringing $3.50 premium. Other seats in this same row sold as high as $10, end seats of course getting the highest prices. In the row back of this the bidding was somewhat lower, and when it came to the next two rows it was hard to get bids of even 25 cents, except on end seats, and many seats went a-begging. The next seats sold were those in the balcony, beginning at the extreme right side in the second row. From 50 cents to $10 was paid for these seats, and places in the third row near the centre of the house brought any where from $13 to $23. On the left hand side of the balcony the same seats, comparatively speaking, brought a somewhat lower price. In the centre of the balcony, six rows back, the seats sold for from $1 to $5 and in the rows behind these sold in some cases as low as fifty cents.

It will therefore be seen that a good many seats are still left in the hands of the management, but it is not yet announced how these will be disposed of or at what time. Few seats were bought this morning by the agents, with the exception of some in the balcony. Here all the agents bought, especially Herrick, Heard and Connolly.

SAINT BOTOLPH.

Address all communications to SAINT BOTOLPH PUBLISHING CO., 130 State Street, Boston, Mass.

☞Remit by express, money order, draft, post-office order or registered letter.

N. E. NEWS COMPANY—WHOLESALE AGENTS.

VOL. 1. 23 SEPT., 1893. No. 18.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Will begin its thirteenth season at Music Hall, on October 14. Both in an artistic sense and considered as a popular attraction, this organization has long held first place among the musical enterprises of this country. Its coming series of performances will excite more than usual interest for many reasons. They will rntroduce a new conductor, who has won high honors in more than one important position in Europe, and who will infuse new blood into the undertaking. The selection of Mr. Emil Paur was made after a careful consideration of the merits of nearly a score of eminent conductors who were available for the place. The position he is to assume is a most difficult one; but Mr. Paur is said to possess abilities which especially qualify him for its duties. He will find at his command an orchestra second to none in the world, and every incentive for the best work of his life. The members of the orchestra, with very few exceptions, will be the same as last year. A notable addition to the first violins will be Mr. Oudricek, formerly concert meister at Prague. Mr. Kneisel will again lead the violins, and will be ably supported by Mr. Loeffler, Mr. Adamowski and the unrivaled section of violinists. Messrs. Svecenski, Schroeder, Goldstein, Mole, Sautet, Goldschmidt, Gutter, Hackebarth, Abloescher, Golde and Luewig will, as before, head their respective departments of the orchestra, and Mr. Schuecker has been re-engaged as harpist. Little can be said about the programs, pending the arrival of Mr. Paur. Negotiations are in progress with many soloists of distinction, and a partial list will be announced later. The sales of season tickets will take place at Music Hall on September 25, 26, 28 and 29, and will be by auction, as usual. The Rehearsal tickets will be sold on Monday and Tuesday, Sept. 25 and 26. The Concert tickets on Thursday and Friday, Sept. 28 and 29.

BOSTON DAILY TRAVELLER
WEDNESDAY, SEPT. 27, 1893.

Musical Notes.

The Town Topics remarks: "Mr. Nikisch, now installed at Buda-Pesth, discloses a lively interest in the future of the B. S. O. His estimate of Mr. Higginson, imparted to most of his intimates, should be given to the Boston public, and not kept for the exclusive edification of Germany." It might be equally interesting to know what Mr. Higginson's estimate of Mr. Nikisch is, and if it was given to the Boston public it might startle some of Mr. Nikisch's former intimates in this city. Considering the sort of an exit that Mr. Nikisch made, it might be well for him to remain silent under the circumstances. There is no doubt concerning the estimate the critical press of Boston have imparted to the public regarding Mr. Nikisch. Neither is there any doubt concerning the estimate that the press and the public both entertain regarding the noble generosity of Mr. Higginson, the benefactor of the public as well as of Mr. Nikisch, if the latter does not appreciate the fact.

The concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York, this season, will be given at Carnegie Hall instead of Chickering Hall as formerly. The latter seats only 1200 while the former has 3000 chairs. As the patronage of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has constantly increased in New York until the Chickering Hall has been overflowed with listeners, this extra room at Carnegie Hall will enable the management to accommodate comfortably the surplus of subscribers, the number of which will be increased as the facility for offering good seating places is improved. It is reported that Damrosch's orchestra will be reduced in numbers this season. This fact will render Mr. Higginson's superb and complete orchestra all the more welcome to the New Yorkers. There is every reason also to hope that the new conductor, Mr. Paur, will prove a great success,—an additional item of consideration.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

BOSTON
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.
WEDNESDAY MORNING, SEPT. 27, '93.

SALE OF SYMPHONY SEATS.

The sale of seats for the symphony concerts was continued yesterday morning. The prices bid were lower than the days before. Some, however, brought a premium of $23.

Few seats were bought by agents, with the exception of some in the balcony.

The bidding began with the seats under the gallery, the first one sold bringing $3.50 premium. Other seats in this same row sold as high as $10, end seats, of course, getting the highest prices. In the row back of this the bidding was somewhat lower, and when it came to the next two rows it was hard to get bids of even 25 cents, except on end seats, and many seats went a-begging. The next seats sold were those in the balcony, beginning at the extreme right side, second row. From 50 cents to $10 was paid for these seats, and places in the third row near the centre of the house brought anywhere from $13 to $23.

Boston Transcript
THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 28, 1893.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

THIRTEENTH SEASON.

AUCTION SALE OF $12 SEATS FOR THE SATURDAY EVENING CONCERTS AT MUSIC HALL TODAY.

AUCTION SALE OF $7.50 SEATS FOR CONCERTS, TOMORROW (FRIDAY).
1t(A)

EXTREMELY LOW PRICES.

Twelve-Dollar Symphony Concert Tickets Sell at Prices Much Below Those of Previous Years.

Although there was a large number of people at the auction sale of the twelve-dollar symphony concert seats this morning, the bidding was exceedingly slow. The prices paid were much lower than in previous years, the highest premium bid being $41 for three end seats in H. The end seats in the right aisle of G, which Mrs. John L. Gardner paid $45 for as rehearsal seats, sold this morning for $29, and this bid illustrates the comparative difference between the rehearsal and concert prices. On the opposite side of the aisle from the seats that brought $29 premium, the price paid was $40; but only eight or ten seats sold at as high a premium as that. End seats at the extreme right and left sold for from $3 to $11 premium, but the prices bid on these seats was very erratic, the left end seat in J selling for $5.50, and the right end in K for $14.

The best seats in the centre of the house were bought for $20 and in several cases these were end seats. The speculators bought in just about the same proportion as at the rehearsal seat auction. No doubt the musical public of Boston is a little uncertain in its opinions concerning the new conductor and the nature of the concerts he will give, and for that reason is holding off, for the time being, from buying the Symphony concert seats.

The $7.50 seats for the Symphony concerts will be sold by auction in Music Hall tomorrow at 10 A. M.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.
FRIDAY MORNING, SEPT. 29, 1893.

THE SYMPHONY SALE.

There was brisk bidding and a good attendance at yesterday's auction sale of tickets, which gives evidence of the widespread interest in the coming symphony concerts. The sale will be continued today at Music Hall, when the $7.50 tickets will be sold. This will be the last chance to secure season tickets for these entertainments.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
FRIDAY MORNING, SEPT. 29, 1893.

SALE OF SYMPHONY TICKETS.

There was a large attendance and lively bidding at yesterday's auction sale of tickets for the Saturday evening Symphony concerts. The sale will be continued at Music Hall today, beginning at 10 o'clock, when the $7 50 concert tickets will be sold. This will be the last opportunity to secure season tickets for these popular entertainments. Conductor Paur arrived in New York yesterday and is expected in Boston today.

[14]

Boston Journal.
TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 26, 1893.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

THIRTEENTH SEASON.

AUCTION SALE OF $7.50 SEATS FOR THE FRIDAY AFTERNOON PUBLIC REHEARSALS AT MUSIC HALL, THIS (TUESDAY) MORNING, AT 10 O'CLOCK, CONTINUING THROUGH THE DAY.

Auction Sale of $12 Seats for Concerts, Thursday, Sept. 28. Auction Sale of $7.50 Seats for Concerts, Friday, Sept. 29.
1t sep26

ONLY $66 PREMIUM.

That Was the Highest Price at the Symphony Sale—Premiums Nowhere Near Last Year's.

The twelve-dollar seats for the 24 public rehearsals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra were disposed of Monday, and, considering the average price paid for a single seat, the result, affected to a great extent by Auctioneer Jackson's persuasiveness and by the rivalry of a few speculators, can be said to be better than was expected. The prices, representing the premium paid on each seat, varied extraordinarily, the difference between the prices paid for seats next to each other often being ridiculous.

Mr. Jackson called for a bid on seat No. 1 of row A promptly at 10 o'clock, and two minutes later the seat was sold for $14. Perhaps these corner seats are not very desirable, for the people, rather more numerous than usual, responded slowly. The lowest premium of the morning was paid on Seat No. 32 of the first row, a seat to the extreme left. The premium paid was $10. But after this the people began to watch one another more closely. In a seat in row L, at the corner of the second aisle to the right, sat Mrs. "Jack" Gardner, engaged alternately in conversing with the young lady to her left, and in watching the auctioneer; and she herself was the watched of all. But she was biding her time, and took no active interest in the bidding until the first few rows of seats were entirely sold. A few seats in the middle of rows C and D brought good premiums, $45 or so. The seats in the middle of row F finally attracted her attention. A bid of $25 was quickly augmented, and alternately with some one who sat at the extreme left, Mrs. Gardner raised her programme. At $45 she indicated her bid more slowly, and when it was her turn to bid—it would have been $48—she did not respond to the call.

The seats directly behind, in row G, numbered 14, 15, 16, 17, went to her at a premium of $45 on each seat. The bidding thereafter, singularly enough, became livelier, but the interest of the curious was centered in the purchase of the seats behind, in row H. No one paid such premiums on seats in this select vicinity as were paid last year, however. Mrs. Weld, the widow of the ex-Commodore of the Eastern Yacht Club, procured, through her agent, the four seats behind at a premium of $37 on each seat. Last year a man paid over $300 for the privilege—privilege, it is said—of occupying the seat nearest those of Mrs. Gardner. Mrs. Weld's agent also bought the four seats in the next row back, row I, and on these he paid a premium of $65.

There were no distractions after this. Mrs. Gardner left the hall, and so did Mrs. Weld's agent, and all the liveliness became confined to the two arch speculators, Mr. Connelly and Mr. Herrick. Mr. Connelly's agent would want a particular seat, and Mr. Herrick not infrequently had his eye on it, too. They would bid until it looked as if something exciting might result, but a hurried consultation of the two generally effected a quiet settlement.

As the sale progressed the people began to run around more and more. A few evidently thought it delightful to worry others who were so unfortunate as to occupy the seats which the few had secured possession of. And some times, if the worrying failed, the few were so bold as to show by certain signs which could not fail to attract the attention of those who occupied the seats, that there were a number of unoccupied places in the hall, and that these—generally indicated by a loudly whispered, "I wish we could sit in our seats," or something equally suggestive—were especially desirable. When possession was gotten the happy purchasers settled themselves comfortably and gazed about, no doubt wondering who would sit here and who would sit there. One young lady, faultlessly though somewhat severely dressed, sat in a seat two rows in front of that temporarily occupied by a Journal man, the possession of which she had diplomatically essayed to get for quite a while. She let her eyelids gently shut out her vision, and listening or musing, began to smile. Nothing seemed to disturb her, and her smile, ecstatic perhaps, never lessened. The dream must have been delicious. She may have reflected on past enjoyments, or have imagined pleasures to come. Her release from the dream power was so sudden that Mr. Jackson missed a bid from some one in the other side of the hall.

Mr. Connelly's agent bought three seats at a premium of $66, and this premium was the highest recorded up to the early afternoon recess. A very fair average price was paid for seats in the middle of the hall.

The sale ended about half-past four. Thirty or forty seats under the balcony were not sold, though the premiums got as low as 50 cents. The seats left over may be reserved for sale singly at $1 50 apiece, or they may be offered to the public for their value as season tickets, $12.

Manager Ellis is quite satisfied with yesterday's sale. "Of course," he said to a Journal man, "no such awful premiums as last year's were paid, but the bidding started higher."

To-day the $7 50 rehearsal seats will be sold. The sale begins at 10 o'clock.

BOSTON EVENING RECORD.
SEPTEMBER 25,

MRS. JACK WAS THERE.

At Music Hall this afternoon occurred the sale of the Symphony seats for the Friday afternoon rehearsals.

Auctioneer Jackson had his hands full, as the seats went off like hot cakes.

The speculators did not buy so many as last year, but they got possession of a big number. Agents Connelly and Herrick bought a lot, acting for a good many people who prefer to have their purchasing done through agents to getting the publicity themselves.

Mrs. Jack Gardner was on hand, looking as charming as ever in a modest dark gown, and captured four seats in "G" for the low price of $44.

As this is only the premium, her seats cost her just $56. All seats were $12 apiece, with the bid added.

An agent for "Mrs. Weld" got eight seats, four in "I" and four two rows back, for $65 each. This was the largest sum bid.

The lowest sum bid was $10, which was what "A-32" brought. Several in the first row brought from $10 to $13.

A great many seats brought in the neighborhood of $50, but few climbed into the sixties.

One young fellow patiently waited, bidding and bidding, but always stopping at just $38. At last, however, he captured the prize, and got "9-P" at his figure, which with the regular price, made his symphony expenses for the season just $50.

Henry Hyde, Asa Potter's friend, got a couple of good seats after some bidding.

A little girl in blue, after waiting a good while, got an end seat for $14, a very reasonable figure.

One woman when Auctioneer Jackson requested an opening bid, promptly held up her hand. That's all right a little later in the game, but it really is a bit indefinite when no bids have been made.

Taken all in all today's sale was a good one, and very successful.

Boston Daily Globe.
MONDAY, SEPT. 25.

SYMPHONY SEATS SOLD.

Bidding Not Very Sharp Today—Speculators Got Some Large Blocks at Comparatively Low Figures.

The auction sale of $12 season tickets for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals of the Boston symphony orchestra began at 10 a m in Music hall today.

There was a large crown present, but at no time was the bidding spirited nor the competition very keen.

The highest price paid this year was $65 for four seats in the centre of I, bought by an agent for a Mrs Weld, as against $380 for a single seat last year, the highest price.

The best seats in the hall brought from $40 to $55, and there were many good seats sold for $15, $20 and $25.

Contrary to her usual custom, Mrs Jack Gardner was present and bought a block of four seats, 14, 15, 16 and 17 in G, paying but $44 premium. She bid on seats in F, but they brought $46 and were knocked down to some one else.

The scale of prices was very erratic.

For instance, 21 to 20 in P, right next to the seats which brought the highest prices of the morning, $65, sold for the comparatively small premium of $28. All the end seats went cheap, averaging from $14 to $21.

A 2, the first seat sold this morning brought $14, and the lowest price of the morning was A 32, which only brought $10.

The speculators were on hand and many blocks of seats were bought by them at low figures.

BOSTON EVENING RECORD.
SEPTEMBER 26,

SALE OF SYMPHONY CONCERT SEATS.

At Music Hall yesterday occurred the sale of the Symphony seats for the Friday afternoon rehearsals.

Auctioneer Jackson had his hands full, as the seats went off briskly.

The speculators did not buy so many as last year, but they got possession of a big number. Agents Connelly and Herrick bought a lot, acting for a good many people who prefer to have their purchasing done through agents to getting the publicity themselves.

Mrs. J. L. Gardner was on hand, looking as charming as ever in a modest dark gown, and captured four seats in "G" for the low price of $44 each.

As this is only the premium, her seats cost her just $56. All seats were $12 apiece, with the bid added.

An agent for "Mrs. Weld" got eight seats, four in "I" and four two rows back, for $65 each. This was the largest sum bid.

The lowest sum bid was $10, which was what "A-32" brought. Several in the first row brought from $10 to $13.

A great many seats brought in the neighborhood of $50, but few climbed into the sixties.

One young fellow patiently waited, bidding and bidding, but always stopping at just $38. At last, however, he captured the prize, and got "9-P" at his figure, which with the regular price, made his symphony expenses for the season just $50.

Henry Hyde, Asa Potter's friend, got a couple of good seats after some bidding.

A little girl in blue, after waiting a good while, got an end seat for $14, a very reasonable figure.

Taken all in all the sale was a good one, and very successful.

The sale of $7 50 seats will take place at 10 A.M. today.

Boston Transcript
TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 26, 1893.

SYMPHONY SALE CONTINUED.

Premiums for the $7.50 Seats Ranged Low—No Bids for Some Tickets.

This morning the $7.50 seats for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's rehearsals were sold by auction at Music Hall, and the prices bid were pretty low, some seats however selling at as high a premium as $23. The location of these seats was on the floor under the gallery, and in the back rows of the first balcony, some of the seats being as good as any in the hall. The bidding began with the seats under the gallery, the first one sold bringing $3.50 premium. Other seats in this same row sold as high as $10, end seats of course getting the highest prices. In the row back of this the bidding was somewhat lower, and when it came to the next two rows it was hard to get bids of even 25 cents, except on end seats, and many seats went a-begging. The next seats sold were those in the balcony, beginning at the extreme right side in the second row. From 50 cents to $10 was paid for these seats, and places in the third row near the centre of the house brought any where from $13 to $23. On the left hand side of the balcony the same seats, comparatively speaking, brought a somewhat lower price. In the centre of the balcony, six rows back, the seats sold for from $1 to $5 and in the rows behind these sold in some cases as low as fifty cents.

It will therefore be seen that a good many seats are still left in the hands of the management, but it is not yet announced how these will be disposed of or at what time. Few seats were bought this morning by the agents, with the exception of some in the balcony. Here all the agents bought, especially Herrick, Heard and Connolly.

SAINT BOTOLPH.

Address all communications to SAINT BOTOLPH PUBLISHING CO., 130 State Street, Boston, Mass.

☞Remit by express, money order, draft, post-office order or registered letter.

N. E. NEWS COMPANY—WHOLESALE AGENTS.

VOL. 1. 23 SEPT., 1893. No. 18.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Will begin its thirteenth season at Music Hall, on October 14. Both in an artistic sense and considered as a popular attraction, this organization has long held first place among the musical enterprises of this country. Its coming series of performances will excite more than usual interest for many reasons. They will rntroduce a new conductor, who has won high honors in more than one important position in Europe, and who will infuse new blood into the undertaking. The selection of Mr. Emil Paur was made after a careful consideration of the merits of nearly a score of eminent conductors who were available for the place. The position he is to assume is a most difficult one; but Mr. Paur is said to possess abilities which especially qualify him for its duties. He will find at his command an orchestra second to none in the world, and every incentive for the best work of his life. The members of the orchestra, with very few exceptions, will be the same as last year. A notable addition to the first violins will be Mr. Oudricek, formerly concert meister at Prague. Mr. Kneisel will again lead the violins, and will be ably supported by Mr. Loeffler, Mr. Adamowski and the unrivaled section of violinists. Messrs. Svecenski, Schroeder, Goldstein, Mole, Sautet, Goldschmidt, Gutter, Hackebarth, Abloescher, Golde and Luewig will, as before, head their respective departments of the orchestra, and Mr. Schuecker has been re-engaged as harpist. Little can be said about the programs, pending the arrival of Mr. Paur. Negotiations are in progress with many soloists of distinction, and a partial list will be announced later. The sales of season tickets will take place at Music Hall on September 25, 26, 28 and 29, and will be by auction, as usual. The Rehearsal tickets will be sold on Monday and Tuesday, Sept. 25 and 26. The Concert tickets on Thursday and Friday, Sept. 28 and 29.

BOSTON DAILY TRAVELLER
WEDNESDAY, SEPT. 27, 1893.

Musical Notes.

The Town Topics remarks: "Mr. Nikisch, now installed at Buda-Pesth, discloses a lively interest in the future of the B. S. O. His estimate of Mr. Higginson, imparted to most of his intimates, should be given to the Boston public, and not kept for the exclusive edification of Germany." It might be equally interesting to know what Mr. Higginson's estimate of Mr. Nikisch is, and if it was given to the Boston public it might startle some of Mr. Nikisch's former intimates in this city. Considering the sort of an exit that Mr. Nikisch made, it might be well for him to remain silent under the circumstances. There is no doubt concerning the estimate the critical press of Boston have imparted to the public regarding Mr. Nikisch. Neither is there any doubt concerning the estimate that the press and the public both entertain regarding the noble generosity of Mr. Higginson, the benefactor of the public as well as of Mr. Nikisch, if the latter does not appreciate the fact.

The concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York, this season, will be given at Carnegie Hall instead of Chickering Hall as formerly. The latter seats only 1200 while the former has 3000 chairs. As the patronage of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has constantly increased in New York until the Chickering Hall has been overflowed with listeners, this extra room at Carnegie Hall will enable the management to accommodate comfortably the surplus of subscribers, the number of which will be increased as the facility for offering good seating places is improved. It is reported that Mr. Damrosch's orchestra will be reduced in numbers this season. This fact will render Mr. Higginson's superb and complete orchestra all the more welcome to the New Yorkers. There is every reason also to hope that the new conductor, Mr. Paur, will prove a great success,—an additional item of consideration.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.
WEDNESDAY MORNING, SEPT. 27, '93.

SALE OF SYMPHONY SEATS.

The sale of seats for the symphony concerts was continued yesterday morning. The prices bid were lower than the day before. Some, however, brought a premium of $23.

Few seats were bought by agents, with the exception of some in the balcony.

The bidding began with the seats under the gallery, the first one sold bringing $3.50 premium. Other seats in this same row sold as high as $10, end seats, of course, getting the highest prices. In the row back of this the bidding was somewhat lower, and when it came to the next two rows it was hard to get bids of even 25 cents, except on end seats, and many seats went a-begging. The next seats sold were those in the balcony, beginning at the extreme right side, second row. From 50 cents to $10 was paid for these seats, and places in the third row near the centre of the house brought anywhere from $13 to $23.

Boston Transcript
THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 28, 1893.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

THIRTEENTH SEASON.

AUCTION SALE OF $12 SEATS FOR THE SATURDAY EVENING CONCERTS AT MUSIC HALL TODAY.

AUCTION SALE OF $7.50 SEATS FOR CONCERTS, TOMORROW (FRIDAY).
1t AY

EXTREMELY LOW PRICES.

Twelve-Dollar Symphony Concert Tickets Sell at Prices Much Below Those of Previous Years.

Although there was a large number of people at the auction sale of the twelve-dollar symphony concert seats this morning, the bidding was exceedingly slow. The prices paid were much lower than in previous years, the highest premium bid being $41 for three end seats in H. The end seats in the right aisle of G, which Mrs. John L. Gardner paid $45 for as rehearsal seats, sold this morning for $29, and this bid illustrates the comparative difference between the rehearsal and concert prices. On the opposite side of the aisle from the seats that brought $29 premium, the price paid was $40; but only eight or ten seats sold at as high a premium as that. End seats at the extreme right and left sold for from $3 to $11 premium, but the prices bid on these seats was very erratic, the left end seat in J selling for $5.50, and the right end in K for $14.

The best seats in the centre of the house were bought for $20 and in several cases these were end seats. The speculators bought in just about the same proportion as at the rehearsal seat auction. No doubt the musical public of Boston is a little uncertain in its opinions concerning the new conductor and the nature of the concerts he will give, and for that reason is holding off, for the time being, from buying the Symphony concert seats.

The $7.50 seats for the Symphony concerts will be sold by auction in Music Hall tomorrow at 10 A. M.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.
FRIDAY MORNING, SEPT. 29, 1893.

THE SYMPHONY SALE.

There was brisk bidding and a good attendance at yesterday's auction sale of tickets, which gives evidence of the widespread interest in the coming symphony concerts. The sale will be continued today at Music Hall, when the $7.50 tickets will be sold. This will be the last chance to secure season tickets for these entertainments.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
FRIDAY MORNING, SEPT. 29, 1893.

SALE OF SYMPHONY TICKETS.

There was a large attendance and lively bidding at yesterday's auction sale of tickets for the Saturday evening Symphony concerts. The sale will be continued at Music Hall today, beginning at 10 o'clock, when the $7 50 concert tickets will be sold. This will be the last opportunity to secure season tickets for these popular entertainments. Conductor Paur arrived in New York yesterday and is expected in Boston today.

---

[14]

Boston Journal.

FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 29, 1893.

PAUR ARRIVES.

On Saturday He Will Reach Boston.

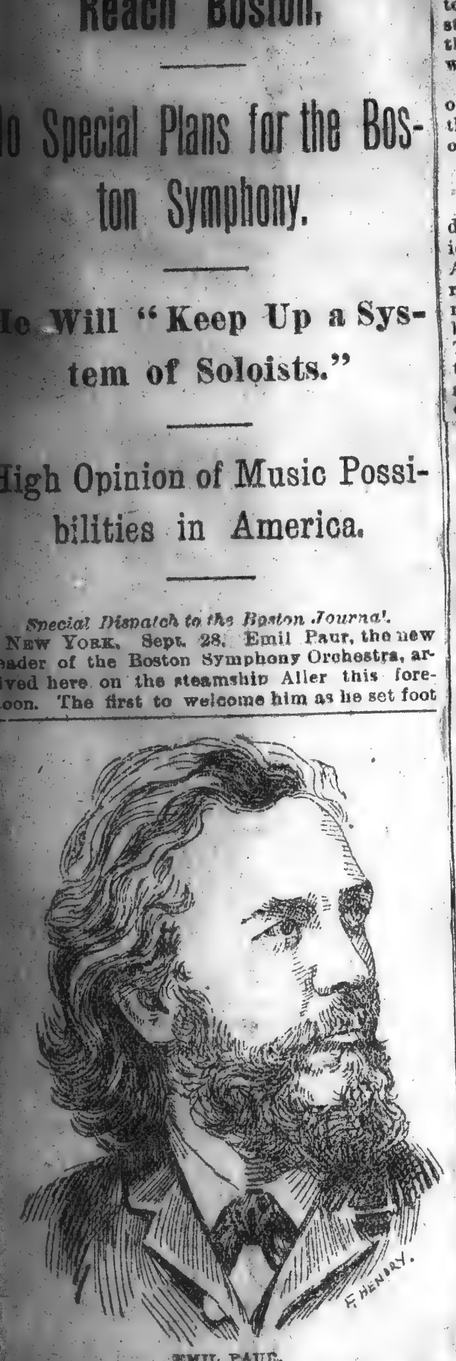
No Special Plans for the Boston Symphony.

He Will "Keep Up a System of Soloists."

High Opinion of Music Possibilities in America.

Special Dispatch to the Boston Journal.

NEW YORK, Sept. 28. Emil Paur, the new leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived here on the steamship Aller this forenoon. The first to welcome him as he set foot



EMIL PAUR.

[The new Conductor of the Symphony Orchestra.]

on American soil was Mr. John Sauerquell, Librarian of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Over 20 years have passed since Mr Sauerquell left Germany, where he had been studying under Mr. Paur's father. The Journal correspondent was standing with Mr. Sauerquell as the big ship slowly swung around the wharf, and witnessed the meeting.

No sooner did they come within hailing distance than the two men recognized each other, despite the 20 years of separation. What a difference there was as the two men stood with clasped hands from 20 years ago. The boy of 16 was now a man known far and wide in the musical world, and had come to America to assume a most important position.

Mrs. Paur stood by her husband's side, with two bright little lads. Mrs. Paur is a dark-eyed, ladylike woman, most unlike the German frau in appearance. The youngest boy resembles his mother in general appearance very much. He appeared to know every man aboard the Aller, from the big captain to the horny-handed. The other boy is a grave, blue-eyed chap.

Mr. Paur Interviewed.

The whole party left at once for the Hoffman House, where the Journal correspondent interviewed Mr. Paur later in the day. He speaks no English, but with the aid of Mr. Sauerquell the newspaper man and Mr. Paur conversed readily. "We had a very good voyage across," said Mr. Paur, answering a question. "The weather was rough and we had several storms, but outside of that everything was very agreeable. My wife was somewhat affected, but has entirely got over the trip. The company was extremely pleasant. I met a number of Americans and found them excellent company."

"Do you propose to live at a hotel in Boston, Mr. Paur, or shall you keep house?"

"Oh, the latter by all means. I have brought over my housekeeper with me. I shall, of course, stay at a hotel for some time, until I can get thoroughly satisfied regarding a suitable residence."

"Regarding your programmes, shall you favor the German school of music?"

"Well, I cannot speak much relative to the programme until I become more acquainted."

"Have you formulated any plans for symphony concerts?"

No Plans Yet.

"No; I have done nothing in that direction. I must wait and see what material can be had before I do anything in that direction."

"Shall you keep up a system of soloists with the orchestra, Mr. Paur?"

"Yes; I shall certainly keep that up. I will introduce that feature every other performance or so. I shall put on only soloists that are really soloists. You know what I mean. They must be capable. The soloists must be classical, too, you know. I do not believe in putting before the public small stuff, not at all."

"In directing, do you use notes or direct [illegible] them?"

pieces that I know by heart, and these I direct without them. I shall make no changes at once in the orchestra. They will follow after I know the strength of every member."

"Have you any decided opinion upon the number of instruments that should constitute the full complement for an orchestra?"

"That depends entirely upon the size of the hall. I could form an opinion on any certain hall after seeing it, but of course not otherwise."

"How do you compare German musicians with French or American?"

"Ah!" said he, smiling, "that is a question I cannot faithfully answer. You see I have never been in America before, and can form but little conception of your musicians, but as to French and German, it is evenly divided. In string instruments the Germans lead, and on the other hand, our French brethren excel with wind instruments."

"Another hard question, 'What do you think of the outlook for music in America; do you think there is a field to develop in American opera?'"

Mr. Paur mused for a moment, then said:

Music in America.

"Yes, I do think there is plenty of field to develop American opera. Of course, my opinion is mainly formed from what I have seen in American papers and clippings sent me at the recent Vienna Exposition. For the first time in my life I heard American music. It was directed by Mr. Adrien of New York. I was delighted. The composition was charming, and I was glad to have the opportunity to personally congratulate Mr. Adrien. I think American opera could be very easily developed here, as I know you have very many talented people in this country."

"Will Mrs. Pauer appear in public? She is a pianist, I believe?"

"Yes; she will appear in that capacity. She is a pupil of Mrs. Essipoff and Leschetitzky."

In answer to a question, he said: "I like any composer who is classical and artistic. I am very fond of classical music."

In conclusion Mr. Paur said: "I am proud to be called to such an important position, and proud to be the head of such a body as the Boston Symphony Orchestra."

Coming to Boston Saturday.

The Journal man hinted that it was the usual custom to propound the question how do you like America to every foreigner who comes to our shores, but in this instance it would be omitted. He laughed heartily; also when something was said about the latest song, "After the Ball," "Annie Rooney" and a few of these "favorites" seemed to be unknown to Mr. Paur. A twinkle in his blue eyes showed that he appreciated the joke, and fearing that he would be asked to sing, the Journal man discreetly bowed his leave.

The picture published with this article is an excellent likeness of Mr. Paur. He is of medium height, stoutly built. His complexion and beard are sandy. His eyes are blue and full of mirth. He is a voluble and ready speaker, although his imperfect knowledge of the English language handicaps him when conversing with an American.

The party, consisting of Mr. Paur, his wife and two boys, with Mr. Sauerquell, will remain in New York until Saturday. They will leave on the 12 o'clock limited for Boston on that day.

EXTREMELY LOW PRICES.

Twelve-Dollar Symphony Concert Tickets Sell at Prices Much Below Those of Previous Years.

Although there was a large number of people at the auction sale of the $12 symphony concert seats on Thursday, the bidding was exceedingly slow. The prices paid were much lower than in previous years, the highest premium bid being $41 for three end seats in H. The end seats in the right aisle of G, which Mrs. John L. Gardner paid $45 for as rehearsal seats, sold on Thursday for $29, and this bid illustrates the comparative difference between the rehearsal and concert prices. On the opposite side of the aisle from the seats that brought $29 premium, the price paid was $40; but only eight or ten seats sold at as high a premium as that. End seats at the extreme right and left sold for from $3 to $11 premium, but the prices bid on these seats was very erratic, the left end seat in J selling for $5 50, and the right end in K for $14.

The best seats in the centre of the house were bought for $20, and in several cases these were end seats. The speculators bought in just about the same proportion as at the rehearsal seat auction. No doubt the musical public of Boston is a little uncertain in its opinions concerning the new conductor and the nature of the concerts he will give, and for that reason is holding off, for the time being, from buying the Symphony concert seats.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCIV. NO. 91.

FRIDAY, SEPT. 29, 1893.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

THIRTEENTH SEASON.

Auction sale of $7.50 seats for the Saturday Evening Concerts at Music Hall this (Friday) morning at 10 o'clock, continuing through the day.

FROM 25 CENTS TO $41.

Concert Seats Sell at Only Moderate Premiums at Music Hall.

There were no crazy spasms at the auction sale of the $12 seats for the Saturday evening concerts in Music Hall yesterday. The premiums were generally sober and reasonable. Some seats went higher than last year, but the average was much lower.

At the opening of the auction there were between 200 and 300 bidders, and more came later. More men were present than at the auction of the rehearsal seats.

Auctioneer Jackson tried to start the sale at $10 for the end seat in slip A, close up to the stage steps, on the Hamilton place side, but all he got was 50 cents; and the bidder, who had no competitors, took two seats. The next two brought $6.50 premium apiece; then they went from $2 to $4 for the rest of the seats in slip A, except the extreme opposite end, which did not get even a 25-cent bid.

In the next slip the seats began at $1 premium, and went up to $14 for one of the middle end seats. These are very poor seats, so near the stage that the sound of the orchestra goes over one's head; and there was more or less quaking in expectation of very high premiums when the good seats were put up.

The middle end seats of slip C brought $13 and $18 respectively; then they went up to $21, $23, $27, $40 and $41 for middle end seats in the successive slips. This was the high water mark. By one of those crotchets characteristic of auctions, the middle end seat directly opposite to the $41 seat went for $20.

After this there was a drop to $32 and $36, when again the opposite middle end seat went for an absurd drop to $23. Slips K, L, M and N brought $36, $25, $23 and $25 for their middle end seats. In slip O the highest premium was only $19, but that was because the best seats in this slip were among the 53 reserved on the floor before the sale.

The highest prices paid for seats in the next slips were $27, $20, $23, $23, $25, and so on back to the balcony posts. The corridor ends of the slips went down by degrees to $8, $5, $3, and even to 50 cents for the left corridor end of slip A A. The seat next to it inside bringing no bid.

The last three rows of the $12 seats back of the cross passage way, brought nothing except one or two end seats and a few in the centre which brought 50 cents. These are by no mens poor seats, especially the first of the three rows, and if they are held for regular box-office sale, for single concerts, the public will gain a good deal from the result of the auction. It has not been decided what will be done with the unsold tickets, of which there are some 200 or more; it will probably be announced in a day or two.

The auction of the floor seats lasted nearly four hours. After a short intermission the first balcony seats were put up. On the Hamilton place side the front row went from $4 to $40. The highest were $40, $38, $29, $26, $27, $26 and $25. The second row on this side brought from $2.50 to $18. On the Winter street side the front row brought from $1 to $30, and the second row $4 to $14.50. The rear balcony, front row, sold from $7.50 to $13, the second and third rows, 25 cents to $25, with no bids for several of the seats. The fourth and last rows went begging almost altogether.

The last sale will take place this morning at 10 o'clock, when the $7.50 seats will be put up.

BOSTON HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 30, 1893

WHAT IS THIS! Symphony tickets not selling at such enormous premiums as formerly? I am surprised, and feel like returning to my callow days, and asking, "why?". Have the fashionables failed to rally, or is it because they have not been "presented to the new conductor, and, really, you know, it would be such bad form," etc. It cannot be because they are unacquainted with his antecedants, for the dailies have told what I should think certainly must constitute nearly all his private affairs. At any rate, I am pleased at the result of the auction, and may the premiums grow beautifully less every year. The concerts were originated that music lovers might educate themselves by hearing good music at low prices, and that is the position to which they should return.

.....

Boston Daily Globe.

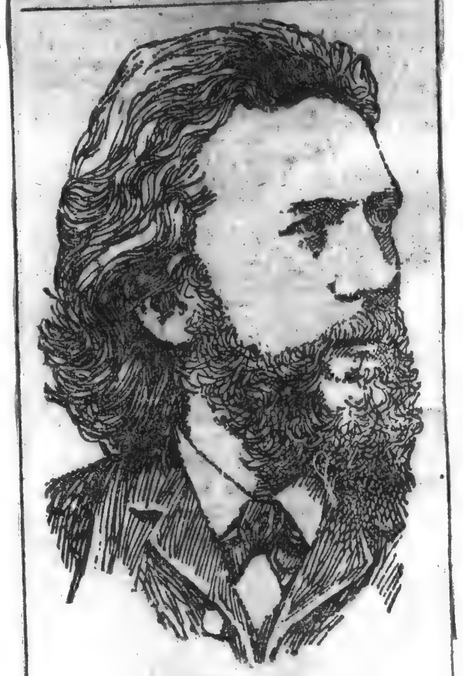
SATURDAY, SEPT. 30.

WILL RETAIN SOLOISTS.

Herr Emil Paur, Leader of the Orchestra, Will Reach Boston Today.

Herr Emil Paur, the new leader of the Symphony orchestra, is expected to arrive in Boston this afternoon.

He reached New York Thursday by the steamer Aller and was accompanied by Mrs Paur and their two sons. The voyage was rather rough, but the party arrived in good health and spirits.



EMIL PAUR.

To a reporter in New York Herr Paur said that he had formulated no plans as yet for the Symphony concerts, but he expected to retain the system of soloists. He would put on only soloists that are really capable.

He would make no immediate changes in the orchestra, he said.

He believed there was a magnificent field for the development of American opera.

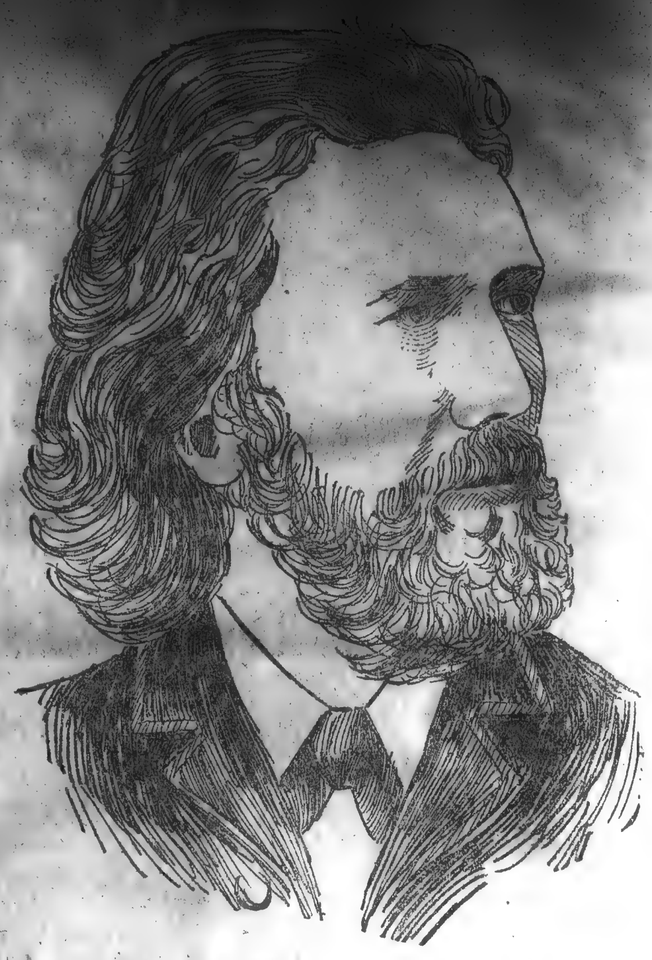
Mrs Paur will appear in public as a pianist. Mr Paur does not speak English. He will make his first public appearance in America at Music hall Oct 14.

Boston Transcript

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 30, 1893.

Emil Paur, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrives in this city today and will begin at once preparations for the coming season. Twenty-nine concerts are to be given on consecutive Saturday evenings from Oct. 14 to April 28, omitting Nov. 11, Dec. 16, Jan. 13, Feb. 10 and March 31. The twenty-nine rehearsals are to be given on consecutive Friday afternoons, from Oct. 13 to April 27, omitting Nov. 10, Dec. 15, Jan. 12, Feb. 9 and March 30.

BOSTON EVENING RECORD
SEPTEMBER, 30, 1893.



HERR PAUR, OF WHOM YOU WILL HEAR ALL THE SYMPHONY GIRLS TALK THIS WINTER.

HERR PAUR.

In directing usually I use notes, but of course there are pieces that I know by heart, and these I direct without them. I shall make no changes at once in the orchestra. They will follow after I know the strength of every member." "What do you think of the outlook for music in America; do you think there is a field to develop in American opera?" "Yes I do; there is plenty of field to develop American opera. I think American opera could be very easily developed here, as I know you have very many talented people in this country." In conclusion Mr. Paur said: "I am proud to be called to such an important position, and proud to be the head of such a body as the Boston Symphony Orchestra." The party, consisting of Mr. Paur, his wife and two boys, with Mr. Sauerquell, will remain in New York today and will leave on the 12 o'clock limited for Boston.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, OCT. 1, 1893.

The German colony in Boston are preparing to give Emil Paur a hearty welcome to their midst, as soon as he has had sufficient time to recover from the effects of his sea voyage. It will be a truly Teutonic welcome, with all the national effusiveness of the sons and daughters of the Fatherland.

* * * * * * * *

This reminds me that the auction sale of Symphony concert seats was somewhat of a surprise. Excellent seats sold at ridiculously low prices. Mrs. John L. Gardner purchased end seats in the right aisle of G for $40. Many society people have deferred buying seats, as they are rather uncertain of the nature of the concerts the new conductor will give.

* * * * * * * *

BOSTON DAILY TRAVELLER

SATURDAY, SEPT. 30, 1893.

The Symphony Sale.

The sale of the seats for the Symphony rehearsals and concerts proved to be quite a satisfactory one to both the management and the buyers. To be sure prices were somewhat lower than last season, but considering the times and financial depression that exists, it must be admitted the premiums obtained were higher than the most sanguine could expect. It is doubtful if any musical undertaking could have commanded at auction so large an attendance and such high premiums as did the sale of the Symphony course.

There is one feature wherein this season's sale differs materially from that of last season, and that is the fact that the buyers all express a feeling of satisfaction with the prices paid for their seats. In other words, the public is satisfied, and as the management is also satisfied, what more equitable conclusion could have been brought about? The speculators have been responsible, in previous seasons, for the very high prices obtained through bidding against the purchasers who came to buy for themselves. But the speculators have got badly bitten the past two seasons, and so, taking this fact and the low financial condition of the public into consideration, they bought only for "orders" intrusted to them at this season's sale.

Herein the public has been the gainer. A new plan for disposal of tickets unsold at the auction has been instituted this season, that is, the remaining tickets will not be sold as season tickets but the places will be retained and sold at each performance in its turn. This will be a great convenience, for it will enable those who cannot go consecutively to avail themselves of the privilege of attending when they can. Strangers, also, visiting the city, can thus gratify their desire to hear our Symphony orchestra. Of course the number of seats to be thus disposed of is limited, and it is said will be sold for $1 and $1.50, according to location, at the Music Hall box office as each performance occurs.

Two of our contemporaries have expressed the opinion in their columns that the probable reason for the lower prices this season existed in the fact that the public was a little uncertain concerning the new conductor and the nature of the concerts he will give.

Nothing could be more ridiculous than such a conclusion. When Mr. Gericke came here he was almost wholly unknown; so obscure was his reputation not ten people in the whole city knew anything of his ability or intentions. It was the same with Mr. Nikisch, of whom it was only known that he was an operatic conductor in Leipsic, a second-rate city in musical importance upon the continent.

As regards Mr. Paur it must be admitted our public know more more of his standing than of his predecessors, both as regards his ability as a conductor and also as an eminent pianist with an enviable reputation throughout Germany. More than that, the best reports have reached us of his marked success in the half dozen or more positions he has held upon the continent, all tending to the impression that he is not only a fine musician, a strict disciplinarian and a magnetic conductor, but that he is as well a musician of broad catholic taste, unpartisan in the nationality of composers, a man of culture in the broad sense, and at the same time a genial and courteous gentleman. We have little or no reason to doubt the reliability of these favorable reports concerning Mr. Paur, hence the folly of the statements made in the columns of our contemporaries.

The expectations of the public had been raised to the highest point in the case of Mr Nikisch, but in the opinion of those competent to judge he failed to realize a high standard of ability as a symphonic conductor. But then these expectations were raised upon no reasonable basis. In Mr. Paur's case an extended and varied experience has established for him a reputation as an able conductor of both operatic and concert performances. Let us welcome him warmly, and generously support him while he displays his capacity and shows in what degree he is competent for the position he is to assume.

SUNDAY HERALD

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCIV. NO. 93.

SUNDAY, OCTOBER 1, 1893.

Mr. Emil Paur's Arrival—The Symphony Season—News Notes.

Mr. Emil Paur reached this city last evening and will immediately devote himself to "settling" himself and his belongings for his coming labors as the conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra. His wife, who is an accomplished pianist, is with him, and they will occupy appartments at the Hotel Thorndyke until other accommodations are decided upon.

The sales of seats during the week, for the 24 public rehearsals and concerts of the coming season, have resulted quite as favorably as was anticipated by all familiar with the effect of the financial situation upon such enterprises.

It was not to be expected that the high-water mark of last season would be maintained, such a result was simply contrary to all the tendencies of the times and the rules under which have come to be understood as applying to musical undertakings, which are continued through a series of years.

The fairest estimate of the relative receipts from these sales is to compare the sales of the past week with those of the first year of the Nikisch regime. Mr. Paur stands in the same position today that Mr. Nikisch did four years ago, practically an unknown quantity to the great American public. It would therefore be useless to expect as much confidence in the symphony scheme under the new leader as was felt after Mr. Nikisch had been identified with the orchestra four years.

As a matter of fact, the sales for the coming season show an increase of a very considerable amount over those for the first Nikisch season, so it can fairly be considered that there is no diminution in the interest regarding this enterprise.

The decision arrived at in regard to the disposition of the seats not sold at the auction sales will be heard with much satisfaction, as it will enable many to attend one or more of the concerts without being compelled to invest in a season ticket.

This limited number of seats will be held for evening sales at the usual concert prices, $1 and $1.50, and in this way a still larger public will be able to attend at their convenience. The season begins with the public rehearsal of the 13th inst. and the concert of the 14th inst.

And now for the Symphony concerts. I hear that Boston is to be surprised in Herr Paur. The new conductor will be "Herr" until the first appearance, and after that he will settle down into plain English; but as surprise, like confession, is good for the soul, we can stand it. The auction sale of seats showed the stringency of the money market, but, as far as the impartial observer could discover, no lack of interest with the would-be patrons of the concerts was apparent. The bidding was simply healthful, with none of the feverish excitement that "bit their own nose off" last year. There will be just as girly a time Fridays as ever, and the indications are that the Saturday night concerts will be more crowded than they have been for several seasons. People can afford to go this winter.

Mr. Emil Paur with his family arrived in Boston yesterday.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, OCT 1, 1893.

EMIL PAUR IS HERE.

His First Appearance Will Be on Friday Afternoon.

The new conductor of the Symphony orchestra, Mr Emil Paur (pronounced Power), accompanied by Mrs Paur and their two sons and Mr Sauerquill, arrived in Boston last evening from New York.

They were met at the Albany station by Mr Kneisel, Mr Schroeder and other members of the Symphony orchestra, and by Mr Ellis.

Mr Paur expressed himself as being delighted to reach Boston, his future home. He liked New York, the little he had seen of it. Mr Sauerquill having taken him to Central park and to see other objects of interest, but he was sure he should soon find himself at home in Boston. He had been struck with the beauty of New England scenery, which was much finer than he had anticipated.

The party drove to the Thorndike, where they will stay until Mr Paur finds a house that suits him. A huge basket of flowers from members of the symphony orchestra made Mrs Paur feel instantly at home. They reached the hotel shortly before the arrival of the party.

Mr Paur will conduct the symphony rehearsal Friday afternoon, Oct 13, his first appearance before an American public.

The Symphony season will begin next week in Music hall, the new conductor, Emil Paur, making his first public appearance in this city at the Friday afternoon rehearsal, Oct 13.

—Herr Paur, his wife and their two bright little sons arrived in Boston last night from New York, where they have been since they landed on Wednesday. They are all in fine health and spirits. They will be at the Thorndike for the present.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, OCTOBER 1, 1893.

"EMIL PAUR, BOSTON."

The New Leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Thorndike.

On the register of the Thorndike, under date of September 30, appears the name, written in broad, straggling characters, hard to decipher,

EMIL PAUR, BOSTON.

It was set down, at a few minutes after 6 o'clock, by a heavily built man with a kind, fatherly face, long, flowing locks and a beard that was at once light in color and light in texture, which curled about his chin like that of a Norse god.

It was the autograph of Mr. Paur, who will this winter direct the Boston Symphony Orchestra. As he wrote the word "Boston" he observed with a satisfied smile, "I want to show that I come from a civilized place." He said this in the purest German, but Mr. John Sauerquell, the librarian of the orchestra, who came on with Mr. Paur from New York and acts as his interpreter, guide, philosopher and friend, translated the remark.

Besides Mr. Sauerquell came Mrs. Paur and the two little boys of the distinguished couple. They arrived on the fast "limited" train over the Providence Division of the New York, New Haven and Hartford Railroad, which was in on time. They walked through Church Street to the Thorndike, where rooms were assigned them, and where they will remain until Mr. Paur finds a house to his liking.

While supper was being prepared Mr. and Mrs. Paur were presented to several members of the orchestra who had made their acquaintance years before in Germany. The reunion was a happy one.

Then, as the evening was so pleasant, the whole party strolled out of doors and slowly walked up and down the shaded paths of the Public Garden. Mr. Paur looked with some astonishment at the loving couples who adorned every other bench, generally closely entwined within one another's arms, but he said nothing. The spectacle evidently surprised him.

When they were back at the hotel the newly arrived, with one or two friends, including Mrs. Paur and the little boys, sat down to tea, which lasted until a late hour.

The new leader's eyes sparkled, and they all seemed to be having a right good time. To the Journal reporter's inquiry he said that he was in the best of health and spirits and that so were all of his party. He expected to remain at the Thorndike for some time.

By-and-by the maid invaded the dining room and bore off the little boys to bed, but the older folks sat up until midnight, talking of times past, present and future.

The musical Season is upon us. Singers, players of instruments and inventors and borrowers of tunes will soon be busy, and there will soon again be discussion in public places and at home concerning proper tempi, dynamic gradations, temperament, stage presence and all the other phrases found in the terminology of modern musical entertainment.

Whether the concert season will be affected seriously by what is known popularly as financial stagnation remains to be seen. That the premiums at the auction sales of the Symphony concert tickets were not as uniformly high as on previous occasions is not to be wondered at. Speculators who bought heavily last year found their investment not worth the candle, and this year their voices did not rise and fall.

* * *

Mr. Paur has already been interviewed, and, like unto a wise man, he said little. When Mr. Paur announces the fact that the soloists at the concerts must be "capable" and "classical," as he "does not believe in putting before the public small stuff," the people say "Amen." Some years ago an appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra was regarded as a privilege, as an honor; and the fact that a singer or player was allowed to appear, was in itself a warrant of the soloist's worth. But Mr. Nikisch allowed himself to be swayed by personal emotion rather than by critical judgment, and Music Hall saw strange sights under his imperial sway, so that the hall might often have been called the Boston Musical Museum.

Some may tremble at the thought that Mrs. Paur plays the piano; for we were afflicted lately and sore distressed by Nikischian marital musical indiscretions.

* * *

But Mrs. Paur was known as an excellent pianist, and she was regarded as a musician of talent before her marriage with Mr. Paur.

Mrs. Nikish, on the other hand, was a soubrette in the theatre, and she was never educated for the operatic or concert stage.

* * *

Mrs. Paur studied the piano under Mrs. Essipoff and Leschetitzki.

Mrs. Nikisch was trained for the American market by Mr. Nikisch.

* * *

And yet, if certain moralists may be belived, a just man should rejoice when his wife sings with only moderate success or even badly.

Let us quote from the Rev. Arthur Bedford, Chaplain to His Grace Wriothesly, Duke of Bedford, in 1711. "And Salust speaking of Semproula, as the Tool of Catiline, to foment the Rebellion, adds this among her other Qualifications, that she was taught to sing more finely than became a Virtuous Woman, with many other things, which he also calls The investments of Luxury."

* * *

But Mrs. Nikisch was hailed in New York as the great "exhibitionist" of German vocal and lyric art. Well, "I guess she was."

* * *

Mr. Paur is a versatile musician, and it is not unlikely that he will be heard here as a soloist; but I can never suppose him a guest in a private house and playing a piano piece for $35. It is said that one of his predecessors thus lowered the dignity of the position of leader of the Symphony Orchestra. And indeed $35 was a paltry sum; if the man had sent his bill for $350, the itching palm would have assumed grand proportions and commanded a certain respect.

* * *

[16]

MONDAY, OCTOBER 2, 1893.

PAUR LIKES MUSIC HALL.

New Leader of the Symphony Orchestra Visits the Hall and Takes Around Boston.

"I think I shall like it," said Emil Paur, the new leader of the Symphony Orchestra, yesterday noon, after a visit to Music Hall. He spoke from the standpoint of a connoisseur and carefully estimating the size and acoustic properties of the place.

"It is not quite so large as I expected to find," continued the distinguished musician, "although plenty large enough."

He spoke in German, of course, for he has not yet mastered the English language sufficiently well to speak it. His remarks were addressed to his old friend John Sauerquell, who had escorted him to the hall, and to Mrs. Paur.

Sunday was passed very quietly by Mr. and Mrs. Paur. Both were tired out, for their trip across the water was a very tempestuous one and they were badly shaken up on their arrival in New York last week. Mr. Paur seems to be even more exhausted than his wife.

It was nearly noon when they and their two children and Mr. Sauerquell came down to breakfast yesterday morning at the Thorndike, where they are now stopping.

After breakfast Mr. Paur donned his derby hat and gray top coat and, with Mrs. Paur, was escorted to Music Hall by Mr. Sauerquell. Mr. Sauerquell came from the same town in Russia that the new Symphony Orchestra leader came from, and in their younger days they were on intimate terms with one another. Since Mr. Paur first stepped on shore in New York he has been in charge of his devoted friend, who acts as interpreter and in other capacities.

Considerable time was spent in Music Hall by the three. Mr. Paur stated, among other things, that he was glad that there were no private boxes in the hall or elaborate ornamentations, for he had found that the acoustic properties of many fine concert halls abroad had been ruined by such unnecessary additions.

In Leipsic Mr. Paur had a much larger hall than Music Hall in which to conduct the concerts of his orchestra. It seated about 5000 people. It is said. He expected to find Music Hall about the same size.

No wonder, then, that he thought it rather small.

After the visit to Music Hall the party took a carriage and enjoyed a long drive. They went out to Jamaica Plain, for Mr. Paur is looking around for a house in the suburbs or out kirts of the city. He and his wife are going to keep house and not live at a hotel while in Boston just as soon as they can arrange matters to their satisfaction.

They also visited Franklin Park, the Marine Park, South Boston, and other places of interest. Mr. Paur expressed himself as delighted with the outside appearance of the city when seen by a Journal reporter upon his return to the Thorndike about 9.30 P. M. He and his wife retired to their apartments almost immediately upon arriving at the hotel.

"To-morrow morning Mr. Paur and I will probably go down to Music Hall again and meet Mr. Ellis, the manager," said Mr. Sauerquell to the Journal reporter. "He will meet Colonel Higginson to-morrow also.

"In the afternoon I shall take him out to Brookline and he may possibly find a house to suit him out there.

"The first rehearsal of the orchestra will be Thursday afternoon and Mr. Paur will be the conductor. It is not necessary for him to understand English in order to act as leader. All the previous conductors, Nikisch, Gericke and all, always spoke in German when addressing the musicians, although there are some Frenchmen and Englishmen and other nationalities represented.

"The new leader is very quick to learn and I think that in six months at least he will be able to speak very good English. He can read it now and understands fairly well when talked to in English. But he cannot speak it.

The Paurs will remain at the Thorndike probably until they go to housekeeping.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, OCT. 2, 1893.

EMIL PAUR IN BOSTON.

On the register of the Thorndike, under date of Sept. 30, appears the name, written in broad, straggling characters, hard to decipher: "Emil Paur, Boston." It was set down, at a few minutes after 6 o'clock, by a heavily built man with a kind, fatherly face, long flowing locks and a beard that was at once light in color and light in texture, which curled about his chin like that of a Norse god.

It was the autograph of Mr. Paur, who will this winter direct the Boston Symphony Orchestra. As he wrote the word "Boston" he observed with a satisfied smile, "I want to show that I come from a civilized place." He said this in the purest German, but John Sauerquell, the librarian of the orchestra, who came on with Mr. Paur from New York and acts as his interpreter, guide, philosopher and friend, translated the remark.

Besides Mr. Sauerquell came Mrs. Paur and the two little boys of the distinguished couple. They arrived on the fast "limited" train over the Providence division of the New York, New Haven and Hartford Railroad, which was in on time. They walked through Church street to the Thorndike, where rooms were assigned them, and where they will remain until Mr. Paur finds a house to his liking.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, OCTOBER 2, 1893.

Mr. Paur, the new leader of the Symphony Orchestra, has expressed his satisfaction with the Music Hall, though he finds it much smaller than he had anticipated. He will begin the work of rehearsal on Thursday afternoon.

Boston Journal.

TUESDAY, OCTOBER 3, 1893.

CONDUCTOR PAUR'S MOVEMENTS.

At 11 o'clock on Monday Emil Paur, the leader of the Symphony Orchestra, came from his hotel to Music Hall, accompanied by Mr. Ellis, manager of concerts. His visit was to become acquainted with the hall and the people connected with it, and to get a general idea of the place in which he is to conduct the great orchestra.

He spent considerable time in the library with his old friend, John Sauerquell, the Librarian, who in years gone by used to be a member of the same orchestra with the Symphony's new leader.

Accompanied by Mr. Ellis, the new director made a brief call upon Mr. Higginson at the latter's office. Then Mr. Paur returned to his

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

TUESDAY MORNING, OCT. 3, 1893.

PLEASED WITH BOSTON.

Herr Paur, the Symphony Orchestra's New Leader, Charmed with Music Hall, Col. Higginson and His New House in Jamaica Plain.

Emil Paur, the new Symphony leader, spent the day yesterday in learning Boston and in house hunting. He sallied out early in the morning, and did not return to his quarters at Hotel Thorndike until 10 at night. He found an Advertiser representative awaiting him in the hotel lobby, but he pleaded weariness and indisposition, and courteously asked to be excused. At the elevator door he paused, and, returning, granted a brief interview.

"I have seen Music Hall again today," said Mr. Paur, through an interpreter, "and, on the whole, I am much pleased with it. It is larger than that at Leipsic; that is, it will seat more people, and there is an advantage in the absence of boxes. We did not test the acoustic properties of the hall, so that my judgment is based wholly on its appearance to the eye. I think, however, that I shall like it very much."

He was glad that there was no elaborate ornamentation, for he had found that the acoustic properties of many fine concert halls abroad had been ruined by such unnecessary additions. This morning, he said, he would pay another visit to Music Hall.

"And you have been house-hunting," the Advertiser man remarked.

"Yes, and I have selected a house and engaged it. It is on Burroughs st., Jamaica Plain. I am much pleased with it, and shall settle in it as soon as my furniture arrives, which is now on its way from Leipsic."

"And you have met Col. Higginson, no doubt," the Advertiser man further suggested.

"Yes, I have seen him today and am much charmed with him. My first week-day in Boston has been very delightful."

With this Mr. Paur again gracefully excused himself and took his leave. Remarkably affable in manner the new Symphony leader, will, undoubtedly, become at once a favorite in Boston society. He has not a full comand of the English language, but he understands readily what is said in that language and he will, no doubt, soon be able to speak it fluently.

Mr. Sauerquell, the Music Hall librarian, who is an old friend of Herr Paur's, was with him a large part of yesterday. He said that Mr. and Mrs. Paur had visited during the day Franklin Park, the Marine Park and other places of interest.

The first rehearsal of the orchestra will be Thursday afternoon and Mr. Paur will be the conductor," said Mr. Sauerquell. "It is not necessary for him to understand English in order to act as leader. All the previous conductors, Nikisch, Gericke and all, always spoke in German when addressing the musicians, although there are some Frenchmen and Englishmen and other nationalities represented. The new leader is very quick to learn, and I think that in six months at least he will be able to speak very good English. He can read it now and understands fairly well when talked to in English."

Boston Daily Globe.

TUESDAY, OCT. 3, 1893.

SAYS HE WILL LIKE IT.

Conductor Paur of the Symphony Orchestra Looks Music Hall Over.

About 11 o'clock yesterday Emil Paur, the new leader of the Symphony orchestra came down from his hotel to Music hall, accompanied by Mr Ellis, manager of the hall. His visit was to become acquainted with the hall and the people connected with it, and to get a general idea of the place in which he is to conduct the great orchestra.

He spent considerable time in the library with his old friend, John Sauerquell, the librarian, who in years gone by used to be a member of the same orchestra with the Symphony's new leader.

Mr Paur told a reporter that he thought he would like Music hall, although it is not so large as he expected to find it, and in fact it seemed quite small in comparison with the hall in Leipsic, where he conducted the orchestra, which accommodated about 5000.

He liked very much, however, the general design of the hall, and commented favorably on the fact that there were no private boxes in the hall, nor elaborate ornamentation, for he had found by experience that many an otherwise good hall had been ruined in its acoustic properties by those things.

Accompanied by Mr Ellis, the new director made a brief call upon Mr Higginson at the latter's office.

Then Mr Paur returned to his hotel. He is having a large number of callers, which, with many little details incident to his residence in Boston, keep him very busy. As soon as possible Mr and Mrs Paur will begin housekeeping.

BOSTON POST.

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

TUESDAY MORNING, OCT. 3, 1893.

CONDUCTOR PAUR SATISFIED.

Emil Paur, the new leader of the Symphony, spent some time at Music Hall yesterday inspecting the auditorium and looking over the ground of his future employment.

Mr. Paur told a reporter that he thought he would like Music Hall, although it is not so large as he expected to find it. He liked very much, however, the general design of the hall, and commented favorably on the fact that there were no private boxes in the hall, nor elaborate ornamentation; for he had found by experience that many an otherwise good hall had been ruined in its acoustic properties by those things.

As soon as possible Mr. and Mrs. Paur will go housekeeping in their Boston home, which is now being fitted up.

THE LEADER.

OCTOBER, 1893.

THE Symphony Concerts begin October 14th, and many novelties are promised. Much interest is manifested to catch a first night view of Mr. Emil Pauer and in consequence much rivalry may be shown in the auction sale of tickets. Mr. Pauer has been the unconscious victim of the puff direct and the puff oblique and he must possess rare skill if he would not disappoint his admirers.

HERR PAUER, the newly-appointed conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will arrive in America early in October. He will probably visit Maj. Henry L. Higginson at Manchester before settling down in Boston for his winter's work.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY, OCTOBER 2, 1893.

PAUR LIKES MUSIC HALL.

New Leader of the Symphony Orchestra Visits the Hall and Takes a Ride Around Boston.

"I think I shall like it," said Emil Paur, the new leader of the Symphony Orchestra, yesterday afternoon, after a visit to Music Hall. He spoke from the standpoint of a connoisseur and after carefully estimating the size and acoustic properties of the place.

"It is not quite so large as I expected to find," continued the distinguished musician, "although plenty large enough."

He spoke in German, of course, for he has not yet mastered the English language sufficiently to be able to speak it. His remarks were addressed to his old friend John Sauerquell, who had escorted him to the hall, and to Mrs. Paur.

Sunday was passed very quietly by Mr. and Mrs. Paur. Both were tired out, for their trip across the water was a very tempestuous one and they were badly shaken up on their arrival in New York last week. Mr. Paur seems to be even more exhausted than his wife.

It was nearly noon when they and their two children and Mr. Sauerquell came down to breakfast yesterday morning at the Thorndike, where they are now stopping.

After breakfast Mr. Paur donned his derby hat and gray top coat and, with Mrs. Paur, were escorted to Music Hall by Mr. Sauerquell. Mr. Sauerquell came from the same town in Austria that the new Symphony Orchestra leader came from, and in their younger days they were on intimate terms with one another. Since Mr. Paur first stepped on shore in New York he has been in charge of his devoted friend, who acts as interpreter and in other capacities.

Considerable time was spent in Music Hall by the three. Mr. Paur stated, among other things, that he was glad that there were no private boxes in the hall or elaborate ornamentations, for he had found that the acoustic properties of many fine concert halls abroad had been ruined by such unnecessary additions.

In Leipsic Mr. Paur had a much larger hall than Music Hall in which to conduct the concerts of his orchestra. It seated about 5000 people, it is said. He expected to find Music Hall about the same size.

No wonder, then, that he thought it rather small.

After the visit to Music Hall the party took a carriage and enjoyed a long drive. They went out to Jamaica Plain, for Mr. Paur is looking around for a house in the suburbs or out kirts of the city. He and his wife are going to keep house and not live at a hotel while in Boston just as soon as they can arrange matters to their satisfaction.

They also visited Franklin Park, the Marine Park, South Boston, and other places of interest. Mr. Paur expressed himself as delighted with the outside appearance of the city when seen by a Journal reporter upon his return to the Thorndike about 9.30 P. M. He and his wife retired to their apartments almost immediately upon arriving at the hotel.

"To-morrow morning Mr. Paur and I will probably go down to Music Hall again and meet Mr. Ellis, the manager," said Mr. Sauerquell to the Journal reporter. "He will meet Colonel Higginson to-morrow also.

"In the afternoon I shall take him out to Brookline and he may possibly find a house to suit him out there.

"The first rehearsal of the orchestra will be Thursday afternoon and Mr. Paur will be the conductor. It is not necessary for him to understand English in order to act as leader. All the previous conduc ors, Nikisch, Gericke and all, always spoke in German when a idressing the musicians, although there are some Frenchmen and Englishmen and other nationalities represented.

"The new leader is very quick to learn and I think that in six months at least he will be able to speak very good English. He can read it now and I understands fairly well when talked to in English. But he cannot speak it.

The Paurs will remain at the Thorndike probably until they go to housekeeping.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, OCT. 2, 1893.

EMIL PAUR IN BOSTON.

On the register of the Thorndike, under date of Sept. 30, appears the name, written in broad, straggling characters, hard to decipher: "Emil Paur, Boston." It was set down, at a few minutes after 6 o'clock, by a heavily built man with a kind, fatherly face, long flowing locks and a beard that was at once light in color and light in texture, which curled about his chin like that of a Norse god.

It was the autograph of Mr. Paur, who will this winter direct the Boston Symphony Orchestra. As he wrote the word "Boston" he observed with a satisfied smile, "I want to show that I come from a civilized place." He said this in the purest German, but John Sauerquell, the librarian of the orchestra, who came on with Mr. Paur from New York and acts as his interpreter, guide, philosopher and friend, translated the remark.

Besides Mr. Sauerquell came Mrs. Paur and the two little boys of the distinguished couple. They arrived on the fast "limited" train over the Providence division of the New York, New Haven and Hartford Railroad, which was in on time. They walked through Church street to the Thorndike, where rooms were assigned them, and where they will remain until Mr. Paur finds a house to his liking.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, OCTOBER 2, 1893.

Mr. Paur, the new leader of the Symphony Orchestra, has expressed his satisfaction with the Music Hall, though he finds it much smaller than he had anticipated. He will begin the work of rehearsal on Thursday afternoon.

Boston Journal.

TUESDAY, OCTOBER 3, 1893.

CONDUCTOR PAUR'S MOVEMENTS.

About 11 o'clock on Monday Emil Paur, the new leader of the Symphony Orchestra, came down from his hotel to Music Hall, accompanied by Mr. Ellis, manager of the concerts. His visit was to become acquainted with the hall and the people connected with it, and to get a general idea of the place in which he is to conduct the great orchestra.

He spent considerable time in the library with his old friend, John Sauerquell, the Librarian, who in years gone by used to be a member of the same orchestra with the Symphony's new leader.

Accompanied by Mr. Ellis, the new director made a brief call upon Mr. Higginson at the latter's office. Then Mr. Paur returned to his hotel.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

TUESDAY MORNING, OCT. 3, 1893.

PLEASED WITH BOSTON.

Herr Paur, the Symphony Orchestra's New Leader, Charmed with Music Hall, Col. Higginson and His New House in Jamaica Plain.

Emil Paur, the new Symphony leader, spent the day yesterday in learning Boston and in house hunting. He sallied out early in the morning, and did not return to his quarters at Hotel Thorndike until 10 at night. He found an Advertiser representative awaiting him in the hotel lobby, but he pleaded weariness and indisposition, and courteously asked to be excused. At the elevator door he paused, and, returning, granted a brief interview.

"I have seen Music Hall again today," said Mr. Paur, through an interpreter, "and, on the whole, I am much pleased with it. It is larger than that at Leipsic; that is, it will seat more people, and there is an advantage in the absence of boxes. We did not test the acoustic properties of the hall, so that my judgment is based wholly on its appearance to the eye. I think, however, that I shall like it very much."

He was glad that there was no elaborate ornamentation, for he had found that the acoustic properties of many fine concert halls abroad had been ruined by such unnecessary additions. This morning, he said, he would pay another visit to Music Hall.

"And you have been house-hunting," the Advertiser man remarked.

"Yes, and I have selecte l a house and engaged it. It is on Burroughs st., Jamaica Plain. I am much pleased with it, and shall settle in it as soon as my furniture arrives, which is now on its way from Leipsic."

"And you have met Col. Higginson, no doubt," the Advertiser man further suggested.

"Yes, I have seen him today and am much charmed with him. My first week-day in Boston has been very delightful."

With this Mr. Paur again gracefully excused himself and took his leave. Remarkably affable in manner the new Symphony leader, will, undoubtedly, become at once a favorite in Boston society. He has not a full comand of the English language, but he understands readily what is said in that language and he will, no doubt, soon be able to speak it fluently.

Mr. Sauerquell, the Music Hall librarian, who is an old friend of Herr Paur's, was with him a large part of yesterday. He said that Mr. and Mrs. Paur had visited during the day Franklin Park, the Marine Park and other places of interest.

The first rehearsal of the orchestra will be Thursday afternoon and Mr. Paur will be the conductor," said Mr. Sauerquell. "It is not necessary for him to understand English in order to act as leader. All the previous conductors, Nikisch, Gericke and all, always spoke in German when addressing the musicians, although there are some Frenchmen and Englishmen and other nationalities represented. The new leader is very quick to learn, and I think that in six months at least he will be able to speak very good English. He can read it now and understands fairly well when talked to in English."

Boston Daily Globe.

TUESDAY, OCT. 3, 1893.

SAYS HE WILL LIKE IT.

Conductor Paur of the Symphony Orchestra Looks Music Hall Over.

About 11 o'clock yesterday Emil Paur, the new leader of the Symphony orchestra came down from his hotel to Music hall, accompanied by Mr Ellis, manager of the hall. His visit was to become acquainted with the hall and the people connected with it, and to get a general idea of the place in which he is to conduct the great orchestra.

He spent considerable time in the library with his old friend, John Sauerquell, the librarian, who in years gone by used to be a member of the same orchestra with the Symphony's new leader.

Mr Paur told a reporter that he thought he would like Music hall, although it is not so large as he expected to find it, and in fact it seemed quite small in comparison with the hall in Leipsic, where he conducted the orchestra, which accommodated about 5000.

He liked very much, however, the general design of the hall, and commented favorably on the fact that there were no private boxes in the hall, nor elaborate ornamentation, for he had found by experience that many an otherwise good hall had been ruined in its acoustic properties by those things.

Accompanied by Mr Ellis, the new director made a brief call upon Mr Higginson at the latter's office.

Then Mr Paur returned to his hotel. He is having a large number of callers, which, with many little details incident to his residence in Boston, keep him very busy. As soon as possible Mr and Mrs Paur will begin housekeeping.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

TUESDAY MORNING, OCT. 3, 1893.

CONDUCTOR PAUR SATISFIED.

Emil Paur, the new leader of the Symphony, spent some time at Music Hall yesterday inspecting the auditorium and looking over the ground of his future employment.

Mr. Paur told a reporter that he thought he would like Music Hall, although it is not so large as he expected to find it. He liked very much, however, the general design of the hall, and commented favorably on the fact that there were no private boxes in the hall, nor elaborate ornamentation, for he had found by experience that many an otherwise good hall had been ruined in its acoustic properties by those things.

As soon as possible Mr. and Mrs. Paur will go housekeeping in their Boston home, which is now being fitted up.

THE LEADER.

OCTOBER, 1893.

THE Symphony Concerts begin October 14th, and many novelties are promised. Much interest is manifested to catch a first night view of Mr. Emil Pauer and in consequence much rivalry may be shown in the auction sale of tickets. Mr. Pauer has been the unconscious victim of the puff direct and the puff oblique and he must possess rare skill if he would not disappoint his admirers.

HERR PAUER, the newly-appointed conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will arrive in America early in October. He will probably visit Maj. Henry L. Higginson at Manchester before settling down in Boston for his winter's work.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY, OCTOBER 2, 1893.

PAUR LIKES MUSIC HALL.

New Leader of the Symphony Orchestra Visits the Hall and Takes a Ride Around Boston.

"I think I shall like it," said Emil Paur, the new leader of the Symphony Orchestra, yesterday afternoon, after a visit to Music Hall. He spoke from the standpoint of a connoisseur and after carefully estimating the size and acoustic properties of the place.

"It is not quite so large as I expected to find," continued the distinguished musician, "although plenty large enough."

He spoke in German, of course, for he has not yet mastered the English language sufficiently to be able to speak it. His remarks were addressed to his old friend John Sauerquell, who had escorted him to the hall, and to Mrs. Paur.

Sunday was passed very quietly by Mr. and Mrs. Paur. Both were tired out, for their trip across the water was a very tempestuous one and they were badly shaken up on their arrival in New York last week. Mr. Paur seems to be even more exhausted than his wife.

It was nearly noon when they and their two children and Mr. Sauerquell came down to breakfast yesterday morning at the Thorndike, where they are now stopping.

After breakfast Mr. Paur donned his derby hat and gray top coat and, with Mrs. Paur, were escorted to Music Hall by Mr. Sauerquell. Mr. Sauerquell came from the same town in Austria that the new Symphony Orchestra leader came from, and in their younger days they were on intimate terms with one another.

Since Mr. Paur first stepped on shore in New York he has been in charge of his devoted friend, who acts as interpreter and in other capacities.

Considerable time was spent in Music Hall by the three. Mr. Paur stated, among other things, that he was glad that there were no private boxes in the hall or elaborate ornamentations, for he had found that the acoustic properties of many fine concert halls abroad had been ruined by such unnecessary additions.

In Leipsic Mr. Paur had a much larger hall than Music Hall in which to conduct the concerts of his orchestra. It seated about 5000 people, it is said. He expected to find Music Hall about the same size.

No wonder, then, that he thought it rather small.

After the visit to Music Hall the party took a carriage and enjoyed a long drive. They went out to Jamaica Plain, for Mr. Paur is looking around for a house in the suburbs or out kirts of the city. He and his wife are going to keep house and not live at a hotel while in Boston just as soon as they can arrange matters to their satisfaction.

They also visited Franklin Park, the Marine Park, South Boston, and other places of interest. Mr. Paur expressed himself as delighted with the outside appearance of the city when seen by a Journal reporter upon his return to the Thorndike about 9.30 P. M. He and his wife retired to their apartments almost immediately upon arriving at the hotel.

"To-morrow morning Mr. Paur and I will probably go down to Music Hall again and meet Mr. Ellis, the manager," said Mr. Sauerquell to the Journal reporter. "He will meet Colonel Higginson to-morrow also.

"In the afternoon I shall take him out to Brookline and he may possibly find a house to suit him out there.

"The first rehearsal of the orchestra will be Thursday afternoon and Mr. Paur will be the conductor. It is not necessary for him to understand English in order to act as leader. All the previous conduc ors, Nikisch, Gericke and all, always spoke in German when a idressing the musicians, although there are some Frenchmen and Englishmen and other nationalities represented.

"The new leader is very quick to learn and I think that in six months at least he will be able to speak very good English. He can read it now and understands fairly well when talked to in English. But he cannot speak it.

The Paurs will remain at the Thorndike probably until they go to housekeeping.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, OCT. 2, 1893.

EMIL PAUR IN BOSTON.

On the register of the Thorndike, under date of Sept. 30, appears the name, written in broad, straggling characters, hard to decipher: "Emil Paur, Boston." It was set down, at a few minutes after 6 o'clock, by a heavily built man with a kind, fatherly face, long flowing locks and a beard that was at once light in color and light in texture, which curled about his chin like that of a Norse god.

It was the autograph of Mr. Paur, who will this winter direct the Boston Symphony Orchestra. As he wrote the word "Boston" he observed with a satisfied smile, "I want to show that I come from a civilized place." He said this in the purest German, but John Sauerquell, the librarian of the orchestra, who came on with Mr. Paur from New York and acts as his interpreter, guide, philosopher and friend, translated the remark.

Besides Mr. Sauerquell came Mrs. Paur and the two little boys of the distinguished couple. They arrived on the fast "limited" train over the Providence division of the New York, New Haven and Hartford Railroad, which was in on time. They walked through Church street to the Thorndike, where rooms were assigned them, and where they will remain until Mr. Paur finds a house to his liking.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, OCTOBER 2, 1893.

Mr. Paur, the new leader of the Symphony Orchestra, has expressed his satisfaction with the Music Hall, though he finds it much smaller than he had anticipated. He will begin the work of rehearsal on Thursday afternoon.

Boston Journal.

TUESDAY, OCTOBER 3, 1893.

CONDUCTOR PAUR'S MOVEMENTS.

About 11 o'clock on Monday Emil Paur, the new leader of the Symphony Orchestra, came down from his hotel to Music Hall, accompanied by Mr. Ellis, manager of the concerts. His visit was to become acquainted with the hall and the people connected with it, and to get a general idea of the place in which he is to conduct the great orchestra.

He spent considerable time in the library with his old friend, John Sauerquell, the Librarian, who in years gone by used to be a member of the same orchestra with the Symphony's new leader.

Accompanied by Mr. Ellis, the new director made a brief call upon Mr. Higginson at the latter's office. Then Mr. Paur returned to his hotel.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

TUESDAY MORNING, OCT. 3, 1893.

PLEASED WITH BOSTON.

Herr Paur, the Symphony Orchestra's New Leader, Charmed with Music Hall, Col. Higginson and His New House in Jamaica Plain.

Emil Paur, the new Symphony leader, spent the day yesterday in learning Boston and in house hunting. He sallied out early in the morning, and did not return to his quarters at Hotel Thorndike until 10 at night. He found an Advertiser representative awaiting him in the hotel lobby, but he pleaded weariness and indisposition, and courteously asked to be excused. At the elevator door he paused, and, returning, granted a brief interview.

"I have seen Music Hall again today," said Mr. Paur, through an interpreter, "and, on the whole, I am much pleased with it. It is larger than that at Leipsic; that is, it will seat more people, and there is an advantage in the absence of boxes. We did not test the acoustic properties of the hall, so that my judgment is based wholly on its appearance to the eye. I think, however, that I shall like it very much."

He was glad that there was no elaborate ornamentation, for he had found that the acoustic properties of many fine concert halls abroad had been ruined by such unnecessary additions. This morning, he said, he would pay another visit to Music Hall.

"And you have been house-hunting," the Advertiser man remarked.

"Yes, and I have selecte l a house and engaged it. It is on Burroughs st., Jamaica Plain. I am much pleased with it, and shall settle in it as soon as my furniture arrives, which is now on its way from Leipsic."

"And you have met Col. Higginson, no doubt," the Advertiser man further suggested.

"Yes, I have seen him today and am much charmed with him. My first week-day in Boston has been very delightful."

With this Mr. Paur again gracefully excused himself and took his leave. Remarkably affable in manner the new Symphony leader, will, undoubtedly, become at once a favorite in Boston society. He has not a full comand of the English language, but he understands readily what is said in that language and he will, no doubt, soon be able to speak it fluently.

Mr. Sauerquell, the Music Hall librarian, who is an old friend of Herr Paur's, was with him a large part of yesterday. He said that Mr. and Mrs. Paur had visited during the day Franklin Park, the Marine Park and other places of interest.

The first rehearsal of the orchestra will be Thursday afternoon and Mr. Paur will be the conductor," said Mr. Sauerquell. "It is not necessary for him to understand English in order to act as leader. All the previous conductors, Nikisch, Gericke and all, always spoke in German when addressing the musicians, although there are some Frenchmen and Englishmen and other nationalities represented. The new leader is very quick to learn, and I think that in six months at least he will be able to speak very good English. He can read it now and understands fairly well when talked to in English."

Boston Daily Globe.

TUESDAY, OCT. 3, 1893.

SAYS HE WILL LIKE IT.

Conductor Paur of the Symphony Orchestra Looks Music Hall Over.

About 11 o'clock yesterday Emil Paur, the new leader of the Symphony orchestra came down from his hotel to Music hall, accompanied by Mr Ellis, manager of the hall. His visit was to become acquainted with the hall and the people connected with it, and to get a general idea of the place in which he is to conduct the great orchestra.

He spent considerable time in the library with his old friend, John Sauerquell, the librarian, who in years gone by used to be a member of the same orchestra with the Symphony's new leader.

Mr Paur told a reporter that he thought he would like Music hall, although it is not so large as he expected to find it, and in fact it seemed quite small in comparison with the hall in Leipsic, where he conducted the orchestra, which accommodated about 5000.

He liked very much, however, the general design of the hall, and commented favorably on the fact that there were no private boxes in the hall, nor elaborate ornamentation, for he had found by experience that many an otherwise good hall had been ruined in its acoustic properties by those things.

Accompanied by Mr Ellis, the new director made a brief call upon Mr Higginson at the latter's office.

Then Mr Paur returned to his hotel. He is having a large number of callers, which, with many little details incident to his residence in Boston, keep him very busy. As soon as possible Mr and Mrs Paur will begin housekeeping.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

TUESDAY MORNING, OCT. 3, 1893.

CONDUCTOR PAUR SATISFIED.

Emil Paur, the new leader of the Symphony, spent some time at Music Hall yesterday inspecting the auditorium and looking over the ground of his future employment.

Mr. Paur told a reporter that he thought he would like Music Hall, although it is not so large as he expected to find it. He liked very much, however, the general design of the hall, and commented favorably on the fact that there were no private boxes in the hall, nor elaborate ornamentation, for he had found by experience that many an otherwise good hall had been ruined in its acoustic properties by those things.

As soon as possible Mr. and Mrs. Paur will go housekeeping in their Boston home, which is now being fitted up.

THE LEADER.

OCTOBER, 1893.

THE Symphony Concerts begin October 14th, and many novelties are promised. Much interest is manifested to catch a first night view of Mr. Emil Pauer and in consequence much rivalry may be shown in the auction sale of tickets. Mr. Pauer has been the unconscious victim of the puff direct and the puff oblique and he must possess rare skill if he would not disappoint his admirers.

HERR PAUER, the newly-appointed conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will arrive in America early in October. He will probably visit Maj. Henry L. Higginson at Manchester before settling down in Boston for his winter's work.

REDUCTION

RATIO

13x

2.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

150 mm

100 mm

A5

A4

1.0 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

3.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

WITH MRS. PAUR.

The Wife of the Leader of the Symphony Orchestra.

She Tells the Journal Writer About Her Plans.

Her New Boston Home, Her Children and Herself.

Sprechen sie Deutsch?

If not, then the Journal will give to its readers, in English, the first interview obtained in America with the wife of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's new conductor.

A very quiet little woman is Mrs. Paur, and as genial and pleasant as she is quiet. She gave a most cordial welcome to the Journal's representative, who called yesterday morning at the pleasant apartment temporarily occupied by the Paurs in the Thorndike.

"Do you speak German?" she asked in English, much to the relief of her caller.

"A little," was the reply: "but perhaps there is no need of my speaking German, since I see you speak English."

"Not very much. You see, I learned my English in school, and that was a long time ago," she said, and her arch smile was accompanied by a graceful shrug of the shoulders—that trick which all must learn if they would appear foreign.

"So few people speak German in Boston," she continued. "It is quite different from New York. Almost everyone speaks German there." Even in the stores of Gotham nearly everybody speaks German, but it is feared that in the stores of cultured Boston they are not so accomplished.

Mrs. Paur was surprised to learn that in Boston schools there was a choice between German and French, and that only in the high schools.

"Why, in all the best schools for young ladies at home they are obliged to study both English and French, as well as their own language. But it has been so long since I went to school," she said, with a merry twinkle in her handsome brown eyes, "that I have forgotten nearly all of my English words." One would hardly think however, that she had left her school days far behind, for the regular, clearly defined features of her pleasant face, which is crowned by natural waves of soft brown hair, give her a particularly youthful appearance. Her becoming morning gown, too, made after the German mode, was of dark blue material finished with black, and set off her trim, stylish figure to the best advantage.

But nevertheless it has been twelve years, at least, since she was a school girl, for she was married to Mr. Paur in 1881.

"You have never been in America before, I believe?" said the Journal's caller to Mrs. Paur.

"No," she said, "this is my first visit here and I find America very pleasant. But I felt very sorry to leave all my German friends at home."

"But you will soon make new friends here."

"Oh, yes, I am sure of that. Everyone is very kind to us. I had no friends at all, here in America, although Mr. Paur knew a few of the musical people. But we have met quite a number already, and they have done what they could to make it pleasant for us," and she glanced significantly at the large basket of roses and bouquet of lilies-o'-the-valley which filled the apartments with their fragrance.

"We spent last evening at the home of Mr. Kneisel, in Brookline," continued Mrs. Paur, referring to the talented violinist who sits at the first desk in the Symphony Orchestra. "They are very pleasant people, and I think Mme. Kneisel is charming."

"Did you know them before you came to [illegible]"

"We know them here," she said, in her [illegible] way. "But I am sure we shall enjoy [illegible] much."

"Boston is a beautiful town, is it not?" [illegible] the Journal.

"Yes, I think the drives there are so [illegible] have not seen so much of [illegible] Plain. We have taken [illegible] Burroughs Street, when we were looking [illegible] took a long drive."

"And have you found a house so soon?" asked her caller in some amazement.

"Yes, we have found quite a pretty one, and have decided to take it. It is very near the street cars and only about 10 minutes' walk from the steam cars. It is quite near Pond Street, too, which is the pleasantest place we saw."

It is with true German enterprise that the Paurs go house hunting. In one afternoon they found a house, and when asked how soon they expected to move into their new home Mrs. Paur said:

"By the last of this week we expect to move in. It is very pleasant here at the hotel,"—and, indeed, the apartment is one of the pleasantest in the Thorndike, overlooking the Public Gardens, which are in the height of their fall beauty—"but we do not like hotel life, and would much rather have a home of our own."

"Did you bring over furniture from Germany?"

"Oh, yes, indeed; but I am not sure what we will do with it," she said, with a look of comic dismay. "Why, your American furniture is so small!" And she thinks the houses are made to fit the furniture.

"Our furniture is so large I do not know how we can get it into the house, the rooms seem so much smaller and lower than they are at home. But we shall be glad to have a house by ourselves. That will be better than what we had in Leipzig, for there are very few private houses there, you know. Nearly all of them are apartments."

Mrs. Paur's voyage from Europe was somewhat tedious, as she was very sick all the way. But she magnanimously says it is a beautiful trip.

"I was in my berth all the way until the very last day," she said. "But Mr. Paur was not sick at all, and enjoyed the trip very much."

"You did not stay in New York long enough to form much of an idea of the city, I presume?" said the Journal's representative.

"Well, of course, we could not see it all, but I think we saw the most beautiful part of the place," said Mrs. Paur. "We were only there two days, but we took a very long drive. We saw the beautiful residences and Central Park, and also went to Riverside Park, where we had a beautiful view of the Hudson River."

"Were you glad to have Mr. Paur come to America?"

"Oh, yes, it is such a very fine position," said Mrs. Paur. "And then the Symphony is such a fine orchestra, I am sure he will enjoy working with them very much. You know D'Albert says the Symphony is one of the best orchestras in the world."

When asked if she expected to appear in public herself, Mrs. Paur said: "Perhaps, although I am not sure yet. I am not anxious for notoriety," she added with a little laugh.

It is tolerably safe to assume, however, that Bostonians will not permit Mrs. Paur to remain very long in their vicinity unheard, for her musical gifts are pronounced to be very rare. She began her musical studies at Stuttgart, but went from there to Mannheim. She was greatly encouraged by the best masters to pursue her studies most diligently, and it was in accordance with the advice of Rubinstein that she studied with Leschetitzki and his wife, Annetta Essipoff.

"You have played in Leipzig a good deal, have you not?" asked the caller from the Journal.

"Yes: both alone and with Mr. Paur. We like best to play together on two pianos."

Their little sons, too, are very musical, for they have two, respectively 10 and 8 years of age.

"They are very fond of music of all kinds," said the justly proud mother. "although the older one cares more for books than for studying music. He likes to hear it, but he does not enjoy practicing. The younger one, however, plays quite well for a little fellow and practices quite a good deal."

Mr. and Mrs. Paur are much devoted to their music, and, in Leipzig, were always busy with their practicing and public work. Gracious, accomplished and vivacious they were highly esteemed by a large number of German friends. The programmes of their concerts always consisted of selections of rarest delicacy and most exceptional value from favorite composers, and [illegible] forward to a musical [illegible] which will afford unusual attractions [illegible] the highest expectations of musical [illegible]

MR. AND MRS. PAUR'S BOSTON HOME.

No. 25 Burroughs Street, Jamaica Plain, is an unassuming building, half hidden from the street by a large horse-chestnut tree, which just now, with its yellowing leaves, stands out in strong contrast to the brown-walled house. The grounds, though limited, are very pleasing, there being a number of shrubs and flowering plants in beds, while against the fence is a rose hedge, which in the time of bloom must be a delight to the residents. A smooth driveway leads to a cosy little stable in the rear of the house.

MARIE PAUR-BURGER,

[illegible] of the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

CHILDREN OF MR. AND MRS. PAUR.

BOSTON HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 7,

E HAS COME; he has seen and been seen by a select few, your humble servant among the number, and he is soon to have his opportunity to conquer.

.....

To whom do I refer? Why to Emil Paur, our new Symphony conductor, to be sure. Mr. Paur is at present enjoying Mr. Damon's expensive hospitality at "The Thorndike," but soon hopes to build himself a nest in one of our pleasant suburbs, Jamaica Plain possibly.

.....

If one may judge at all from the printed interviews, Mr. Paur is possessed of a large amount of tact, for he has been plied with the usual test questions, as to "how he enjoyed his voyage," "was he favorably impressed with America," "in his opinion how did the musicians of his country compare with our own and others," "what school of music he favored," etc., and while he has not been found wanting, he certainly has not been committal in these matters. We congratulate him on possessing tact, he will need it we think. Is it not so?

.....

If Mr. Paur differs from his predecessors as much in temperament as he does in personal appearance we may expect innovations of a pronounced type, for the gentleman is light as to complexion, sandy as to beard, and his eyes blue and laughing. Totally at variance you see with the "passionate" Henschel, conservative Gericke, or the "sensational" Nikisch, who have all been dark haired and of pallid skin.

.....

He brings with him his wife and two sons. Mrs. Paur is a pianist of repute in her own country, a pupil of Essipoff, so great a favorite in America, and of Leschetitzky. She will be heard in public ere long and each of us may judge for his or herself.

.....

This is the second time Mr. Paur has succeeded Mr. Nikisch as conductor, the first time being at Leipsic some few years ago. He then not only replaced Nikisch, who was the people's idol, but supplanted him in their critical affection after a very short time. We shall see if that will be the case here.

.....

As I was crossing the Common the other day, my eye was attracted to a sheet of paper at my feet, and upon which I was about to step. Now as a sheet of paper is not a rarity to me and as it was difficult for my foot, from its size, to overcome the inertia of motion, I stepped on the paper and should have passed on, but that I was seized with an impulse I could not account for, to pick up that paper. I did so and found it to be a letter from which the envelope had been torn and intended for Emil Paur.

.....

How it came there will always remain a mystery, probably the old story of the messenger boy who stopped to gossip or play marbles with his mates; at any rate, being in too dilapidated a condition to remail, it seemed to me that it might be a good thing to print it in these columns, that the effort of some well wisher of Mr. Paur might not be wholly lost. Here it is:—

....

Parker House, Oct. 1st, '93.

My dear Mr. Paur:—As you are a stranger and in a foreign land, it seems but fair that some one should give you a few points as to what lies before you, that you may not be subjected to too many shocks, either of joy or sorrow, for the joys and sorrows of a musician in this city are pretty sure to be well intermingled, and it really depends upon his or her start, as to which predominates. Of course, I know that any one who does what I am doing is always considered officious and is never thanked, but I am willing to immolate myself upon the altar of my unknown friendship for you. I shall have some compensation in the way of being able to say, "I told you so" as things progress.

We Bostonians are, as you may have heard, a cultured and learned people. The first quality is indicated by our ofttimes rude manner, (the prerogative of cultured people), and the latter by the prevalence of eyeglasses among us. We have also, I may say, a reserve force of brain power, which we don't use every day, for we are a thrifty people and like to keep something for great occasions. This fact will account to you for many things you may see or hear in the next five years. This country differs from your own in that it is the women who are all powerful, instead of the men. Boston is essentially a woman's city in most points, and where you find women you find "Fads," and the latest one is "Faddism." This is a quality that allows merit to pass by unnoticed very frequently, while mediocrity is raised to a pedestal. However, there is no need of enlarging upon this topic, for such will not be your fate at present, for your position in itself commands respect, and your sex will insure to you adulation. This is another point for future use.

The women being sure to endorse you, you will not lack for the support of their fathers, husbands and brothers. Therefore, socially, you may be considered "in it."

As for the critics, well, as Kipling says, "that is another matter." They are, generally speaking, highly cultured, broad-minded gentlemen in whom prejudice is a thing unprecedented. Still, if you would be popular with them, I wouldn't show too much originality or make any daring flights. We are conservative people, and our critics don't like that sort of thing. Your demeanor must be just "betwixt and between," for if you show too much temperament, you will be found "dramatic," and if too little, "stolid."

For the musicians, well, I wouldn't make too many changes in the orchestra, for they all have friends, and our friends in this part of the country are so loyal—to us. It might not be pleasant, you know. Well, my dear Mr. Paur, my best wishes will be with you on the occasion of your début, and if you see fit to try to follow any of the suggestions I have made, you cannot possibly get more tangled up than you will if you try the plan of minding your own business and doing your duty. I am, my very dear sir,

Yours most sincerely,

A MEDDLER.

American Art Journal.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 7, 1893.

Once more the Symphony auctions have taken place. As usual, the rehearsal tickets brought the best premiums, the highest point being $66 for a few seats; but this is a big descent from the nearly $400 of last year, and not many seats reached $50. Though some of the less desirable brought higher prices than in 1892, the average was much lower; and the evening prices ranged so low that most music-lovers can afford to hear the 24 concerts this season. Many fair seats were passed without a bid. The regular prices, as heretofore, are $12 and $7.50.

BOSTON, SUNDAY [illegible]

CYNOSURE.

I wonder what impression the new conductor of the Symphony Orchestra will make. I do not mean what the public and the critics will think of him, but what effect he will have on the more youthful femininity that glorify the rehearsals. It seems that Mr. Paur is a blonde. He is the first who has wielded a baton over the orchestra. The others were of a different complexion. This should be in his favor, as a mere matter of change. However, all will depend on the girls. I wonder if they will forget the allegiance they swore to Mr. Nikisch when he was new to them; how they admired the poetic pallor of his countenance, and were fascinated by the whiteness of his hands when they protruded beyond the extensive shirt cuffs that he affected. I think, too, that they felt drawn toward him by the fact that he appeared to be in ill health, and that the prevailing expression of his face was one of profound melancholy. It is true that they never saw him when he was drinking lager beer or playing poker, but that was only so much in his favor. I cannot say that I admired him very greatly as a conductor, but I had a sincere admiration for him in his aspect as a poseur. There can be no question that he had talent in a certain way, as a musician, but he was gifted with positive genius for posing. I remember when he first came here the members of the orchestra were delighted with him. They hailed him as a welcome change from the stern discipline of his predecessor, Gericke, as they hailed the latter as a vast improvement on his predecessor, Henschel. In Nikisch there was nothing of Henschel's lack of camaraderie, or of Gericke's dignified stiffness. In fact, the men were charmed with him. By and by, however, this feeling of enthusiasm dimmed, and then dissipated. If I were a conductor, I am not sure whether I should feel pleased or otherwise if an orchestra took to me with admiration at the outset of my acquaintance with them. I have known many orchestras, but I never met one that did not heartily dislike its conductor after it had served under him for any length of time. I am curious to learn what the Symphony Orchestra thinks of its new conductor. Its opinion is doubtless favorable, but it is as certain to go the other way as it is that to-morrow's sun will shine. This matters very little, however, for Herr Paur's success here does not depend on his orchestra's like or dislike of him. It depends on the ladies. From all the reports that have preceded him hither, it would appear that he is a man eminently fitted for the post he has been called upon to fill. That, however, is not essentially a prime factor in his possible success. All depends on how he begins; on how and by whom he is taken up. Of course, it is understood than an artist occupying so prominent a position as that of conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, must be taken up; and already there is a spirited competition among the usual takers. This eagerness to obtain him is easily accounted for, on the ground that those who succeed in catching him attain a certain distinction as art patrons, and shine by reflected light. The only difficulty in the matter is, that there are rival coteries, little cliques, so to speak, each one of which is at daggers drawn with the others; and the consequence is that, if he permits himself to be caught by one, he makes enemies of the rest. The situation is perplexing; and it is to be hoped that Herr Paur will learn who is who and what is what before he suffers himself to be captured by the lion hunters, who become lions themselves through the larger lions that they capture. After he is once in the toils, he must be careful to remember that he is tethered, and must not strain his rope and get into the next field, if he would not find himself suddenly in disfavor with his capturers. As for his artistic merits, he may leave them safely to the judgment and appreciation of the really musical public and his critics. Still, I await the verdict of the Rehearsal girls; not on his conducting, but on the impression his personality will make. They have admired all of the Symphony conductors in turn, but they raved over Nikisch, despite the peculiar cut of his trousers, and remained loyal to him when nearly everybody else had deserted him. It remains to be seen if they will transfer their admiration in its gushing fulness to his successor. If he knew the intensity of the feeling experienced by Japonicadom to see him, and to pass judgment on him, he could scarcely avoid a painful nervousness until the ordeal was over. Does he realize how much hinges on that first Friday afternoon?

* * *

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its first performances this season at Music Hall, next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Mr. Paur will introduce himself to the Boston public with a performance of the Beethoven Fifth Symphony. The other numbers of the programme are, Serenade for String Orchestra by Tschaikowsky, and the overture, "Tannhauser," Wagner. It goes without saying that great interest will attach to these occasions, and Mr. Paur will be greeted by two of the finest audiences that Boston can provide. For the first time in several years a limited number of single tickets, with reserved seats, are available for both the rehearsals and concerts. These tickets will be placed on sale at Music Hall tomorrow morning.

The Cambridge concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Sander's Theatre, on Thursday evenings, Oct. 19, Nov. 2, Nov. 16, Dec. 7, Jan. 4, Jan. 25, Feb. 15, March 8, April 5 and April 26. Mme. Nordica, Mr. Max Heinrich, Mr. Kneisel, Mr. Schulz and other artists will appear as soloists. The The sale of season tickets for these concerts opens at the University Book Store, Cambridge, next Saturday morning. A limited number of seats will be reserved for college officers, and invited guests.

The Kneisel Quartet will give its usual series of chamber concerts, at Chickering Hall, during the season. Mr. Kneisel secured a number of interesting and important novelties during his summer in Europe. Some of these will have an early hearing in his concerts.

SANDERS THEATRE, CAMBRIDGE.

BOSTON

Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

Ten Concerts on Thursday Evenings

Oct. 19, Nov. 2, Nov. 16, Dec. 7, Jan. 4, Jan. 25, Feb. 15, March 8, April 5, April 26.

Soloists: Mme. NORDICA, Mr. HEINRICH, Mr. KNEISEL, Mr. SCHULZ, and others.

Season tickets, with reserved seats for the series of ten concerts, $7.50, will be on sale at the University Bookstore, Cambridge, on and after Saturday, Oct. 14. Sale opens at 8 A. M. A limited number of tickets will be reserved for College officers and invited guests.

— The Rehearsal girl is going to be madly disappointed when the musical stranger within our gates, Paur by name, and said to be power by nature, steps upon the soap box of a stand, come opening day of the "Symphs." The newspapers have done this thing. They thought they did nobly in publishing portraits of Herr Paur, but they made their cuts before he cut his Sampsonian locks and cropped his beard, and now he is in danger of being cut by his best friends, so he is in danger of being cut by his best friends, so changed is he in appearance. It's too bad, just when we thought to have poetic Georg and Arthur, both recalled by the tossing mane of Paur, as it has been portrayed. What does this retrenchment of the crowning glory of woman—and presumably of man—just before [illegible] for?

...ston Journal.
WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 4, 1893.

WITH MRS. PAUR.

The Wife of the Leader of the Symphony Orchestra.

She Tells the Journal Writer About Her Plans.

Her New Boston Home, Her Children and Herself.

Sprechen sie Deutsch?

If not, then the Journal will give to its readers, in English, the first interview obtained in America with the wife of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's new conductor.

A very quiet little woman is Mrs. Paur, and as genial and pleasant as she is quiet. She gave a most cordial welcome to the Journal's representative, who called yesterday morning at the pleasant apartment temporarily occupied by the Paurs in the Tuorndike.

"Do you speak German?" she asked in English, much to the relief of her caller.

"A little," was the reply; "but perhaps there is no need of my speaking German, since I see you speak English."

"Not very much. You see, I learned my English in school, and that was a long time ago," she said, and her arch smile was accompanied by a graceful shrug of the shoulders—that trick which all must learn if they would appear foreign.

"So few people speak German in Boston," she continued. "It is quite different from New York. Almost everyone speaks German there." Even in the stores of Gotham nearly everybody speaks German, but it is feared that in the stores of cultured Boston they are not so accomplished.

Mrs. Paur was surprised to learn that in Boston schools there was a choice between German and French, and that only in the high schools.

"Why, in all the best schools for young ladies at home they are obliged to study both English and French, as well as their own language. But it has been so long since I went to school," she said, with a merry twinkle in her handsome brown eyes, "that I have forgotten nearly all of my English words." One would hardly think however, that she had left her school days far behind, for the regular, clearly defined features of her pleasant face, which is crowned by natural waves of soft brown hair, give her a particularly youthful appearance. Her becoming morning gown, too, made after the German mode, was of dark blue material finished with black, and set off her trim, stylish figure to the best advantage.

But nevertheless it has been twelve years, at least, since she was a school girl, for she was married to Mr. Paur in 1881.

"You have never been in America before, I believe?" said the Journal's caller to Mrs. Paur.

"No," she said, "this is my first visit here and I find America very pleasant. But I felt very sorry to leave all my German friends at home."

"But you will soon make new friends here."

"Oh, yes, I am sure of that. Everyone is very kind to us. I had no friends at all, here in America, although Mr. Paur knew a few of the musical people. But we have met quite a number already, and they have done what they could to make it pleasant for us," and she glanced significantly at the large basket of roses and bouquet of lilies-of-the-valley which filled the apartments with their fragrance.

"We spent last evening at the home of Mr. Kneisel, in Brookline," continued Mrs. Paur, referring to the talented violinist who sits at the first desk in the Symphony Orchestra. "They are very pleasant people, and I think Mrs. Kneisel is charming."

"Did you know them before you came to America?"

"No, we knew them here," she said, in her quaint little way. "But I am sure we shall enjoy them very much."

"Brookline is a beautiful town, is it not?" again asked the caller from the Journal.

"Oh, very! I think the drives there are so pleasant. But I have not seen so much of Brookline as of Jamaica Plain. We have taken a house in Jamaica Plain, on Burroughs Street, and yesterday afternoon, when we were looking, we took a long drive."

"And have you found a house so soon?" asked her caller in some amazement.

"Yes, we have found quite a pretty one, and have decided to take it. It is very near the street cars and only about 10 minutes' walk from the steam cars. It is quite near Pond Street, too, which is the pleasantest place we saw."

It is with true German enterprise that the Paurs go house hunting. In one afternoon they found a house, and when asked how soon they expected to move into their new home Mrs. Paur said:

"By the last of this week we expect to move in. It is very pleasant here at the hotel,"—and, indeed, the apartment is one of the pleasantest in the Thorndike, overlooking the Public Gardens, which are in the height of their fall beauty—"but we do not like hotel life, and would much rather have a home of our own."

"Did you bring over furniture from Germany?"

"Oh, yes, indeed; but I am not sure what we will do with it," she said, with a look of comic dismay. "Why, your American furniture is so small!" And she thinks the houses are made to fit the furniture.

"Our furniture is so large I do not know how we can get it into the house, the rooms seem so much smaller and lower than they are at home. But we shall be glad to have a house by ourselves. That will be better than what we had in Leipzig, for there are very few private houses there, you know. Nearly all of them are apartments."

Mrs. Paur's voyage from Europe was somewhat tedious, as she was very sick all the way. But she magnanimously says it is a beautiful trip.

"I was in my berth all the way until the very last day," she said. "But Mr. Paur was not sick at all, and enjoyed the trip very much."

"You did not stay in New York long enough to form much of an idea of the city, I presume?" said the Journal's representative.

"Well, of course, we could not see it all, but I think we saw the most beautiful part of the place," said Mrs. Paur. "We were only there two days, but we took a very long drive. We saw the beautiful residences and Central Park, and also went to Riverside Park, where we had a beautiful view of the Hudson River."

"Were you glad to have Mr. Paur come to America?"

"Oh, yes, it is such a very fine position," said Mrs. Paur. "And then the Symphony is such a fine orchestra, I am sure he will enjoy working with them very much. You know D'Albert says the Symphony is one of the best orchestras in the world."

When asked if she expected to appear in public herself, Mrs. Paur said: "Perhaps, although I am not sure yet. I am not anxious for notoriety," she added with a little laugh.

It is tolerably safe to assume, however, that Bostonians will not permit Mrs. Paur to remain very long in their vicinity unheard, for her musical gifts are pronounced to be very rare. She began her musical studies at Stuttgart, but went from there to Mannheim. She was greatly encouraged by the best masters to pursue her studies most diligently, and it was in accordance with the advice of Rubinstein that she studied with Leschetitzki and his wife, Annetta Essipoff.

"You have played in Leipzig a good deal, have you not?" asked the caller from the Journal.

"Yes; both alone and with Mr. Paur. We like best to play together on two pianos."

Their little sons, too, are very musical, for they have two, respectively 10 and 8 years of age.

"They are very fond of music of all kinds," said the justly proud mother, "although the older one cares more for books than for studying music. He likes to hear it, but he does not enjoy practicing. The younger one, however, plays quite well for a little fellow and practices quite a good deal."

Mr. and Mrs. Paur are much devoted to their music, and, in Leipzig, were always busy with their practicing and public work. Gracious, accomplished and vivacious they were highly esteemed by a large number of German friends. The programmes of their concerts always consisted of selections of rarest delicacy and most exceptional value from favorite composers, and ... they will look forward to a musical ... which will afford unusual attractions ... the highest expectations of musical ...cal Boston.

HELEN MAR SHAW.

MR. AND MRS. PAUR'S BOSTON HOME.

No. 23 Burroughs Street, Jamaica Plain, is an unassuming building, half hidden from the street by a large horse-chestnut tree, which just now, with its yellowing leaves, stands out in strong contrast to the brown-walled house. The grounds, though limited, are very pleasing, there being a number of shrubs and flowering plants in beds, while against the fence is a rose hedge, which in the time of bloom must be a delight to the residents. A smooth driveway leads to a cosey little stable in the rear of the house.

MARIE PAUR-BURGER,
...ife of the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

CHILDREN OF MR. AND MRS. PAUR.

BOSTON HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 7,

HE HAS COME; he has seen and been seen by a select few, your humble servant among the number, and he is soon to have his opportunity to conquer.

.....

To whom do I refer? Why to Emil Paur, our new Symphony conductor, to be sure. Mr. Paur is at present enjoying Mr. Damon's expensive hospitality at "The Thorndike," but soon hopes to build himself a nest in one of our pleasant suburbs, Jamaica Plain possibly.

.....

If one may judge at all from the printed interviews, Mr. Paur is possessed of a large amount of tact, for he has been plied with the usual test questions, as to "how he enjoyed his voyage," "was he favorably impressed with America," "in his opinion how did the musicians of his country compare with our own and others," "what school of music he favored," etc., and while he has not been found wanting, he certainly has not been committal in these matters. We congratulate him on possessing tact, he will need it we think. Is it not so?

.....

If Mr. Paur differs from his predecessors as much in temperament as he does in personal appearance we may expect innovations of a pronounced type, for the gentleman is light as to complexion, sandy as to beard, and his eyes blue and laughing. Totally at variance you see with the "passionate" Henschel, conservative Gericke, or the "sensational" Nikisch, who have all been dark haired and of pallid skin.

.....

He brings with him his wife and two sons. Mrs. Paur is a pianist of repute in her own country, a pupil of Essipoff, so great a favorite in America, and of Leschetitzky. She will be heard in public ere long and each of us may judge for his or herself.

.....

This is the second time Mr. Paur has succeeded Mr. Nikisch as conductor, the first time being at Leipsic some few years ago. He then not only replaced Nikisch, who was the people's idol, but supplanted him in their critical affection after a very short time. We shall see if that will be the case here.

.....

As I was crossing the Common the other day, my eye was attracted to a sheet of paper at my feet, and upon which I was about to step. Now as a sheet of paper is not a rarity to me and as it was difficult for my foot, from its size, to overcome the inertia of motion, I stepped on the paper and should have passed on, but that I was seized with an impulse I could not account for, to pick up that paper. I did so and found it to be a letter from which the envelope had been torn and intended for Emil Paur.

.....

How it came there will always remain a mystery, probably the old story of the messenger boy who stopped to gossip or play marbles with his mates; at any rate, being in too dilapidated a condition to remail, it seemed to me that it might be a good thing to print it in these columns, that the effort of some well wisher of Mr. Paur might not be wholly lost. Here it is:—

....

Parker House, Oct. 1st, '93.

My dear Mr. Paur:—As you are a stranger and in a foreign land, it seems but fair that some one should give you a few points as to what lies before you, that you may not be subjected to too many shocks, either of joy or sorrow, for the joys and sorrows of a musician in this city are pretty sure to be well intermingled, and it really depends upon his or her start, as to which predominates. Of course, I know that any one who does what I am doing is always considered officious and is never thanked, but I am willing to immolate myself upon the altar of my unknown friendship for you. I shall have some compensation in the way of being able to say, "I told you so" as things progress.

We Bostonians are, as you may have heard, a cultured and learned people. The first quality is indicated by our ofttimes rude manner, (the prerogative of cultured people), and the latter by the prevalence of eyeglasses among us. We have also, I may say, a reserve force of brain power, which we don't use every day, for we are a thrifty people and like to keep something for great occasions. This fact will account to you for many things you may see or hear in the next five years. This country differs from your own in that it is the women who are all powerful, instead of the men. Boston is essentially a woman's city in most points, and where you find women you find "Fads," and the latest one is "Faddism." This is a quality that allows merit to pass by unnoticed very frequently, while mediocrity is raised to a pedestal. However, there is no need of enlarging upon this topic, for such will not be your fate at present, for your position in itself commands respect, and your sex will insure to you adulation. This is another point for future use.

The women being sure to endorse you, you will not lack for the support of their fathers, husbands and brothers. Therefore, socially, you may be considered "in it."

As for the critics, well, as Kipling says, "that is another matter." They are, generally speaking, highly cultured, broad-minded gentlemen in whom prejudice is a thing unprecedented. Still, if you would be popular with them, I wouldn't show too much originality or make any flaring flights. We are conservative people, and our critics don't like that sort of thing. Your demeanor must be just "betwixt and between," for if you show too much temperament, you will be found "dramatic," and if too little, "stolid."

For the musicians, well, I wouldn't make too many changes in the orchestra, for they all have friends, and our friends in this part of the country are so loyal—to us. It might not be pleasant, you know. Well, my dear Mr. Paur, my best wishes will be with you on the occasion of your début, and if you see fit to try to follow any of the suggestions I have made, you cannot possibly get more tangled up than you will if you try the plan of minding your own business and doing your duty. I am, my very dear sir,

Yours most sincerely,
A MEDDLER.

American Art Journal.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 7, 1893.

Once more the Symphony auctions have taken place. As usual, the rehearsal tickets brought the best premiums, the highest point being $66 for a few seats; but this is a big descent from the nearly $400 of last year, and not many seats reached $50. Though some of the less desirable brought higher prices than in 1892, the average was much lower; and the evening prices ranged so low that most music-lovers can afford to hear the 24 concerts this season. Many fair seats were passed without a bid. The regular prices, as heretofore, are $12 and $7.50.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, OCT. 8.

CYNICISMS.

I wonder what impression the new conductor of the Symphony Orchestra will make. I do not mean what the public and the critics will think of him, but what effect he will have on the more youthful femininity that glorify the rehearsals. It seems that Mr. Paur is a blonde. He is the first who has wielded a baton over the orchestra. The others were of a different complexion. This should be in his favor, as a mere matter of change. However, all will depend on the girls. I wonder if they will forget the allegiance they swore to Mr. Nikisch when he was new to them; how they admired the poetic pallor of his countenance, and were fascinated by the whiteness of his hands when they protruded beyond the extensive shirt cuffs that he affected. I think, too, that they felt drawn toward him by the fact that he appeared to be in ill health, and that the prevailing expression of his face was one of profound melancholy. It is true that they never saw him when he was drinking lager beer or playing poker, but that was only so much in his favor. I cannot say that I admired him very greatly as a conductor, but I had a sincere admiration for him in his aspect as a poseur. There can be no question that he had talent in a certain way, as a musician, but he was gifted with positive genius for posing. I remember when he first came here the members of the orchestra were delighted with him. They hailed him as a welcome change from the stern discipline of his predecessor, Gericke, as they hailed the latter as a vast improvement on his predecessor, Henschel. In Nikisch there was nothing of Henschel's lack of camaraderie, or of Gericke's dignified stiffness. In fact, the men were charmed with him. By and by, however, this feeling of enthusiasm dimmed, and then dissipated. If I were a conductor, I am not sure whether I should feel pleased or otherwise if an orchestra took to me with admiration at the outset of my acquaintance with them. I have known many orchestras, but I never met one that did not heartily dislike its conductor after it had served under him for any length of time. I am curious to learn what the Symphony Orchestra thinks of its new conductor. Its opinion is doubtless favorable, but it is as certain to go the other way as it is that to-morrow's sun will shine. This matters very little, however, for Herr Paur's success here does not depend on his orchestra's like or dislike of him. It depends on the ladies. From all the reports that have preceded him hither, it would appear that he is a man eminently fitted for the post he has been called upon to fill. That, however, is not essentially a prime factor in his possible success. All depends on how he begins; on how and by whom he is taken up. Of course, it is understood than an artist occupying so prominent a position as that of conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, must be taken up; and already there is a spirited competition among the usual takers. This eagerness to obtain him is easily accounted for, on the ground that those who succeed in catching him attain a certain distinction as art patrons, and shine by reflected light. The only difficulty in the matter is, that there are rival coteries, little cliques, so to speak, each one of which is at daggers drawn with the others; and the consequence is that, if he permits himself to be caught by one, he makes enemies of the rest. The situation is perplexing; and it is to be hoped that Herr Paur will learn who is who and what is what before he suffers himself to be captured by the lion hunters, who become lions themselves through the larger lions that they capture. After he is once in the toils, he must be careful to remember that he is tethered, and must not strain his rope and get into the next field, if he would not find himself suddenly in disfavor with his capturers. As for his artistic merits, he may leave them safely to the judgment and appreciation of the really musical public and his critics. Still, I await the verdict of the Rehearsal girls; not on his conducting, but on the impression his personality will make. They have admired all of the Symphony conductors in turn, but they raved over Nikisch, despite the peculiar cut of his trousers, and remained loyal to him when nearly everybody else had deserted him. It remains to be seen if they will transfer their admiration in its gushing fulness to his successor. If he knew the intensity of the feeling experienced by Japonicadom to see him, and to pass judgment on him, he could scarcely avoid a painful nervousness until the ordeal was over. Does he realize how much hinges on that first Friday afternoon?

***

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its first performances this season at Music Hall, next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Mr. Paur will introduce himself to the Boston public with a performance of the Beethoven Fifth Symphony. The other numbers of the programme are, Serenade for String Orchestra by Tschaikowsky, and the overture, "Tannhauser," Wagner. It goes without saying that great interest will attach to these occasions, and Mr. Paur will be greeted by two of the finest audiences that Boston can provide. For the first time in several years a limited number of single tickets, with reserved seats, are available for both the rehearsals and concerts. These tickets will be placed on sale at Music Hall tomorrow morning.

The Cambridge concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Sander's Theatre, on Thursday evenings, Oct. 19, Nov. 2, Nov. 16, Dec. 7, Jan. 4, Jan. 25, Feb. 15, March 8, April 5 and April 26. Mme. Nordica, Mr. Max Heinrich, Mr. Kneisel, Mr. Schulz and other artists will appear as soloists. The The sale of season tickets for these concerts opens at the University Book Store, Cambridge, next Saturday morning. A limited number of seats will be reserved for college officers, and invited guests.

The Kneisel Quartet will give its usual series of chamber concerts, at Chickering Hall, during the season. Mr. Kneisel secured a number of interesting and important novelties during his summer in Europe. Some of these will have an early hearing in his concerts.

SANDERS THEATRE, CAMBRIDGE.

BOSTON
Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

Ten Concerts on Thursday Evenings

Oct. 19, Nov. 2, Nov. 16, Dec. 7, Jan. 4, Jan. 25, Feb. 15, March 8, April 5, April 26.

Soloists: Mme. NORDICA, Mr. HEINRICH, Mr. KNEISEL, Mr. SCHULZ, and others.

Season tickets, with reserved seats for the series of ten concerts, $7.50, will be on sale at the University Bookstore, Cambridge, on and after Saturday, Oct. 14. Sale opens at 8 A.M. A limited number of tickets will be reserved for College officers and invited guests.

— The Rehearsal girl is going to be madly disappointed when the musical stranger within our gates, Paur by name, and said to be power by nature, steps upon the soap box of a stand, come opening day of the "Symphs." The newspapers have done this thing. They thought they did nobly in publishing portraits of Herr Paur, but they made their cuts before he cut his Sampsonian locks and cropped his beard, and now he is in danger of being cut by his best friends, so changed is he in appearance. It's too bad, just when we thought to have poetic Georg and Arthur, both recalled by the tossing mane of Paur, as it has been portrayed. What does this retrenchment of the crowning glory of woman—and presumably of man—just before ... stand for?

[18]

Boston Journal.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

BOSTON POST.

Boston Journal.
SUNDAY, OCTOBER 8, 1893.

MR. PAUR'S FIRST.

How He Led the Symphony at Rehearsal.

The Journal Gives the First Description.

He Finds an Orchestra That Can Play "Piano."

On Wednesday last Mr. Emil Paur, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was first presented privately to that famous organization as a body, and for the first time guided it through the musical maze with his eloquent baton.

A private rehearsal of the Symphony Orchestra is only one degree less secret than a meeting of a Masonic Lodge. You cannot get into the hall for love or money. All the avenues of ingress are closed save one, and this is closely guarded by two argus-eyed representatives of Mr. Higginson.

CHARACTERISTIC ATTITUDES OF HERR PAUR.

Even Mr. Ellis, the manager of the hall, is debarred. So it was on Wednesday. From above floated in indistinct harmonies the music of the orchestra, but the strongest vision is incapable of piercing several flights of stairs and a thick door, as Mr. Sam Weller discovered long ago.

"A Chiel Amang Ye Taking Notes."

But it is possible for the Journal to get into the corridors, and, witnessing the rehearsal, become the first newspaper to tell its readers of Herr Paur's initial work with his famous orchestra.

He has already won golden opinions of the men who are to be his associates and are to follow his bidding at the concerts for the next three years, and, as far as can be learned, the comparisons between him and Mr. Nikish are all in favor of the new arrival.

"The Observed of All Observers."

By twos and threes the musicians came to Music Hall on Wednesday morning, nearly all possessed with a tremendous curiosity to ascertain by personal observation what manner of man the new conductor might be. To the greater number he was a total stranger, for, while he is known to a few of the men, who have met him abroad, he is too young and began his career as leader at a time subsequent to that during which the veterans of the orchestra were in Germany.

The 90 odd musicians ranged themselves along the wooden amphitheatrical structure, which was in place of the stage, all in their accustomed positions. There were only three absentees. One was Mr. J. Schnitzler, first violin, who has not yet returned to the city, but who will be here before long. The other two were both basses, and had both been disabled by accidents. Mr. Goldstein had the misfortune to break one of his legs a short time since, and the other gentleman will be invalided for some time, on account of his having cut an artery in one of his arms, and thereby lost a great deal of blood. The vacancies will be speedily filled.

Interest and expectation were manifest on every face. The younger men could not sit still, and even the veterans who have played in Music Hall under all the successive administrations of the leadership kept rubbing their glasses and watching the door of the room where Mr. Paur and Col. Higginson were closeted.

The only outsider in the hall was gray-haired Carl Zerrahn, whose musical name and fame entitled him to the privilege.

"Hail to the Chief."

A few minutes after 10 o'clock the tall form of Col. Higginson appeared, crowned with the polished and altogether irreproachable headgear that is inseparable from his identity. At his side walked Mr. Paur, with a baton in his hand and a most genial smile upon his golden-bearded face. He advanced to the centre of the amphitheatre, where Col. Higginson, without further ado, introduced him to the members of the orchestra.

Mr. Paur buttoned up his rather loose and flowing frock coat, glanced at the floor and then up at the sounding board as if he rather wondered how the electric light chandeliers got through the holes, and then made a little speech. He waved his arm, and it was plain to see that he said he was glad to meet them.

A Mutual Admiration Scene.

The next minute a conscious smile rippled from chair to chair, and anyone with half an eye could have told that the speaker was telling his hearers how the splendid reputation of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has passed the ocean, and that he was pleased and proud of the privilege of being called to lead them.

Then a look of exceeding virtue succeeded the smile which meant, of course, that the new conductor had just told them that he hoped for their cordial co-operation in making the coming season a great success.

A slight inclination of the body concluded the oration. It was the briefest, most unconventional sort of a bow, just the kind of a salutation which you would bestow upon a friend were you to meet him upon the street some afternoon with his wife upon his arm, and as different from Arthur Nikisch's jackknife manœuver as could be imagined.

The orchestra applauded, and the faint crepitation produced by the smiting together of 90 pairs of hands sounded like the distant rattle of hailstones upon a slated roof.

Now to Business.

Then the rehearsal began. The first work essayed was Beethoven's seventh (heroic) symphony. It was familiar enough to both leader and musicians, and started off with a confident swing and spirit. Mr. Paur's blue eyes kindled with animation as it proceeded, and the strokes of his baton, at first short and precise, grew longer and more vigorous.

His method of conducting is not like that of his predecessor. It is not so graceful, and the poetry of motion which was wont to fascinate the symphony girls will be missed. But the members of the orchestra say that it is much more easy to follow. Somehow Mr. Nikisch's poetic waves were not always to be interpreted, and the musicians played on in such emergencies as their own experience suggested. With Paur there is no mistaking what he wants. Every stroke means something and is emphasized, and a nod of the head and a jerk of the other arm serves to impress the idea still further. To sum it up, Mr. Paur is not a graceful conductor; in fact, as far as could be seen from his first rehearsal, his manner seems to be a trifle clumsy in aspect. He moves his body from side to side, and this, together with his short and "stocky" physique, gives the impression. But the players say that the symphony was beautifully rendered. The music of the stately funeral march rolled grandly through the hall, and the smile which lit up Mr. Paur's countenance showed that he was entirely happy.

Piano!

"I have heard," he said, "that you can play piano. I have never heard an orchestra play piano and would like to now."

Soon a piano passage was reached and the great orchestra was playing with that wonderful sweetness, lightness and delicacy that can be likened only to the strains of a choir of æolian harps all pitched in perfect accord, and which has made the organization celebrated all over the musical world.

When it was finished Mr. Paur stood still a moment without saying a word. Then he bowed low to his men and said: "I have heard you play piano. I thank you, gentlemen."

When the customary recess was taken the musicians strolled about the hall or down stairs into the lower corridor. They naturally discussed their new leader, and there was no dissent from the favorable opinion of his merits as a musician, and his qualities as a man that were freely expressed.

A Man Among Men.

He has showed an unmistakeable disposition to be friendly with his new associates, and their relations will be most pleasant. He will be popular, and that means a good deal. It is no harm now to say that his immediate predecessor was decidedly unpopular on account of his manner and the disdainful air with which he was accustomed to treat the men. "When he saw one of us coming he would pose," was how one of them expressed it.

But the recess was over and the rehearsal was recommenced. The second number on the programme was the Cherubini Overture. This was taken right through without interruptions, and at the close the leader was mopping his brow in a fashion that showed how the vigor of his exertions had told upon him. It was evident, however, that he was more than satisfied with the performance.

The third and last selection was Bethoven's Leonore, No. 3. This was executed with skill and taste, and then the orchestra dispersed.

They will rehearse every day from now on until the first concert, but after that Mr. Paur has announced that Monday will be a day off. This is a concession that is highly appreciated, for being obliged to rehearse every day in the week, as has hitherto been the rule, is a weariness and vexation of spirit.

When Mr. Paur rehearsed with the Symphony Orchestra Thursday he was "as happy as a child," to borrow the expression of an eye-witness of his joy. This joy was not dampened by the fact that he perspired freely, and thus again showed his resemblance to "a Norse god"; for the heroes of Northern mythology were a rude, hardy race, always exercising violently, that is, when they were not drinking mead. Mr. Paur's physical condition attracted the attention of the players, who are surely by this time used to strange sights and habituated to every degree of atmospheric condition.

This perspiration is a good sign; in Mr. Paur's case it goes with strength, earnestness, conviction. Better this sledge-hammer style of direction than the languid wave of a lily-white left hand. Mr. Paur's beat is said to be eminently virile; it is alleged to be Roman, not Byzantine. Well, we shall soon see.

But I am grieved to hear that Mr. Paur is not acclimated, and that he does not enjoy our American cookery. Nay, I hear he even flouts our oysters; but it is not to be expected that our distinguished guest will appreciate in the twinkling of an eye the full glory of the country of his adoption.

It is possible that Mr. Paur sighs for gose, that beer so dear to the people of Leipsic, but a deadly mixture to the foreigner.

As Mr. Paur will be obliged later in the course of his symphonic wanderings to traverse in large measure the great North American Pie-Belt, he should inure himself to our pastry as soon as possible. There is no sudden antidote to pie. The foreigner should remember Mithridates, that warlike King of Pontus and Bythynia, who took poison daily, lest some day he might take it suddenly; the foreigner should call for pie the moment of landing, so that the more dangerous Western brand may find his stomach prepared for the shock.

It is said that at the first rehearsal Mr. Paur ran through Beethoven's Third Symphony, a Cherubini overture, and Beethoven's Leonore No. III.

* *

Miss Elizabeth Hamlin has been asked by the directors of the Handel and Haydn Society to

SUNDAY TEL[illegible]
PROVIDE[illegible]
OCTOBER 8, 1893.

Events Par Excellence.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give six concerts in Infantry Hall on Wednesday evenings, Oct. 25, Nov. 22, Dec. 20, Jan. 17, Feb. 28 and April 11. Both in an artistic sense and considered as a popular attraction this organization has long held first place among the musical enterprises of this country. Its coming series of performances will excite more than usual attention for many reasons. They will introduce a new conductor, who has already won high honors in more than one important position in Europe, and who will infuse new blood into the undertaking. The appearance of Mr. Emil Paur at the head of the orchestra will be awaited with the liveliest interest. The selection of Mr. Paur to succeed Mr. Nikisch was made after a careful consideration of the merits of nearly a score of eminent conductors who were available for the place. The position he is to assume is a most difficult one, but Mr. Paur is said to possess abilities which especially qualify him for its duties. He will find at his command an orchestra second to none in the world, and every incentive for the best work of his life.

The members of the orchestra, with very few exceptions, will be the same as last year. Mr. Kneisel will again lead the violins, and will be ably supported by Mr. Loeffler, Mr. Adamowski and the unrivaled section of violinists. Messrs. Sveceuski, Schroeder, Goldstein, Mole, Sautet, Goldschmidth, Gutter, Hackebarth, Hampe and Ludwig will, as before, head their respective departments of the orchestra, and Mr. Schuecker has been re-engaged as harpist.

Mme. Lillian Nordica will be the soloist at the first concert, and negotiations are in progress with other eminent artists who appear later. The sale of season tickets for the series will open at the box office, Infantry Hall, on Monday morning, Oct. 16. The management promises that the course this fall and winter will be the finest ever arranged, both in a general musical way and in respect to the standing of the soloists.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, OCTOBER 8, 1893.

Symphony Orchestra and Its New Director---Several Lectures and Musicales---Gossip.

The Boston symphony orchestra will give its first performances this season at Music hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Private rehearsals have already begun, and before the end of the week the orchestra will be in its best possible form. Mr Paur will introduce himself to the American public with a performance of Beethoven's immortal fifth symphony. The other numbers of his first programme are the serenade for string orchestra, op 48, Tschaikowsky, and the overture, "Tannhauser," Wagner.

Mme Nordica will be the soloist at the second concert, and Mme Emma Eames, Mr Kneisel and Mr Max Heinrich will be heard early in the season. For the first time in several years a limited number of tickets carrying reserved seats are available for single performances. These tickets will be placed on sale at Music hall next Monday morning.

[19]

REDUCTION

RATIO

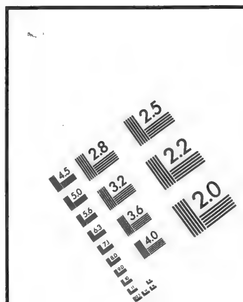
12x

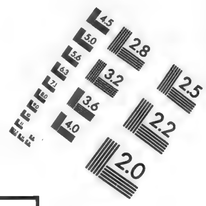
2.5 mm
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

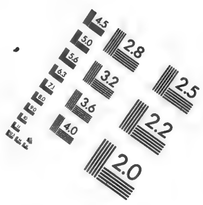
2.0 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

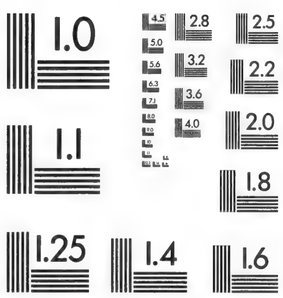






150 mm

100 mm



ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

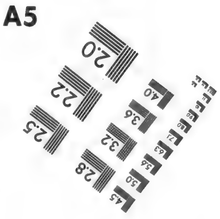
2.0 mm

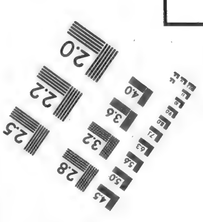
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.5 mm

A5

A4





PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

4.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.5 mm

...HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCIV. NO. 100.

SUNDAY, OCTOBER 8, 1893.

Mr. Emil Paur's Impressions and Plans.

"Do you know him?"

"No."

"Have you ever seen him?"

"Only in his photograph."

"Well, do you speak German?"

"Oh, yes."

"It's all right, then. Wie geht's?

"Ganz gut, danke. Und Ihnen?"

This was the beginning of a chat with the Thorndike clerk after the HERALD representative had sent up his card to the recently arrived conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra. Herr Emil Paur. The hotel man had some pleasant stories to tell of Herr Paur's experience with our language, and of his relief at finding a hotel where he could make himself understood. It turned out, however, that the would-be interviewer was to be the means of adding a new story to the list. For, although the bell boy returned with the news that Herr Paur would be down directly, it was learned, after half an hour's waiting, that the cordial conductor's intention had been to invite the visitor below to come up. The kindly apologies which the Kappellmeister made became the happiest possible means of opening the interview, which, being carried on in German, gave our new conductor perfect freedom to express himself on the various subjects which were suggested for discussion.

The reasons for requesting an interview were soon stated. "Herr Kapellmeister, you know that we Bostonians are very proud of our orchestra. We not only take delight in it ourselves, but we have great gratification in hearing the good reports of its work in other cities where the taste for orchestral music has had a chance to develop. And our interest in it is, we believe, more intimate, direct and general than any similar feeling in any city of the Union. The most insignificant facts concerning it are not without interest to a large proportion of the music-loving public. It goes without saying, then, that the personality and ideas of the conductor are subjects of an attention in no way to be mistaken for that idle curiosity which prompts the general public to inquire concerning any celebrated personage. It was thought, then, that you would not object to talking informally in response to concerning your ideas on several topics which suggest themselves to one who has attended our concerts for many seasons."

A Few Questions

"I should be very glad to do so, I assure you. The reputation of the orchestra is well known to me; for it has passed the limits of your country, and has spread through the whole of musical Europe. I have heard, too, of the friendliness and musical intelligence of the Boston public, and am looking forward with the greatest pleasure to the performance of the task before me. What are some of the questions which you would like to ask?"

"As to your musical sympathies—are they distinctly for the classic or for the modern schools?

"I am thoroughly unpartisan. I love and honor the classic writers, but am glad to recognize any evidences of talent or genius in the younger composers. Indeed, I consider it the duty of every conductor to be continually on the alert concerning newer productions. It is true that such a course involves much labor. One finds that a great proportion of contemporary compositions are worthless, but the satisfaction of introducing to the public something of real worth is to me very great. During all the time of my residence in Konigsberg and Mannheim I gave much attention to new works. It was at Mannheim that the "Ring of the Niebelungen" was produced for the first time outside of Bayreuth and Munich. You know that Mannheim has been, ever since before the time of Mozart, famous for its devotion to music."

"What have been the various stages in your career as a conductor?"

"It was in Vienna that I completed my studies. I early received much encouragement from my friends to devote myself to conducting, but it was not until, at the age of 19, I conducted with success a large choral performance in Berlin, that I definitely decided to adopt the career of Kapellmeister. I was for a time at Cassel, and in Hanover I came in contact with Von Bulow during the time when he was making his reputation as a conductor. My first absolutely independent position was in Konigsberg, where I remained several years. My period of service at Mannheim extended over 10 or 11 years, and when Nikisch left Leipzic I became his successor at the Stadttheater of that city. In Mannheim I gave also a great many concerts of chamber music, and have several times appeared as pianist at the Gewandhaus in Leipzic. You see that my musical activity has been very varied."

"You speak of your

Love for the Classics.

Do you think that the works of Beethoven should be rendered according to modern fashion or in a purely classical spirit?"

"Most decidedly the latter. I am not at all in sympathy with certain tendencies which have lately become so pronounced in these matters. Greatly as I admire Wagner, I think he went much too far in his interpretation of the Beethoven symphonies. I believe in programme music only to the extent that an idea, poetical or other, may underlie a musical composition. But I cannot sympathize with Wagner in his wish to invest some of Beethoven's compositions with scenic suggestions and dramatic developments which need other than musical terms of expression. Indeed, I feel myself especially fitted to undertake the rendering of Beethoven's works; for my father was an instrumentalist and was closely identified with the musical life of Vienna at the time when Beethoven was exercising a direct influence there. He early called to my attention the distinguishing points of Beethoven's genius, and pointed out the means which the master employed to carry out his artistic purposes."

"Who among all the composers most command your admiration?"

"Bach, Beethoven and Wagner represent for me the greatest in music. That may indicate for you the catholicity of my taste."

"If you were asked to give rank to Haydn and Mozart, where would you place them with reference to each other?"

"You ask that question so guardedly that I think perhaps you agree with me in not believing in drawing such comparisons. Both of these composers were consummate masters, perfectly individual, and thoroughly delightful. When one's mood is favorable to gayety Haydn's music is more welcome, but Mozart's late operas stand alone in the loftiest realms of music. Hayden is a sun, and Mozart is a sun, too. Luckily we may enjoy the warmth and brightness of each of

Wagner's Art Life

was between the beginning of the composition of the 'Master Singers' and the conclusion of the 'Ring.' This period includes these works and 'Tristan.' These, for me, represent Wagner at his greatest.'

"Of course you have often been at Bayreuth?"

"Nearly every season. I was there at the first performance '76."

"Then you must have met Liszt."

"Oh, yes, I was very intimate with him. When I directed the first performance of 'Gotterdammerung' in Mannheim—I believe I mentioned that—Liszt, Frau Cosima and others of Wagner's family were there to hear. I also gave in Mannheim what was considered to be an ideal performance of the 'Faust' symphony of Liszt."

"Do you consider that to be his greatest work?"

"Yes, if you use the word 'great,' I do so consider it. But I think that Liszt is most delightful, most characteristic, most spontaneous in his rhapsodies. They seem to me to be the happiest expression of his peculiar genius."

"And as to Brahms!"

"In the realm of absolute music Brahms is, in my opinion, the single German composer of today who possesses qualities of real greatness."

"You have, then, given many performances of his works?"

"I have produced practically everything of his. The C minor and E minor symphonies were performed in Mannheim while still in manuscript, and I have often been personally associated with Dr. Brahms in concert performances."

"Among those who belong to the so-called new German school, some have become very favorably known in America—Peter Cornelius, for instance."

"Yes, indeed; and what a pity it was that he died so young. He would certainly have accomplished many great works. I esteem very highly his songs, and consider his 'Barber of Bagdad' as one of the most important operatic works of our time. In the 'Cid,' too, there are moments of great power. His songs are very worthy of the popularity they are rapidly gaining in Germany."

"Have you interested yourself much in the work of Richard Strauss?"

"Yes, I know very well nearly all his published compositions. As my remarks concerning

Programme Music

may indicate, I cannot agree with him in his new departure in composition, as embodied in such symphonic poems as 'Death and Redemption,' 'Don Juan' and 'Macbeth.' His earlier works were full of great promise, and I greatly enjoy his symphony in F minor. Nevertheless, in regard to his later works, it is not to be denied that there are manifestations of a certain genius in them—a genius which, if guided by riper intelligence, may yield fruit in really great works. But that remains to be seen. At present there is too much 'programme' in him for my taste."

"Some of the Hungarian masters have no doubt claimed your attention?"

"Oh, yes, I place Dvorak by the side of Brahms, even if I must place the German master in the seat of honor. Dvorak has that which is rare in our day, a distinct and large individuality."

"And Moskowski?"

"I have never been drawn toward him as toward some other modern composers. Perhaps it would be better not to express myself in any more definite terms."

"What of the French composers?"

"The one who is now perhaps most popular, Massenet, has always seemed to me to be inspired in only a very moderate degree. Saint-Saens, on the contrary, I have always held in high esteem."

"A certain other French composer has lately excited attention in Germany. I refer to the composer of the opera 'Gwendoline,' Emmanuel Chabrier."

"I'm very glad you mentioned him. He is a delightful man, and a very good friend of mine. I suppose I did not think of him because he is not naturally classed with Frenchmen. Do you know, the poor fellow has become demented, and his friends think the reason of it to be the continued refusals of French theatre directors to undertake the production of his wonderful, but very difficult, opera. He has had little good fortune in his fatherland."

"That's the way it's likely to be with Frenchmen; they must——"

"Yes," said Herr Paur, anticipating what the writer was about to remark, "they must get recognition and fame in Germany before their countrymen wake up to the fact of their importance. So it was with Berlioz, so again with Saint-Saens."

"And in regard to the Russian masters?"

"I believe that Russia will have a great musical future. Tschaikowsky is easily the first among their living composers, and is certainly a very delightful and characteristic writer. Borodin, too, has been lately attracting much attention, especially in Berlin."

"And the English writers?"

"Well," said Herr Paur, with a smile, "as we sometimes say in Germany, history is silent concerning them, apparently."

Frau Paur, who had been in the room almost throughout the interview, here remarked to her husband: "But I thought I heard you speak once of an interesting symphony by a man named—what was it? —Kofen—"

"Ah, yes, Cowen. I do remember such a work. It was written, however, in clearly German style. For that matter, I believe that Cowen was educated in Germany. In general the English seem to me to have produced nothing of importance in the higher forms of music."

"And young America?"

"I really know too little about the productions of your countrymen to pass judgment. I can only say that I

Was Greatly Surprised

at the excellence of some works I heard in an orchestral concert of American compositions given in Leipzig under the direction of a certain Mr. Areus. I was so unfortunate as not to hear the symphony of Paine (Herr Paur called it Pynuh), which began the programme. I do very distinctly remember that something by MacDowell excited my admiration. 'There were works by—what was he called?—Chad——"

"Chadwick," suggested Frau Paur.

"Yes, that was it. Chadwick; and also something by Van der Stucken. Possibly there were others. In general, I remember, as I said before, that the extraordinary possibilities of your musical development impressed themselves upon me."

"Is there any one among the well known German musical critics with whose ideas you in general agree?"

"Hardly," was the reply, after a moment's thought. "Hanslick would be such a one, were it not for his wholesale condemnation of Wagner. By the way, did you know that Hanslick has experienced a partial conversion, and has been induced to recognize that he went too far in the earlier days. Dr. Wilhelm Tappert—of whom you doubtless have heard as a writer on musical subjects—had happened to preserve Hanslick's criticisms of the first performances he heard of 'Tannhauser' more than 20 years ago. Not long since Hanslick wrote a feuilleton praising certain parts of the opera. Dr. Tappert took the opportunity to lay before Hanslick the two criticisms, one of earlier years, one of today. The author of 'The Musically Beautiful' was obliged to confess that he had made some mistakes."

"Exactly what was your connection with the musical life of Leipzig?"

"I was chief director in the Stadt Theatre; that was my only official position. But I directed numerous large charity concerts in the Gewandhaus and also directed the ... Subscription Concerts. During the last winter I had the direction of the semi-centennial celebration of Rubinstein's first appearance in Leipzig. The master himself was there. We performed his great oratorio, 'Moses.' At a matinee at our house we had some chamber music works of his, among others the fantasy for two pianos, which my wife and I played.

Rubinstein Seemed Delighted, and richly rewarded our endeavors by treating us and the assembled company of musicians to an improvisation in his happiest vein. That evening I had arranged for a public concert of chamber music in the old Gewandhaus—no longer the hall for the regular concerts—where Rubinstein, then a boy of 12 or so, made his first appearance in Leipzig. We had a bust of the master before the stage, and the hall was suitably decorated. My wife and I played again the fantasy, and several other of his works were given. Again the enthusiasm was unbounded, and again Rubinstein delighted the hearers by his own playing. One of his last messages to me was: "If I cannot get my 'Christus' done in Germany, I'll come to you in America. The Americans will do it for me."

"Do you prefer to conduct in the theatre or in the concert hall?"

"Do you know," said Herr Paur with a sigh of apparent relief, while his wife seconded by a smile and nod the declaration which she knew was about to be made, "I consider it as a deliverance that I have nothing more to do with the theatre. Play houses are, after all, only business houses nowadays. That which will draw must be performed, and that which will not draw never receives the attention it deserves. And so it comes about that there are very few performances of great works concerning which the conscientious artist can truly say to himself: Well done! In concert performances, however, one may have plenty of time for preparation, and there are not so many influences which militate against really artistic work. The one thing which I used to object to in Leipzig is absent here. There the public want at least two soloists, and long programmes have become the rule. As a result, the minds of the audience are no longer in a condition to listen to the symphony which closes the programme. I am glad to note that there is a more sensible arrangement here."

"Have you as yet made the acquaintance of any of the Resident American Musicians?"

"As yet, none."

"Have you already held a rehearsal?"

"Yes, a single one."

"And how does the orchestra strike you?"

"My expectations were very high. I am glad to say that the reality has surpassed them. The tone quality (der Klang) is wonderfully fine. I cannot conceive of a better implement for the working out of orchestral problems than this very orchestra. I can't help hoping that the new hall which is to be erected will be modelled primarily with reference to the orchestral concerts. The present hall seems excellent, though a trifle too broad for its length. Too broad halls are not favorable to the hearing of orchestral composition. Nowadays they are too likely to build halls that may be used for concerts, for theatrical performances and possibly, on occasion, for a circus show. It would be a pity not to plan the new hall for the best interests of our orchestra. And, do you know," continued Herr Paur, "another delightful thing to me is that the orchestra is composed almost exclusively of young men. That has long been a desire of mine, to conduct an orchestra of young musicians. In Boston I shall have found my ideal in that respect."

"In general, how will your programmes be made up?"

"In length, about as they have been. I am not an enthusiastic friend of 'historical' programmes—three symphonies in one evening, for instance. I don't believe in overdoing one particular style of composition, as is especially likely to be the case with the overture. Again, I believe that works of widely different types should not be intimately associated on a programme. Harsh antitheses should be avoided."

"Is your first programme already made?"

"Oh, yes," replied the conductor, drawing a bundle of notes from his pocket. "I have the programmes of the first 15 concerts more or less clearly determined. The first programme will consist of the C minor symphony of Beethoven, a serenade for strings by Tschaikowsky and Wagner's Tannhauser overture. There will be no soloist."

"What Novelties

may we expect this season?"

"I have on my list the following late works, most of which will, I think, be novelties: Second rhapsody, by Dvorak; overture, 'Bernhard von Weimar,' Raff; symphony in F minor, Richard Strauss; symphonie dramatique, Rubenstein; 'cappriccio Italien, Tschaikowsky; Dimitrius overture, Rubinstein; Seventh Symphony, Dvorak; overture to Ibsen's 'Nordische Heerfahrt,' by a Danish composer, Hartmann; prelude to second act of 'Gwendoline,' Chabrier; double concerto, Brahms; serenade for small orchestra, Brahms; Hamlet overture, Gade."

"There is nothing by any American on your list?"

"No, not yet. I have as yet had no time to look about me with a view to finding American novelties."

"Are there any prospects of a chorus in connection with the orchestra?"

"Concerning that I know nothing. I should be very glad if there could exist a competent body of singers for our assistance. Of course, every conductor wants to give the Ninth Symphony. That is the crown of all things musical. But unless it can be well given it is better not to attempt it. My ideals in reference to the Ninth Symphony were formed in Vienna, where there are performances not only adequate, but superb. I have never heard such chorus singing in Germany proper. I should dislike to undertake a performance which could not carry out my convictions concerning the work."

The interviewer had exhausted his supply of questions and confessed the fact to Herr Paur. The latter did not at all seem overcatechised or fatigued, and urged his caller not to hurry away, as, perhaps, something might come to his mind if the chat were continued. Some general conversation followed, in which the wife of the conductor took part. The only matters of musical interest touched upon were some interesting details concerning Herr Paur and Von Bulow. In the old days of Hannover there were many friendly controversies between the two concerning the interpretations of Beethoven's works. Paur could not countenance the "enormous freedoms" which Von Bulow allowed himself. And the younger man has had the satisfaction in later years of a recognition of the rightness of his more conservative views.

"That does not mean," said Herr Paur, "that I think the Beethoven symphonies ought to be rattled off as if by a barrel organ. No; but I believe that Beethoven's ideas, if properly presented, are sufficiently characteristic of themselves, without being colored especially for the occasion."

Both Herr and Frau Paur were delighted at the prospect of being soon settled in their cosey home in Jamaica Plain. They are apparently not only ready, but anxious, to begin life as Bostonians. Certainly those who may have the good fortune to make their acquaintance have a delightful experience in store. The interviewer left them with the firm conviction that, if artistic devotion, superb professional training and a delightful personality are determining qualities of excellence in a conductor of the Symphony orchestra, our good friend, Mr. Higginson, has found an ideal incumbent in Herr Emil Paur.

BENEDICK.

[20]

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

THIRTEENTH SEASON, 1893-94.

6 Grand Concerts!

IN INFANTRY HALL,

WEDNESDAY EVENINGS, Oct. 25, Nov. 22, Dec. 20, Jan. 17, Feb. 28, April 11,

Mme. NORDICA, Mr. LOEFFLER,

and other distinguished artists will appear as soloists.

Season tickets with reserved seats for the series of six concerts, $5. Programme books, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed, will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets.

The sale of season tickets will open at the box office, Infantry Hall, Monday morning, October 16. To insure a fair distribution of seats, no more than ten tickets will be sold to one person. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 11, 1893.

Well, we have heard much this week about Mr. and Mrs. Paur. The first rehearsal of the orchestra under the new leader was held the 5th, and I am told the secrecy was equal to that observed in ancient days at the performances at Eleusis. Newspaper reporters, male and female, haunted the corridors, but they could see nothing. Peepholes were covered and I should not wonder if the players observed a pianissimo throughout. And yet there were leaks somewhere. It is said that the pieces rehearsed were Beethoven's third symphony, Cherubini's overture to "The Water Carriers," and Beethoven's "Leonore" overture No. 3. Mr. Paur was "as delighted as a boy." It is alleged that he perspires freely in the act of directing, and that his beat is firm and heavy; or "massive and concrete" as the young man described in "Great Expectations" a reading of Shakespeare by an eminent tragedian.

There are rumors that Mr. Paur is not yet accustomed to American cookery; that he does not relish oysters; that he eschews beer. Take these rumors for what they are worth.

It is also said, and this is perhaps more to the point, that the players respect the new conductor thoroughly, and find enjoyment in obeying his wishes.

The one question asked now in street car or on street corner is, "Have you met Paur?"

* * *

Nor has Mrs. Paur escaped She was interviewed this week at considerable length. Here are extracts: "I learned my English in school, and that was a long time ago."

"So few people speak German in Boston. It is quite different from New York."

"I felt very sorry to leave all my German friends at home."

"I brought over furniture from Germany; but I am not sure what we will do with it. Why, your American furniture is so small. We shall be glad to have a house by ourselves. That will be better than what we had in Leipsic, for there are very few private houses there, you know."

"The Symphony is such a fine orchestra I am sure Mr. Paur will enjoy working with them very much. You know d'Albert says the Symphony is one of the best orchestras in the world."

"I am not anxious for notoriety."

And then "their little sons too are very musical."

These sons are respectively ten and eight years old. Mr. and Mrs. Paur were made man and wife in 1881.

* * *

It is stated that the program of the first Symphony concert, October 14, will include Beethoven's C minor symphony, a serenade for strings by Tschaikowsky, and the "Tannhauser" overture. There will be no soloist.

The usual series of chamber music concerts will be given at Chickering Hall by the Kneisel string quartet during the coming season. The concerts will be given on Monday evenings, October 23, November 13, December 4, January 1, January 27, February 12, March 5 and March 19.

Manager C. A. Ellis, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announces that ten concerts will be given by that organization at Sanders' Theatre, Cambridge, during the coming season, the dates being the evenings of October 19, November 2, November 16, December 7, January 4, January 25, February 15, March 8, April 5, April 26. The orchestra will be assisted by Nordica, Max Heinrich, Kneisel, Schulz and others.

EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR.

Career of the New Leader of the Boston Orchestra.

HE IS A MUSICAL PRODIGY WHO HASN'T PETERED OUT.

Operatic Successes in Germany.—Said to be a Maker of Good Programmes.

EMIL PAUR'S arrival in Boston has started a fresh and increased amount of inquiry among the people who frequent Symphony Concerts, and the chief events of his career, his age, the probabilities as to his programmes, and the hundred and one possibilities of his advent as conductor have to be stated over and over again by the attendants at Boston Music Hall. Here in Providence, where there will be given this season the usual six concerts, interest in what we may expect from the successor of Nikisch is proportionately large. It is Emil Paur's second time of being chosen successor to Arthur Nikisch. The first was as leader of the orchestra at the Leipsig Theatre. No puffing, no blowing of trumpets preceded him, only a short notice of his activity in Mannheim. His predecessor, Nikisch, had not only been enthusiastically, almost idolatrously, received at the farewell evening in the theatre, and also at farewell festivities in private circles.

EMIL PAUR.

The partisans of Nikisch declared such a conductor could never be replaced. What a surprise was the first appearance of Mr. Paur! Unexampled applause, loud recalls, glowing enthusiasm! It was a perfect victory. It was interesting to observe how the new conductor differed in externals from his predecessor, writes one who was there. If Nikisch impressed by his solemn manner, quiet and almost stiff demeanor, one might almost say, his stony calmness, Paur led with youthful fire and glowing inspiration. The former held his head, framed in black, with immovable pale face, always high, but the latter moved in a lively way; his fair curly hair strayed about, and every movement betrayed his south German temperament. One would see he was quite taken up by his artistic office, that he wished every tone to be given with full effect, and that with his whole soul he seemed to play himself upon every instrument.

In his conduct at Leipsig Paur has been free from all national prejudice. He conducted the operas of the old and new French and Italian composers just as carefully, spiritedly and ingeniously as the German ones. The mutilation of masterpieces, as is unfortunately the custom, through unscrupulous leaders and careless singers, he thoroughly condemned. He reproduced them, as in the original, however much it annoyed the indolent singers and members of the orchestra.

Paur comes to the leadership of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at a yearly salary of 40,000 marks, which in American money is equivalent to about $10,000 in round figures. There was some trouble and delay about the negotiations, because Paur's contract at the Leipsig Opera House had still two years to run. But the matter was settled by Mr. Higginson coming to the rescue and offering to pay the forfeit money.

"My story," he says, "is only a story of work." Paur is a tall man, slender in build, but well knit and strong. He is 38 years old. He was born at Czernowitz in the Bukowyna. He showed in early youth an unsurmountable passion for music, and his tastes were cultivated. At the age of 8 he met with huge success at the public musical examinations at Czernowitz. Some time after that he family went to Vienna to live, and the father placed his son in the Vienna Conservatoire. There he gave himself up to study. You can see that he had the best masters, for he learned the violin of Hellmersberger, theory and composition of Bruckner and Dessof, and the piano of Epstein. He was four years at the conservatoire, and he took the first prize there. Soon after this he became the first violinist in the orchestra of the Imperial Opera of Vienna. But this position did not satisfy him long.

Adelbert von Goldschmidt induced him to study the now well known composition "Die Siebel Todsunden" and to produce it in Berlin. Paur did so. It was applauded heartily, the Berlin musicians joining the chorus of praise. Then Paur was made conductor at Cassel. But at the same time he continued to study the piano, and by and by he was able to gratify his wish to be near his beloved Von Bulow, for he went to Hanover and studied there continually. From 1879 to 1880 he was at Koenigsberg, where he had been called by conductor Staegemann, who later on became conductor at Leipsig.

One of the first works conducted by Paur at Koenigsberg was Wagner's "Meistersinger." In this effort he founded his reputation among the Wagnerians. Then he was made conductor of the Court Theatre of Mannheim. For nine years he steadily developed as a conductor of concerts and operas and as a soloist on the piano and the violin. One of the best known German critics said after a performance of "Tristan and Isolde," which Paur conducted: "The effect was extraordinary. We very rarely hear such enthusiasm as this first representation aroused. The work was played with such power and force and with such complete understanding of the spirit of the composer, that the performance at Mannheim was more than equal to the more celebrated performances of Berlin."

Paur sacrificed himself in the most unselfish way in order to obtain the brilliant results which are now being attached to his name. He had offers from Leipsig, from Hamburg and Berlin, but he remained at Mannheim until 1889. He conducted Berlioz's "Faust," and he became noted as one of the very best conductors of the Wagnerian operas. He made Mannheim quite a musical centre until in 1889 he was called to Leipsig. He has composed a violin sonata, a concerto, a string quartet, piano pieces and some songs. His style of conducting is said to be animated, but very graceful.

Frau Paur is musical, too. She was born in 1862 at Gengenbach, in the Schwarzwald, and received her education at Mannheim and Stuttgart, studying at the latter place in the Conservatoire, and particularly under the excellent professors Lebert and Bruckner. Anton Rubenstein encouraged her greatly, admired her playing and arranged that she should conclude her studies under the direction of Leschetitzki and his wife Annetta Essipoff. No doubt they will give chamber concerts together. They were married in 1881, and have two children.

In a measure Paur's coming to the Symphony Orchestra is a disappointment, but that is principally due to the little that has been known of him, and to the expectation musical people had of hearing the great Vienna conductor whom Mr. Higginson could not secure. German authorities recommend Paur very highly, and he will need to be all they say he is to keep up the reputation his predecessors have won for the Symphony Orchestra. In Providence the first concert will be given in Infantry Hall, Oct. 25; the other five, Nov. 22, Dec. 20, Jan. 17, Feb. 28 and April 11.

Boston Daily Globe.

WEDNESDAY, OCT. 11.

FULL OF KNOWLEDGE.

He Got Information Regarding the Sale of Symphony Concert Seats.

The other afternoon, an unknowing and unsophisticated reporter walked into the office of Music hall and asked the manager how long the present craze and rage in symphony concerts had been in existence.

The manager laughed, and at that all the various minions and minionettes in the office laughed.

The reporter thought that he had wandered into an unkind atmosphere and said so, at the same time inquiring in as mild a manner as he could what the deuce they were all laughing at.

Then they all laughed some more, and finally the great fat, jolly man who sits inside the little pen at the little rolltop desk and looks out over a little counter recovered sufficiently to say that there never was a time when the present craze and rage did not exist.

This was news to the unknowing reporter, and he was glad that he could feel in his inmost soul satisfied with his day, as he thought of that famous saying that the day in which one learns nothing new is lost.

For this was decided news to him, and will perhaps be so to many other people.

This is the 13th year that the glorious symphonies have delighted the music lovers of Boston and vicinity, and it seems, according to the manager, that they were always productive of just such musical frenzies as they are today.

Whereupon the reporter expressed himself as greatly surprised and enlightened and said he thought the present craze began four years ago, when it became the custom to sell the precious pasteboards by auction. But this was a most unfortunate remark, as it only revealed the density of his ignorance and pressed the laughter button again.

After some minutes of mirth, the manager again vouchsafed the remark that the auction sales had not the slightest possible bearing on the thing; in fact, there was more enthusiasm, if anything, before the beginning of the sales by auction.

"Why," said he, "did you never hear of those glorious and wonderful days when the alley running to Winter st was lined some years for a week before with a crowd of weary watchers? Why, my friend, that was why we discontinued selling the tickets over the counters. That line got to be such an infernal nuisance that we lay awake nights thinking of it and all the trouble it made.

"You see, they would come six or seven days before and there they would stay, and one speculator would have from two to half a dozen men in line and another batch of equal numbers to relieve the first batch. And at such and such a time they would relieve them.

"When the sale began the speculator who had hired the weary waiters would come along and step into the place and buy his tickets. Then he would charge enormous premiums for them. For instance, the $7 seats often sold for $25. Now, a man can very often get a $12 seat for only $3 premium at $15.

"Talk about your enthusiasm! Those were the days when that was rampant. There is nothing that can compare with it now. We started to sell at auction to save ourselves the expense and the nuisance of keeping that line in order.

"The character of the audiences has never changed in the least. From the very first it has been the fashionable thing to go to the symphony concerts, and the rich people are better pleased with the present plan than the old one of waiting in the line and being compelled to pay the speculator such a large price."

And the unknowing reporter departed, no longer unknowing, but full of wholesome knowledge.

Boston Journal.

FRIDAY, OCTOBER 13, 1893.

THE KNEISEL QUARTETTE.

The Kneisel Quartette, consisting of Franz Kneisel, Otto Roth, L. Svecenski and Alwin Schroeder, members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will give a series of eight concerts in Chickering Hall on Monday evenings, beginning October 23. Among the novelties to be produced will be Suntana's Quartette in E minor, D'Albert's Quartette in E flat major and a piano quintette in F minor by Brahms. Soloists have been engaged, and will be announced in a few days. Subscription tickets, with reserved seats, for the series, $8, and may be secured at the box office, Music Hall, next Monday morning, Oct. 16.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

FRIDAY MORNING, OCT. 13, 1893.

The annual series of chamber concerts by the Kneisel Quartette are one of the most attractive features of the musical season in Boston. This year eight concerts are announced to take place in Chickering Hall on Monday evenings of Oct. 23, Nov. 13, Dec. 4, Jan. 1, Jan. 22, Feb. 12, March 5 and March 19. Assisting artists have been engaged, and will soon be announced. Season tickets with reserved seats for the series, $8, and may be secured at the box office, Music Hall, next Monday morning, Oct. 16.

[21]

PROVIDENCE SUNDAY JOURNAL, OCTOBER 8,

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

MR EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

THIRTEENTH SEASON, 1893-94.

6 Grand Concerts!

IN INFANTRY HALL,

WEDNESDAY EVENINGS, Oct. 25, Nov. 22, Dec. 20, Jan. 17, Feb. 28, April 11,

Mme. NORDICA, Mr. LOEFFLER,

and other distinguished artists will appear as soloists.

Season tickets with reserved seats for the series of six concerts, $5. Programme books, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed, will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets.

The sale of season tickets will open at the box office, Infantry Hall, Monday morning, October 16. To insure a fair distribution of seats, no more than ten tickets will be sold to one person. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR.

Career of the New Leader of the Boston Orchestra.

IS A MUSICAL PRODIGY WHO HASN'T PETERED OUT.

Operatic Successes in Germany.—Said to be a Maker of Good Programmes.

EMIL PAUR'S arrival in Boston has started a fresh and increased amount of inquiry among the people who frequent Symphony Concerts, and the chief events of his career, his age, the probabilities as to his programmes, and the hundred and one possibilities of his advent as conductor have to be stated over and over again by the attendants at Boston Music Hall. Here in Providence, where there will be given this season the usual six concerts, interest in what we may expect from the successor of Nikisch is proportionately large. It is Emil Paur's second time of being chosen successor to Arthur Nikisch. The first was as leader of the orchestra at the Leipsig Theatre. No puffing, no blowing of trumpets preceded him, only a short notice of his activity in Mannheim. His predecessor, Nikisch, had not only been enthusiastically, almost idolatrously, received at the farewell evening in the theatre, and also at farewell festivities in private circles.

EMIL PAUR.

The partisans of Nikisch declared such a conductor could never be replaced. What a surprise was the first appearance of Mr. Paur! Unexampled applause, loud recalls, glowing enthusiasm! It was a perfect victory. It was interesting to observe how the new conductor differed in externals from his predecessor, writes one who was there. If Nikisch impressed by his solemn manner, quiet and almost stiff demeanor, one might almost say, his stony calmness, Paur led with youthful fire and glowing inspiration. The former held his head, framed in black, with immovable pale face, always high, but the latter moved in a lively way; his fair curly hair strayed about, and every movement betrayed his south German temperament. One would see he was quite taken up by his artistic office, that he wished every tone to be given with full effect, and that with his whole soul he seemed to play himself on every instrument.

In his conduct at Leipsig Paur has been free from all national prejudice. He conducted the operas of the old and new French and Italian composers just as carefully, spiritedly and ingeniously as the German ones. The mutilation of masterpieces, as is unfortunately the custom, through unscrupulous leaders and careless singers, he thoroughly condemned. He reproduced them, as in the original, however much it annoyed the indolent singers and members of the orchestra.

Paur comes to the leadership of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at a yearly salary of 40,000 marks, which in American money is equivalent to about $10,000 in round figures. There was some trouble and delay about the negotiations, because Paur's contract at the Leipsig Opera House had still two years to run. But the matter was settled by Mr. Higginson coming to the rescue and offering to pay the forfeit money.

"My story," he says, "is only a story of work." Paur is a tall man, slender in build, but well knit and strong. He is 38 years old. He was born at Czernowitz in the Bukowyna. He showed in early youth an unsurmountable passion for music, and his tastes were cultivated. At the age of 8 he met with huge success at the public musical examinations at Czernowitz. Some time after that his family went to Vienna to live, and the father placed his son in the Vienna Conservatoire. There he gave himself up to study. You can see that he had the best masters, for he learned the violin of Hellmersberger, theory and composition of Bruckner and Dessof, and the piano of Epstein. He was four years at the conservatoire, and he took the first prize there. Soon after this he became the first violinist in the orchestra of the Imperial Opera of Vienna. But this position did not satisfy him long.

Adelbert von Goldschmidt induced him to study the now well known composition "Die Siebel Todsunden" and to produce it in Berlin. Paur did so. It was applauded heartily, the Berlin musicians joining the chorus of praise. Then Paur was made conductor at Cassel. But at the same time he continued to study the piano, and by and by he was able to gratify his wish to be near his beloved Von Bulow, for he went to Hanover and studied there continually. From 1879 to 1880 he was at Koenigsberg, where he had been called by conductor Staegemann, who later on became conductor at Leipsig.

One of the first works conducted by Paur at Koenigsberg was Wagner's "Meistersinger." In this effort he founded his reputation among the Wagnerians. Then he was made conductor of the Court Theatre of Mannheim. For nine years he steadily developed as a conductor of concerts and operas and as a soloist on the piano and the violin. One of the best known German critics said after a performance of "Tristan and Isolde," which Paur conducted: "The effect was extraordinary. We very rarely hear such enthusiasm as this first representation aroused. The work was played with such power and force and with such complete understanding of the spirit of the composer, that the performance at Mannheim was more than equal to the more celebrated performances of Berlin."

Paur sacrificed himself in the most unselfish way in order to obtain the brilliant results which are now being attached to his name. He had offers from Leipsig, from Hamburg and Berlin, but he remained at Mannheim until 1889. He conducted Berlioz's "Faust," and he became noted as one of the very best conductors of the Wagnerian operas. He made Mannheim quite a musical centre until in 1889 he was called to Leipsig. He has composed a violin sonata, a concerto, a string quartet, piano pieces and some songs. His style of conducting is said to be animated, but very graceful.

Frau Paur is musical, too. She was born in 1862 at Gengenbach, in the Schwarzwald, and received her education at Mannheim and Stuttgart, studying at the latter place in the Conservatoire, and particularly under the excellent professors Lebert and Bruckner. Anton Rubenstein encouraged her greatly, admired her playing and arranged that she should conclude her studies under the direction of Leschetitzki and his wife Annetta Essipoff. No doubt they will give chamber concerts together. They were married in 1881, and have two children.

In a measure Paur's coming to the Symphony Orchestra is a disappointment; but that is principally due to the little that has been known of him, and to the expectation musical people had of hearing the great Vienna conductor whom Mr. Higginson could not secure. German authorities recommend Paur very highly, and he will need to be all they say he is to keep up the reputation his predecessors have won for the Symphony Orchestra. In Providence the first concert will be given in Infantry Hall, Oct. 25; the other five, Nov. 22, Dec. 20, Jan. 17, Feb. 28 and April 11.

Boston Daily Globe.

WEDNESDAY, OCT. 11.

FULL OF KNOWLEDGE.

He Got Information Regarding the Sale of Symphony Concert Seats.

The other afternoon, an unknowing and unsophisticated reporter walked into the office of Music hall and asked the manager how long the present craze and rage in symphony concerts had been in existence.

The manager laughed, and at that all the various minions and minionettes in the office laughed.

The reporter thought that he had wandered into an unkind atmosphere and said so, at the same time inquiring in as mild a manner as he could what the deuce they were all laughing at.

Then they all laughed some more, and finally the great fat, jolly man who sits inside the little pen at the little rolltop desk and looks out over a little counter, recovered sufficiently to say that there never was a time when the present craze and rage did not exist.

This was news to the unknowing reporter, and he was glad that he could feel in his inmost soul satisfied with his day, as he thought of that famous saying that the day in which one learns nothing new is lost.

For this was decided news to him and will perhaps be so to many other people.

This is the 13th year that the glorious symphonies have delighted the music lovers of Boston and vicinity, and it seems, according to the manager, that they were always productive of just such musical frenzies as they are today.

Whereupon the reporter expressed himself as greatly surprised and enlightened and said he thought the present craze began four years ago, when it became the custom to sell the precious pasteboards by auction. But this was a most unfortunate remark, as it only revealed the density of his ignorance and pressed the laughter button again.

After some minutes of mirth, the manager again vouchsafed the remark that the auction sales had not the slightest possible bearing on the thing; in fact, there was more enthusiasm, if anything, before the beginning of the sales by auction.

"Why," said he, "did you never hear of those glorious and wonderful days when the alley running to Winter st was lined some years for a week before with a crowd of weary watchers? Why, my friend, that was why we discontinued selling the tickets over the counters. That line got to be such an infernal nuisance that we lay awake nights thinking of it and all the trouble it made.

"You see, they would come six or seven days before and there they would stay, and one speculator would have from two to half a dozen men in line and another batch of equal numbers to relieve the first batch. And at such and such a time they would relieve them.

"When the sale began the speculator who had hired the weary waiters would come along and step into the place and buy his tickets. Then he would charge enormous premiums for them. For instance, the $7 seats often sold for $25. Now, a man can very often get a $12 seat for only $3 premium at $15.

"Talk about your enthusiasm! Those were the days when that was rampant. There is nothing that can compare with it now. We started to sell at auction to save ourselves the expense and the nuisance of keeping that line in order.

"The character of the audiences has never changed in the least. From the very first it has been the fashionable thing to go to the symphony concerts, and the rich people are better pleased with the present plan than the old one of waiting in the line and being compelled to pay the speculator such a large price."

And the unknowing reporter departed, no longer unknowing, but full of wholesome knowledge.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 11, 1893.

Well, we have heard much this week about Mr. and Mrs. Paur. The first rehearsal of the orchestra under the new leader was held the 5th, and I am told the secrecy was equal to that observed in ancient days at the performances at Eleusis. Newspaper reporters, male and female, haunted the corridors, but they could see nothing. Peepholes were covered and I should not wonder if the players observed a pianissimo throughout. And yet there were leaks somewhere. It is said that the pieces rehearsed were Beethoven's third symphony, Cherubini's overture to "The Water Carriers," and Beethoven's "Leonore" overture No. 3. Mr. Paur was "as delighted as a boy." It is alleged that he perspires freely in the act of directing, and that his beat is firm and heavy; or "massive and concrete" as the young man described in "Great Expectations" a reading of Shakespeare by an eminent tragedian.

There are rumors that Mr. Paur is not yet accustomed to American cookery; that he does not relish oysters; that he eschews beer. Take these rumors for what they are worth.

It is also said, and this is perhaps more to the point, that the players respect the new conductor thoroughly, and find enjoyment in obeying his wishes.

The one question asked now in street car or on street corner is, "Have you met Paur?"

* * *

Nor has Mrs. Paur escaped She was interviewed this week at considerable length. Here are extracts: "I learned my English in school, and that was a long time ago."

"So few people speak German in Boston. It is quite different from New York."

"I felt very sorry to leave all my German friends at home."

"I brought over furniture from Germany; but I am not sure what we will do with it. Why, your American furniture is so small. We shall be glad to have a house by ourselves. That will be better than what we had in Leipsic, for there are very few private houses there, you know."

"The Symphony is such a fine orchestra I am sure Mr. Paur will enjoy working with them very much. You know d'Albert says the Symphony is one of the best orchestras in the world."

"I am not anxious for notoriety."

And then "their little sons too are very musical."

These sons are respectively ten and eight years old. Mr. and Mrs. Paur were made man and wife in 1881.

* * *

It is stated that the program of the first Symphony concert, October 14, will include Beethoven's C minor symphony, a serenade for strings by Tschaikowsky, and the "Tannhauser" overture. There will be no soloist.

The usual series of chamber music concerts will be given at Chickering Hall by the Kneisel string quartet during the coming season. The concerts will be given on Monday evenings, October 23, November 13, December 4, January 1, January 27, February 12, March 5 and March 19.

Manager C. A. Ellis, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announces that ten concerts will be given by that organization at Sanders' Theatre, Cambridge, during the coming season, the dates being the evenings of October 19, November 2, November 16, December 7, January 4, January 25, February 15, March 8, April 5, April 26. The orchestra will be assisted by Nordica, Max Heinrich, Kneisel, Schulz and others.

Boston Journal.

FRIDAY, OCTOBER 13, 1893.

THE KNEISEL QUARTETTE.

The Kneisel Quartette, consisting of Franz Kneisel, Otto Roth, L. Svecenski and Alwin Schroeder, members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will give a series of eight concerts in Chickering Hall on Monday evenings, beginning October 23. Among the novelties to be produced will be Suntana's Quartette in E minor, D'Albert's Quartette in E flat major and a piano quintette in F minor by Brahms. Soloists have been engaged, and will be announced in a few days. Subscription tickets, with reserved seats, for the series, $8, and may be secured at the box office, Music Hall, next Monday morning, Oct. 16.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

FRIDAY MORNING, OCT. 13, 1893.

The annual series of chamber concerts by the Kneisel Quartette are one of the most attractive features of the musical season in Boston. This year eight concerts are announced to take place in Chickering Hall on Monday evenings of Oct. 23, Nov. 13, Dec. 4, Jan. 1, Jan. 22, Feb. 12, March 5 and March 19. Assisting artists have been engaged, and will soon be announced. Season tickets with reserved seats for the series, $8, and may be secured at the box office, Music Hall, next Monday morning, Oct. 16.

[21]

Boston Daily Globe.
SATURDAY, OCT. 14, 1893.

PAUR REIGNS.

New Capellmeister Has a Symphony Triumph.

Fair Rehearsal Girl Declares He is Inspiring.

Nervous, Quick, Active, He is Energetic.

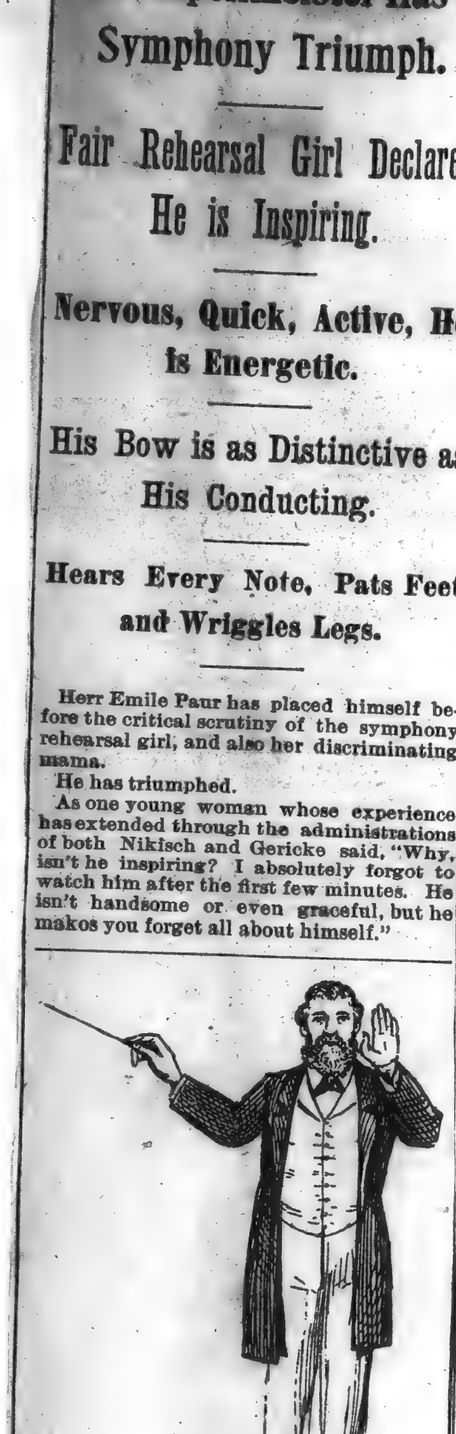
His Bow is as Distinctive as His Conducting.

Hears Every Note, Pats Feet and Wriggles Legs.

Herr Emile Paur has placed himself before the critical scrutiny of the symphony rehearsal girl, and also her discriminating mama.

He has triumphed.

As one young woman whose experience has extended through the administrations of both Nikisch and Gericke said, "Why, isn't he inspiring? I absolutely forgot to watch him after the first few minutes. He isn't handsome or even graceful, but he makes you forget all about himself."



HERR PAUR HUSHING THE FIRST VIOLINS.

This comment was particularly descriptive of the new Symphony director's appearance, and was heard repeated by a number during the brief intermissions between the numbers.

A striking characteristic of the new director is the very obvious consideration he gives to the members of the orchestra. To them he is particularly gracious, and yesterday, before turning to the audience to bow to the torrent of enthusiasm that was manifested, he made a quick nod and gesture of approval, accompanied by a smile, to the players, as if anxious to devise a share of the success to them.

Herr Paur will be a popular conductor as far as the orchestra is concerned. His name is calculated to win the highest respect from them. That is a very valuable point in favor of the new capell-meister.

The symphony audience went to see him with very little knowledge of his personality, with, probably, no very deep-seated impressions, and they showed him that they liked him by the prolonged applause that followed the finale of the serial numbers and by the outburst after the concluding number.

He is not at all like Nikisch, the man who for two years was the very idol of symphony attendants. He is the greatest possible antithesis to the old leader.

Where Nikisch was calm, easy, with the natural, unstudied abandon in the makeup of a thorough Bohemian, Paur is nervous, quick, constantly active, the very embodiment of energy and constantly showing the enthusiasm he is imbued with.

HERR PAUR APPEALING TO THE BASSES.

He is a conductor of an entirely different school from Nikisch, and every gracful, whether waving his baton or in bowing to accept his reward from the assemblage, the new director is ever possessed with the air of business and has very little of what might be called the talents and accomplishments of the social end of the leader's stand.

But when he gets thoroughly down to business he charms because of the results he obtains.

As one critic said, "He doesn't do things quite as easy as did Nikisch," and this suggests the two dominating characteristics of the personality of the two men.

Nikisch was magnetic.

Paur is energetic.

Both men are excellent examples of their class.

It is just 2.33 p m, three minutes past the usual hour for the commencement of the rehearsal, and the hall is crowded, with everybody on the edge of their seat waiting for the appearance of the new leader.

Soon the head of the symphony librarian appears at the entrance to the left of the stage as he reconnoiters, and everybody knows that Herr Paur is to follow.

So he does, but he walks across the front so quickly, as if in a hurry to get to his place, that he has reached the small, red-carpeted conductor's stand before the audience really have time to arrive at the fortissimo of enthusiasm.

Herr Paur steps upon the stand, turns to the house and bows three times at the greeting.

At the outset the new director sets his auditors a talking. His bow is a unique one.

Placing both feet near together his head goes down suddenly and does not stop until his body and limbs are almos at right angles, and then he places his left hand into his long hair over his ear and hangs on to it while he executes a few short, quick bows with his head without straightening up.

The Paur bow is destined to be a distinctive feature in the conversation about the director personally.

Herr Paur wears a black frock coat, which is unbuttoned, but does not open enough to show his vest, and his trousers are of dark striped material.

His long, sandy hair is parted in the middle, but unlike most hirsute growths of the character it does not fly about as he exerts himself. No matter how Herr Paur waves his arms and shakes his head that hair never moves a particle.

The conductor stands nervously rubbing his beard about his mouth and looking over the house for the few moments that precede the opening chords of the first number.

He turns toward the orchestra, gives his baton a short, sharp wave, and the rehearsal has commenced.

It is in the first few moments that the audience sees the remarkable distinctiveness of Paur's manner of conducting.

He uses his whole body.

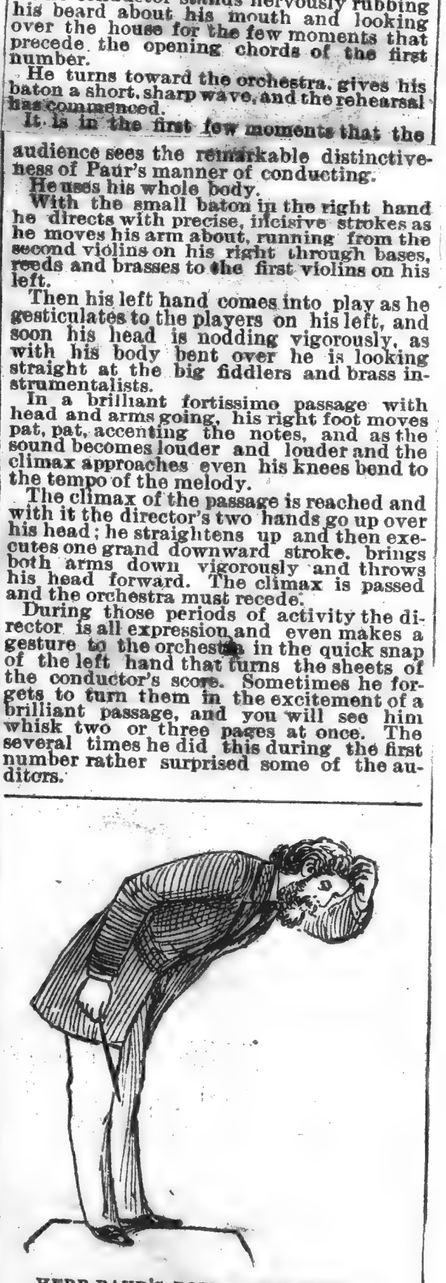
With the small baton in the right hand he directs with precise, incisive strokes as he moves his arm about, running from the second violins on his right through bases, reeds and brasses to the first violins on his left.

Then his left hand comes into play as he gesticulates to the players on his left, and soon his head is nodding vigorously, as with his body bent over he is looking straight at the big fiddlers and brass instrumentalists.

In a brilliant fortissimo passage with head and arms going, his right foot moves pat, pat, accenting the notes, and as the sound becomes louder and louder and the climax approaches even his knees bend to the tempo of the melody.

The climax of the passage is reached and with it the director's two hands go up over his head; he straightens up and then executes one grand downward stroke, brings both arms down vigorously and throws his head forward. The climax is passed and the orchestra must recede.

During those periods of activity the director is all expression and even makes a gesture to the orchestra in the quick snap of the left hand that turns the sheets of the conductor's score. Sometimes he forgets to turn them in the excitement of a brilliant passage, and you will see him whisk two or three pages at once. The several times he did this during the first number rather surprised some of the auditors.



HERR PAUR'S BOW IS DISTINCTIVE.

He resumes his manner of incisive strokes and soon he wants to bring the orchestra down to a pianissimo.

He extends his baton right over the music stand, and gently lays the end of the white stick; his left hand is raised up to his face, and as he bends his head over just wiggles the little finger of his left hand to the first violins. He seems to be whispering to the band.

As the music becomes softer and still more softly the body of the musician is inclined more and more, and as the fingers grip the baton loosely every part of his body expresses the restraint he wishes to impress upon the players.

Truly Herr Paur is a man of remarkably expressive contrasts.

He is surely a pantomimist of no meager talent.

His favorite move seemed to be, however, the short, quick downward and upward stroke of the baton, and only when reaching the climaxes did he use the full downward swing of the arm.

For first-class animation, however, there is nothing like the new capellmeister when he is directing an accelerando movement.

His head is bowed toward them. He swings it around from the extreme second violinist to the concert master, then quickly raises it and the baton goes in short jerks as the orchestra increases the volume of tone.

As if urging them on the director keeps thrashing his little stick about, gradually raising his arm. The other hand is going in the same jerky fashion, his head is bobbing from side to side, until you think he is going to strain his neck.

The left hand shoots out at arm's length, and with the fist clenched he vigorously signals for the bass players to give out the fullest tones.

It is in these movements that one recollects the soft, easy ways of Nikisch and contrasts them with the energy and animation of his successor to the detriment, however, of neither.

Paur bends himself to the softer portions of the movements but straightens and strains as the demand upon his men becomes more and the sound broadens.

He is a pours in both extremes.

Only once did he use Nikisch's favorite broad, almost horizontal swing of the [illegible] the second number of the program. Here he swung the stick over the top of his music stand and waved his left hand lightly, but even in this quiet motion there was the energy when he reversed the motion.

Capellmeister Paur demonstrates to the audience that he has his eye and ear applied to every member of the orchestra, for he keeps continually moving his eyes all over the body of men. At one time the work of a second violinist annoyed him for a second and he quickly bent over toward him. Several times other members felt this little reprimand in a glance and fixed their eyes closer on the music.

Herr Paur tells his men forcibly from the directing stand what to do, as was shown in the last number where a triangle, cymbals and tambourine came in in one passage. The three men were sitting down at the back of the stage, when the director nodded for them to get up and, extending both hands out until they met, indicated in this way every clash he wished from that trio.

Herr Paur has one little eccentricity that the audience does'nt see.

He has a habit when raising his head toward the players of opening his mouth and eyes wide and as he swings his head and slowly lowers it, the eyes and mouth close.

The director is nervous and awkward during the intermissions, and stands up fingering his baton and looking over the hall. He had to repeat his eccentric bow several times at every interlude.

As he stepped down at the close of the last number and bowed once to the applause, he went quickly to Mr Kneisel, the concert master, warmly shook his hand, and rushed quickly for the refuge of the retiring room. He had to come out again and respond to the plaudits.

Of the many expressions regarding the new conductor heard after the rehearsal the predominating one was that Herr Paur was energetic, precise and inspiring.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.
SATURDAY MORNING, OCT. 14, 1893.

SYMPHONIES BEGIN.

First Public Appearance of Conductor Paur.

A man, wholly without that nameless "Je ne sais pas quoi," understood to distinguish the aristocracy of blood, an honest Saxon face, full bearded, with mild blue eyes, framed by a shock of fluffy, light-colored hair, worn in mild profusion, black frock coat and light trousers hanging carelessly upon the tall, loosely-jointed figure—such is Emil Paur as he appeared yesterday afternoon at the first rehearsal of the Symphony Orchestra.

And what an audience had gathered to greet him!

Over floor and gallery the eye roamed in vain, seeking an empty seat; from each open door on the floor peered a crowd of delighted faces.

All society was present, nodding and smiling to its friends in the intervals between the music, hushed and silent for once during the perfect harmonies produced by the matchless orchestra.

Promptly at 2:30 Mr. Paur takes his stand in front of the orchestra. The audience is prepared to criticise. Franz Kneisel has many friends in its ranks, but note—as the grand strains of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony float out over their heads, the awkward form before them seems to expand, the mild blue eyes dilate, and the mouth closes firmly over the white teeth, the hair is tossed back from the forehead—the shoulders are thrown back—it is another and widely different man who stands before them. One forgets the ill-fitting garments as the form within instinctively assumes attitudes of grace. Note how he bends first this way and then the other, now beckoning a musician in the rear who may be almost infinitesimally at fault, but whom the perfect ear of the master has detected and chided; now waving his hands slowly over a perfectly rendered "andante" passage, and anon, with quickened time and beat, hurrying on an "allegro," identifying himself completely with the composer.

The vast audience is still as death—a flush comes and goes in the cheeks of the women—some of the men instinctively gnaw their finger nails, while others are as still and motionless as if spellbound; when the music ceases, a great sigh, as if forced from the lips of a struggling giant, goes up from the listeners, silence again for a moment—and then—a perfect storm of hand clapping and exclamations of delight, whilst, after gravely bowing to his orchestra, the master turns slowly around and bows thrice to his audience, the long hair falling over and almost concealing his face.

When he lifts his head, the inspiration has departed from it. Once more he is the plain, kindly-faced German.

Such is Emil Paur.

Boston Journal.
TEN PAGES.
SATURDAY, OCTOBER 14, 1893.

REHEARSAL GIRLS.

How They Crowded Music Hall Yesterday.

"Perfectly Lovely" and "Decision Reserved" The Verdict.

Musicians Also Give the Journal Their Opinion of Mr. Paur.

The symphonies began yesterday. The fashionable "rehearsal"—which is not a rehearsal at all, by the way, but which is quite as much a "concert" as is the Saturday night performance designated by that title—attracted the usual flock of stylishly attired Back Bay maidens, with their stately chaperones and an infinitessimal sprinkling of men. Yesterday it seemed as though the proportion between the sexes was even more askew than on previous years, for, to a Journal man who watched the outflowing stream at the close of the performance, there seemed to be at least 50 women to every man.

But it was a crush. The "symphony girls" were dying to see Mr. Paur, the new conductor, and to compare him with the departed Nikisch.

They have not quite decided whether he is more delightful or not. It is an open question. Do the broad shoulders and the mass of blonde hair and beard atone for the lithe figure of the Hungarian and that carefully trained wisp of hair which used to descend over his brow? So they content themselves with the non-committal assurance that he is "perfectly lovely," and "decision is reserved," as the judges say in court when they cannot decide.

"A GOOD CONDUCTOR."

That Is the General Opinion in Regard to the New Leader.

The general opinion is that the new conductor is a good one. At a bound he has passed from the status of an experiment to that of an accepted fact. At least that is how one of Boston's best known musicians expressed it to the Journal man.

"It was rough and somewhat uneven, but he is a great conductor," was the enthusiastic criticism of another.

Mrs. John L. Gardner was there, of course, and every one wanted to learn her sentiments. By the way she smiled and by the glitter of her eyes during the playing it was evident that she appreciated Mr. Paur's efforts. He has not learned to look at her seats yet in order to find out whether she has come in, so that the concert may begin, as some of the society journalists were so fond of saying Mr. Nikisch did, but he will undoubtedly soon learn. Mrs. Gardner was heard to say to a friend that she approved of Mr. Paur's method very much, and that means a good deal as coming from the leader of Boston's society.

A BUNCH OF MUSICIANS.

Mr. Carl Faelton of the Boston Conservatory of Music said: "He is an excellent conductor, and it is a good thing for Boston that we have him.

"I was very much pleased with the performance. I also think Mr. Nikisch very fine."

Mr. H. G. Gilbert, who is a well known musician and a regular attendant at the concerts, said:

"Tannhauser went better than I ever heard it before and the time prescribed was consumed in the performance and no more, and this is an occurrence unusual."

Mr. L. E. Grant said: "I enjoyed the performance very much. I like the new conductor, and think him a power with an orchestra."

Heinrich Schwecker, the well-known boy harpist, said: "I like Mr. Paur very much in every respect. I particularly like his manner, so perfectly unaffected.

Mr. Eugene Gruenberg.

Mr. Eugene Gruenberg said: "I should say that his reading, especially of the Symphony of Beethoven, was correct, from hearing his father, who was playing in Beethoven's time at Vienna, and so he knew from his childhood the real tradition. Mr. Paur does not seem to strive to be different from all other conductors, but simply to be correct. As far as I can carefully judge, I think he had a remarkable reception for a Friday afternoon performance, and he was called several times at the 'final,' which is something unusual."

John C. Mullaly.

Mr. John C. Mullaly, the noted local orchestra leader, had not completely recovered from the rapturous state into which the musical flood of the Wagner finale had put him, for when a Journal reporter approached him he murmured, "Oh! it was lovely. What? Tell you my impressions of the leader, or of the orchestra under him? Well, I couldn't really say. It's a little too early. And then, too, the programme was a familiar one to the orchestra. No, it's hard to say. But you come to see me later and I'll be glad to tell you."

And with many smiling protestations of his unworthiness to be quoted, one of the most accomplished of Boston's homebred musicians walked on.

Some Other Verdicts.

Mr. Johann Sauerquell, librarian of the Symphony Orchestra, told the Journal reporter that Emil Paur was an able director, whose heart and soul was in his work.

A lady, who did not wish her name used, thought M. Paur was not so graceful as Mr. Nikisch, "but at the same time I think he is very fine."

Mr. Daniel Sullivan, when asked by the Journal man what he thought of the new conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, replied that his execution was grand and his conception better than that of Mr. Nikisch.

Mr. G. A. Silberman, the well-known baritone and soloist, replied to the Journal reporter: "He is remarkable, and I think he is much more earnest in his work than Mr. Nickison was."

Senator Henry Parkman enjoyed the concert immensely and is a devoted Paur man from this time out.

Prof. John K. Paine of Harvard University courteously refused to express an opinion, on the ground that it was impossible to judge fairly by one performance.

[22]

Boston Journal

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

BOSTON HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 14, The Saturday Evening Paper.

BY THE TIME this chatter of mine reaches you, my readers, Emil Paur will have faced his feminine critics and have been passed judgment upon,—a trying ordeal, and I trust the verdict will be a pleasant one.

.....

An example of our conservativeness, or rather our prudence, is seen, I think, in the manner in which the tickets for the concerts have been sold. Boston has heard of Mr. Paur and heard well of his ability as a conductor, but she does not know him and is not going to run any large risks, so the tickets have gone in a less enthusiastic manner than usual, but the old enthusiasm will undoubtedly come back after the gentleman has made his bow and the verdict been given.

.....

The orchestra will give concerts as usual in Cambridge at the Saunders Theater, and in New York. The Cambridge concerts will be given on Thursday evenings, beginning Oct. 19, and ending April 26. Those in New York will be five in number and will extend over a period of time including November 8 and March 29. Three artists, to whom Boston has the right to lay some claim, will appear, Emma Eames, Lillian Nordica and Franz Kneisel.

.....

The quartet of which Mr. Kneisel is the director gives as usual a series of concerts which will be held in Chickering Hall. Many novelties are promised, Mr. Kneisel having spent the summer abroad and visited many composers of note.

.....

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, OCT. 15, 1893.

BOSTON GREETS HERR EMIL PAUR AT THE FIRST SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Symphony Orchestra have never played a programme better than they played last night the first of the present season. Indeed, in some respects, they have perhaps never played so well. The rehearsals under Mr. Paur have effected a cordial understanding between him and his men and have established a standard for the maintenance of which they will be held to a strict accountability. Aware, as they could not help being, of the severe but by no means unjust criticism which had been made upon the work of the orchestra in its gradual deterioriation under Mr. Nikisch, every man has set himself from the first rehearsal to play for all his worth, in order to assist in proving their right to the praise—always cheerfully accorded them when they did their best—of constituting one of the finest bands in the world. On his part, Mr. Paur, gratified to find an instrument of such strength, ductility and capability for perfect detail under his hand, has been able to use it frankly, without tentatives, reserves, doubts or struggles. The result was splendid, and if the conductor merited the long and loud acclaims with which he was frequently hailed and encouraged, his men also merited the genial, contented look which he cast over them at the end of each movement.

The programme was such as gave every experienced listener a first rate opportunity to study and compare—Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, Tschaikowsky's serenade for strings, opus 48, and the Tannhauser overture. From the performance of these works some of the characteristics of Mr. Paur may be confidently deduced. One thing is clear—that he means to have rhythm and accent absolutely preserved, thus securing lucidity of phrase and justness of emphasis. Nor is he satisfied with obtaining this from the most prominent instruments only. He has the skill to realize just what part of the score most needs the help of such presentment at any given moment, and is ready and quick to give the instrument then charged with responsibility its proper production and to require from it the same exactitude as if it stood at the head of the composition. Yet, when he feels that his forces are moving truly and in complete sympathy, his beat becomes very small and slight and sometimes almost ceases for a few bars. He seems to have the disposition towards positive perfection for which Mr. Gericke was distinguished, united to an elasticity and earnestness of temperament sufficient to insure magnetic and dramatic interpretations without verging upon dangerous romanticism. No single observation of the occupant of so difficult a place as his is sufficient for guaging a man and predicating about him exactly; but from this first hearing it seems as if Boston had come nearer to obtaining the thoroughly able and satisfactory conductor than ever before. What he may prove as a maker of programmes, remains to be seen.

His reading of the symphony was conservative and careful—even a little reserved at times; but the minuter details were beautifully marked and presented sharply, but without abruptness; the dynamic gradations were nicely developed and when a climax was reached it was announced with fervor as well as vigor. If any departure from conventionalism were noted, it was to be found in the occasional slight relaxation of time for a bar or two in a transition passage or in a cadence, where, if the melody were sung, the vocalist would naturally linger lightly but not enough to impair the pulsative sense of the tempo. The overture had a large, strongly colored and powerful rendering, but offered as a whole points of excellence rather than of difference. The serenade gave a better suggestion of how Mr. Paur may be expected to treat music of a romantic or fanciful cast. The strings were in fine condition, both for resonance and body of tone and for swift and keen execution, all these qualities being demanded by the composition. The grave introduction had fulness and depth; the elegy (a little longer drawn out) was sweet and smooth; the waltz, with its seductive theme, swayed and poised so languorously as to indicate that Mr. Paur is not too classic to give that rhythm its due; and the finale was worked up with immense vivacity and speed. And when it is added that the hitherto obstreperous and domineering kettle drums were actually played and harmoniously subordinated or indulged, it will be understood that there may now be a good hope for discipline and symmetry in all the orchestra.

In general appearance Mr. Paur does not correspond to such expectations as his pictures must have created; because he is not a dark man, but of a reddish-blonde type. He suggested to very many people, both in his manner and his temperament, Mr. Baermann, and it is to be hoped that the season will not pass without his conducting some concert for that eminent pianist, who has been too long absent from the Symphony performances. He is not a graceful conductor, inclining a little toward angularity of beat; but his evident manliness, his strength of purpose, his intelligence, decision, vitality and fineness, so far as they can be estimated so hastily, will atone many score times for any lack of Delsartian curves and statuesque attitudes.

For the second concert this will be the programme: Volkmann's "Richard III." overture; Dvorak's second rhapsody; Schubert's C major symphony, and two arias to be sung by Mme. Nordica.

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, OCT. 15.

The Symphony Concert.

The twelfth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts began last night. The programme was Beethoven's Symphony in C minor; the Serenade for strings in C, op. 48, by Tschaikowsky; and Wagner's "Tannhäuser" overture. There was an enormous audience, and the new conductor, Herr Emil Pauer, was accorded a reception of the most cordial nature, and through the evening the hearty applause bestowed on him must have convinced him that his public was animated by the most friendly sentiments toward him. He has an interesting presence, and appears to be without any of the affectations that were often so unpleasingly manifested by his immediate predecessor. His beat is decisive, and he holds his orchestra well in hand. Vigor is one of the striking characteristics of his conducting, and he excites at once the conviction that he has an artistic temperament, and is thoroughly absorbed in his work. Much might be said of his reading of the symphony, and even of his interpretation of the overture, but, all things considered, we deem it both just and advisable to defer any extended criticism of his method of conducting or to express judgment upon it until we have had further experience of it. His surroundings are as yet, new to him; the orchestra has been under his control for a very brief time, and it would be wiser, therefore, to wait until he has had an opportunity to get over the inevitable anxiety and nervousness attendant on the outset of his assumption of an exacting position, and has had time to become more at his ease. It is impossible that he should, as yet, have been able to establish a complete understanding between himself and his players regarding his views; and, besides, the situation bears as hard on the orchestra as it does on their director. It is a very easy matter, under the circumstances, to do both an injustice, and hence our preference for a more complete and more satisfying experience of Mr. Paur as a conductor before venturing on an estimate of him on a first hearing. He made a very favorable impression, if the spirited approval of his efforts, given by the large and critical assemblage, may be taken as evidence. The programme, as will be seen, contained contained nothing that is not very familiar to the Symphony Concert audiences, and therefore, afforded ample chance to compare his methods with those who have previously wielded the baton over the orchestra; and we may add, without breach of our resolve to forego criticism, that his readings of the symphony and of the overture, brought forward much that was novel—at least, here. The selections for the next concert are: Overture, "Richard III.," Volkmann; Rhapsodie No. 2, Dvorak; and Symphony C, Schubert. Mme. Lillian Nordica will be the soloist.

The New Conductor.

The People Who Welcomed Him at the First Symphony Rehearsal of the Season.

[WRITTEN FOR THE SATURDAY EVENING GAZETTE.

"Never saw so many people I know, in all my life, before, did you?" "Hardly saw a soul I knew. Wonder where everybody is!"

There you have the two extremes in the Symphony chatter of Friday afternoon. It was a crush with a big C, and there was the utmost friendliness—far and away more than mere politeness warranted—for the new conductor. His name troubled the greater number. From "Paw" to "Power-r-r" (the extra trill from the Western girls, from the Conservatory, in the "rush" gallery), there was not a possible change left unrung on the pronunciation of the name of the gentleman whose fatherland patronomic was being rolled as a troublesome morsel under the tongue.

"Image of Mr. Baermann, don't you think?" "Doesn't he look like Prof. Blank, though?" These were a few of the sotto voce remarks anent his personal appearance, when he—which is what nearly everybody called him—came first into view.

There wasn't a frill or a furbelow on his manner.

For aught there was to see, Herr Paur might have been the conductor of that same orchestra for a twelvemonth.

"There isn't the scrap of a bald place. Wonder if there will be, before he leaves?" said one irreverent hoyden.

But there doesn't appear to be any immediate prospect of baldness. Indeed, Her Paur's locks, though shorn somewhat since his older pictures were "taken," are still long enough to require to be held back, to prevent them falling into his eyes when he bows.

He had to bow a great many times on Friday, and every time he made one of his odd jack-knife acknowledgements of the disposition of the audience to make him feel at home, and that they were having a good time, he carried one hand to hold his head to his hair where the slightly grizzled and fluffy mane had been brushed à la Pompadour.

There would have been a critical chill in the air had the audience lived up to the Bostonese reputation, for not only was the matinee house supposed to be weighing to see if they could find wanting in the merit of the new conductor, but there was such a sprinkling of the professionally critical fraternity in evidence, as to make it seem much more like the Saturday concert or a regular "first-night" gathering of the authorative clans.

All the Boston critics were on hand, or to be exact, though less idomatic, on ear; indeed, one paper had both members of its critical staff and its society reporter, by turns occupying seats in a prominent position.

Then the musicians all turned out to hear.

Also New York took us under consideration. There's proof that it was a function.

Was not Mr. Theodore Thomas in one of the seats of the elect, and not scornful?

He was. And so was Mr. Krehbiel, of the Tribune, and Mr. Henderson (likewise musical critic from the Metropolis) of the Times staff, and—and so on.

Beside these and some other people who know what is what in music, there is no disputing—probably nobody wishes to do so—that the majority couldn't have told without their programmes whether it were the Fifth or the First in the matter of "dear old Beet's symphony"—quotation from a jolly young thing in blue crêpon, with a white lace bib, and pale gold hair.

Certain it is, that the talk before and after and between the concert was of everything nameable under the blue canopy of heaven save and except music; that is to say, this was among the great majority.

The majority? The rehearsalites proper. Not the enthusiastic and short-pursed folk in the twenty-five cent places, who stand on one foot for an interminable hour and longer for the chance to tumble upstairs into the unreserved seats. No, not them, but the classes.

The rehearsal girl, in current fiction, is pictured as chic to a point that even a Parisian fashion plate would rustle over. But she mostly isn't.

Here and there on Friday was a good-looking girl, and here and there was one well dressed,—stylishly so,—well set up and fetching; and once in a great while a person not myopic could discover a combination of good looks and good clothes.

But seldom. Hats are the worst feature in a Boston gathering.

Gowns grow better, but hats are still pretty bad.

Wherefore? There are immensely attractive hats for sale, even in Boston; but they must stay in the bandboxes ever after, most of them. Few, seemingly, ever come to light again.

But it's ten times more of a misfortune than a fault that one's clothes jurer at one. And it's nothing to one's discredit to like to sit under the regning influence of good music, though she may not know a suite for strings from a metronome (always provided that she doesn't pretend she does).

And it really seemed nice that the town that turned itself inside out, as to classes, in the spring, and has kept up ever since a St. Vitus-jerking series of vacations among the masses, should have turned back again. There was hand-shaking enough to set up good feeling for the rest of the winter, and the echoes of "When did you get back?" and "Have you had a, etc., etc.?" fairly made the head board above the funny little petticoated lamps over the players, reverberate these giggling and gurgling salutations.

It was warm—very warm, and Music Hall was as dingy and ill-lighted as ever; and—— But there, some day there will be a new hall, and then, when the social sheep are set off in boxes from the goats in the pit, the goats will wish the old days back again. Now there is no way of distinguishing between the elegant person who paid a small fortune for her seat, and the interloper who, being "in" with a speculator, got hers for the price of a fig over and above the regular asking terms, unless, a la Dr. Holmes, you ask them to pronounce "view."

Oh, yes, speculators have friends whom they don't even think of robbing.

Speculators seemed to be having a pretty fair sort of time on Friday; fair for them, that is. Those who had season tickets unsold had no difficulty in getting two or three dollars apiece for the use of them for the hour and a half of the concert.

"Everybody" may be said to have been present. Still everybody wasn't there; not even everybody who is usually at the rehearsal; several of our most talked about society folk being out in Cook County, Ill., while others are still going hither and thither.

Several people drove in and up from their out-of-town places, where they are lingering through these delicious autumnal days, but more came in street cars, and did the usual "act" afterward, of overflowing the adjacent picture gallery, or going further for a glass of something less dry than the book of the concert, or even into the few remaining high-toned down town shops for a bit of a bargain.

Nobody's joy quite equalled that of the bevy of more or less shabby students who climbed slowly down from the gods, and were only prevented from having hysterics of admiration, by the care, needed when they got out to the street corner, to prevent them being alternately mobbed by a bobby or mangled by an electric Juggernaut.

As for who were really on the spot when the applause broke out loudly enough to make Mr. Beethoven's dusty statue rattle, one wouldn't be far out of the way who should name the entire list of knowables from Mrs. "Montie" Sears to Mrs. Nobody in particular; others were Mr. and Mrs. R. C. Lincoln, Mr. G. W. Chadwick, Mrs. R. G. Burrill, Miss Lawrence, the Misses Bradlee, Mrs. Homans, Miss Paine, Mrs. C. L. Sturgis, Miss Sturgis, Miss Lyman, Mr. F. L. Coolidge, Miss Ames, Mrs. D. A. Dwight, Miss Rice, Miss Codman, Mrs. P. H. Sears, Miss Lang, Mrs. W. F. Weld, Miss Hood, Lieut. C. P. Crosby, Miss Crosby, Miss Johnson, Mr. Heinrich Schuecker, the Misses Winsor, Mrs. R. Winthrop, Jr., Dr. and Mrs. Thorndike, Miss Florence Amory, Mrs. E. W. Pratt, Miss Perkins, Mr. and Mrs. J. C. Hooper, Prof. J. K. Paine, Mr. Carl Faelten, Mr. G. C. Chadwick, Mr. Henry Parkman.

—— A very large and most enthusiastic audience filled Music Hall last night to greet the new conductor and old orchestra. Even the fact that Mrs. Gardner's seats were only occupied by Mr. Apthorp's topcoat, did not throw a damper over the audience. Mrs. John C. Gray, looking as lovely as ever, was with Mr. Swift, Mrs Nichols brought pretty Miss Houston. Mr. Higginson had a family party with him, and among the others present were Mr. and Mrs. W. L. Parker, Mr. and Mrs. G. H. Davenport, Mr. and Mrs. W. J. Winch, Dr. and Mrs. John Elliot, Dr. and Mrs. Cabot, Mrs. May-Winsor, Mr. and Mrs. J. C. D. Parker, Miss Gertrude Edmands, Dr. Hamilton Osgood, pretty Miss Osgood, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Foote, the Misses Prescott, Miss Forest, Mrs. and Miss Clapp, Mr. G. L. Osgood, Mr. Clarence Hay, Mr. Clayton Johns, Mr. Ethelbert Nevin, Prof. and Mrs. Royce, Miss Heloise Hersey with a bevy of pretty girls, Miss Winslow with more pretty girls, Mr. and Mrs. H. M. Rogers, Mrs. Phœbe Jenks, Mr. I. N. Gaugengigl, Mr. and Mrs. Barton Jenks, Mr. Percival Gassett, Mr. Eliot Hubbard, Mr. and Mrs. T. S. Lockwood, Mrs. W. B. Boardman, Miss French, Mr. J. Edward Priest, Mr. Arthur Downer, Dr. and Mrs. Morse, Mrs. W. B. Kehew, Mr. W. B. Lovering, Miss Lovering, Mr. and Mrs. Hecht, Miss Wheelwright, Mr. Jackson, Mr. Dorr and Miss Andrew. A number of club men in evening dress emphasized the pleasant fact that the Tavern Club was to give a supper in honor of Mr. Paur, at the conclusion of the concert.

[23]

OF ONE MIND.

LEADING SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA PLAYERS.

T. Adamowski, Franz Kneisel, Alwin Schroeder, Arnold Moldauer, Max Zach, L. Svecenski, J. Adamowski, Otto Roth.

How the Orchestra Played Under New Leadership.

Critical Review of Programme and Director.

An Admirable Disciplinarian is Mr. Paur.

Mr. Emil Paur came to us from Leipsic: but let no one be prejudiced against him on this account. He was neither born nor educated in Leipsic; he only tarried there for a season.

Whatever Leipsic may have been before 1860 or even 1870, there is no denying the fact that the Leipsic of to-day is musically a barren place. What great wandering virtuoso, or fixed artist, or composer of originality has Leipsic sent forth during the last ten or twenty years?

There are professors and chapel-masters there, and galore. There is the ancient Reinecke, the echo of Mendelssohn, the spinner of endless cadenzas, who has just adapted scenes from the Bible for the use of piano-players. There are such men as Salomon Jadassohn, whose music sounds a good deal like the name of the composer. But of what influence to-day is Leipsic in the great kingdom of music? Ichabod, Ichabod, the glory is departed.

As long ago as 1877, Liszt said to Borodine, who mentioned a pianist as a graduate of the Leipsic Conservatory, "That's no recommendation.; They have turned out there a pile of mediocrities."

⁂

We all know by hearsay and some know by actual experience, that Mr. Paur was respected and admired as a musician in the cities which he has honored by his presence. Let us start aright, Mr. Paur is not worthy of our serious attention simply because Leipsic patted him on the head. He, on the contrary, contributed largely to the musical fame of a town, that, living chiefly on its past reputation, needs such props.

⁂

Since Mr. Paur's arrival here his conduct has been judicious. On divers occasions he was examined thoroughly by newspaper men, and his conversation, as recorded, was modest, frank, sensible, to the point.

⁂

It is said that he has been diligent in rehearsal. He has not used the time of the players in reading his private correspondence of merely friendly or inflammatory nature. He has worked with the orchestra, and he knew when he entered the hall what he was about to demand of his men.

This is proper and becoming. Mr. Paur is hired for this purpose, and the players are hired to obey the conductor.

Nor were some of these players imported solely for their social qualifications, as would appear by their behavior during the last three years.

⁂

There was curiosity to see the man at the head of his forces. How many of those who attended the concert last evening cared one straw about the programme, whether the numbers were by Beethoven or by Bulsenheimer. There was a desire to see the man himself, so that there could be talk about his hair, his hands, the movements of his arms, his costume and any personal mannerisms.

This admiration of individuality and this curiosity concerning personality retard undoubtedly the healthy growth of music and tend to stifle honest criticism. The talk is of the conductor, not of the orchestra; of the conductor, not of the music, which it is his duty and privilege to study reverently.

If the conductor were unseen by the audience, would there be as great a demand for admission?

And yet, men and brethren, the one great absorbing question should not be, does Mr. Paur like oysters, or does he believe in the Jaeger system of underwear, or is Mrs. Paur a charming woman, or would the couple shine at an afternoon tea; —— the one great absorbing question is this: Is Mr. Paur thoroughly qualified for the performance of his task.

Then comes this question: When Mr. Paur conducts, are his heart and soul the servants of the composer, or do they work merely for Mr. Paur's glorification?

⁂

Mr. Paur had prepared us by his own words to think favorably of certain of his artistic theories and beliefs. Before the concert he said publicly: "I cannot sympathize with Wagner in his wish to invest some of Beethoven's compositions with scenic suggestions and dramatic developments which need other than musical terms of expression."

And in speaking of the "enormous freedoms" of von Buelow, Mr. Paur said, "That does not mean that I think the Beethoven symphonies ought to be rattled off as if by a barrel organ. No, but I believe that Beethoven's ideas, if properly presented, are sufficiently characteristic of themselves without being colored especially for the occasion."

So it does not seem that Mr. Paur intends to raise himself by trampling down and standing on Beethoven.

⁂

Then, again, Mr. Paur spoke sensibly about the introduction of soloists. In an interview published in the Journal of Sept. 29th, the new conductor said: "I shall put on only soloists that are really soloists. * * * They must be capable. The soloists must be classical, too, you know. I do not believe in putting before the public small stuff, not at all."

It must be confessed that our Symphony seasons of late were not wholly free from "small stuff." Singers so worn out, so tired that they could not raise their tones to the true pitch, nevertheless found favor with Mr. Nikisch. Pianists appeared who did not give sufficient reason for their engagement. Then there was that long line of orchestral players, some admirable and others amiable, each armed with a concerto—a line that stretched out "to th' crack of doom." And there was legitimate surprise expressed at the omission of a trombone solo, say, the well-known arrangement of "The Tear," and the non-performance by our implacable drummer of Julius Tausch's Solo for Six Kettle Drums.

⁂

Now it is true that there is often a wide difference between theories and deeds. To take a snap-shot judgment of the first performance of a conductor might be, in all probability would be, unfair, and the judgment would not be surely permanent. On the one hand, there is the comparative unfamiliarity with the players; there is the natural nervousness of a man in a strange place. On the other hand, there is always a possibility that the conductor may not fulfill the promise of a first performance. The flattery of the thoughtless and the ignorant may turn his head. Social attentions may divert him from his duty. He may grow lazy. It is much fairer to conductor and to audience to judge him after the twelfth performance instead of after the first.

But our American public is in a hurry; it can not wait; and so, as before, it is not unlikely that there will be a "grand symposium," in which musicians of high and low degree will, by editorial request, indulge in printed eulogy. Let us hope that these will not in future be a repetition of the thoughtlessness or the ingratitude of Mr. Nikisch, who, even within the following year, contradicted those good reports by his own conduct, and so irritated some of his former eulogists that they were ready to insert a knife under his fifth rib.

⁂

The programme chosen by Mr. Paur for his first appearance was as follows:

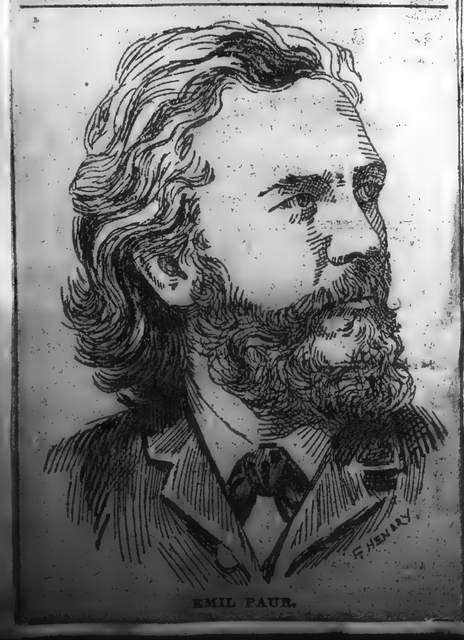
Symphony, C minor, No. 5.....Beethoven
Serenade for string orchestra, op. 48.....Tschaikowsky
Overture, "Tannhaeuser".....Wagner

⁂

The serenade by Tschaikowsky was first given in this city, or at least at the Symphony concerts, by Mr. Gericke Oct. 13, 1888, at the first concert of the season. The fifth Symphony of Beethoven was on the programme of the first concert of the season of '92-93. At this last concert there was no soloist. At the concert under Mr. Gericke songs were sung by Mrs. Julie Moran-Wyman, for Mrs. Wyman used to "hyphenate" her name.

⁂

Surely the programme itself does not call for extended discussion. The serenade by Tschaikowsky is a singularly eclectic composition, with its German introduction dashed with a hint at Russia; with its German waltz freshened with French grace; with its elegy in doleful Russian dumps, where the mourner suddenly bethinks himself of an Italian [illegible]



EMIL PAUR.

finale where the tails of the horses are over the dashboard and the passengers smell of vodka. The trivial is side by side with the beautiful; strength shakes hands with weakness. But the interest is maintained steadily, except in the Elegy, where the grief of the mourner is so spun out that there are doubts of its sincerity.

⁂

And now let us record impressions of Mr. Paur.

The man's personality assures one of his earnestness and virility.

Here is no manicured, perfumed darling of Temple Place.

This man regards the orchestra and the music rather than the audience.

He does not remember to be graceful in action.

He is sometimes violent, sometimes almost grotesque.

At one time he chops wood; at another he says to a child, "Come now, play do-do."

He is angular, even triangular.

But he is terribly in earnest.

The audience might well have thought of the line of Walt Whitman: "Pleased with the earnest words of the sweating Methodist preacher."

For Mr. Paur gave physical manifestations of his conviction and his desire to do his duty, though the hall should prove to be a stoke-hole.

⁂

Mr. Paur's beat is decisive, if it is not elegant; and decision is better than careless grace. He was diligent in giving the cue, and there could be no mistake as to the direction.

He has a keen sense of the value of drawing. His draught is clear and firm. About his sense of color, I am not so sure.

He knows the value of dynamic gradations, and he can compel his wish to be performed and to become a fact. Although the playing of orchestra last evening was of uneven worth, he showed that he could work the crescendo pedal, to borrow a phrase from the organ-builder, and there were niceties in expression that have not been heard here since the departure of Mr. Gericke.

⁂

Every move had evidently been carefully studied, and if his hand wss sometimes unsteady in moving a piece upon the board, it arose from apparent nervousness at the start, and not from ignorance of intention.

⁂

Last evening Mr. Paur appeared chiefly as a thoroughly equipped schoolmaster, a rigid disciplinarian.

The love for finish in detail gave at times a movement, particularly in the Symphony, the appearance of Mosaic. A movement became then a collection of episodes rather than a burst of long breath.

And why did Mr. Paur take the andante con moto of Beethoven at so slow a pace? The melos suffered thereby. The beauty, the strange beauty of the music became monotonous.

⁂

Has Mr. Paur temperament? Has he magnetism? Has he the imagination, the noble rage of the poet?

Time must answer these questions.

Last evening it was rather the admirable schoolmaster than the man of imagination who dominates the audience by some mysterious quality, call it what you will.

And yet how sadly this very schoolmaster was needed in Boston?

⁂

Perhaps it is a good sign that Mr. Paur last evening did not give any exhibition of volcanic, Vesuvian Emstion.

Let us wait until Mr. Paur has made the orchestra that still remembers another his own. Let us wait until he realizes thoroughly that he is no longer a stranger, that he is at home and among friends, who will hold up his hands in every honest endeavor to cultivate that which is good and honest and noble in music.

⁂

The hall was crowded, and the applause was evidently as sincere as it was frequent, loud and long continued.

The programme of the concert next Saturday evening will include Volkmann's overture, "Richard III.;" Dvorak's Rhapsodie No. 2, and Schubert's C major symphony. Mrs. Nordica will sing.

PHILIP HALE.

Who Were There and How They Enjoyed It.

A Notable Audience Completely Filling Music Hall.

Everybody Was There but Mrs. John L. Gardner.

It was shortly after 7.30 that the fashionable crowd began to gather in Music Hall for the opening event of the season, and the appearance of the new Symphony Orchestra conductor, Herr Paur.

As usual, it was a sober audience. Society takes itself very seriously when the Symphony Orchestra is in question, and there is very little small talk. In fact, people seemed to rush into the corridor, push through the doors and hurry to their seats as they never do anywhere else.

Inside the hall the very first look at the platform impressed one with a difference. The double-decked stand for the conductor had disappeared. The small two by one block, of wood box reminiscence, which, during the regime of the last conductor had been added to the regular stand to give additional inches to Mr. Nikisch when he faced the orchestra, is a thing of history. In its place was a broad, low stand of generous proportions, neatly carpeted with red, and the bit of color was a great improvement to the bare stage. On it the green-twined music stand, with its beribboned rosette of chrysanthemums did not look as it usually does—out of place.

The orchestra men were eyed with less curiosity than usual. Everyone awaited—Paur. It was past eight when he appeared at the left of the stage, mounted the steps and stirered for his post. At first sight he is far from graceful. His trunk is long for his legs and his gait is nervous and awkward. No fault could, however, be found with his attire. His clothes fitted him as well as evening dress ever fits the loose jointed German figure. His linen was immaculate, and a handerchief peeped properly from his waistcoat. His auburn mane, devoid of anything so conventional as a parting, was pushed back from his face, and his tawny beard was neatly trimmed.

In appearance he suggested Neuendorff more than anyone else who has conducted here.

The applause which greeted him was cordial but well controlled; it was warm enough, but it was not excited, and it was evident at once that he was a man who knew none, or, at least, employed none of the tricks for working up applause; for, having brushed back his hair, which his vigorous bowing in response to his reception had tumbled into his eyes, he pitched into his work with vigor.

His left hand is not the left hand of Gericke, cold, depressing, tyrannical; nor is it the left hand of Nikisch, pallid, effeminate, devitalized. In truth, it is not a pretty left hand. It is big, inclined to be ruddy, and not real becoming to a well-laundered shirt cuff. But its mannerism are likely to be as famous as were those of its predecessors. Its most notable peculiarity is a sort of "hush-a-bye-baby" act that is very peculiar, but very suggestive.

There is something honest and unaffected about the man, and, when he is quite used to Boston, no doubt he will boldly fetch out from his coat tail pocket that extra handkerchief for which he fished between each movement of the symphony last night and did not display at all, although his brow sadly needed mopping—a mopping which Boston, when he knows it better, will often see administered, and why not?

Many prominent people were absent last evening, but the gathering was a brilliant one.

Mr. Henry L. Higginson and his wife occupied their usual seats on the floor.

Near them sat Dr. John Wheelock Elliot and his wife of Marlboro Street and Dr. H. H. A. Beach and Mrs. Beach, the composer, with her hair hair pushed back from the face in which some one has discovered a resemblance to Beethoven, and wearing, as usual, a simple dark gown. In fact, there was no dressing in the audience, the absence of a few bonnets being the only festive thing in the attire of the women.

Arthur Howard Pickering has deserted his seat right under the conductor's stand for one further on the side.

Dr. Hamilton Osgood, who is destined to be known as the father of Mrs. Fiske Warren, was accompanied by his younger daughter; almost as pretty as her older sister.

Professor Whitney of Harvard College, who for so many years has sat, score in hand, just over the cock, was one of the first to take his seat in the balcony. Mr. John Pickering Lyman sat near him.

Of course the musical fraternity was well represented. Among those present were: Mr. and Mrs. E. A. McDowell, who have recently come to town; Mr. Ethelbert Nevin, Mr. Arthur Foote, Mr. Ernest Perato, Mr. S. B. Whitney, Miss Gertrude Edmands, J. D. C. Parker, Mr. W. L. Parker, Mr. Clayton Johns, Mr. and Mrs. William French, Mr. E. B. Hayes, B. J. Lang, Warren Davenport.

The library set was equally well represented. Mr. J. Russell Sullivan sat in front of the balcony. Mr. Arlo Bates was there with his new honors sitting easily upon him; Mr. W. H. Ridering was accompanied by Mrs. Ridering. Richard Henry Dana and Theodore Dwight, the new librarian were noted on the floor.

Mrs. Phobe Jenks, her son Barton Jenks and his wife, who was pretty Agnes Acres, a sister of Miriam O'Leary, and a bride of last season, were present.

Dr. Inches was accompanied by Mrs. Inches, who was Louise Pomeroy of Philadelphia, and has been one of the belles of the North shore this season.

In addition, if it is fair to pick out men of an audience so notable men, Dr. Clarence Blake, one of the most beloved and popular professional men in town; Dr. W. S. Bigelow, Mr. A. Brown, Mr. Warren A. Locke, Mr. Henry C. Peabody, Dr. L. L. Breck, Prof. H. E. Clifford, Mr. B. Learned Hand, Prof. James Mills Pierce, Mrs. Mary May-Winsor, Miss Florence May-Winsor, Mr. and Mrs. H. M. Rogers, Mr. Creston Clarke, Dr. Fitts, Mr. Temple Fay, Mr. and Mrs. H. E. Clement, Mrs. James Jackson, I. M. Ganzenglge.

Probably Mrs. John L. Gardner was the most missed of the absentees.

ELLEN HAWKINS.

THE OPINIONS OF MUSICIANS.

The interviews with prominent musicians gathered by Journal reporters after the Symphony rehearsal, and published in the Saturday Journal, voiced the opinion of critical Boston then, and last night's favorable opinions by those present at the concert only served to emphasize the points originally published in the Journal columns.

THE SYMPHONIES.

The thirteenth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra began last evening, with the interesting, if not exciting, circumstance of the appearance of a new conductor. The organization that is the result of Mr. Higginson's generous impulse and patient fostering is now surely on a firm foundation. It is a public institution that adds abroad a glory to our town; and there is no doubt that the orchestra is appreciated here, although there may be open discussion of the merits and faults of conductors who come and go, fret for an idle day, or are for lasting benefit as musicians and disciplinarians. So let us all welcome the season now begun, and if there be any shaking of the head at the number 13, absit omen!

These weekly concerts are indeed "a sweet boon" to us, as, according to Artemus, the Tower is to London. To many, Saturday evening in winter would not exist without this musical enjoyment, and when there is occasionally a breathing spell, in the absence of the orchestra, the regular [illegible] heavy. The theatres are usually crowded Saturday night, and enforced staying at home saddens many victims of the Symphony habit.

Then the appearance of the conductor and the men, the latest gossip concerning some alleged behavior or belief of one of the musicians, the atmospheric condition of the hall, the state of the Saturday evening weather—all these furnish food for conversation at table and in street car for at least two days after the concert. And occasionally there is talk about the music that was played.

This going to Music Hall of a Saturday evening is to many an amusement, a regularly recurring amusement that in certain respects is not unlike dram-drinking. It is a pleasure not without acute excitement, followed, particularly after a long-winded symphony, by a condition of dull lethargy. And yet these good people might be offended seriously, if they were classed as amusement-seekers; they look upon the Symphony concerts as educational, as making for culture. But they might be sorely put to it, if they were required to explain just how and when and where they gained in civilization.

The sense of gratifying a longing for amusement does not preclude criticism, particularly destructive criticism; nor would it be well perhaps to inquire concerning the foundation for any reasonable criticism to rest upon. Boston is very critical, and it seems occasionally that the only real pleasure of the inhabitants is in the investigation or explanation of this question: Why do we not find pleasure in this or that? It is only at the "Pop" concerts that music is accepted gratefully and sympathetically by the crowd, and there is no doubt that in this case pleasant eating and drinking and smoking pave the way to musical enjoyment.

The first gun of the season has been fired—the Symphonies are begun. On Friday Winter Street and Hamilton Place began to assume their usual appearance in the season. Pretty young girls with violets in their jackets and their dainty chins tied up snugly in thread lace, with their broad coat collars flaring, were once more seen chatting in the most lively manner, as they wended their way to the rehearsal, while the same loungers, as of old, appeared and passed up and down the thoroughfares and stared at the said pretty girls.

And all the talk was not about Paur either, for there are in the symphony orchestra many who do not stand on the top of that two by one box who have a decided draught. If any one chanced to be walking down the street after it was over he would have heard delicious confidences made of the manner in which last season's idol affected this season's symphony rehearsal girl.

And once more the ice cream soda resort is in full blast, and the photograph dealer in Hamilton Place is again an important factor in the young girl's Friday afternoon spree.

Fortunately, or unfortunately, the Boston photographer captured Mr. Paur as soon as he arrived in town, so that the girls who are disappointed that he has clipped his flame red beard and cropped his flowing locks may buy his counterfeit presentment as he is and not as he was.

It was the old, old story—all the rush tickets, even, were sold before noon on Friday, and at a quarter before twelve the line was forming. Fancy standing an hour and three-quarters at the door, and sitting an hour inside before the concert began—two hours and three-quarters of waiting for one hour and a half of concert! Still, it anticipation betters realization, the waiters have it.

And the rattle of many carriages down that Park Street slope last night assured one that Back Bay was arising from its summer sleep.

The swells return to town to find it looking even more beautiful than ever. On many of the houses the woodbine dies in glorious tints, and the Common and the Garden are gorgeous in their autumn dress. It seems as if there never was such an October as this is being.

[24]

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCIV. NO. 107.

SUNDAY, OCTOBER 15, 1893.

THE NEW CONDUCTOR.

Emil Paur in Charge of the Symphony.

Wielded the Baton at Last Night's Concert.

Beethoven, Tschaikowsky and Wagner Played.

The General Impression Very Favorable.

What Musical Critics Say of the Performance.

The reassembling of the Boston Symphony orchestra for the season and the appearance of Mr. Emil Paur, the new conductor of the organization, served as attractions which called musical Boston to Music Hall last evening in such numbers that both seating and standing room was completely occupied.

It is a source of pleasure to say at once that the most sanguine hopes regarding the new incumbent of the position of conductor of the Boston orchestra were fully realized.

Mr. Henry L. Higginson, the founder and patron of this orchestra, has for the fourth time shown his rare good judgment in selecting a proper conductor, and the Boston musical public is again his debtor for his action in this direction.

Mr. Paur is a master of the art of conducting, he holds the most absolute control over his men, swaying them at will, and controlling the several sections as if they were each a single instrument. He conveys his ideas in the most unmistakable fashion, his beat is decisive and distinct at all times, his indications of the cues cannot fail to be understood, and, all in all, he combines as many excellent qualifications for his position as any man America has yet had an opportunity to pass judgment upon.

HERR EMIL PAUR.

He is evidently a born musician, and has developed his natural faculties in the most thorough fashion, his handling of the orchestra last evening showing a thorough understanding of the possibilities of every instrument and the power to bring these possibilities to his aid in the presentation of his ideas of the several compositions.

The evening's programme was begun with the great fifth symphony of Beethoven, a work well calculated to display the intelligence, taste and ability of a conductor. The reading given the symphony was a masterly one in every way. Thoroughly conservative in its general [illegible] qualities with a cleanness and grace that at once established the standing of the new conductor as a man whose lead can be safely followed by all seeking to know the 'immortal nine" in all their perfection.

No better interpretation of this symphony can be recalled since the elder Damrosch electrified a select audience in this city many years ago by a performance of the work. It is impossible to consider the individual merits of the reading at this time.

Tschaikowsky's serenade for strings in C major, op. 48, followed the symphony, and in his performance of the several movements Mr. Paur used the string section of the band with faultless grace and finish. The ever changing moods of the composition were splendidly reproduced, and the playing of the men was controlled as absolutely as if the conductor had a single instrument at his own command. The sensuous waltz movement was given with a swing and grace that would have done credit to the "Waltz King," and the virtuosity of the players was admirably displayed in the difficult finale.

Mr. Paur completed his evening's programme with a performance of the "Tannhauser" overture that fairly electrified his audience, and sent them away from the hall full of enthusiasm over his skill as a conductor. The colossal beauties of this old overture were brought out in the boldest fashion, and the massive use of tone color indulged in by Wagner in this composition was splendidly realized in its interpretation.

The evening had many events of interest aside from the programme and its performance. Mrs. Paur was present to witness the triumphs of her husband, occupying a modest position in the left section near the stage. Mr. Henry L. Higginson occupied his usual seat, and had much difficulty in escaping the congratulations thrust upon him from all sides after the concert.

The conductor's desk was elegantly decked in honor of the occasion, and, above all, it can be said that the interest shown by the men of the orchestra in carrying out, in the minutest fashion, the clearly expressed directions of Mr. Paur, were at all times manifest.

Mr. Paur is a welcome addition to musical Boston.

WHAT THE TRIBUNE SAYS.

Lacks Faults of Previous Conductors, but Has Some of His Own.

[Special Dispatch to the Sunday Herald.]

NEW YORK, Oct. 14, 1893. Regarding the Symphony rehearsal in Boston yesterday afternoon, and the concert this evening, and the new conductor, the Tribune critic says: The consuming curiosity which the musical people of Boston have felt for six months past concerning the personality, methods and artistic ideals of the new conductor of the Symphony orchestra was measurably gratified by the first public rehearsal and concert of the season, which took place on Friday afternoon and last night.

It is not likely that any other city in the world could have developed quite so profound a feeling on just such a subject. The conductor cult is a phase of social activity which flourishes only in Boston. It is true, indications of something like it have appeared here and in several other cities occasionally, but a complete parallel to Boston is yet to be found. In a sense the cult is the outgrowth of a latter-day development in music.

Largely through the influence of Wagner, conductors have become virtuosi. They are now hired for their skill and training as specialists; they command salaries which are beginning to approach those of eminent singers and instrumentalists; naturally, also, they have their following and their critics. Fifty or 75 years ago such things were not dreamed of. When the conductor sat at his harpsichord and took part in the accompaniment, or when he beat time with a roll of paper, turning his back on the musicians, as compelled by deference due to august listeners, he was a comparatively small factor in the sum of music making. The chapel masters of kings and nobles were not conductors so much as they were composers, bound to provide new music for the court band and maintain discipline in that body, which meant to keep its members conscious of their duties as menials in the household. Conducting, moreover, was then little else than time beating. A change followed the dawn of the romantic period, when characteristic beauty and poetical expression came into their rights as Elements in Music.

This change lifted interpretation, so called, into prominence, which, working retroactively, has ever since sought to find the essence of new wines in old bottles. The tendency was to some extent based on truth, but the liberty which it gave the conductor has frequently been strained into license, and it was largely through the medium of just such straining that the conductor grew into the hitherto unheard of importance, such great importance indeed, that his dictum concerning the meaning of a composer often has seemed sufficient to work an estoppal of appeal to the composer himself.

Boston contains a large number of music lovers, and it was not at all strange that the conductor question should there take on large dimensions. Perhaps it never would have developed to an abnormal size if the Symphony orchestra concerts, especially the Friday afternoon rehearsals, had not become pre-eminently social functions. Good form has for years compelled attendance on them, whether one is fond of music or not. Of course, persons who patronized artistic enterprises for wholly extraneous reasons are bound to champion the cause of the powers that be in the enterprises. Here we have the beginning of a faction which naturally finds an ally in the conservative or the radical persons who love music and whose tastes chance to be humored by the conductor.

The existence of a conductor's party, by the same token, presupposes the existence of an opposition. For four years the musical government of Boston has been radical and the conservatives have been in opposition. The first rehearsal and concert under the new regime have reduced things to a state of flux, which, we imagine, will endure for several weeks. When the state of fixity comes again, we imagine, further, it will be found that the parties have been reconstructed. It will not be surprising if the young Symphony rehearsal women shall withdraw in force from the government and join the opposition, and that a great many now in opposition from other reasons than a simple desire to be "agin the government" shall espouse the cause of the new conductor.

The reasons for this belief will appear in the course of such a discussion of the new conductor as was made possible by his first appearance. He is Emil Paur, until a few weeks ago conductor at the Stadt Theatre in Leipsic. This theatre, by the way, is the stepping stone by which German conductors mount to American altitudes in their profession. When Anton Seidl was conductor there, Arthur Nikisch was his assistant. Seidl came to America and Nikisch moved up. When Nikisch received his call to Boston, Paur became his successor at Leipsic. Now Nikisch has gone to Buda-Pesth, and Paur succeeds [illegible] a considerable experience. He has wielded the baton at Cassel, Koenigsberg and Mannheim, as well as Leipsic. He is studious, energetic, conscientious and devoted to his work, fond of the music of the forward young composers of today, a Wagnerite from conviction, and professedly a believer that the music of classic writers ought to be read in the spirit of their time. So far as his published creed is concerned, it is unobjectionable, but probably his critics in Boston will sooner believe his acts than his words. He is a man of large frame and large head; his face is covered with a typical Teutonic beard, and in appearance as well as bearing he realizes the German conviction that strength goes before beauty. He is not a graceful man, and he will prove a grievous disappointment to the gushing Symphony persons who doted on Mr. Nikisch by reason of his interesting pallor, his dainty hands and his attitudes. Mr. Paur is built of homelier stuff. His beat is heavy, jerky and angular, and the sight of it does not help one to the enjoyment of the music. Its purpose, however, is unmistakable; it is not the public. He beats time, and he beats dynamics, but he does not try "with waving arms" to suggest the emotional contents of the music to the public.

Meant for the Musicians,

All of these things will be disappointing to many of the patrons of the public rehearsals, but it they serve to divert attention from the man to the music there will be compensation in that fact. Whatever else he may encourage, Mr. Paur will not encourage affectation. He looks and acts like a man incapable of it himself, and intolerant of it in others. Affectation is the bane of musical culture.

So much for the physical manifestations. The intellectual are more significant. Mr. Paur's programme contained only three numbers, but they sufficed to make plain what will probably on longer and better acquaintance prove to be the characteristics of his works. They were Beethoven's symphony in C minor, the Tschaikowsky's serenata for strings in C major, op. 48, and Wagner's overture to "Tannhauser"—three works, each of which bears the stamp of its composer's in dividuality.

In an interview printed in the BOSTON HERALD last Sunday Mr. Paur disclaimed sympathy with a tendency attributed to Wagner to invest some of Beethoven's symphonies with scenic and dramatic elements which lie outside of purely musical expression. We do not know to which composition he referred, but we do know that a great many sins of interpretation have been laid at Wagner's door for which he was not responsible. It does not follow if a champion of Wagner distorts and abuses a symphony as Mr. Nikisch and Mr. Thomas distorted and abused Beethoven's seventh at some of their concerts a few seasons ago, and Dr. von Bulow the minuet of the eighth, they do it to be done. Mr. Nikisch's grievous work with the first movement was simple erraticism, and possibly a seeking after catchpenny effects; Mr. Thomas' innovations were the outcome of pedantic studies in scientific phrasing. They held him captive for awhile and then he frankly abandoned them. Dr. von Bulow's notions were exaggerations of some of Wagner's suggestions, uttered in protest aginst an abuse in the opposite direction. In each case appeal to Beethoven's printed page and the canons of beauty which had universal validity in Beethoven's day brought out a judgment of condemnation.

Because Wagner Wished It

Of similar wrong-doing Mr. Paur must be acquitted. He did not strive to impress any novel conception on the C minor symphony. He did mar its beauty, but it was not through any wish to inject into it things that never entered Beethoven's mind. He hurt it by exaggerated emphasis and a detached style of performance, which we have observed as an outgrowth of the Bayreuth influence. It is a good rule to ask the players upon the wind instruments to phrase as if they were vocal performers, but this does not mean that the charm of continuity of idea should be sacrificed in order that every phrase, and occasionally a motive, may stand out from the fabrics in all the sharpness of its outline.

Mr. Paur believes that Beethoven sometimes built his works on a poetical idea. Such a one, a venerable tradition tells us, underlies the C minor symphony. It is not necessary, however, to enforce this upon the attention of the hearers to make such a proclamation of of the symphony that only loudness and angularity are to be noted as its characteristics. Even here homogeneity and beauty of tone count for something. This striving after sonority is one of the pitfalls of the fiery, untamed conductor of the present. It leads them to try to build up climaxes by dynamics, instead of musical means.

The Fundamental Theme

The Boston Symphony orchestra is a superb band, peculiarly admirable in its string choir. These strings have never had the fulness and richness of tone, the all-compelling and all-satisfying muscularity since Mr. Gericke went away that they had when he was their conductor. Yet Mr. Gericke never forced them any more than he forced the brass choir. There was a great volume of tone at times in the Tschaikowsky serenade last Friday, but it seemed to have been acquired at such a cost of labor that the lightness and grace which are the chief adornments of the work were wofully wanting. It was always strong, capitally worked out at times, in respect of the rubato and the treatment of the voices, but not for a moment elegant.

The "Tannhauser" overture threw all of the features of Mr. Paur of which we have been obliged to speak in disprais into the boldest relief; but in this music they worked less harm. It was an extremely lurid reading, very much like that to which Mr. Seidl has accustomed his audiences, but it showed a masterful hand in the development of climaxes and a superb ability to hold his forces in serried ranks on the top of a dramatic hill so long as it was necessary they should be there.

It ought to be said as bearing upon some of this criticism that the orchestra was not in such condition as it will soon be after it has got down to regular practice. It was decidedly rusty, in fact, and that this circumstance unquestionably accentuated most of the things which must be pronounced unlovely in last Friday's public rehearsal.

Mr. Paur was most graciously and warmly welcomed by the audience, and while there was no lack of fault finding, neither was there want of encouraging and approving applause.

HENRY E. KREHBIEL.

WEIGHT, DIGNITY, CORRECTNESS.

Qualities Which the New York Times Attributes to Mr. Paur.

[Special Dispatch to the Sunday Herald.]

NEW YORK, Oct. 14, 1893. The Times says of the Boston Symphony's new conductor:

For the sake of art it is a great pity that the personal element should enter so strongly into the public consideration of artistic matters. Rossini wrote music simply that Patti might sing it; Chopin wrote scherzos only that Paderewski might interpret them; Beethoven composed symphonies that conductors might have "readings." Yet, there are cases in which the personality of a single man means much, and one of these is in the direction of an important orchestra.

Four years ago Emil Paur laid down the baton of the Boston Symphony orchestra and Arthur Nikisch took it up. Already the fame of the organization had grown so wide that it was regarded as a national rather than a local body. Persons from various cities, including, as a matter of course, the metropolis flocked, to Boston to attend the result of the new man and to try to fore ast the future of the splendid orchestra over which he was to preside. Today Bostonians are called upon to sit at the feet of a new conductor. Nikisch is no longer a name to conjure with. His pale, thoughtful face; his silken, pendent hair; his eloquent, conspicuous hands, and his passionate, erratic readings have all taken wings to themselves. The causes of their flight need not now concern any one. They were not nice.

Of the unavailing efforts of Col. Henry L. Higginson—who is not and never was T. Wentworth Higginson, though many newspapers of high degree have tried to make him so—to secure Dr. Hans Richter of Vienna; of the doctor's willingness to come, and of the inviolability of his contract, the tale has been told.

Emil Paur is the name of the new man who was finally engaged, and whom at yesterday's public rehearsal and tonight's concert all Boston went out to see. The verb "to see" is used advisedly, for even Boston, with all its intellect, is human.

Paur Is an Austrian, born at Czernow, in the province of Bukowina. He was a fellow-student of Nikisch and Felix Motta at Vienna. He has been conductor at Cassel, gloried by the memory of Spohr, and at Koeningsburg, at Mannheim and at Leipsic. In all of these places he directed the opera. He also appeared as a violinist and a piano virtuoso. Thus much Boston learned about him through the patient industry of the newspaper scribes, for, painful though it be to admit it no one in Boston had ever heard of him before.

But such information did not go far toward satisfying the heart-hunger of that marvellous production of nature, not unassisted by art, the Boston Symphony matinee girl. Was the new conductor handsome? Was he blessed with a seraphic countenance, suggestive of an oatmeal diet and early death? Was he not at least poetic and æsthetic? Did he have soulful hands? And did his clothes fit him? What were 20,000 "readings" if he were to turn out to be short, rotund and prone to limpness of the collar?

It is not likely that the matinee girl will soon recover from the dreadful shock which struck her emotional centre when Emil Paur stepped upon the stage of the Boston Music Hall for the first time. If ever there was a plain, prosaic, "Hofcapelmeister" looking conductor, it is Paur. He is not especially short, nor does he run far toward globularity, but his architecture is severely doric. His hair is a dingy brown—long, of course—and his face is conspicuous by reason of the prominence of the cheekbones and the length of his lower jaw.

Paur Is Not Pretty

to look at. As for his manner of conducting, it is certainly rigorous. His down beat is full of conscious rectitude, and the relations of the other beats to it are sanctified by the fundamental truth of trigonometry. It is certain that the remark of Little Buttercup about Dick Deadeye may be fairly applied to the new conductor. "He is a little triangular."

Alas for the palpitating matinee girl! No more graceful curves that seemed to wave the music out of the air, as though they were the summonses of a magician's wand; nothing now but a cold, intellectual, accurately measured beat, for which, perhaps, the members of the orchestra are in secret profoundly grateful; for a good, intelligible beat with the weight of head, hands, arms, back and directorial solemnity behind it, has this one admirable quality: It will keep an orchestra acquainted with the conductor's wishes as to tempo.

Now, as to that mighty significant, yet mysterious, matter called "reading." Mr. Paur called upon Boston yesterday afternoon and tonight to judge of his quality through the performance of Beethoven's fifth symphony, Tshaikowsky's serenade for strings in C major, op. 48, and Wagner's "Tannhauser" overture. No soloist was permitted to obtrude upon the scheme. The conductor himself furnished enough of the personal element.

It may be prophesied, with a reasonable amount of assurance, that Mr. Paur's readings will never assume what is called a revolutionary tendency. His conception of the Beethoven symphony was one of which even Carl Zerrahn need not have been ashamed. It was one which could not have aroused very greatly the combativeness of Theodore Thomas, an attentive listener. It was thoroughly respectful and eminently respectable. It permitted Tradition to sit with accustomed squareness on her oaken throne, and it diffused of general comfort.

A Mild and Gentle Glow

But there is such a thing as carrying a reading too far, even though it be one whose correctness is indisputable. It is said to be necessary for the sculptor to study anatomy. It is not deemed essential, however, that he should practice the science of dissecting. Neither is it essential that a conductor should so far impose his process of intellectual analysis upon a performance that the articulation of a symphony should be exposed. Yet this was what Paur did. That inexorable down beat made fate knock at the door with the arsis of every measure, while every phrase came out with neatly-trimmed corners.

In the simple, elementary rythm of the final march this square-cut manner was decidedly in place; in the sensuous and ornate it was quite as decidedly out. Yet here the splendid quality of the Boston strings came to the conductor's rescue and gained for him a result which was not his own.

On the whole, the performance of the fifth symphony was acceptable. To those who are rightly weary of attempts to dramatize Beethoven it must have been a general relief. But it was unleniably a cold, calculated correctness that pervaded it, and some hearers must have been reminded of a Von Bulow piano recital, or a cavan by Judassohn.

However, those who were wondering whether there was any real temperament concealed under the somewhat modest exterior turned with expectancy to the second number, the serenade. Again weight, force, deliberation, ponderosity. The lovely languorous, delicately-treated valse came with heavy steps and affected ritardardi. Where were all the infinitesimal nuances, the dainty lacework of lights and shades, like sunlight shot through forest boughs, that Gericke would have scattered through

This Sinuous Scherzando?

Was there no lightness in the man? Oh, for a single moment of Gallic volatility, poised on tiptoe, and with an airy kiss blown from fingertips! There is a time to laugh, and a time to sing. It is not always time to count three in a bar. Enough of this serenade. Now for the "Tannhauser" overture.

Again weight and force, but now also dignity, for the music of the opening measures bears calm, sustained treatment. The end of the "Pilgrim's Chorus" is reached. The strings slip away into the weird mysteries of the bacchanale. Now, now for more passion! Gradually the agitation of the orchestra grows. There is a grim resolution about the down beat. There is a deep earnestness in the conductor's face at last. There is a glow under this homely exterior. It is not a flash; not a burst of fire; but it is warmth and the climax of the overture [illegible]

[illegible] crescendo.

And so we came to the end of this first view of the new man from Leipsic. Final judgment as to his ability cannot now be pronounced. But unless nervousness and anxiety wholly changed the habit of the man, it is safe to say that weight, dignity and correctness, rather than grace, poetry and passion, will prove to be the salient qualities of Emil Paur's conducting.

These are by no means qualities to be despised. The classic writers left us a very precious legacy, which is safe from violent treatment in the hands of just such men as Pauer. Perhaps the modern romanticists may not seem to be quite so romantic under his beat, but that remains to be proved. From his first concert one would naturally expect to find that his most admirable achievements would prove to be the explication of a Bach fugue.

The attitude of the audiences toward the new conductor was not inspirating. The applause was of a conservative nature. Perhaps in the future, when Boston is better acquainted with Mr. Paur he may arouse enthusiasm.

W. G. HENDERSON.

LOCAL COMMENTS.

Opinions of Boston Musicians Upon Mr. Paur's Abilities.

In response to requests made, a number of musicians and composers have presented briefly their impressions of Mr. Paur's abilities, as formed by a hearing of his opening concert last evening. Some curious declinations were received, and it is to be hoped that some of the writers will recall their own words when, in the future, they may read critical opinions formed under the circumstances they were called upon to adapt themselves to in this instance. It may be well, for the benefit of readers unfamiliar with Boston's musicians, to indicate the standing of those who have contributed their opinion upon this subject.

Mr. B. J. Lang is the conductor of the Cecilia and Apollo clubs and director and organist at King's Chapel. Mr. George L. Osgood was for years director of the Boylston Club and subsequently of the Boston Singers. Mr. George E. Whiting is director of music and organist at the Church of the Immaculate Conception. Mr. Carl Faetten is at the head of the New England Conservatory, and a pianist and composer. Mr. Thomas Ryan of the Mendelssohn Quintet club needs no introduction; he is known from Maine to California, and has known every conductor in this country for a generation. Mr. L. S. Thompson represents the younger school of American musicians, and, although known at present most prominently as the composer of "Prince Pro Tem," is generally admitted to be a representative of the best education of today. Mrs. H. H. A. Beach is accepted as the leading woman composer of America at the present time, her compositions and writing having won her a recognition in the world of music which entitles her opinions to the prominence given them.

Mr. B. J. Lang.

To the Editor of the Herald: In response to your courteous request for my impressions of Mr. Paur as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, I must declare that the judgment that can be formed after a single concert must be at best rather unreliable. The opinion of any one of the many distinguished musicians in the orchestra who have played under Mr. Paur's conducting for a week or more, must be far more valuable than that of a listener of a single performance. The devoted attention and evidently eager desire of the entire orchestra to respond to Mr. Paur in every indication of his wishes, speaks volumes for the regard and respect that he has already obtained from them. What wonderful changes—thanks to Mr. Higginson—have come over our musical conditions in Boston in these last 20 years! I have previous to the last dozen years seen the services of two of the three most famous conductors of the world offered to us for the asking, and lost to us for the simple lack of that asking, while now we are eagerly welcoming our fourth new conductor.

Now that our Symphony orchestra is in its teens, let us hope that the illnesses of early youth have all been endured, and that from now on it will thrive in blessed health and vigor. With the warmest welcome to Mr. Paur and the highest anticipations of his success with us, I am yours,

B. J. LANG.

George L. Osgood.

To the Editor of the Herald: There was a sturdy, wholesome manliness about the whole performance. The figures were always wonderfully clear. The rythms were magnificent. The conducting was earnest and painstaking. The impression upon the orchestra was positive to the last degree.

In place of poetic license, there was a determined control on given lines.

After a few concerts Mr. Paur will probably get into the full swing of all his forces, and will give us opportunity to see him at his best, hardly possible in a first concert with an orchestra almost new to him.

The conductor himself is a manly fellow.

GEORGE L. OSGOOD.

George E. Whiting.

To the Editor of the Herald: It would be out of the question for me to judge intelligently of Mr. Paur after the performance of tonight. Still, one can give a tolerably shrewd guess that the new conductor belongs decidedly to the old school of capellmeisters—good musicians and capable conductors, but perhaps not brilliant men, especially as regards their attitude toward the new school of composers. It would be exceedingly difficult to find a man to follow Mr. Nikish possessing this brilliant qualities and at the same time the wonderful power of drill which Mr. Gericke had to a superlative degree. Looked at in this light the new conductor's conservatism will be welcome to the musical public I have no doubt.

GEORGE E. WHITING.

Carl Faelten.

To the Editor of the Herald: I attended the rehearsal yesterday, and in my opinion Bostonians are to be congratulated to see again at the head of our Symphony orchestra another excellent conductor. The first impressions of Mr. Emil Paur's work are very favorable in every respect, and I am looking forward with great pleasure and interest toward the continuation of the series. Yours very truly,

CARL FAELTEN.

Thomas Ryan.

To the Editor of the Herald: I was greatly pleased and satisfied with Mr. Paur as a director. Evidently he had full control over the orchestra. The performance of the symphony made that manifest. Each movement was played with great deliberation and repose of manner—fine balance of parts—and with most careful attention to the pianissimo passages. The finale march was an ideal heroique performance.

The Tschaikowsky suite was delightful. The brilliant last movement was well played and showed up the fine string force. To some people the "Tannhauser" overture would be the piece to prove ability. Well, his ability was proved. The difference in manner from that displayed in the Beethoven symphony [illegible]

...comes of ... to the ... and about him and ... his future work.

... and all music lovers can congratulate themselves and feel sure that they have a genuine musician in their new director. THOMAS RYAN.

L. S. Thompson.

To the Editor of the Herald: There is so much that seems to me entirely new, both in Mr. Paur's style of conducting and in his conception of the music, that I find it almost impossible to form any permanent opinion of him from a single hearing.

The rendering of the Beethoven symphony, especially, seemed to me a revelation, and gave me intense pleasure. On the whole, Mr. Paur appears to me a conductor of remarkable ability in his control of the orchestra and his general grasp of the music.

He seems like a man of intense musical temperament, and one whom we shall like better and better the more we hear him.

L. S. THOMPSON.

Mrs. H. H. A. Beach.

To the Editor of the Herald: A well chosen programme presented a comparative novelty in the serenade and such an exemplification of the classical and romantic schools in the symphony and the overture as would supply a fair and adequate test of the capacity and courage of our new conductor.

Mr. Paur's reading of the 5th Symphony was characterized by dignity, clearness and brilliancy, with the addition in the andante of a reverential tenderness worthy of the highest praise. Exception might be taken to the tempo of this movement, which was played at an extremely slow pace, but the rendering was so consistent and broad throughout that only occasionally was any sense of dragging noticeable. The first movement was presented with fine attention to the slightest marks of the composer; the fermata, especially were treated with rare judgment.

Mr. Paur's firm and decisive beat carried the cellos and basses through the trio of the Scherzo with as near an approach to clearness as the music will permit, and the finale was a genuine triumph of brilliancy.

Many phases of great beauty in regard to shading and refinement of expression might be instanced, such as the leading up to the last movement from the scherzo, where there was a wonderfully steady pianissimo with no crescendo until the exact moment indicated by Beethoven, eight measures before the allegro. The entire interpretation was free from capricious variations in tempo or phrasing, and the playing remarkable for its precision and sincerity.

Tschaikowski's serenade displayed the sonority of the strings to good advantage, while the "Tannhaeuser" overture received a performance worthy of a high place among the successes of the orchestra.

It is already evident that Mr. Paur is a disciplinarian and executant of a high order. If his manner, to which as yet we are hardly accustomed, appears somewhat rigid, let us hope that the mathematical accuracy, of which it seemed to be a part, accounted for the unusually satisfactory performance of his orchestra after a long vacation and comparatively few rehearsals, promising much for the future of music in Boston.

BOSTON IDEAS

OCTOBER 15, 1893.

Friday afternoon's first Symphony rehearsal drew a packed house to Music hall. And Mr. Paur seems to have made a good impression, even though those persons who like to grow enthusiastic have not as yet found occasion to "go wild" over him. Which is perhaps a point in Mr. Paur's favor.

NEW YORK HERALD.

NEW YORK, MONDAY, OCTOBER 16, 1893.

EMIL PAUR LEADS IN BOSTON.

[BY TELEGRAPH TO THE HERALD.]

BOSTON, Mass., Oct. 15, 1893.—The programme for the opening concert of the symphony series last night included Beethoven's fifth symphony and the overture to "Tannhauser," and for a novelty, a suite for string orchestra, Op. 48, by Tschaikowsky. This was Mr. Emil Paur's first offering to an American public, and he received the tumultuous reception, at the hands of a hall crowded by music loving fashionables, which was accorded his predecessors, Messrs. Nikisch and Gericke. Mr. Paur is less graceful than Mr. Nikisch, but he gave an exhibition of earnestness and power, and apparently won the respect of his critical audience. The orchestra as usual played faultlessly.

Mr. Paur said to-day that he was very much pleased with the work of the orchestra, and thought he had as good a lot of musicians as could be found anywhere. He was delighted, too, with his reception.

The critics all see in the new conductor a strict disciplinarian and a man of earnestness and vigor. Some of them, however, doubt if he has the magnetism which characterized his predecessors.

[26]

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

SUNDAY, [illegible], 93.

FIRST SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Season Opens Brilliantly and Musical Bostonians Seem Delighted with Mr Nikisch's Successor.

The 13th season of the Symphony orchestral concerts has opened brilliantly. Music hall was crowded with fashion and wealth at the Friday afternoon rehearsal and at last evening's concert. Seemingly few of the patrons of former years were absent.

Everybody was glad that the concerts had begun again, and nobody hesitated to express his or her gratification.

Rarely has a symphony gathering been so demonstrative in welcoming the orchestra. As one after the other of the favorite members of the band came upon the stage they were greeted with hearty plaudits, and when it was evident that few if any of the prominent members of last year's organization were missing there was more and still warmer applause.

The reception accorded the new director, Mr Emil Paur, was enthusiastically cordial. They wanted him to at once feel that he was among friends and among those who are capable of appreciating to the fullest extent his rare musical attainments.

If Mr Paur does not feel thoroughly at home in Boston today it is not because of any lack of good will on the part of those who listened to his first concert in this city.

Before the Friday rehearsal was over it was evident that the new director would be a great favorite in Boston, and at last night's concert there was still further assurance of his coming popularity. The generally expressed opinion was that Mr Higginson had secured a worthy successor for the two master musicians who have directed this foremost of all orchestral organizations.

In appearance Mr Paur differs essentially from either of his predecessors, and he is as unlike them in his method of conducting. He is of large, solid physique, and his manner of directing is most substantial, if not absolutely heavy.

There is little that is light or graceful in his style. He directs with determination and exactness rather than with enthusiasm.

He does not seem to be possessed of great personal magnetism. He is a leader who will inspire confidence rather than enthusiasm. He makes one feel that he knows absolutely what he is doing, and compels confidence in the correctness of all that he does.

None of his predecessors gave at first hearing such forcible evidence of thorough control over every individual member of the orchestra. Mr Paur's command over all was absolute.

There will surely be no lack of discipline in the Boston symphony orchestra so long as Mr Paur is at its head, and there is every reason for believing that the splendid organization will, under his careful direction, not only maintain its position at the head of all orchestras, but will advance still further towards the goal of perfection.

The program provided for his first offering was characteristic of the man.

It was conservative and substantial.

Mr Paur is, from all indications, inclined to classical music, and it is unlikely that anything of a trivial nature will ever be allowed to appear upon his programs.

On the contrary his offerings will likely be of an educational character.

Beethoven's grand fifth symphony, Tschaikowshy's serenade for strings in C and the "Tannhauser" overture constituted yesterday's numbers.

Naturally the greatest interest was felt in his reading of the symphony, for no one who knows anything about music is ignorant of the position occupied in musical compositions by this grand work.

His interpretation of the work was worthy of the cordial praise bestowed upon it. His was a faithful reading, rather more exact than that offered by Mr Nikisch. He does not seem inclined to innovations of his own, but is content to perform a composition as its writer intended it should be. It is difficult to single out especial excellence, so generally praiseworthy was the interpretation. Particularly delightful, however, was the effect attained in that marvelous transition from the scherzo to the final; it has never been better performed here.

Mr Paur is to be commended for placing the symphony first on his program, and it is to be hoped that he will adhere to this rule.

The Tschaikowsky serenade was given a graceful artistic interpretation, but more daintiness and lightness might have been welcome in the waltz movement. The Wagner overture was very delightful, the softer sentimental passages being given with especially delightful effect.

It is too soon to express a decided opinion as to Mr Paur's rank among his predecessors, but he has certainly made a splendid beginning for Boston favor.

The program of the next concert is as follows: Volkmann, overture, "Richard III.;" Dvorak, rhapsodie No. 2; Schubert, symphony in C major; soloist, Mme Nordica.

——Mme Paur came in so quietly at the rehearsal Friday and was so unconspicuously dressed that scarcely any one was aware who she was until at the close she went with Mrs Higginson into the artists' room to be among the first to offer congratulations to her husband. She is a very lady-like, pleasant-faced woman, with brown hair and eyes and a pretty, low brow. She wore a navy blue cloth gown and a small toque of dark color.

——Music hall was a great human bee hive Friday afternoon as the opening symphony audience gathered, and again when the rehearsal was over, and the handshaking and chatting were renewed still more vehemently. It was the first real mustering of the clans in any considerable number since society left town for the summer, and the sight of such a sea of familiar faces was most agreeable. Many of the regular patrons of the rehearsals occupy the same or nearly the same season seats as last year. The Higginsons, with Mme Agassiz, Mrs Higginson's mother, have, of course, the same in the center of the hall. Nearby are the C. P. Curtises. Mr Francis Bartlett has changed his seats to some further back, nearer the middle on the floor. Mrs Henry Winsor and the Oliver W. Peabodys are near their old places, and Mrs W. F. Weld's seats are just where they were before. Mrs Gardner's two seats, about four rows from the platform, were vacant, the Misses Stackpoles sit further back than last year, the Montgomery Searses, the Eliot Hubbards, Henry Parkmans, Frank Zerrahns, Mrs F. S. Watson, Mrs G. B. Shattuck, Mrs Seth Sprague, the Matthew Luces and the Parkman Shaws are pretty nearly located as before. Dr Sturgis Bigelow and Miss Mary Bigelow, the Apthorps, Dr Russell Sturgis and Mr Edmund Dwight are in the first balcony as usual. Rev Fr Bodfish is in his old place, near the platform. The Lothrop Thorndikes are on the floor this year. Mr and Mrs John H. Bradford have seats near the platform and so have the R. C. Dixeys. The new conductor was given a most hearty and prolonged welcome as he appeared on the platform and again after the first half of the program was ended. He is utterly unlike in his abundant blondness and thick-set figure any other we have ever had.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, OCT. 16, 1893.

PAUR'S DEBUT.

FIRST SYMPHONY CONCERT OF THE SEASON.

Three Important Works on the Programme—The New Conductor Creates a Favorable Impression—Not Exciting But Emphatic and Decisive—A Large Audience Present.

An auspicious beginning! It would naturally be unsafe to proceed to absolute judgment after a single performance, and that performance one which is always attended by especial difficulties and surrounded by abnormal conditions; at the outset therefore, the reviewer may beg permission to present personal impressions rather than that definite verdict which can only be attained after our new conductor has been heard in varying schools and under differing circumstances.

So much is sure, the audience was captured on Saturday, and what began as a cordial welcome ended as a furore of enthusiasm. Naturally enough one thought less of the composers on such an occasion, than of the conductor. The personality of Mr. Paur (and the name is to be pronounced just as the English word "Power") is entirely in his favor; earnestness is in every gesture, and fidelity is stamped upon the features. A thoroughly Teutonic nature, one would judge, and one which will adhere to received traditions with consistent conservatism. The performance carried out these impressions: There will not be much pepper in the broth this season; after our hasheesh a sedative will be healthy. Mr. Paur does not seem to be an exciting conductor, but his gestures are emphatic, and his beat is decisive enough.

The make-up of the first two programmes is a significant straw, and demonstrates that showiness and sensationalism are to be absent from the list. Beethoven's fifth symphony was an excellent letter of introduction, a fitting work to form the musical grace to the season. The first two movements showed something of nervousness on the part of both conductor and orchestra. The first attack of the awkward figure beginning on the arsis of the measure (the bete noir of all conductors) was a trifle ragged, and when the second theme was ushered in by the horn that instrument was played timidly, too softly, and broke besides. But the oboe deserves a word of especial mention for the exquisite shading of the cadenza in the recapitulation of the chief theme after the development: it has never been taken here at so slow a tempo, but this seemed an improvement rather than a fault.

In the second movement the pizzicato of the contrabasses was too light to balance the viola and cello theme; it would be an improvement if our orchestra had a couple of contrabasses added to its force; eight are scarcely enough to counterbalance the power of the higher strings. This second movement seemed a trifle squarecut; it was too precise and formal for an andante and the con moto was often absent.

From this time on, however, there was more of abandon, and the reading was commendable. The difficult passages for contrabasses in the trio of the scherzo were as clear as crystal, and the finale was given with brilliancy and vigor. The absence of all tendency to exaggerate was commendable.

Tschaikowsky's serenade for strings, C major, op. 48, was light and refreshing. It was a popular work which yet was far from being either sensational or trashy. The introductory theme of its first movement had a certain dignity, and was suggestive of "Ein Feste Burg." This theme was made use of in a symmetrical manner; it ended the first movement just as the horn theme which begins the great Schubert symphony (to be played next Saturday) also ends the first movement; it also appeared as a reminiscence at the end of the finale of the entire serenade. The waltz of the second movement was a pretty bit of musical confectionery, and was given a graceful reading. The Elegie had a distinct leaning towards Goldmarkian sensuousness. The theme on the first violins with pizzicato accompaniment, the duet between these and the cellos, and the passages for muted strings, all showed that we may yet be proud of our body of strings, and that we ought never to forget the conductor who first organized them. They played under difficulties at this concert, for the warmth of the night told upon the catgut, and there was an absolute hailstorm of breaking strings, and this was not confined to the violin E strings either, for even the heavy, cello strings began to break.

The finale of the pretty serenade began, as the preceding movement had ended, upon the highest positions of the violins, but soon led into a most rollicking Russian folk-dance. Such music one might hear at the Possidelotschni, the jolly winter gatherings of the peasantry, when the men join in the wild Kamarinskaia, or all hands unite in the hearty folk-song. There was some graceful counterpoint in this movement, chiefly in a florid bass part. Portions of this finale distinctly recalled a theme of the finale of the Fifth symphony which had preceded. The concert ended with the "Tannhaeuser" overture. This was taken with considerable deliberation at first, and one missed the spice which legitimately belongs to the Venus music, but from the final entrance of the Pilgrim Chorus all went brilliantly, and one heard with satisfaction that our conductor was not likely to over-refine fiery works by suppressing the brasses.

A very large audience was present and the applause was liberal, culminating, as already indicated, in many recalls at the close of the concert. A conductor's post in Boston is not a bed of roses, and it is therefore most gratifying that Mr. Paur has been so fortunate in at once winning popular suffrages.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Some Other Views.

H. E. Krehbiel of the N. Y. Tribune, regarding the first appearance of Herr Paur as conductor of the Symphony orchestra, writes: "He did not strive to impress any novel conception on the C minor symphony. He did mar its beauty, but it was not through any wish to inject into it things that never entered Beethoven's mind. He hurt it by exaggerated emphasis and a detached style of performance, which we have observed as an outgrowth of the Bayreuth influence." Regarding the Tannhauser overture: "It was extremely lurid reading. Very [illegible] and a superb [illegible] in serried ranks on the top of a dramatic hill so long as it was necessary they should be there."

W. J. Henderson of the Times says: "Final judgment as to his ability cannot now be pronounced. But unless nervousness and anxiety wholly changed the habit of the man, it is safe to say that weight, dignity and correctness, rather than grace, poetry and passion, will prove to be the salient qualities of Emil Paur's conducting.

"These are by no means qualities to be despised. The classic writers left us a very precious legacy, which is safe from violent treatment in the hands of just such men as Paur. Perhaps the modern romanticists may not seem to be quite so romantic under his beat, but that remains to be proved. From his first concert one would naturally expect to find that his most admirable achievement would prove to be the explication of a Bach fugue.

One Impression of Paur.

Emil Paur, the new director of the Symphony Orchestra, is likely to be popular. In any event, people are studying him now with interest because of his rather unique appearance and unconventional personality.

His bow to the symphony audience is a unique one. Putting his feet near together his head goes down suddenly and he does not stop until his body and limbs are almost at right angles. His left hand goes into his long hair and hangs on to it.

His long, sandy hair is parted in the middle, but does not fly about as he exerts himself. It never moves.

"He is not at all like Nikisch. He uses his whole body. His baton in the right hand he directs with precise, incisive strokes."

In a fortissimo passage with head and arms going, his right foot moves pat, pat, accenting the notes, and as the sound becomes louder and louder and the climax approaches even his knees bend to the tempo of the melody.

He resumes his incisive strokes as he wants to bring the orchestra down to a pianissimo.

Truly Herr Paur is a man of remarkably expressive contrasts.

He is a pantomimist of no meagre talent.

Paur demonstrates to the audience that he has his eye and ear applied to every member of the orchestra, for he keeps continually moving his eyes all over the body of men.

Herr Paur has one little eccentricity that the audience does not see. He has a habit when raising his head toward the players of opening his mouth and eyes wide and as he swings his head and slowly lowers it, the eyes and mouth close.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, OCT. 15, 1893.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Opening of the Thirteenth Season in Music Hall.

The thirteenth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts began in Music Hall, last evening, with the following programme:

Beethoven—Symphony No. 5, in C minor, op. 67. 1, Allegro con brio; 2, Andante con moto; 3, Allegro; 4, Allegro.

Tschaikowsky—Serenade for strings, in C major, op. 48. 1, Pezzo in forma di sonatina, Andante non troppo, Allegro moderato; 2, Valse, Moderato, Tempo di valse; 3, Elegia, Larghetto elegiaco; 4, Finale (Tema russo), Andante, Allegro con spirito.

Wagner—Overture to "Tannhauser."

The chief interest naturally centred in the new conductor, Mr. Emil Paur, who made his debut as the leader of the new orchestra. The contrast between Mr. Paur and his predecessor was apparent, not only from his personal appearance, but in his methods as well.

Mr. Nikisch will be remembered for his polished manner and graceful wielding of his baton. Mr. Paur has none of these embellishments, but his ideas are more musical, and the results with the orchestra appeal to the ear rather than to the eye.

He impresses the listener as a man thoroughly interested in his work, whose whole soul is wrapt up in the music he is conducting, and whose thoughts and ideas are conveyed to the musicians before him by a series of peculiar but expressive motions.

The audience listened to music which was inspired by an artist, and the interpretation of the conductor was clearly followed by the listeners. To those who make the Symphony concert a society event, Mr. Paur may not be wholly pleasing, but those who attend for the music alone will be more and more delighted as the season advances.

Beethoven's Fifth Symphony is familiar to the patrons of these concerts. It is one of the earlier and perhaps less brilliant of the great composer's works, but it contains much which appeals to the musical sense.

The allegro was given with spirit and good taste, and the andante rendered with delicate expression, the leader watching his musicians much more than the score before him, and carefully leading them through all the intricate passages with skill and good judgment. The finale was well worked out, and the conclusion of the symphony was received with loud applause.

In the serenade for strings, Mr. Paur was afforded an even greater scope for displaying his musical taste. The waltz movement was especially well done, and was as dainty and full of expression as one could wish. The finale, with its characteristic Russian theme, was forcibly brought out, displaying a thoughtful conception of the work.

The concert overture of "Tannhauser" was given with a somewhat different rendering from the one we are accustomed to hear, and was in a trifle lighter vein than the profound students of Wagner are apt to give it. It was interesting from this novelty, and on the whole pleasing. The house was, of course, crowded, and applause frequent, and at the termination of the concert Mr. Paur was greeted with an ovation.

The programme for the rehearsal and concert next week will be as follows:

Overture, "Richard III.," aria, Volkmann; Rhapsodie No. 2, aria, Dvorak; Symphony in C major, Schubert. Soloist, Mme. Nordica.

The sale of subscription tickets for the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, is progressing with more than usual success. The season tickets will be kept on sale for several days. The concerts will take place on Thursday evenings, Oct. 19, Nov. 2, Nov. 16, Dec. 7, Jan. 4, Jan. 25, Feb. 15, March 8, April 5, April 26.

The sale of season tickets for the concerts of the Kneisel Quartet, in Chickering Hall, will open at the box office of Music Hall tomorrow morning.

sistent and broad throughout that only occasionally was any sense of dragging noticeable. The first movement was presented with fine attention to the slightest marks of the composer; the fermata, especially were treated with rare judgment.

Mr. Paur's firm and decisive beat carried the cellos and basses through the trio of the Scherzo with as near an approach to clearness as the music will permit, and the finale was a genuine triumph of brilliancy.

Many phases of great beauty in regard to shading and refinement of expression might be instanced, such as the leading up to the last movement from the scherzo, where there was a wonderfully steady pianissimo with no crescendo until the exact moment indicated by Beethoven, eight measures before the allegro. The entire interpretation was free from capricious variations in tempo or phrasing, and the playing remarkable for its precision and sincerity.

Tschaikowski's serenade displayed the sonority of the strings to good advantage, while the "Tannhaeuser" overture received a performance worthy of a high place among the successes of the orchestra.

It is already evident that Mr. Paur is a disciplinarian and executant of a high order. If his manner, to which as yet we are hardly accustomed, appears somewhat rigid, let us hope that the mathematical accuracy, of which it seemed to be a part, accounted for the unusually satisfactory performance of his orchestra after a long vacation and comparatively few rehearsals, promising much for the future of music in Boston.

BOSTON IDEAS

OCTOBER 15, 1893.

Friday afternoon's first Symphony rehearsal drew a packed house to Music hall. And Mr. Paur seems to have made a good impression, even though those persons who like to grow enthusiastic have not as yet found occasion to "go wild" over him. Which is perhaps a point in Mr. Paur's favor.

NEW YORK HERALD.

NEW YORK, MONDAY, OCTOBER 16, 1893.

EMIL PAUR LEADS IN BOSTON.

[BY TELEGRAPH TO THE HERALD.]

BOSTON, Mass., Oct. 15, 1893.—The programme for the opening concert of the symphony series last night included Beethoven's fifth symphony and the overture to "Tannhauser," and for a novelty, a suite for string orchestra, Op. 48, by Tschaikowsky. This was Mr. Emil Paur's first offering to an American public, and he received the tumultuous reception, at the hands of a hall crowded by music loving fashionables, which was accorded his predecessors, Messrs. Nikisch and Gericke. Mr. Paur is less graceful than Mr. Nikisch, but he gave an exhibition of earnestness and power, and apparently won the respect of his critical audience. The orchestra as usual played faultlessly.

Mr. Paur said to-day that he was very much pleased with the work of the orchestra, and thought he had as good a lot of musicians as could be found anywhere. He was delighted, too, with his reception.

The critics all see in the new conductor a strict disciplinarian and a man of earnestness and vigor. Some of them, however, doubt if he has the magnetism which characterized his predecessors.

L. S. Thompson.

To the Editor of the Herald: There is so much that seems to me entirely new, both in Mr. Paur's style of conducting and in his conception of the music, that I find it almost impossible to form any permanent opinion of him from a single hearing.

The rendering of the Beethoven symphony, especially, seemed to me a revelation, and gave me intense pleasure. On the whole, Mr. Paur appears to me a conductor of remarkable ability in his control of the orchestra and his general grasp of the music.

He seems like a man of intense musical temperament, and one whom we shall like better and better the more we hear him.

L. S. THOMPSON.

Mrs. H. H. A. Beach.

To the Editor of the Herald: A well chosen programme presented a comparative novelty in the serenade and such an exemplification of the classical and romantic schools in the symphony and the overture as would supply a fair and adequate test of the capacity and courage of our new conductor.

Mr. Paur's reading of the 5th Symphony was characterized by dignity, clearness and brilliancy, with the addition in the andante of a reverential tenderness worthy of the highest praise. Exception might be taken to the tempo of this movement, which was played at an extremely slow pace, but the rendering was so consistent and broad throughout that only occasionally was any sense of dragging noticeable. The first movement was presented with fine attention to the slightest marks of the composer; the fermata, especially were treated with rare judgment.

Mr. Paur's firm and decisive beat carried the cellos and basses through the trio of the Scherzo with as near an approach to clearness as the music will permit, and the finale was a genuine triumph of brilliancy.

Many phases of great beauty in regard to shading and refinement of expression might be instanced, such as the leading up to the last movement from the scherzo, where there was a wonderfully steady pianissimo with no crescendo until the exact moment indicated by Beethoven, eight measures before the allegro. The entire interpretation was free from capricious variations in tempo or phrasing, and the playing remarkable for its precision and sincerity.

Tschaikowski's serenade displayed the sonority of the strings to good advantage, while the "Tannhaeuser" overture received a performance worthy of a high place among the successes of the orchestra.

It is already evident that Mr. Paur is a disciplinarian and executant of a high order. If his manner, to which as yet we are hardly accustomed, appears somewhat rigid, let us hope that the mathematical accuracy, of which it seemed to be a part, accounted for the unusually satisfactory performance of his orchestra after a long vacation and comparatively few rehearsals, promising much for the future of music in Boston.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, OCTOBER 15, 1893.

FIRST SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Season Opens Brilliantly and Musical Bostonians Seem Delighted with Mr Nikisch's Successor.

The 13th season of the Symphony orchestral concerts has opened brilliantly. Music hall was crowded with fashion and wealth at the Friday afternoon rehearsal and at last evening's concert. Seemingly few of the patrons of former years were absent.

Everybody was glad that the concerts had begun again, and nobody hesitated to express his or her gratification.

Rarely has a symphony gathering been so demonstrative in welcoming the orchestra. As one after the other of the favorite members of the band came upon the stage they were greeted with hearty plaudits, and when it was evident that few if any of the prominent members of last year's organization were missing there was more and still warmer applause.

The reception accorded the new director, Mr Emil Paur, was enthusiastically cordial. They wanted him to at once feel that he was among friends and among those who are capable of appreciating to the fullest extent his rare musical attainments.

If Mr Paur does not feel thoroughly at home in Boston today it is not because of any lack of good will on the part of those who listened to his first concert in this city.

Before the Friday rehearsal was over it was evident that the new director would be a great favorite in Boston, and at last night's concert there was still further assurance of his coming popularity. The generally expressed opinion was that Mr Higginson had secured a worthy successor for the two master musicians who have directed this foremost of all orchestral organizations.

In appearance Mr Paur differs essentially from either of his predecessors, and he is as unlike them in his method of conducting. He is of large, solid physique, and his manner of directing is most substantial, if not absolutely heavy.

There is little that is light or graceful in his style. He directs with determination and exactness rather than with enthusiasm.

He does not seem to be possessed of great personal magnetism. He is a leader who will inspire confidence rather than enthusiasm. He makes one feel that he knows absolutely what he is doing, and compels confidence in the correctness of all that he does.

None of his predecessors gave at first hearing such forcible evidence of thorough control over every individual member of the orchestra. Mr Paur's command over all was absolute.

There will surely be no lack of discipline in the Boston symphony orchestra so long as Mr Paur is at its head, and there is every reason for believing that the splendid organization will, under his careful direction, not only maintain its position at the head of all orchestras, but will advance still further towards the goal of perfection.

The program provided for his first offering was characteristic of the man.

It was conservative and substantial.

Mr Paur is, from all indications, inclined to classical music, and it is unlikely that anything of a trivial nature will ever be allowed to appear upon his programs.

On the contrary his offerings will likely be of an educational character.

Beethoven's grand fifth symphony, Tschaikowshy's serenade for strings in C and the "Tannhauser" overture constituted yesterday's numbers.

Naturally the greatest interest was felt in his reading of the symphony, for no one who knows anything about music is ignorant of the position occupied in musical compositions by this grand work.

His interpretation of the work was worthy of the cordial praise bestowed upon it. His was a faithful reading, rather more exact than that offered by Mr Nickisch. He does not seem inclined to innovations of his own, but is content to perform a composition as its writer intended it should be. It is difficult to single out especial excellence, so generally praiseworthy was the interpretation. Particularly delightful, however, was the effect attained in that marvelous transition from the scherzo to the final; it has never been better performed here.

Mr Paur is to be commended for placing the symphony first on his program, and it is to be hoped that he will adhere to this rule.

The Tschaikowsky serenade was given a graceful artistic interpretation, but more daintiness and lightness might have been welcome in the waltz movement. The Wagner overture was very delightful, the softer sentimental passages being given with especially delightful effect.

It is too soon to express a decided opinion as to Mr Paur's rank among his predecessors, but he has certainly made a splendid beginning for Boston favor.

The program of the next concert is as follows: Volkmann, overture, "Richard III.;" Dvorak, rhapsodie No. 2; Schubert, symphony in C major; soloist, Mme Nordica.

——Mme Paur came in so quietly at the rehearsal Friday and was so unconspicuously dressed that scarcely any one was aware who she was until at the close she went with Mrs Higginson into the artists' room to be among the first to offer congratulations to her husband. She is a very lady-like, pleasant-faced woman, with brown hair and eyes and a pretty, low brow. She wore a navy blue cloth gown and a small toque of dark color.

——Music hall was a great human bee hive Friday afternoon as the opening symphony audience gathered, and again when the rehearsal was over, and the handshaking and chatting were renewed still more vehemently. It was the first real mustering of the clans in any considerable number since society left town for the summer, and the sight of such a sea of familiar faces was most agreeable. Many of the regular patrons of the rehearsals occupy the same or nearly the same season seats as last year. The Higginsons, with Mme Agassiz, Mrs Higginson's mother, have, of course, the same in the center of the hall. Nearby are the C. P. Curtises. Mr Francis Bartlett has changed his seats to some further back, nearer the middle on the floor. Mrs Henry Winsor and the Oliver W. Peabodys are near their old places, and Mrs W. F. Weld's seats are just where they were before. Mrs Gardner's two seats, about four rows from the platform, were vacant, the Misses Stackpoles sit further back than last year, the Montgomery Searses, the Eliot Hubbards, Henry Parkmans, Frank Zerrahns, Mrs F. S. Watson, Mrs G. B. Shattuck, Mrs Seth Sprague, the Matthew Luces and the Parkman Shaws are pretty nearly located as before. Dr Sturgis Bigelow and Miss Mary Bigelow, the Apthorps, Dr Russell Sturgis and Mr Edmund Dwight are in the first balcony as usual. Rev Fr Bodfish is in his old place, near the platform. The Lothrop Thorndikes are on the floor this year. Mr and Mrs John H. Bradford have seats near the platform and so have the R. C. Dixeys. The new conductor was given a most hearty and prolonged welcome as he appeared on the platform and again after the first half of the program was ended. He is utterly unlike in his abundant blondness and thick-set figure any other we have ever had.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, OCT. 16, 1893.

PAUR'S DEBUT.

FIRST SYMPHONY CONCERT OF THE SEASON.

Three Important Works on the Programme—The New Conductor Creates a Favorable Impression—Not Exciting But Emphatic and Decisive—A Large Audience Present.

An auspicious beginning! It would naturally be unsafe to proceed to absolute judgment after a single performance, and that performance one which is always attended by especial difficulties and surrounded by abnormal conditions; at the outset therefore, the reviewer may beg permission to present personal impressions rather than that definite verdict which can only be attained after our new conductor has been heard in varying schools and under differing circumstances.

So much is sure, the audience was captured on Saturday, and what began as a cordial welcome ended as a furore of enthusiasm. Naturally enough one thought less of the composers on such an occasion, than of the conductor. The personality of Mr. Paur (and the name is to be pronounced just as the English word "Power") is entirely in his favor; earnestness is in every gesture, and fidelity is stamped upon the features. A thoroughly Teutonic nature, one would judge, and one which will adhere to received traditions with consistent conservatism. The performance carried out these impressions: There will not be much pepper in the broth this season; after our hasheesh a sedative will be healthy. Mr. Paur does not seem to be an exciting conductor, but his gestures are emphatic, and his beat is decisive enough.

The make-up of the first two programmes is a significant straw, and demonstrates that showiness and sensationalism are to be absent from the list. Beethoven's fifth symphony was an excellent letter of introduction, a fitting work to form the musical grace to the season. The first two movements showed something of nervousness on the part of both conductor and orchestra. The first attack of the awkward figure beginning on the arsis of the measure (the bete noir of all conductors) was a trifle ragged, and when the second theme was ushered in by the horn that instrument was played timidly, too softly, and broke besides. But the oboe deserves a word of especial mention for the exquisite shading of the cadenza in the recapitulation of the chief theme after the development: it has never been taken here at so slow a tempo, but this seemed an improvement rather than a fault.

In the second movement the pizzicato of the contrabasses was too light to balance the viola and cello theme; it would be an improvement if our orchestra had a couple of contrabasses added to its force; eight are scarcely enough to counterbalance the power of the higher strings. This second movement seemed a trifle squarecut; it was too precise and formal for an andante and the con moto was often absent.

From this time on, however, there was more of abandon, and the reading was commendable. The difficult passages for contrabasses in the trio of the scherzo were as clear as crystal, and the finale was given with brilliancy and vigor. The absence of all tendency to exaggerate was commendable.

Tschaikowsky's serenade for strings, C major, op. 48, was light and refreshing. It was a popular work which yet was far from being either sensational or trashy. The introductory theme of its first movement had a certain dignity, and was suggestive of "Ein Feste Burg." This theme was made use of in a symmetrical manner; it ended the first movement just as the horn theme which begins the great Schubert symphony (to be played next Saturday) also ends the first movement; it also appeared as a reminiscence at the end of the finale of the entire serenade. The waltz of the second movement was a pretty bit of musical confectionery, and was given a graceful reading. The Elegie had a distinct leaning towards Goldmarkian sensuousness. The theme on the first violins with pizzicato accompaniment, the duet between these and the cellos, and the passages for muted strings, all showed that we may yet be proud of our body of strings, and that we ought never to forget the conductor who first organized them. They played under difficulties at this concert, for the warmth of the night told upon the catgut, and there was an absolute hailstorm of breaking strings, and this was not confined to the violin E strings either, for even the heavy, cello strings began to break.

The finale of the pretty serenade began, as the preceding movement had ended, upon the highest positions of the violins, but soon led into a most rollicking Russian folk-dance. Such music one might hear at the Possidelotschni, the jolly winter gatherings of the peasantry, when the men join in the wild Kamarinskaia, or all hands unite in the hearty folk-song. There was some graceful counterpoint in this movement, chiefly in a florid bass part. Portions of this finale distinctly recalled a theme of the finale of the Fifth symphony which had preceded. The concert ended with the "Tannhaeuser" overture. This was taken with considerable deliberation at first, and one missed the spice which legitimately belongs to the Venus music, but from the final entrance of the Pilgrim Chorus all went brilliantly, and one heard with satisfaction that our conductor was not likely to over-refine fiery works by suppressing the brasses.

A very large audience was present and the applause was liberal, culminating, as already indicated, in many recalls at the close of the concert. A conductor's post in Boston is not a bed of roses, and it is therefore most gratifying that Mr. Paur has been so fortunate in at once winning popular suffrages.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Some Other Views.

H. E. Krehbiel of the N. Y. Tribune, regarding the first appearance of Herr Paur as conductor of the Symphony orchestra, writes: "He did not strive to impress any novel conception on the C minor symphony. He did mar its beauty, but it was not through any wish to inject into it things that never entered Beethoven's mind. He hurt it by exaggerated emphasis and a detached style of performance, which we have observed as an outgrowth of the Bayreuth influence." Regarding the Tannhauser overture: "It was extremely lurid reading. Very [illegible] accustomed his audience [illegible] showed a masterful hand in the development of climaxes and a superb ability to hold his forces in serried ranks on the top of a dramatic hill so long as it was necessary they should be there."

W. J. Henderson of the Times says: "Final judgment as to his ability cannot now be pronounced. But unless nervousness and anxiety wholly changed the habit of the man, it is safe to say that weight, dignity and correctness, rather than grace, poetry and passion, will prove to be the salient qualities of Emil Paur's conducting.

"These are by no means qualities to be despised. The classic writers left us a very precious legacy, which is safe from violent treatment in the hands of just such men as Paur. Perhaps the modern romanticists may not seem to be quite so romantic under his beat, but that remains to be proved. From his first concert one would naturally expect to find that his most admirable achievement would prove to be the explication of a Bach fugue.

One Impression of Paur.

Emil Paur, the new director of the Symphony Orchestra, is likely to be popular. In any event, people are studying him now with interest because of his rather unique appearance and unconventional personality.

His bow to the symphony audience is a unique one. Putting his feet near together his head goes down suddenly and he does not stop until his body and limbs are almost at right angles. His left hand goes into his long hair and hangs on to it.

His long, sandy hair is parted in the middle, but does not fly about as he exerts himself. It never moves.

"He is not at all like Nikisch. He uses his whole body. His baton in the right hand he directs with precise, incisive strokes."

In a fortissimo passage with head and arms going, his right foot moves pat, pat, accenting the notes, and as the sound becomes louder and louder and the climax approaches even his knees bend to the tempo of the melody.

He resumes his incisive strokes as he wants to bring the orchestra down to a pianissimo.

Truly Herr Paur is a man of remarkably expressive contrasts.

He is a pantomimist of no meagre talent.

Paur demonstrates to the audience that he has his eye and ear applied to every member of the orchestra, for he keeps continually moving his eyes all over the body of men.

Herr Paur has one little eccentricity that the audience does not see. He has a habit when raising his head toward the players of opening his mouth and eyes wide and as he swings his head and slowly lowers it, the eyes and mouth close.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, OCT. 15, 1893.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Opening of the Thirteenth Season in Music Hall.

The thirteenth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts began in Music Hall, last evening, with the following programme:

Beethoven—Symphony No. 5, in C minor, op. 67. 1, Allegro con brio; 2, Andante con moto; 3, Allegro; 4, Allegro.

Tschaikowsky—Serenade for strings, in C major, op. 48. 1, Pezzo in forma di sonatina, Andante non troppo, Allegro moderato; 2, Valse, Moderato. Tempo di valse; 3, Elegia, Larghetto elegiaco; 4, Finale (Tema russo), Andante, Allegro con spirito.

Wagner—Overture to "Tannhauser."

The chief interest naturally centred in the new conductor, Mr. Emil Paur, who made his debut as the leader of the new orchestra. The contrast between Mr. Paur and his predecessor was apparent, not only from his personal appearance, but in his methods as well.

Mr. Nikisch will be remembered for his polished manner and graceful wielding of his baton. Mr. Paur has none of these embellishments, but his ideas are more musical, and the results with the orchestra appeal to the ear rather than to the eye.

He impresses the listener as a man thoroughly interested in his work, whose whole soul is wrapt up in the music he is conducting, and whose thoughts and ideas are conveyed to the musicians before him by a series of peculiar but expressive motions.

The audience listened to music which was inspired by an artist, and the interpretation of the conductor was clearly followed by the listeners. To those who make the Symphony concert a society event, Mr. Paur may not be wholly pleasing, but those who attend for the music alone will be more and more delighted as the season advances.

Beethoven's Fifth Symphony is familiar to the patrons of these concerts. It is one of the earlier and perhaps less brilliant of the great composer's works, but it contains much which appeals to the musical sense.

The allegro was given with spirit and good taste, and the andante rendered with delicate expression, the leader watching his musicians much more than the score before him, and carefully leading them through all the intricate passages with skill and good judgment. The finale was well worked out, and the conclusion of the symphony was received with loud applause.

In the serenade for strings, Mr. Paur was afforded an even greater scope for displaying his musical taste. The waltz movement was especially well done, and was as dainty and full of expression as one could wish. The finale, with its characteristic Russian theme, was forcibly brought out, displaying a thoughtful conception of the work.

The concert overture of "Tannhauser" was given with a somewhat different rendering from the one we are accustomed to hear, and was in a trifle lighter vein than the profound students of Wagner are apt to give it. It was interesting from this novelty, and on the whole pleasing. The house was, of course, crowded, and applause frequent, and at the termination of the concert Mr. Paur was greeted with an ovation.

The programme for the rehearsal and concert next week will be as follows:

Overture, "Richard III.," aria, Volkmann; Rhapsodie No. 2, aria, Dvorak; Symphony in C major, Schubert. Soloist, Mme. Nordica.

The sale of subscription tickets for the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, is progressing with more than usual success. The season tickets will be kept on sale for several days. The concerts will take place on Thursday evenings, Oct. 19, Nov. 2, Nov. 16, Dec. 7, Jan. 4, Jan. 25, Feb. 15, March 8, April 5, April 26.

The sale of season tickets for the concerts of the Kneisel Quartet, in Chickering Hall, will open at the box office of Music Hall tomorrow morning.

[26]

Boston Journal.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, OCTOBER 16, 1893.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Emil Paur, conductor, gave the first concert of this its thirteenth season in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, the programme being as follows:

Beethoven: Symphony No. 5, in C minor, opus 67.
Tschaikowsky: Serenade for strings, in C major, opus 48.
Wagner: Overture to "Tannhäuser."

Here is a case where the critic's task is either very easy or exceedingly difficult. A new conductor makes his first appearance before our public, and everyone is agog to know what everyone else has to say of him. But the opportunities for forming a judgment are too slight for anyone to be willing to formulate an opinion, even if he has partly formed one. The first concert an orchestra gives after its summer vacation is never a very good bone for critical contention; the men have not played together for at least four months, the orchestra is consequently rather rusty and needs more or less ensemble practice to bring it up to its whilom mark; we can hardly call to mind a first concert at which the performance was wholly fine. Add to this ordinary condition the extraordinary one of the orchestra's playing for the first time under a new conductor, to whose beat and methods the players are as much strangers as he to them, and it can be seen that no very distinct opinion is to be formed of the value of the results.

One or two things, to be sure, seemed pretty evident last Saturday evening: Mr. Paur appears not to belong to the class of conductors who trust (with greater or less reason) to the dramatic, or otherwise emotional, effect their personal presence and bearing may have upon an audience; he concentrates his attention upon the orchestra and upon the score before him, letting the playing tell the story of the music without any mimetic aid from himself. This is a comfort; not that we are inclined to undervalue the aid to the impressiveness of music that may come from a dramatic or otherwise expressive manner on the conductor's part—we have heard performances where the conductor's manner stood for a good deal in making the eye help out the ear—but that so many conductors employ such quasi-dramatic methods more for the sake of what is called in theatrical slang "mashing" an audience than for anything else, that an absence of all such manner or mannerism is at times grateful, as at least prima facie evidence of artistic sincerity and single-mindedness.

Another point in Mr. Paur's conducting may be brought up with tolerable certainty, even at this early stage of our acquaintance with him. Judging from the performances of the symphony and overture, one would say that he did not belong to the extreme school of modern "musical interpreters:" that his sympathies are not unreservedly with those whose first—and often last—aim is to see how much effect it is possible to get out of a great composition, by hook or by crook, regardless of the general style and habitual artistic attitude of the composer. If our guess in this matter is right, we are doubly and trebly glad. The amount of "inspired rendering" that master-works have come in for lately is quite enough; it will be a comfort in future to be able to hear what the music itself sounds like, even at the expense of a superacute thrill or two. Mr. Paur, to be sure, took some passages in both symphony and overture a shade different-ly from the way we have been accustomed to hear them go; but we cannot recall an instance either of his contravening expression-marks in the score, or of his in any way overstepping the normal limits of that artistic latitude of interpretation of which most music naturally admits. In no case did an individual reading of a passage seem to flaunt "This is Paur" in your face. We can even say that one of the "new readings"—near the close of the Andante con moto of the fifth symphony—was more nearly in accordance with plainly printed directions in the score than any playing of the passage in question we have ever heard.

Having said thus much (or little) about Mr. Paur and his conducting, we have said all we mean to this time. Except that it should go on record that he was warmly greeted by a large audience—quite unusually large for the beginning of a season—and had that applause dearest of all to an artist's heart: the kind that goes on crescendo e sempre più crescendo as number after number on the programme is finished.

Of the programme itself not much need be said; a first concert with a strange orchestra is about as awkward an occasion for the conductor, as programme-maker, as it is in other respects. Beethoven's C minor symphony and Wagner's overture to "Tannhäuser" are (be it said with all respect) old concert hacks, astride of which any orchestral player may be expected to keep his seat; they are as good as anything else to begin the season with—works of genius of which only the most jaded musical palate need ever tire. Why the Tschaikowsky serenade was given is not quite so clear; the work is not up to the dignity of a symphony concert, let alone an occasion that might be supposed to have something "inaugural" about it. The first and last movements can pass muster well enough, but the rest is cheap as may be. If the performance of this serenade was of the nature of a ceremonial call on Tschaikowsky as one of the brightest shining lights of contemporary music (to whom such ceremonial respect is in a measure due), we hope it was given last Saturday on the "do-it-now-and-have-it-over" principle.

The next programme is: Volkmann, overture to "Richard III.;" aria; Dvorák, rhapsody No. 2; aria; Schubert, symphony in C major, No. 9. Mme. Nordica will be the singer.

BOSTON EVENING RECORD.

OCTOBER 16, 1893.

PAUR'S DEBUT.

The Symphony Conductor Makes a Good Impression.

An auspicious beginning! It would naturally be unsafe to proceed to absolute judgment after a single performance, and that performance one which is always attended by especial difficulties and surrounded by abnormal conditions; at the outset therefore, the reviewer may beg permission to present personal impressions rather than that definite verdict which can only be attained after our new conductor has been heard in varying schools and under differing circumstances.

So much is sure, the audience was captured on Saturday, and what began as a furore of enthusiasm. Naturally enough one thought less of the composers on such an occasion, than of the conductor. The personality of Mr. Paur (and the name is to be pronounced just as the English word "Power") is entirely in his favor; earnestness is in every gesture, and fidelity is stamped upon the features. A thoroughly Teutonic nature, one would judge, and one which will adhere to received traditions with consistent conservatism. The performance carried out these impressions: There will not be much pepper in the broth this season; after our hasheesh a sedative will be healthy. Mr. Paur does not seem to be an exciting conductor, but his gestures are emphatic, and his beat is decisive enough.

The make-up of the first two programmes is a significant straw, and demonstrates that showiness and sensationalism are to be absent from the list. Beethoven's fifth symphony was an excellent letter of introduction, a fitting work to form the musical grace to the season. The first two movements showed something of nervousness on the part of both conductor and orchestra.

From this time on, however, there was more of abandon, and the reading was commendable. The difficult passages for contra-basses in the trio of the scherzo were as clear as crystal, and the finale was given with brilliancy and vigor. The absence of all tendency to exaggerate was commendable.

The first violins with pizzicato accompaniment, the duet between these and the cellos, and the passages for muted strings, all showed that we may yet be proud of our body of strings, and that we ought never to forget the conductor who first organized them. They played under difficulties at this concert, for the warmth of the night told upon the catgut, and there was an absolute hailstorm of breaking strings, and this was not confined to the violin E strings either, for even the heavy, cello strings began to break.

The finale of the pretty serenade began, as the preceding movement had ended, upon the highest positions of the violins, but soon led into a most rollicking Russian folk-dance. Such music one might hear at the Possidelotschni, the jolly winter gatherings of the peasantry, when the men join in the wild Kamarinskaia, or all hands unite in the hearty folk-song. There was some graceful counterpoint in this movement, chiefly in a florid bass part. Portions of this finale distinctly recalled a theme of the finale of the Fifth symphony which had preceded. The concert ended with the "Tannhaeuser" overture. This was taken with considerable deliberation at first, and one missed the spice which legitimately belongs to the Venus music, but from the final entrance of the Pilgrim Chorus all went brilliantly, and one heard with satisfaction that our conductor was not likely to over-refine fiery works by suppressing the brasses.

A very large audience was present and the applause was liberal, culminating, as already indicated, in many recalls at the close of the concert. A conductor's post in Boston is not a bed of roses, and it is therefore most gratifying that Mr. Paur has been so fortunate in at once winning popular suffrages.

Louis C. Elson.

Some Other Views

H. E. Krehbiel of the N. Y. Tribune, regarding the first appearance of Herr Paur as conductor of the Symphony orchestra, writes: "He did not strive to impress any novel conception on the C minor symphony. He did mar its beauty, but it was not through any wish to inject into it things that never entered Beethoven's mind. He hurt it by exaggerated emphasis and a detached style of performance, which we have observed as an outgrowth of the Bayreuth influence." Regarding the Tannhauser overture: "It was extremely lurid reading, very much like that to which Mr. Seidl has accustomed his audiences, but it showed a masterful hand in the development of climaxes and a superb ability to hold his forces in serried ranks on the top of a dramatic hill so long as it was necessary they should be there."

W. J. Henderson of the Times says: "Final judgment as to his ability cannot now be pronounced. But unless nervousness and anxiety wholly changed the habit of the man, it is safe to say that weight, dignity and correctness, rather than grace, poetry and passion, will prove to be the salient qualities of Emil Paur's conducting. "These are by no means qualities to be despised. The classic writers left us a very precious legacy, which is safe from violent treatment in the hands of just such men as Paur. Perhaps the modern romanticists may not seem to be quite so romantic under his beat, but that remains to be proved. From his first concert one would naturally expect to find that his most admirable achievement would prove to be the explication of a Bach fugue.

BOSTON DAILY TRAVELLER

MONDAY, OCTOBER 16, 1893.

A HEAD ON ITS SHOULDERS.

Symphony Orchestra Has a Leader.

Director Paur Gives Promise of a Great Success.

The head of that superb body, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has been again placed upon its shoulders and a hand has grasped the helm of its efforts, a strong, skilful hand that will now guide it firmly and surely after its four seasons of drifting in a disabled state before the violence of vagarious tempests. The pilot that has come to the rescue is Mr. Emil Paur—let us rejoice.

The Music Hall on Saturday evening was overflowed with an audience gathered to welcome the new conductor and to satisfy a curiosity and relieve an anxiety regarding his ability that has existed since it was made known who was to take charge of this fine body of musicians that under Mr. Gericke had reached the highest point of perfection in orchestral playing, and under Mr. Nikisch had fallen to a state of indifference, coarseness and sometimes vulgarity of performance that was a disgrace to the band and an undeniable mark of the incompetency of the conductor that incumbered the position so honored by his predecessor.

That Mr. Paur should have accomplished so much under the circumstances, on Saturday evening, as was shown in the results, gave the intelligent and critical listeners the best of reasons to believe that he is master of the situation, and will prove a success as regards his ability to fill the position to which he is elected when he has had the orchestra longer in hand.

Mr. Paur chose for his first programme, the beginning of the 13th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the following works:

Symphony No. 5 in C minor.....Beethoven
Serenade for strings in C major op 48.....Tschaikowsky
Overture to "Tannhauser".....Wagner

In the interpretation of the symphony Mr. Paur kept to the true spirit of the composer, as indicated in the score. There was nothing of exaggeration, no attempt to improve Beethoven, in the rendering, and the tempo of the different movements was the traditional one, it perhaps the andante con moto be excepted, which was taken at a rather slow pace. Nevertheless as a whole this movement was a noble conception upon the tempo assumed, and was a revelation of the purity of Mr. Paur's taste, the depth of his feeling and the extreme sensitiveness of his musical nature. So, also, of the first movement, to which he imparted a nobility in the rendering. The Scherzo was taken at a most discreet tempo, and was finely contrasted between the delicacy of the softer passages and the vigor and strength of those founded upon the second theme beginning in the basses. The last movement was surpassing fine in its majesty, perhaps never has it been more satisfactorily given by the orchestra.

The Tschaikowsky "Serenade for Strings" is in some respects an interesting work. It has been played but once before in these concerts, by Mr. Gericke, at the beginning of the season of 1888. It may not be particularly original, and the movements vary materially in musical value, but it displays contrapuntal ingenuity, and with its characteristic melodies and strongly marked rhythms its rather tedious length was less marked than it would have been otherwise. The theme with variations is taken from another Suite of Tschaikowsky's, No. 3 in G. Under the skilful direction of Mr. Paur the orchestra achieved a brilliant success in the playing of this number of the programme.

The familiar overture to "Tannhauser," that closed the concert, was given in a most brilliant and effective manner, and the large audience that had most cordially welcomed Mr. Paur when he first appeared at the beginning of the evening, broke into the most enraptured applause, recalling him again and again with cheers and bravos.

On the whole, it must be admitted that Mr. Paur has made a most satisfactory beginning. He is modest and earnest in his bearing; there is nothing of the poseur in his composition: he does not find it necessary to climb up on two or three boxes to exhibit himself; his whole soul is in his work, and he appears to be totally unconscious of the presence of an audience; he has a firm beat, and every movement is of significant importance to the players; he has a fine musical temperament, apparently; to all appearances is sensitive and refined to a high degree in his musical nature; he has a just sense of the necessity of contrast, and imparts repose in the renderings. He gives the orchestra more sway than Mr. Gericke, and does not restrict the brass as the latter did. Under Mr. Paur the wood-wind has been restored to a sense of discretion in its use. Mr. Paur produced a fine pianissimo and did not force his fortissimos. That wonderful gradation of tone that made Mr. Gericke's work pre-eminent, was not observable, however, in the playing Saturday night. I mean that acute distinction between pp and p, p and mf, mf and , and ff, ff and fff. It may seem hypercritical to expect such distinctions, but The delight that the critical ear has experienced in the realization of these tints and half tints, and minute colorings of Mr. Gericke' renderings leaves the sensitive and keenly appreciative listener always yearning for their reproduction, a sensation so gratifying that its elimination from the memory is impossible; neither has it been blunted in the remembrance by the rough charcoal sketches and undefined masses of color that have been shown upon the canvas during the past four seasons.

But there is time yet for Mr. Paur to accomplish more in the dynamical and technical direction when he shall have had the orchestra longer under his control. All the roughness of the last regime had not disappeared in the playing Saturday night.

There is this yet to be ascertained: Will Mr. Paur exert his authority, and through rigid, inexible disciplne, oblige the players to do their best when, as the season advances, they get tired and careless and heedless of his desires? It seems to me that Mr. Paur is the man who will maintain a high degree of technical perfection and dynamic contrast throughout, but that he will reach that automatic perfection once possessed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra remains to be proved.

Also the all-important feature of catholic taste in selecting music for the programmes and a happy ability in arranging the same is yet to be decided. Also will he begin promptly at 8 o'clock, and make his programmes conform to the limit of one hour and a half. Well, we shall see. In the meantime let us rejoice that we have so good a conductor and so refined a musician, and also so superb an orchestra as has been provided by the noble generosity of Mr. Henry L. Higginson, by whose munificent impulse art and his townsmen are so liberally benefited.

Next Saturday evening the programme will embrace overture, "Richard III.," Volkmann; Rhapsodie No. 2, Dvorak, and Schubert's great symphony in C major. Mrs. Lillian Nordica will be the soloist.

Warren Davenport.

[27]

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 18, 1893.

Telephone - - - - 1253-18th.

BOSTON, October 15, 1893.

THE first concert of the thirteenth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given in Music Hall the evening of the 14th. Mr. Emil Paur then made his first appearance as conductor at these concerts. The program was as follows:

Symphony No. 5, C minor ..... Beethoven
Serenade for Strings, C major, op. 48. ..... Tschaikowsky
Overture, "Tannhäuser" ..... Wagner

The public rehearsal of the day before was largely attended, and the comments of the members of the audience were caught up greedily by musical loungers in the streets and at the clubs. One half of the audience thought that Mr. Paur was "superb" in the symphony, but that the "Tannhäuser" overture was not given with the passion of Mr. Nikisch. The other half expressed a reversed opinion.

Newspaper men buttonholed poor devils at they came out of the hall, and the opinions of the well-known and the unknown were treated with equal consideration. Here is a sample:

"A lady who did not wish her name used thought Mr. Paur was not so graceful as Mr. Nikisch, 'but at the same time I think he is very fine.'"

Here is another chunk of Boston culture (don't mistake "chunk" for "chump" in this connection): "Senator Henry Parkman enjoyed the concert immensely, and is a devoted Paur man from this time out."

But the learned punster and professor, John K. Paine, remembered the wisdom of Brer' Rabbit: "Prof. John K. Paine, of Harvard University, courteously refused to express an opinion, on the ground that it was impossible to judge fairly by one performance."

And the learned professor is eminently right.

* * *

Although Mr. Paur has labored diligently in rehearsal, he is not yet of course fully master of the men, nor are they, though willing, able to respond quickly to each desire of the conductor. He is said to be a rigid disciplinarian, and the time of rehearsal is a time of work, not of social intercourse on topics of the day. His mind is determined and he does not experiment in effects.

Again, Mr. Paur was evidently nervous at the beginning, and no wonder. The hall was crowded and the air was hot and foul. When Mr. Paur entered there was reassuring and long continued applause, but he seemed anxious to begin and he plunged into his work.

* * *

Instead of venturing fixed opinions that might be unfair to conductor, orchestra and writer, I prefer for a time to simply record impressions, which the performance of next week or three weeks after may modify.

* * *

Mr. Paur's manner of conducting is distinguished chiefly by honesty, earnestness and decision.

He is by no means graceful in action or in repose. In his movements there is no thought of the Hogarthian line of beauty. His beat is direct; it is unmistakable. Mr. Paur was diligent in giving the cue, and there was no excuse for any neglect to obey.

The man's gestures are often angular, at times almost grotesque. He frequently brings to mind a Fliegende Blätter conductor. But he is terribly in earnest. His mind is not only on his task, it jumps on the task. He has a marked sense of rhythm, but it should not be necessary for him to use the foot in indication of the rhythm.

Mr. Paur's face indicates strength, firmness, honesty, intelligence; but it is hard to find it the face of a man of marked temperament or of fine or luxuriant imagination. It is a face that will certainly be respected by all, admired by some, loved probably by those closest to him.

But he will not influence the blood of the "musical chippies" (to borrow a phrase from an esteemed contemporary in New York). I fear he is too rugged, too sincere, to appeal to the frequenters of the Friday rehearsals; and I doubt if he cares for such admiration.

* * *

Last evening Mr. Paur appeared as a well equipped schoolmaster, an accomplished drill master rather than as a musician of large imagination or as a being who exerts a mysterious influence by his individuality, or temperament, or magnetism, expressed through music led by him.

Much of the detail was admirable, and the fruits of study were plucked in the sight of the audience.

Here let this be said: Mr. Paur is apparently unconscious of the presence of the audience. I do not believe that he knows the meaning of the word poseur.

But to go back to the detail. There would be delightful passages in which a keen sense of values was displayed; but these same passages were so carefully worked out that a movement of liberal length became a piece of mosaic work. The hearer was at once aware of the labor at rehearsal. The machinery worked admirably, but it creaked.

There was more preparation than inspiration. Now, by inspiration I do not here mean a sudden, possibly heaven-descended caprice that overmasters a conductor whose men are unprepared for the reception and the expression of the caprice. But after the labor of preparation is over, and the conductor stands ready for performance, then if he be the rare, the ideal conductor, he possesses the souls of the men under his stick so they are a part of him; they act with him; they feel with him; they even anticipate a wish.

Of course such conducting presupposes an unlimited knowledge of the men and their characteristics that comes alone with time, if it comes at all.

* * *

And so, to me at least, the symphony became four movements subdivided into detached episodes that were unrelated. There were niceties of expression, there was a careful observance of dynamic gradations, there was a sense of value in estimating the importance of the various voices; but there was something lacking, and that was perhaps the expression of a great musical river with its contributory streams.

Surely the andante con moto of the symphony was taken at too slow a pace. Leave any discussion of the proper meaning of the Italian phrase out of the question, the melos suffered by the slowness, nor was the phrase sung and bound together as it might have been. But it is a fashion with some in these days to confound an andante with an adagio.

* * *

Mr. Paur wore patent leather pumps, if I am not mistaken; but when he conducted the waltz from the serenade by Tchaikowsky he seemed to exchange them for rubber boots that came above the knees. The daintiness, the delicacy, the coquetry of this Franco-German movement vanished in thin air. The dancers moved laboriously in a ploughed field.

* * *

So in the "Tannhäuser" overture, there was more of thoughtfulness than of spontaneity in the performance. The drawing was possibly all right; but the colors for the most part were thinly spread, and in this overture color may be thrown on with a palette knife.

* * *

Mr. Paur seems to be an honest, hard working, vigorous musician. The first impression is that he is, first of all, a schoolmaster.

And perhaps a schoolmaster would be now of greater benefit to the orchestra and the public than a frenzied poet.

* * *

This is the program of the concert of October 21: Volkmann's "Richard III.," Dvorák's Second Rhapsodie, Schubert's C major symphony. Nordica will sing.

* * *

NOT A NIKISCH.

THE consensus of opinion as to the merits of Mr. Emil Paur's conducting is that he has more scholarship than temperament. Mr. Philip Hale, the well-known music critic and the Boston correspondent of THE MUSICAL COURIER, thoroughly dissects Mr. Paur's methods in the present issue, and finds him more of the schoolmaster than a poet. Perhaps the orchestra needs a pedagogue, but then the feelings of its audiences should be taken into consideration. By the way, who recommended Mr. Paur to Colonel Higginson?

And after all, can European judgments be considered final until a test is made here? Boston is a difficult city to please. Arthur Nikisch and Wilhelm Gericke did not suit it. So it will have to learn to like Emil Paur. Perhaps the Worcester County Festival Association will take Mr. Paur off Colonel Higginson's hands. From all that has been written of him he would, it appears, make an admirable successor to Carl Zerrahn.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

FRIDAY MORNING, OCT. 20, 1893.

CONDUCTOR PAUR AT CAMBRIDGE.

Emil Paur's first appearance at Cambridge as leader of the Symphony orchestra was made at Sanders Theatre last evening before a large audience. The new conductor was received with great satisfaction.

After the performance Mr. and Mrs. Paur were tendered a reception by the Misses Riddle of Arrow st., Cambridge. Many people prominent in Cambridge and Boston musical circles were present.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCIV. NO. 112.

FRIDAY, OCTOBER 20, 1893.

CAMBRIDGE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The first of this season's annual Symphony concerts in Cambridge was given last evening in Sanders Theatre, which was comfortably filled. The music was of a high order. Following are the dates of coming concerts: Oct. 19, Nov. 2, Nov. 16, Dec. 7, Jan. 4, Jan. 25, Feb. 15, March 8, April 5, April 26.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, Oct. 21, 1893.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The initial programme of the thirteenth season was not such as to impress the music-lover with an idea that the new conductor, Mr. Emil Paur, excels in programme-making. It comprised Beethoven's Symphony No. 5, in C-minor; Tschaikowsky's Serenade for strings, and Wagner's "Tannhäuser Overture."

While it would be manifestly unfair to pronounce a final judgment upon Mr. Paur's conducting after a single concert, it cannot be denied that there were many among the audience who were disappointed with his reading of the works given. He is no doubt a musician of ability, but he lacks magnetism, and he does not exhibit such poetical, refined and graceful treatment as was given to the interpretations of last season. Mr. Paur is accurate to a mechanical degree; he is heavy and unsentimental in his readings, having all the correctness and method of a pile-driver in his rigidity.

The audience gave him a greeting of moderate warmth, but there was no enthusiasm. The indications do not point to a brilliant success for these concerts.

BOSTON HOME JOURNAL.

The Saturday Evening Paper.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 21, 1893.

EMIL PAUR is still the all-absorbing topic, I find, only now it is, "Have you heard him?" "Do you like him?" etc. As if any one could tell whether he liked him or judge of his ability with any fairness, upon one hearing!

.....

Certain it is, though, that the first impression was most favorable from the musician's standpoint, Saturday's program being interpreted in a truly musicianly manner rather than brilliantly. Mr. Paur's apparently absolute control over his men reminds one more of Gericke than any other of his predecessors. One would judge him to be conservative rather than extreme, and to be less endowed with temperament than those who have preceded him, in other words, precision rather than passion would characterize his work.

.....

Personally, Mr. Paur must have been a terrible disappointment to the feminine portion of his audience, gone thither with willingness to adore, for he is distinctly German in appearance, manly, too, and rather dignified, with nothing of the "passionate poet" about him, and his conducting is not in the least graceful to watch. Unless the matinee girls turn their attention this year to an appreciation of the music, I fear their occupation's gone.

.....

BOSTON POST, SUNDAY MORNING, OCT. 22, 1893.

MRS. EMIL PAUR.

(From the first photograph she has had taken in this country.)

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Second of the Series in Music Hall --Music Notes.

The second of the concerts by the Symphony Orchestra was given last evening in Music Hall, when the following programme was presented:

Volkmann—Overture to "Richard III.," op. 68.

Beethoven—Recitative and aria, from "Fidelio."

Dvorak—Slavische rhapsodie No. 2, in G minor, op. 45.

Massenet—Recitative and air, from "Herodiade."

Schubert—Symphony No. 9, in C major.

Soloist, Mme. Nordica.

The Volkmann overture was interesting from its novelty, for, while it is not new to the patrons of these concerts, it is less familiar than some other selections. It also gave an opportunity of further judging of the methods of Mr. Paur, for the number admits of varied expression and display of musical taste. The overture was given with pleasing effect, particularly the battle scene and the slow movement at the close.

Dvorak's Slavische rhapsodie, a rather gloomy selection, was also pleasantly heard, and the admirable control of the conductor over his forces was shown in more than one instance. Schubert's ninth symphony closed the orchestral numbers. This work is somewhat long and tedious, but is occasionally enjoyed. It was rendered artistically, but was rather heavy food for the spectators after the preceding selections.

Mme. Nordica was the soloist, but she was not in the best voice and several times sang falsely. Her rendering of the selection from "Herodiade" was better than the Beethoven number.

At the concert and rehearsal this week, the programme will be as follows:

H. Goetz—Symphony in F major, op. 9.

Volkmann—Serenade. Solo violoncello, Mr. Alwin Schroeder.

Beethoven—Overture. "Leonore," No. 3.

.....

The Kneisel Quartet concert announced for tomorrow (Monday) evening is unavoidably postponed until the following Monday, Oct. 30. Mr. Kneisel is unable to play, owing to a severe lameness of the right hand.

Corbett's Herald.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 21, 1893.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts will be inaugurated in this city this season next Wednesday night. Mme. Nordica, Mr. Loeffler and other distinguished artists will appear as soloists. A rich treat is in store for our people.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 18, 1893.

Telephone - - - - 1253-18th.

BOSTON, October 15, 1893.

THE first concert of the thirteenth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given in Music Hall the evening of the 14th. Mr. Emil Paur then made his first appearance as conductor at these concerts. The program was as follows:

Symphony No. 5, C minor ..... Beethoven
Serenade for Strings, C major, op. 48..... Tschaikowsky
Overture, "Tannhäuser"..... Wagner

The public rehearsal of the day before was largely attended, and the comments of the members of the audience were caught up greedily by musical loungers in the streets and at the clubs. One half of the audience thought that Mr. Paur was "superb" in the symphony, but that the "Tannhäuser" overture was not given with the passion of Mr. Nikisch. The other half expressed a reversed opinion.

Newspaper men buttonholed poor devils at they came out of the hall, and the opinions of the well-known and the unknown were treated with equal consideration. Here is a sample:

"A lady who did not wish her name used thought Mr. Paur was not so graceful as Mr. Nikisch, 'but at the same time I think he is very fine.'"

Here is another chunk of Boston culture (don't mistake "chunk" for "chump" in this connection): "Senator Henry Parkman enjoyed the concert immensely, and is a devoted Paur man from this time out."

But the learned punster and professor, John K. Paine, remembered the wisdom of Brer' Rabbit: "Prof. John K. Paine, of Harvard University, courteously refused to express an opinion, on the ground that it was impossible to judge fairly by one performance."

And the learned professor is eminently right.

* * *

Although Mr. Paur has labored diligently in rehearsal, he is not yet of course fully master of the men, nor are they, though willing, able to respond quickly to each desire of the conductor. He is said to be a rigid disciplinarian, and the time of rehearsal is a time of work, not of social intercourse on topics of the day. His mind is determined and he does not experiment in effects.

Again, Mr. Paur was evidently nervous at the beginning, and no wonder. The hall was crowded and the air was hot and foul. When Mr. Paur entered there was reassuring and long continued applause, but he seemed anxious to begin and he plunged into his work.

* * *

Instead of venturing fixed opinions that might be unfair to conductor, orchestra and writer, I prefer for a time to simply record impressions, which the performance of next week or three weeks after may modify.

* * *

Mr. Paur's manner of conducting is distinguished chiefly by honesty, earnestness and decision.

He is by no means graceful in action or in repose. In his movements there is no thought of the Hogarthian line of beauty. His beat is direct; it is unmistakable. Mr. Paur was diligent in giving the cue, and there was no excuse for any neglect to obey.

The man's gestures are often angular, at times almost grotesque. He frequently brings to mind a Fliegende Blätter conductor. But he is terribly in earnest. His mind is not only on his task, it jumps on the task. He has a marked sense of rhythm, but it should not be necessary for him to use the foot in indication of the rhythm.

Mr. Paur's face indicates strength, firmness, honesty, intelligence; but it is hard to find it the face of a man of marked temperament or of fine or luxuriant imagination. It is a face that will certainly be respected by all, admired by some, loved probably by those closest to him.

But he will not influence the blood of the "musical chippies" (to borrow a phrase from an esteemed contemporary in New York). I fear he is too rugged, too sincere, to appeal to the frequenters of the Friday rehearsals; and I doubt if he cares for such admiration.

* * *

Last evening Mr. Paur appeared as a well equipped schoolmaster, an accomplished drill master rather than as a musician of large imagination or as a being who exerts a mysterious influence by his individuality, or temperament, or magnetism, expressed through music led by him.

Much of the detail was admirable, and the fruits of study were plucked in the sight of the audience.

Here let this be said: Mr. Paur is apparently unconscious of the presence of the audience. I do not believe that he knows the meaning of the word poseur.

But to go back to the detail. There would be delightful passages in which a keen sense of values was displayed; but these same passages were so carefully worked out that a movement of liberal length became a piece of mosaic work. The hearer was at once aware of the labor at rehearsal. The machinery worked admirably, but it creaked.

There was more preparation than inspiration. Now, by inspiration I do not here mean a sudden, possibly heaven-descended caprice that overmasters a conductor whose men are unprepared for the reception and the expression of the caprice. But after the labor of preparation is over, and the conductor stands ready for performance, then if he be the rare, the ideal conductor, he possesses the souls of the men under his stick so they are a part of him; they act with him; they feel with him; they even anticipate a wish.

Of course such conducting presupposes an unlimited knowledge of the men and their characteristics that comes alone with time, if it comes at all.

* * *

And so, to me at least, the symphony became four movements subdivided into detached episodes that were unrelated. There were niceties of expression, there was a careful observance of dynamic gradations, there was a sense of value in estimating the importance of the various voices; but there was something lacking, and that was perhaps the expression of a great musical river with its contributory streams.

Surely the andante con moto of the symphony was taken at too slow a pace. Leave any discussion of the proper meaning of the Italian phrase out of the question, the melos suffered by the slowness, nor was the phrase sung and bound together as it might have been. But it is a fashion with some in these days to confound an andante with an adagio.

* * *

Mr. Paur wore patent leather pumps, if I am not mistaken; but when he conducted the waltz from the serenade by Tchaikowsky he seemed to exchange them for rubber boots that came above the knees. The daintiness, the delicacy, the coquetry of this Franco-German movement vanished in thin air. The dancers moved laboriously in a ploughed field.

* * *

So in the "Tannhäuser" overture, there was more of thoughtfulness than of spontaneity in the performance. The drawing was possibly all right; but the colors for the most part were thinly spread, and in this overture color may be thrown on with a palette knife.

* * *

Mr. Paur seems to be an honest, hard working, vigorous musician. The first impression is that he is, first of all, a schoolmaster.

And perhaps a schoolmaster would be now of greater benefit to the orchestra and the public than a frenzied poet.

* * *

This is the program of the concert of October 21: Volkmann's "Richard III.," Dvorák's Second Rhapsodie, Schubert's C major symphony. Nordica will sing.

* * *

NOT A NIKISCH.

THE consensus of opinion as to the merits of Mr. Emil Paur's conducting is that he has more scholarship than temperament. Mr. Philip Hale, the well-known music critic and the Boston correspondent of THE MUSICAL COURIER, thoroughly dissects Mr. Paur's methods in the present issue, and finds him more of the schoolmaster than a poet. Perhaps the orchestra needs a pedagogue, but then the feelings of its audiences should be taken into consideration. By the way, who recommended Mr. Paur to Colonel Higginson?

And after all, can European judgments be considered final until a test is made here? Boston is a difficult city to please. Arthur Nikisch and Wilhelm Gericke did not suit it. So it will have to learn to like Emil Paur. Perhaps the Worcester County Festival Association will take Mr. Paur off Colonel Higginson's hands. From all that has been written of him he would, it appears, make an admirable successor to Carl Zerrahn.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

FRIDAY MORNING, OCT. 20, 1893.

CONDUCTOR PAUR AT CAMBRIDGE.

Emil Paur's first appearance at Cambridge as leader of the Symphony orchestra was made at Sanders Theatre last evening before a large audience. The new conductor was received with great satisfaction.

After the performance Mr. and Mrs. Paur were tendered a reception by the Misses Riddle of Arrow st., Cambridge. Many people prominent in Cambridge and Boston musical circles were present.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCIV. NO. 112.

FRIDAY, OCTOBER 20, 1893.

CAMBRIDGE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The first of this season's annual Symphony concerts in Cambridge was given last evening in Sanders Theatre, which was comfortably filled. The music was of a high order. Following are the dates of coming concerts: Oct. 19, Nov. 2, Nov. 16, Dec. 7, Jan. 4, Jan. 25, Feb. 15, March 8, April 5, April 26.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, Oct. 21, 1893.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The initial programme of the thirteenth season was not such as to impress the music-lover with an idea that the new conductor, Mr. Emil Paur, excels in programme-making. It comprised Beethoven's Symphony No. 5, in C-minor; Tschaikowsky's Serenade for strings, and Wagner's "Tannhäuser Overture."

While it would be manifestly unfair to pronounce a final judgment upon Mr. Paur's conducting after a single concert, it cannot be denied that there were many among the audience who were disappointed with his reading of the works given. He is no doubt a musician of ability, but he lacks magnetism, and he does not exhibit such poetical, refined and graceful treatment as was given to the interpretations of last season. Mr. Paur is accurate to a mechanical degree; he is heavy and unsentimental in his readings, having all the correctness and method of a pile-driver in his rigidity.

The audience gave him a greeting of moderate warmth, but there was no enthusiasm. The indications do not point to a brilliant success for these concerts.

BOSTON HOME JOURNAL.

The Saturday Evening Paper.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 21, 1893.

EMIL PAUR is still the all-absorbing topic, I find, only now it is, "Have you heard him?" "Do you like him?" etc. As if any one could tell whether he liked him or judge of his ability with any fairness, upon one hearing!

.....

Certain it is, though, that the first impression was most favorable from the musician's standpoint, Saturday's program being interpreted in a truly musicianly manner rather than brilliantly. Mr. Paur's apparently absolute control over his men reminds one more of Gericke than any other of his predecessors. One would judge him to be conservative rather than extreme, and to be less endowed with temperament than those who have preceded him, in other words, precision rather than passion would characterize his work.

.....

Personally, Mr. Paur must have been a terrible disappointment to the feminine portion of his audience, gone thither with willingness to adore, for he is distinctly German in appearance, manly, too, and rather dignified, with nothing of the "passionate poet" about him, and his conducting is not in the least graceful to watch. Unless the matinee girls turn their attention this year to an appreciation of the music, I fear their occupation's gone.

.....

BOSTON POST, SUNDAY MORNING, OCT. 22, 1893.

MRS. EMIL PAUR.

(From the first photograph she has had taken in this country.)

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Second of the Series in Music Hall ---Music Notes.

The second of the concerts by the Symphony Orchestra was given last evening in Music Hall, when the following programme was presented:

Volkmann—Overture to "Richard III.," op. 68.

Beethoven—Recitative and aria, from "Fidelio."

Dvorak—Slavische rhapsodie No. 2, in G minor, op. 45.

Massenet—Recitative and air, from "Herodiade."

Schubert—Symphony No. 9, in C major.

Soloist, Mme. Nordica.

The Volkmann overture was interesting from its novelty, for, while it is not new to the patrons of these concerts, it is less familiar than some other selections. It also gave an opportunity of further judging of the methods of Mr. Paur, for the number admits of varied expression and display of musical taste. The overture was given with pleasing effect, particularly the battle scene and the slow movement at the close.

Dvorak's Slavische rhapsodie, a rather gloomy selection, was also pleasantly heard, and the admirable control of the conductor over his forces was shown in more than one instance. Schubert's ninth symphony closed the orchestral numbers. This work is somewhat long and tedious, but is occasionally enjoyed. It was rendered artistically, but was rather heavy food for the spectators after the preceding selections.

Mme. Nordica was the soloist, but she was not in the best voice and several times sang falsely. Her rendering of the selection from "Herodiade" was better than the Beethoven number.

At the concert and rehearsal this week, the programme will be as follows:

H. Goetz—Symphony in F major, op. 9.

Volkmann—Serenade. Solo violoncello, Mr. Alwin Schroeder.

Beethoven—Overture. "Leonore," No. 3.

.....

The Kneisel Quartet concert announced for tomorrow (Monday) evening is unavoidably postponed until the following Monday, Oct. 30. Mr. Kneisel is unable to play, owing to a severe lameness of the right hand.

Corbett's Herald.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 21, 1893.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts will be inaugurated in this city this season next Wednesday night. Mme. Nordica, Mr. Loeffler and other distinguished artists will appear as soloists. A rich treat is in store for our people.

[28]

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 18, 1893.

Telephone - - - - 1253-18th.

BOSTON, October 15, 1893.

THE first concert of the thirteenth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given in Music Hall the evening of the 14th. Mr. Emil Paur then made his first appearance as conductor at these concerts. The program was as follows:

Symphony No. 5, C minor .....Beethoven
Serenade for Strings, C major, op. 48.....Tschaikowsky
Overture, "Tannhäuser".....Wagner

The public rehearsal of the day before was largely attended, and the comments of the members of the audience were caught up greedily by musical loungers in the streets and at the clubs. One half of the audience thought that Mr. Paur was "superb" in the symphony, but that the "Tannhäuser" overture was not given with the passion of Mr. Nikisch. The other half expressed a reversed opinion.

Newspaper men buttonholed poor devils at they came out of the hall, and the opinions of the well-known and the unknown were treated with equal consideration. Here is a sample:

"A lady who did not wish her name used thought Mr. Paur was not so graceful as Mr. Nikisch, 'but at the same time I think he is very fine.'"

Here is another chunk of Boston culture (don't mistake "chunk" for "chump" in this connection): "Senator Henry Parkman enjoyed the concert immensely, and is a devoted Paur man from this time out."

But the learned punster and professor, John K. Paine, remembered the wisdom of Brer' Rabbit: "Prof. John K. Paine, of Harvard University, courteously refused to express an opinion, on the ground that it was impossible to judge fairly by one performance."

And the learned professor is eminently right.

* * *

Although Mr. Paur has labored diligently in rehearsal, he is not yet of course fully master of the men, nor are they, though willing, able to respond quickly to each desire of the conductor. He is said to be a rigid disciplinarian, and the time of rehearsal is a time of work, not of social intercourse on topics of the day. His mind is determined and he does not experiment in effects.

Again, Mr. Paur was evidently nervous at the beginning, and no wonder. The hall was crowded and the air was hot and foul. When Mr. Paur entered there was reassuring and long continued applause, but he seemed anxious to begin and he plunged into his work.

* * *

Instead of venturing fixed opinions that might be unfair to conductor, orchestra and writer, I prefer for a time to simply record impressions, which the performance of next week or three weeks after may modify.

* * *

Mr. Paur's manner of conducting is distinguished chiefly by honesty, earnestness and decision.

He is by no means graceful in action or in repose. In his movements there is no thought of the Hogarthian line of beauty. His beat is direct; it is unmistakable. Mr. Paur was diligent in giving the cue, and there was no excuse for any neglect to obey.

The man's gestures are often angular, at times almost grotesque. He frequently brings to mind a Fliegende Blätter conductor. But he is terribly in earnest. His mind is not only on his task, it jumps on the task. He has a marked sense of rhythm, but it should not be necessary for him to use the foot in indication of the rhythm.

Mr. Paur's face indicates strength, firmness, honesty, intelligence; but it is hard to find it the face of a man of marked temperament or of fine or luxuriant imagination. It is a face that will certainly be respected by all, admired by some, loved probably by those closest to him.

But he will not influence the blood of the "musical chippies" (to borrow a phrase from an esteemed contemporary in New York). I fear he is too rugged, too sincere, to appeal to the frequenters of the Friday rehearsals; and I doubt if he cares for such admiration.

* * *

Last evening Mr. Paur appeared as a well equipped schoolmaster, an accomplished drill master rather than as a musician of large imagination or as a being who exerts a mysterious influence by his individuality, or temperament, or magnetism, expressed through music led by him.

Much of the detail was admirable, and the fruits of study were plucked in the sight of the audience.

Here let this be said: Mr. Paur is apparently unconscious of the presence of the audience. I do not believe that he knows the meaning of the word poseur.

But to go back to the detail. There would be delightful passages in which a keen sense of values was displayed; but these same passages were so carefully worked out that a movement of liberal length became a piece of mosaic work. The hearer was at once aware of the labor at rehearsal. The machinery worked admirably, but it creaked.

There was more preparation than inspiration. Now, by inspiration I do not here mean a sudden, possibly heaven-descended caprice that overmasters a conductor whose men are unprepared for the reception and the expression of the caprice. But after the labor of preparation is over, and the conductor stands ready for performance, then if he be the rare, the ideal conductor, he possesses the souls of the men under his stick so they are a part of him; they act with him; they feel with him; they even anticipate a wish.

Of course such conducting presupposes an unlimited knowledge of the men and their characteristics that comes alone with time, if it comes at all.

* * *

And so, to me at least, the symphony became four movements subdivided into detached episodes that were unrelated. There were niceties of expression, there was a careful observance of dynamic gradations, there was a sense of value in estimating the importance of the various voices; but there was something lacking, and that was perhaps the expression of a great musical river with its contributory streams.

Surely the andante con moto of the symphony was taken at too slow a pace. Leave any discussion of the proper meaning of the Italian phrase out of the question, the melos suffered by the slowness, nor was the phrase sung and bound together as it might have been. But it is a fashion with some in these days to confound an andante with an adagio.

* * *

Mr. Paur wore patent leather pumps, if I am not mistaken; but when he conducted the waltz from the serenade by Tchaikowsky he seemed to exchange them for rubber boots that came above the knees. The daintiness, the delicacy, the coquetry of this Franco-German movement vanished in thin air. The dancers moved laboriously in a ploughed field.

* * *

So in the "Tannhäuser" overture, there was more of thoughtfulness than of spontaneity in the performance. The drawing was possibly all right; but the colors for the most part were thinly spread, and in this overture color may be thrown on with a palette knife.

* * *

Mr. Paur seems to be an honest, hard working, vigorous musician. The first impression is that he is, first of all, a schoolmaster.

And perhaps a schoolmaster would be now of greater benefit to the orchestra and the public than a frenzied poet.

* * *

This is the program of the concert of October 21: Volkmann's "Richard III.," Dvorák's Second Rhapsodie, Schubert's C major symphony. Nordica will sing.

* * *

NOT A NIKISCH.

THE consensus of opinion as to the merits of Mr. Emil Paur's conducting is that he has more scholarship than temperament. Mr. Philip Hale, the well-known music critic and the Boston correspondent of THE MUSICAL COURIER, thoroughly dissects Mr. Paur's methods in the present issue, and finds him more of the schoolmaster than a poet. Perhaps the orchestra needs a pedagogue, but then the feelings of its audiences should be taken into consideration. By the way, who recommended Mr. Paur to Colonel Higginson?

And after all, can European judgments be considered final until a test is made here? Boston is a difficult city to please. Arthur Nikisch and Wilhelm Gericke did not suit it. So it will have to learn to like Emil Paur. Perhaps the Worcester County Festival Association will take Mr. Paur off Colonel Higginson's hands. From all that has been written of him he would, it appears, make an admirable successor to Carl Zerrahn.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

FRIDAY MORNING, OCT. 20, 1893.

CONDUCTOR PAUR AT CAMBRIDGE.

Emil Paur's first appearance at Cambridge as leader of the Symphony orchestra was made at Sanders Theatre last evening before a large audience. The new conductor was received with great satisfaction.

After the performance Mr. and Mrs. Paur were tendered a reception by the Misses Riddle of Arrow st., Cambridge. Many people prominent in Cambridge and Boston musical circles were present.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCIV. NO. 112.

FRIDAY, OCTOBER 20, 1893.

CAMBRIDGE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The first of this season's annual Symphony concerts in Cambridge was given last evening in Sanders Theatre, which was comfortably filled. The music was of a high order. Following are the dates of coming concerts: Oct. 19, Nov. 2, Nov. 16, Dec. 7, Jan. 4, Jan. 25, Feb. 15, March 8, April 5, April 26.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, Oct. 21, 1893.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The initial programme of the thirteenth season was not such as to impress the music-lover with an idea that the new conductor, Mr. Emil Paur, excels in programme-making. It comprised Beethoven's Symphony No. 5, in C-minor; Tschaikowsky's Serenade for strings, and Wagner's "Tannhäuser Overture."

While it would be manifestly unfair to pronounce a final judgment upon Mr. Paur's conducting after a single concert, it cannot be denied that there were many among the audience who were disappointed with his reading of the works given. He is no doubt a musician of ability, but he lacks magnetism, and he does not exhibit such poetical, refined and graceful treatment as was given to the interpretations of last season. Mr. Paur is accurate to a mechanical degree; he is heavy and unsentimental in his readings, having all the correctness and method of a pile-driver in his rigidity.

The audience gave him a greeting of moderate warmth, but there was no enthusiasm. The indications do not point to a brilliant success for these concerts.

BOSTON HOME JOURNAL.

The Saturday Evening Paper.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 21, 1893.

EMIL PAUR is still the all-absorbing topic, I find, only now it is, "Have you heard him?" "Do you like him?" etc. As if any one could tell whether he liked him or judge of his ability with any fairness, upon one hearing!

.....

Certain it is, though, that the first impression was most favorable from the musician's standpoint, Saturday's program being interpreted in a truly musicianly manner rather than brilliantly. Mr. Paur's apparently absolute control over his men reminds one more of Gericke than any other of his predecessors. One would judge him to be conservative rather than extreme, and to be less endowed with temperament than those who have preceded him, in other words, precision rather than passion would characterize his work.

.....

Personally, Mr. Paur must have been a terrible disappointment to the feminine portion of his audience, gone thither with willingness to adore, for he is distinctly German in appearance, manly, too, and rather dignified, with nothing of the "passionate poet" about him, and his conducting is not in the least graceful to watch. Unless the matinee girls turn their attention this year to an appreciation of the music, I fear their occupation's gone.

.....

BOSTON POST, SUNDAY MORNING, OCT. 22, 1893.

MRS. EMIL PAUR.

(From the first photograph she has had taken in this country.)

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Second of the Series in Music Hall ---Music Notes.

The second of the concerts by the Symphony Orchestra was given last evening in Music Hall, when the following programme was presented:

Volkmann—Overture to "Richard III.," op. 68.

Beethoven—Recitative and aria, from "Fidelio."

Dvorak—Slavische rhapsodie No. 2, in G minor, op. 45.

Massenet—Recitative and air, from "Herodiade."

Schubert—Symphony No. 9, in C major.

Soloist, Mme. Nordica.

The Volkmann overture was interesting from its novelty, for, while it is not new to the patrons of these concerts, it is less familiar than some other selections. It also gave an opportunity of further judging of the methods of Mr. Paur, for the number admits of varied expression and display of musical taste. The overture was given with pleasing effect, particularly the battle scene and the slow movement at the close.

Dvorak's Slavische rhapsodie, a rather gloomy selection, was also pleasantly heard, and the admirable control of the conductor over his forces was shown in more than one instance. Schubert's ninth symphony closed the orchestral numbers. This work is somewhat long and tedious, but is occasionally enjoyed. It was rendered artistically, but was rather heavy food for the spectators after the preceding selections.

Mme. Nordica was the soloist, but she was not in the best voice and several times sang falsely. Her rendering of the selection from "Herodiade" was better than the Beethoven number.

At the concert and rehearsal this week, the programme will be as follows:

H. Goetz—Symphony in F major, op. 9.

Volkmann—Serenade. Solo violoncello, Mr. Alwin Schroeder.

Beethoven—Overture. "Leonore," No. 3.

.....

The Kneisel Quartet concert announced for tomorrow (Monday) evening is unavoidably postponed until the following Monday, Oct. 30. Mr. Kneisel is unable to play, owing to a severe lameness of the right hand.

Corbett's Herald.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 21, 1893.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts will be inaugurated in this city this season next Wednesday night. Mme. Nordica, Mr. Loeffler and other distinguished artists will appear as soloists. A rich treat is in store for our people.

[28]

SUNDAY, OCTOBER 22, 1893.

Second Symphony Orchestra Program — Tavary English Opera Company—Concerts, Etc.

The second Symphony program contained one novelty, Dvorak's Slavonic rhapsody No. 2, which was given here for the first time. The remaining numbers were Volkmann's overture to "Richard III," Schubert's ninth symphony, and the vocal solos from Massenet's "Herodiade" and Beethoven's "Fidelio," sung by Mme Nordica.

No American singer is more popular in this city than Nordica, and her receptions at the rehearsal and concert were enough to inspire the artist to her best efforts. She sang superbly. Salome's aria was given with beautiful devotional fervor and artistic power, and was in marked contrast to the dramatic scene from "Fidelio." The latter was interpreted with notable purity of tone and dramatic expression, the notes of the upper register electrifying her auditors and eliciting several recalls to the platform. It may as well be noted here that Mr Paur complimented the fair soloist by escorting her to her position on the stage.

Mr Emil Paur conducted the orchestra in a manner which should receive commendation from all music lovers, although he almost ignored the thousands of listeners in the hall, and paid attention to the performers. His manner evidently inspires confidence in the men, for his directing is firm and decisive, and he does not leave them in doubt about tempos and cues.

Dvorak's rhapsody, one of those hurly-burly Slavonic pieces for which this composer is noted, shows the individuality of the man unmistakably, and it was given with the vigor, dash and dissonance necessary for the effects intended by the writer. Volkmann's overture showed no indications of new readings or interpretations differing from previous performances. It was smoothly given.

Schubert's grand ninth symphony was played with nearly all the repeats. The length and importance of this number should place it at the beginning of concert programs, for few can appreciate the manifold beauties and thoroughly enjoy the composition after a long symphonic feast has preceded a performance of this work.

The wind instruments, which play so prominent a part throughout, were effectively used, although the brasses at times were unnecessarily harsh and seemingly eluded the vigilance of the conductor's eye. The finale was magnificently played. Those who looked for startling innovations in Mr Paur's readings were disappointed. The conductor interprets his composers with an evident determination to illustrate their ideas as near as possible.

This week's program will be: Symphony in F major, op 9, H. Goetz; serenade, Volkmann, solo violoncello, Mr Alwin Schroeder; overture, "Leonore," No 3, Beethoven.

—The reception given in Cambridge Thursday night by the Misses Riddle for the new Symphony conductor, Mr Paur, and Mrs Paur, was the first society entertainment in their honor, and a very charming occasion. It took place immediately after the opening Symphony concert at Sanders theater, many going from the performance besides the number who went out direct from town. Mr George Riddle, who is looking finely after his California trip, assisted his sisters in receiving their guests. Mrs Paur, who speaks English surprisingly well considering the short time she has devoted to the study of it, made a most agreeable impression. She is a very pretty woman, and has a gracious manner, which is very winning. Mr Paur's English vocabulary is as yet very limited, but his manner is most cordial. Among the many at the reception were Mrs Louis Agassiz, Mr and Mrs Barthold Schlesinger, Prof J. K. Paine, Mr and Mrs George Putnam, Profs G. M. Lane and James Mills Pierce, Mr and Mrs Curtis Guild Jr and Mr Courtenay Guild, Rev John G. Brooks, Mr G. L. Osgood, the Messrs Adamowski, Mr Roth, Mr and Mrs Kneisel, Mr Loeffler, Mr Gaugengigl, Mrs B. J. Lang, Mrs W. J. Rolfe, Prof J. J. Hayes, Rev Mr Richards and Mr A. H. Pickering.

—Mme Nordica, who was the prima donna of the previous night, brought a party to hear Miss Eames at Music hall Tuesday evening. Mr and Mrs James Jackson, Col H. L. Higginson, Mr and Mrs Herbert Dumaresq, the Eldridges, Miss Virginia Stackpole, Miss Alice Ward, Mr G. W. Wheelwright and family, Mr Adamowski, and Mr Story, Miss Eames' husband, were also in the audience. Miss Eames looked exceedingly distinguished and handsome in a white silk gown with white crepe and rich white lace garniture. The bodice was cut square in the neck, bringing into view Miss Eames' beautiful throat. A diamond star shone in her brown hair, and a superb diamond spray glittered in the corsage, which was also adorned with bows of scarlet and green velvet.

—It needed only the announcement that Nordica was to sing at the rehearsal Friday afternoon to pack Music hall from floor to upper balcony seats and standing room. The great prima donna never looked more brilliantly handsome than when she appeared in an exquisite Worth creation of rose pink satin, hand painted with purple fleurs de lis, and draped with rich cream lace. The high pink corsage was covered with a network of lace. A dainty little French toque, which looked like a big jeweled rose rested on the bright brown hair. This creation first saw the light at the Prince of Wales' garden party this summer, where Mme Nordica was a special guest, and where the gown was declared to be the most beautiful worn. One of the jewels Mme Nordica wore Friday was a dagger brooch sent her by Queen Victoria after the former had sung at the palace last season. It is made in the shape of a crown, and formed of rubies and emeralds set in diamonds and pearls.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
MONDAY MORNING, OCT. 23, 1893.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme of Saturday was broad and varied enough to suit any exacting auditor; it contained much of the dramatic element, and the Slavonic vein of the Dvorak rhapsody found a good counterpoise in the Hungarian flavor of Schubert's great symphony in C major. That this dramatic element was always fully brought out cannot be said, but there was not a measure in the concert that was slovenly, and every thought was so clearly expressed that the intention of the composer was always easily followed.

The Volkmann overture ("Richard III.") began somewhat too deliberately; one cannot imagine a phlegmatic Duke of Gloster. From the beginning of the battle, however, all went well, and there was adequate power and vehemence; the fanfares rang out with martial effect, and the shock of combat was portrayed with appropriate fire. The old Scotch tune of "The Campbells are Comin'" was given crisply and established the warlike atmosphere, in spite of its being dragged in by the composer about a century too soon. Not only did Volkmann err in calling this "an old English war song," but he committed the strangest of anachronisms, for the battle of Bosworth was fought in 1485, while the Scotch tune was not written until 1568; but music, heavenly maid, is not to be fettered by dates.

After the overture came the attraction which had crowded the hall to repletion—Madame Nordica. The famous air from Massenet's "Herodiade" ("Il est Doux, il est Bon") suited her style well, yet there was not entire satisfaction in her work, for there seemed to be more of effort in her singing than is usual, and in the high note of the climax there was aberration from pitch, which was also perceptible in the finale of the Beethoven aria given later in the concert. The aria by Leonora from "Fidelio" was, however, sung with much intelligence and its dramatic contrasts well preserved, even if the Materna or Lehmann standard was not attained. Applause, recalls and floral tributes followed the conclusion of the numbers, as a matter of course.

To return to our orchestral topic,—the Slavonic rhapsody by Dvorak was the weak spot of the programme; it is not, in itself, the strongest of works, but its almost Oriental caprice may not be treated as a Beethoven development; the sharpest of contrasts, the freest of tempi, might have been used here. Just this high-flavored modern school has been given with extraordinary abandon in our concerts for years past, and it is difficult to accustom oneself to a less vivid interpretation. It gave every department of the orchestra an opportunity to display itself, even to muted horns with baleful and ugly tones, and the delicate harp. Our new conductor may break through his reserve in works such as these.

The finest of the Schubert symphonies ended the programme. In every measure the C major symphony shows that Schubert thought vocally; musical ideas come into the mind of a composer through some definite media of tone; thus Schumann thought piano, and one hears the piano even in his great orchestral poems; Beethoven always had the orchestra in his mind's eye, and even his sonatas and string quartettes suggest the orchestra; but Schubert's musical fancies were linked to the human voice, and whether it be a piano work, a string quartette or a symphony, one hears a set of beautiful songs without much thematic development such as would befit an instrumental work. The fact that the development is slight and the themes very striking, may be a full justification for Mr. Paur's omitting the repeat in the performance, before the development. The consensus of modern musical thought is against the repetitions which our forefathers bore with exemplary patience. It may be that in the near future the repeat of the first three divisions (the themes before development) of a sonata-movement may be abolished even in Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven.

The introduction to the symphony was taken quicker than is usual. The horn-player gave his theme without blemish, and the orchestra took it up with good ensemble. The "non troppo" of the chief theme seemed to be disregarded, and it went at a flying pace but clearly throughout. The coda of this movement was splendidly played, especially in the important trombone phrases, which cross each other like the clash of swords. Never was a sterner dialogue written between tenor and base trombones; one can recall a time years ago when the phrases were repressed until they became mere horn passages, but it was not so on this occasion. If ever there was a wood-wind symphony this was one, and the oboe is almost continually in the foreground; it was splendidly played in this work, especially in the second and fourth movements. Not less commendable was the clarinette work, which abounds with important phrases, amounting to obbligato passages.

There were some notably fine points of reading in the symphony; the powerful crescendo just preceding the awe-inspiring pause (a startling rest of one measure) in the second movement was well worked up, and the cello work after it was finely given too; the scherzo was brilliant throughout, but the finale was the crowning effect, for here the conductor threw reserve to the winds, and the fanfares which began the movement sounded like the approach of a victorious army, the chief theme was as brilliant as one could wish (the first violins showed their mettle here), and when it came to those mighty four strokes of the full orchestra, that amazing picture of massive power, picturesque because of its very monotony, titanic in its constant reiteration, the climax of the concert was reached. This movement abundantly proved that it is not to be King Log after King Stork, in our orchestral matters, but one could wish such moments of fire and enthusiasm to come more frequently. Perhaps they will, after conductor and orchestra have fully formed acquaintance.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Journal.
SUNDAY, OCTOBER 22, 1893.

The Second Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the second Symphony concert, given last evening in Music Hall, was as follows:

Overture to Shakspeare's "Richard III.,".....Volkmann
Recitative and Air, "Il est doux, il est bon," from "Herodiade".....Massenet
Slavonic Rhapsody No. 2, in G minor, Op. 45 (First time.).....Dvorak
Recitative and Aria, Komm Hoffnung, lass den letzten Stern, from "Fidelio.".....Beethoven
Symphony No. 9, in C major.....Schubert

Volkmann's overture "Richard III" bears the opus number 68, and it was published in 1871; his other music to the tragedy, opus 73, was published in 1882 with a poem for concert use. I do not know whether the whole music has ever been given in connection with a performance of the tragedy.

The first performance of this overture at a Boston Symphony concert was Oct. 18, 1884.

***

This overture is apparently a musical panorama of the life and the death of Richard III.

Now, according to historians, there were two Richards.

Many, as the playwright Shakspeare, follow tradition and are of the opinion that he was an unpleasant individual, low of stature, crook-backed, hook-shouldered, splay-footed, goggle-eyed, of swarthy complexion, and with the left arm withered from birth. They also allege that he came into the world with a singularly complete outfit of teeth, nails and hair. His vices were habits; "his cruelty was not casual but natural; and the truth of his mind was only lying and falsehood."

Others, and they are in a decided minority, call Richard an abused man. To some he is that vague entity known as a "perfect gentleman;" and while it is true that he did not invent the kindergarten system, he nevertheless was not a follower of Herod.

Volkmann wrote his music for Shakspeare's play, and Richard is therefore a bogy-man.

There is no programme attached; there is no "hump-motiv," which, like the placard in the street car, invites the audience to "see that hump." Volkmann might have called his overture "Alva" or by the name of any cruel character, for the introduction of the anachronistic "Campbells are Coming" does not identify the music with Richard.

The music is for the most part appropriately saturnine and truculent; it is almost as unbearably gloomy as Rubinstein's "Ivan." It is episodic. And what, pray, has the finale to do with the rest of the overture? Who mourned Richard? Or is the lamentation general, not particular?

***

There are compositions by Dvorak that seem saturated with Bohemian blood. Others suggest the innumerable dances of Bohemia, from the Ambit to the Zic. Others again bring to mind forests, the open air, gypsy life and gypsy recklessness. This second rhapsody suggests chiefly hard labor.

***

Schubert never heard his C major symphony. If he had heard it, he might have boiled it down. It was once the fashion to speak of its "divine length," but modern audiences are impatient. Even when it is cut, and the repeats are not observed, it seems interminable; perhaps its peculiar instrumentation, perhaps the monotony of much of the rhythm is the cause. Still, it contains wonderful passages, passages that have not been written in symphonies since the death of Beethoven.

***

Mr. Paur showed again his great anxiety for the detail, and his work was the result of elaborate preparation. At times he thus produced exceedingly fine effects; and yet, though it may seem a paradoxical statement, his very zeal sometimes brought about apparent crudeness. Thus the beauty of the andante con moto in the symphony was marred by the fact that in order to let a particular instrument sing, the rhythm was almost wholly destroyed. And it may be here remarked again that an andante con moto is not an adagio. But, on the other hand, it may be said that the work of this earnest man will undoubtedly be of benefit to the orchestra; for he demands precision and a rigid observance of gradation of tone.

***

Mrs. Nordica was heard to best advantage in the air from Massenet's opera, although the air admits easily passion. The air from "Fidelio" was too much for her, for, vocally and in conception, she was not satisfactory.

***

The programme of the concert of next Saturday is as follows: Symphony, F major, Goetz; Serenade, Volkmann; Beethoven's overture, "Leonore," No. 3.

PHILIP HALE.

NOTES.

The Kneisel Quartette Concert announced for to-morrow (Monday) evening is unavoidably postponed until the following Monday, Oct. 30. Mr. Kneisel is unable to play owing to a severe lameness of the right hand.

First Symphony Concert in Sanders Theatre.

These concerts, now in their twelfth season, were arranged by Mr. Higginson for the officers and students of the University, and these gentlemen find in them a most delightful means of relaxation and entertainment. At the first concert Mr. Paur was as cordially received as he was in Boston, and he was obliged to acknowledge by numerous exhibitions of his peculiar bows the applause that was given him. The programme was Beethoven, Symphony in E flat major; Volkman, Serenade No. 3, solo violoncello by Mr. Alwin Schroeder and Cherubini, overture "Anacreon."

Among the prominent musical and literary people who attended were Major H. L. Higginson, Prof. J. D. Whitney, who always carries the scores as he does to the Boston concerts, Prof. James Mills Peirce, Prof. C. H. Toy, Prof. John K. Paine, Prof. N. S. Slater and Miss Slater, Prof. F. D. Allen, Prof. William G. Farlow, Mrs. Prof. F. G. Peabody and Miss Peabody, Prof. E. Emerton, the Misses Macvane, Prof. John H. Wright, Mrs. Prof. Kuno Francke, Prof. A. A. Howard, Prof. and Mrs. Edward Cummings, Dr. T. W. Harris, Dr. T. W. Richards, Mr. B. S. Hurlbut, Mr. Robert DeCourcy Ward, Prof. Hugo Munstemberg, Mr. and Mrs. J. G. Thorpe, Mr. and Mrs. William H. Bradbury, the Misses Seavey, Mr. and Mrs. George B. Rogers, Dr. and Mrs. B. A. Sargent, Mrs. E. R. Chaplain, Mr. Charles F. Batcheider, Mr. W. T. Brewster and Mr. J. Bertram Williams. As in former years, the prominent musical students of the university acted as ushers, and this week a violinist in the college orchestra did the extra service of loaning his Stradivarius to a nervous Symphony player, who had someway missed connections with his own.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCIV. NO. 114.
SUNDAY, OCTOBER 22, 1893.

SYMPHONY CONCERT. NORDICA.

The second of the season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, given at Music Hall last evening under Mr. Emil Paur's direction, had an especially attractive feature in the appearance of Mme. Nordica, the programme consisting of the following works and selections:

Overture to "Richard III.," op. 68.....Volkmann
Recitative: "Abscheulicher! wo eilst du hin?" and aria: "Komm Hoffnung, lass den letzten Stern," from "Fidelio".....Beethoven
Slavische rhapsodie No. 2, in G minor, op. 45.....Dvorak
Recitative: "Celui dont la parole," and air: "Il est doux, il est bon," from "Herodiade".....Massenet
Symphony No. 9, in C major.....Schubert

It is apparent that the new conductor has diplomatic tendencies. He evidently proposes to stand upon non-committal ground as to the placing of the symphony, and give even advantage to both those who demand it first and those who are equally positive that it should come last. The Heinschel adherents who favor the symphony in the middle of the programme may be recognized later on.

Although the great Schubert symphony was put last, it demands first consideration in commenting on the programme, for Mr Paur fully confirmed all the favorable impressions gained of his ability at his first appearance by his reading of its several movements. He certainly gave this masterly composition a performance eminently in keeping with its grand characteristics, and, without imposing his own individuality, he yet gave a freshness and vigor to his interpretation that was altogether delightful.

The Volkmann overture exhibited the mastery of the conductor over his men in a marked fashion, and the succession of tone pictures which make up the composition were brought out vividly and with a splendid realization of all the wealth of color lavished upon them by the composer. The scenes of strife upon the battlefield could almost be seen, so admirably were the various elements in its construction brought out, and the strong dramatic characteristics of the overture were at all times admirably depicted.

Dvorak's rhapsody had its first hearing here on this occasion and proved an intensely interesting novelty. Its strongly contrasted movements are full of marked originality, both in the themes themselves and their elaboration and treatment, and the dash and fire of the composer's nature shows itself throughout the work. Mr. Paur gave the rhapsody a very brilliant performance and gained a hearty recognition of the merits of the work and its performance.

Mme. Nordica sung with splendid success in the Massenet aria, her nature and gifts as a vocalist appearing to be peculiarly suited to the music of this composer. Her style is so broad and dramatic that she fully realized all the beauties of the aria from "Fidelio," and she gave it with a delightful intelligence and greatly pleased her audience in both her appearances.

It is worthy of note that Mr. Paur extended the courtesy of an escort to the singer upon her entrance and departure, a courtesy that has been sadly neglected by his predecessors.

After the concert last night Madame Nordica—who was resplendent in her Worth gown of glistening white, and her superb jewels, gave a delightful supper party to a few friends at Parker's. Miss Emma Eames—who went to Music Hall to hear Madame Nordica both for the rehearsal and the concert, her husband, Mr. Julian Story, Sig. Rotoli and his handsome wife, Madame Scalchi and her husband, Mrs. C. H. Washburn, Mrs. W. F. Baldwin and Mrs. Walker, Madame Nordica's sisters, with their husbands, were among those who sat around the flower-wreathed table.

Mme. Nordica's immense popularity with her audience was demonstrated anew Friday afternoon at the rehearsal. Although full half an hour was spent after the performance in receiving her friends in the artists' room, when she entered her carriage at the door of Music Hall a solid mass of people, mostly women, had formed on either side the whole length of the brick walk, and way out into the street opposite. They stood patiently waiting to catch a glimpse of the prima donna's face as she passed out and drove away. Always amiable and ready to bestow a smile, Madame Nordica leaned out and made many an eye brighter by her pleasant greeting as she passed along.

The Boston Symphony sale opened in Providence on Monday morning. There was no auction, and no premiums were paid, yet the line commenced to form on Sunday afternoon, and Mr. Copse missed a night's repose to enjoy the merriment in which the anxious applicants for seats indulged. Mr. W. F. Apthorp goes down next Tuesday afternoon to give an analysis of the Wednesday programme to a club composed of 70 or more society people, who wish to understand the programmes before attending the concerts. These analyses will be given by Mr. Apthorp on the Tuesday preceding each concert.

American Art Journal.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 21, 1893.

Emil Paur and the Boston Symphony Concerts.

Of the new leader it might almost be written, He came; he was seen; he conquered. His first appearance was at the first Symphony Matinee, Friday afternoon, October 13. On taking his place on the platform he was greeted with moderate applause. We found him a well set man, addressing himself to business in short order. Already he had made himself popular with his players, by praising their pianissimo, and decreeing a regular Monday holiday. Comparing Paur with past directors, he has an orchestral grip, which Henschel lacked, is less of a precisian than Gericke, is not a romantic free lance like Nikisch. Somebody says of chess, that a tyro tries new gambits, whereas an older head begins with the customary move of the King's pawn. Mr. Nikisch was received with warm enthusiasm four years ago, and astonished the natives by directing without the score, though this fascinating eccentricity did not long endure: but Paur begins his Boston career in a quiet, old-fashioned way.

The audience is large, every seat occupied, and hundreds of men and women standing. We begin with roast beef, in the shape of the great Fifth Symphony. Speaking for myself, this performance was somewhat of a disappointment, especially in the mounting chords of the Andante; for who can forget the elder Damrosch's grand presentation of this Symphony here a few seasons ago?

An admirer of Tschaikowsky, the new director, next gives us the novelty of the occasion, String Serenade in C, op. 48, and does it in beautiful form, especially the Waltz (which won the audience) and the Russian dance movement, both given with admirable delicacy.

Mr. Paur's triumph came last of the feast, in the Tannhaeuser Overture, which was so marvelously well played that you could feel the cool outside air after the Venus fever in the heart of the mountain.

The ushers did their duty nimbly and well, especially when a lady fell in a fit, and her dozen small packages were scattered far and wide in a transverse aisle.

Every concert has its humors. Hearing her neighbor lament that she had not brought her lorgnette, a kind-hearted younger lady proffered hers, and was rather surprised to be met with a curt, "No, I thank you!" Doubtless the refuser remembered the temperance adage, "There's contamination in the glass!"

Though the rehearsals draw the biggest crowds and prices, it is the fashion for the papers to ignore the first of the two concerts, and notice only the Saturday evening repetition; but this time the press had its early paragraphs about the new departure. Perhaps the most sensible utterance was that of Professor Paine, to the effect that it was too soon to judge Mr. Paur's ability. He received a special welcome at the evening concert, however, and Henry L. Higginson was congratulated on his new director.

J. H. W.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, OCT. 22.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme for the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Music Hall, last night, was, Overture, "Richard III.," Volkmann; aria from Massenet's "Herodiade," rhapsodie No. 2, "Dovrak," (first time); aria from Beethoven's "Fidelio;" and Schubert's Symphony in C. Mme. Nordica was the soloist. The house was filled to overflowing. A further acquaintance into the conducting of Mr. Paur, developed little, if anything more, than was obtained by our first experience. He is undoubtedy sincerely painstaking, and scrupulously conscientious in his work, so much so, perhaps, as to be almost pedagogic in his scrupulous anxiety for exactness. Every point, important and otherwise, is elaborated with such minute and demonstrative care, that at times, it nearly becomes oppressive, and causes one to wish for something less of rigidity, and something more in freedom of swing. Then, too, there is such an excess of gesticulation on the part of Mr. Paur, especially in indicating to the different players when it is time to "come in," that it distracts attention from the music. Surely, he has an orchestra of intelligent, experienced, and compent players, who are rehearsed sedulously during the week, and who, therefore, by the time that the performance takes place, may be presumed to know exactly what the conductor expects from them. Hence, it seems superfluous that there should be so much waving of the baton, as if they were playing prima vista; when a glance of the eye or a slight nod of the head would be sufficient indication as a cue. Mr. Paur's readings are eminently thoughtful, but as yet have been dry and lacking in the desired effect of spontaneity. However, the freedom from trickery, the artistic sincerity, and the frank honesty that manifestly underlie the impulses of the conductor, entitle him to the most respectful consideration. Perhaps, when we shall have seen more of him, we shall lose the impression that we now have regarding his tendency to over elaborate his readings by emphasizing every possible point, and thus giving a disjointed effect to the music; and regarding also, his lack of a certain grace of poetic feeling. The music does not flow, but moves haltingly, under his method of interpreting it. It would seem as if he desired to treat an orchestra as a solo instrument; but it is too unwieldy to bear such treatment, which deprives it of its characteristic dignity. Not that he himself is wanting in dignity, but that conscientiousness may be pushed too far, to say nothing of the effect of heavy, didactic pedantry that it may produce. The Volkmann overture had been heard here before, when it made no very marked impression. It was broadly and effectively given, but with such an excess in finish of detail, that it seemed longer than ever before, and more tiresome. The Dvorak Rhapsodie was very like the other music we have had from the same composer, so like in fact, that notwithstanding it was given on this occasion for the first time, it seemed to us as if we were thoroughly familiar with it. There is not much that is intesesting in it. and it is abundant in the now, almost conventional groping in the dark for something that is never found. The orchestration is often very rich, and sometimes thrilling for the moment, in its vigorous massiveness. It was read and played with all possible effect, but it did not seem to meet with a very favorable reception. If it had anything to say that was imperatively called for, we did not discover what it was. Variety in style and expressiveness does not seem to be among Dvorak's gifts. The symphony was carefully read. The tempi were admirable, except when now and then there was a slacking of the movement whenever a phase appeared that might be made to take a sentimental aspect. However, on the whole it was a spirited and honest rendering of the work. Madame Nordica, who was gorgeously costumed, was welcomed with hearty fervor. She sang the Massenet air, "Il est doux," tastefully, tunefully, and with grace and finish of techniuqe, though perhaps somewhat rigidly and coldly in point of style. In this selection, Mr. Paur gave the most satisfying evidence of his skill that he had hitherto vouchsafed. It was delightfully flexible, and was the perfection of conducting the accompaniments to vocal music; and in the Beethoven air, which was the "Abscheulicher," he was equally successful and satisfying. Mme. Nordica was less pleasing in her interpretation of this air than she was in her earlier contribution to the concert. Her style is hardly dramatic enough to do it justice, and she was clearly overweighted by it. Her execution of it was clean cut, and, for a high voice, she took the lower notes with remarkable volume and clearness; but the aria makes exactions, for its proper interpretation, which are beyond her powers to meet. The programme for the next concert is: Symphony in F, Goetz; Serenade, for 'cello and orchestra, Volkmann; Overture, "Leonore," No. 3, Beethoven. Mr. Alwin Schroeder is to be the soloist.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, OCT. 22, 1893.

THE SYMPHONY AND OTHER CONCERTS OF THE WEEK.

If, as was said here a week ago, the initial concert of the current Symphony series was an exceptionally fine first performance, certainly the concert of last evening will be accepted as following worthily that excellent lead.

It is too soon, of course, to talk about perfection. The understanding between the conductor and his four-score men seems to be of the best; for, when one catches a glimpse of his face, one sees sympathy and approval in the look it wears, while the musicians say that they like his treatment of them and the music and mean to support him. But as yet there must necessarily be something tentative in what he and they do, and this double anxiety of itself militates against entire ease and smoothness. The brass instruments have not yet learned to attack a phrase all together as one voice, the first violins still incline occasionally to take the lead even when it is not their turn, and the tone color is somewhat spotty here and there, while some phrasing is stiff and cautious.

But the conductor's plan seems to be all right—to work not for himself, but for the music and the musicians. He seems intent on giving the author his clearest possible light; preserving for each component of the score its proper place; insuring its own fair chance for every instrument; encouraging and stimulating the players, but depending on them for the personal enthusiasm which will make the life, spirit, warmth and sentiment of the readings come finally from them, as it should. Those of us who sit in front and see only Mr. Paur's back and the movements of his arms, may judge him to be a little dry and formal; but the orchestra themselves speak of him as no less energizing than manly, a conductor who will, they think, move them to do their best and stand behind them strongly, like a good general, while they are doing it. And they hint that a solid fortnight longer will be needed to get the great machine running smoothly and with its proper power and pliancy.

The second programme took more time than the first, for it included the tremendously long C-major symphony of Schubert, which would have been better assigned to an evening when the participation of a vocalist did not make five numbers necessary. The other instrumental works were Volkmann's dramatic "Richard the Third" overture, so gloomy and almost gruesome in its moody introduction, so furious and noisy in its battle pictures, and so melancholy in the short conclusion which follows the conflict, and the second Rhapsody of Dvorak. This latter was new to Boston, and on this first hearing seemed to substantiate its title. It is almost a tone-picture, as the phrase goes, being a series of wandering and yet connected episodes derived principally from a pleasant phrase presented, after a couple of clamorous chords, by a few voices from the wooden wind. Rhythm, time and accent change constantly, and no choir long holds the predominance. But for the strong sense of unity which binds these episodes so that each seems to be in its proper place as a consequent and a cause, one might almost set down the work among improvisations. It has more interest than positive character, perhaps, and will be made welcome as an occasional visitor rather than as a constant friend.

The management of these three works has been already implied in our opening paragraph. It was firm, intellectual, earnest, fair-minded and forceful, with no little delicacy and elasticity, giving much pleasure at the time and in recollection and promising well for the future.

Mme. Nordica sang—with orchestral accompaniment—Salome's large sweet air from Massenet's "Herodiade" and Leonora's great scene in Beethoven's "Fidelio." The former had grace and refinement and the latter had honest strength and sincerity. Mme. Nordica is a dramatic, but not a passionate singer, and she wisely refrained from attempting to put intensity into the Beethoven recitative, and depended chiefly for her effect upon the gentleness and quiet firmness of the air. She was in excellent voice and mood, sang generously and freely and was recalled several times. It was pleasant to see that Mr. Paur, unlike Mr. Nikisch, brought some good manners with him, and escorted his soloist from the anteroom to the platform.

Mr. Kneisel was absent from his place and Mr. Loeffler led the first violins.

The next programme stands thus. Goetz's F major symphony; a serenade by Volkmann, Mr. Schroeder playing the 'cello solo, and Beethoven's overture "Leonora, No. 3."

SATURDAY [illegible]

PHILHARMONIC CONCERTS.

HERR PAUR TO MAKE HIS BROOKLYN DEBUT NOV. 10.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's announcement for the coming season will be read with interest by thousands of admirers which the organization has won by its fine performances in this city. The orchestra will give, as usual, five public rehearsals and five concerts at the Academy of Music on

HERR PAUR.

Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings, Nov. 10 and 11, Dec. 15 and 16, Jan. 12 and 13, Feb. 9 and 10, and March 30 and 31. The performances are under the auspices of the Philharmonic Society, and all indications lead to the belief they will be quite as successful as usual.

The appearance of the new conductor, Emil Paur, and the exceptional importance of the solo artists, will add much to the attractiveness which these concerts always possess for the musical public. Mr. Paur comes to America with a record of brilliant achievements in the important positions which he has filled in Europe. His last chair was at the Leipzic Opera, where he succeeded Mr. Nikisch four years ago, as he now succeeds him in Boston. He is 38 years of age, a tireless worker, a profound musical student, and an enthusiastic leader. His control over his forces is absolute, and he will tolerate no mediocrity in the performances under his direction.

He made his debut in Boston last week, and won golden opinions with an almost faultless performance. The orchestra at his command is recognized as the equal of any on either side of the Atlantic. There have been practically no changes in its membership for several years, and constant training and association have produced an ensemble impossible under other conditions. Mme. Emma Eames, the young American prima donna, whose brilliant successes in opera are well known in this city, will be the soloist at the first public rehearsal and concert. Mme. Materna, Franz Kneisel and others are expected to appear in the series. The sale of subscription tickets for both series opens at Chandler's, 300 Fulton street, next Thursday morning.

American Art Journal.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 21, 1893.

Emil Paur and the Boston Symphony Concerts.

Of the new leader it might almost be written, He came; he was seen; he conquered. His first appearance was at the first Symphony Matinee, Friday afternoon, October 13. On taking his place on the platform he was greeted with moderate applause. We found him a well set man, addressing himself to business in short order. Already he had made himself popular with his players, by praising their pianissimo, and decreeing a regular Monday holiday. Comparing Paur with past directors, he has an orchestral grip, which Henschel lacked, is less of a precisian than Gericke, is not a romantic free lance like Nikisch. Somebody says of chess, that a tyro tries new gambits, whereas an older head begins with the customary move of the King's pawn. Mr. Nikisch was received with warm enthusiasm four years ago, and astonished the natives by directing without the score, though this fascinating eccentricity did not long endure; but Paur begins his Boston career in a quiet, old-fashioned way.

The audience is large, every seat occupied, and hundreds of men and women standing. We begin with roast beef, in the shape of the great Fifth Symphony. Speaking for myself, this performance was somewhat of a disappointment, especially in the mounting chords of the Andante; for who can forget the elder Damrosch's grand presentation of this Symphony here a few seasons ago?

An admirer of Tschaikowsky, the new director, next gives us the novelty of the occasion, String Serenade in C, op. 48, and does it in beautiful form, especially the Waltz (which won the audience) and the Russian dance movement, both given with admirable delicacy.

Mr. Paur's triumph came last of the feast, in the Tannhaeuser Overture, which was so marvelously well played that you could feel the cool outside air after the Venus fever in the heart of the mountain.

The ushers did their duty nimbly and well, especially when a lady fell in a fit, and her dozen small packages were scattered far and wide in a transverse aisle.

Every concert has its humors. Hearing her neighbor lament that she had not brought her lorgnette, a kind-hearted younger lady proffered hers, and was rather surprised to be met with a curt, "No, I thank you!" Doubtless the refuser remembered the temperance adage, "There's contamination in the glass!"

Though the rehearsals draw the biggest crowds and prices, it is the fashion for the papers to ignore the first of the two concerts, and notice only the Saturday evening repetition; but this time the press had its early paragraphs about the new departure. Perhaps the most sensible utterance was that of Professor Paine, to the effect that it was too soon to judge Mr. Paur's ability. He received a special welcome at the evening concert, however, and Henry L. Higginson was congratulated on his new director.

J. H. W.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, OCT. 22.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme for the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Music Hall, last night, was, Overture, "Richard III.," Volkmann; aria from Massenet's "Herodiade," rhapsodie No. 2, "Dovrak," (first time); aria from Beethoven's "Fidelio;" and Schubert's Symphony in C. Mme. Nordica was the soloist. The house was filled to overflowing. A further acquaintance into the conducting of Mr. Paur, developed little, if anything more, than was obtained by our first experience. He is undoubtedy sincerely painstaking, and scrupulously conscientious in his work, so much so, perhaps, as to be almost pedagogic in his scrupulous anxiety for exactness. Every point, important and otherwise, is elaborated with such minute and demonstrative care, that at times, it nearly becomes oppressive, and causes one to wish for something less of rigidity, and something more in freedom of swing. Then, too, there is such an excess of gesticulation on the part of Mr. Paur, especially in indicating to the different players when it is time to "come in," that it distracts attention from the music. Surely, he has an orchestra of intelligent, experienced, and competent players, who are rehearsed sedulously during the week, and who, therefore, by the time that the performance takes place, may be presumed to know exactly what the conductor expects from them. Hence, it seems superfluous that there should be so much waving of the baton, as if they were playing prima vista; when a glance of the eye or a slight nod of the head would be sufficient indication as a cue. Mr. Paur's readings are eminently thoughtful, but as yet have been dry and lacking in the desired effect of spontaneity. However, the freedom from trickery, the artistic sincerity, and the frank honesty that manifestly underlie the impulses of the conductor, entitle him to the most respectful consideration. Perhaps, when we shall have seen more of him, we shall lose the impression that we now have regarding his tendency to over elaborate his readings by emphasizing every possible point, and thus giving a disjointed effect to the music; and regarding also, his lack of a certain grace of poetic feeling. The music does not flow, but moves haltingly, under his method of interpreting it. It would seem as if he desired to treat an orchestra as a solo instrument; but it is too unwieldy to bear such treatment, which deprives it of its characteristic dignity. Not that he himself is wanting in dignity, but that conscientiousness may be pushed too far, to say nothing of the effect of heavy, didactic pedantry that it may produce. The Volkmann overture had been heard here before, when it made no very marked impression. It was broadly and effectively given, but with such an excess in finish of detail, that it seemed longer than ever before, and more tiresome. The Dvorak Rhapsodie was very like the other music we have had from the same composer, so like in fact, that notwithstanding it was given on this occasion for the first time, it seemed to us as if we were thoroughly familiar with it. There is not much that is intesesting in it, and it is abundant in the now, almost conventional groping in the dark for something that is never found. The orchestration is often very rich, and sometimes thrilling for the moment, in its vigorous massiveness. It was read and played with all possible effect, but it did not seem to meet with a very favorable reception. If it had anything to say that was imperatively called for, we did not discover what it was. Variety in style and expressiveness does not seem to be among Dvorak's gifts. The symphony was carefully read. The tempi were admirable, except when now and then there was a slacking of the movement whenever a phase appeared that might be made to take a sentimental aspect. However, on the whole it was a spirited and honest rendering of the work. Madame Nordica, who was gorgeously costumed, was welcomed with hearty fervor. She sang the Massenet air, "Il est doux," tastefully, tunefully, and with grace and finish of techniuqe, though perhaps somewhat rigidly and coldly in point of style. In this selection, Mr. Paur gave the most satisfying evidence of his skill that he had hitherto vouchsafed. It was delightfully flexible, and was the perfection of conducting the accompaniments to vocal music; and in the Beethoven air, which was the "Abscheulicher," he was equally successful and satisfying. Mme. Nordica was less pleasing in her interpretation of this air than she was in her earlier contribution to the concert. Her style is hardly dramatic enough to do it justice, and she was clearly overweighted by it. Her execution of it was clean cut, and, for a high voice, she took the lower notes with remarkable volume and clearness; but the aria makes exactions, for its proper interpretation, which are beyond her powers to meet. The programme for the next concert is: Symphony in F, Goetz; Serenade, for 'cello and orchestra, Volkmann; Overture, "Leonore," No. 3, Beethoven. Mr. Alwin Schroeder is to be the soloist.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, OCT. 22, 1893.

THE SYMPHONY AND OTHER CONCERTS OF THE WEEK.

If, as was said here a week ago, the initial concert of the current Symphony series was an exceptionally fine first performance, certainly the concert of last evening will be accepted as following worthily that excellent lead.

It is too soon, of course, to talk about perfection. The understanding between the conductor and his four-score men seems to be of the best; for, when one catches a glimpse of his face, one sees sympathy and approval in the look it wears, while the musicians say that they like his treatment of them and the music and mean to support him. But as yet there must necessarily be something tentative in what he and they do, and this double anxiety of itself militates against entire ease and smoothness. The brass instruments have not yet learned to attack a phrase all together as one voice, the first violins still incline occasionally to take the lead even when it is not their turn, and the tone color is somewhat spotty here and there, while some phrasing is stiff and cautious.

But the conductor's plan seems to be all right—to work not for himself, but for the music and the musicians. He seems intent on giving the author his clearest possible light; preserving for each component of the score its proper place; insuring its own fair chance for every instrument; encouraging and stimulating the players, but depending on them for the personal enthusiasm which will make the life, spirit, warmth and sentiment of the readings come finally from them, as it should. Those of us who sit in front and see only Mr. Paur's back and the movements of his arms, may judge him to be a little dry and formal; but the orchestra themselves speak of him as no less energizing than manly, a conductor who will, they think, move them to do their best and stand behind them strongly, like a good general, while they are doing it. And they hint that a solid fortnight longer will be needed to get the great machine running smoothly and with its proper power and pliancy.

The second programme took more time than the first, for it included the tremendously long C-major symphony of Schubert, which would have been better assigned to an evening when the participation of a vocalist did not make five numbers necessary. The other instrumental works were Volkmann's dramatic "Richard the Third" overture, so gloomy and almost gruesome in its moody introduction, so furious and noisy in its battle pictures, and so melancholy in the short conclusion which follows the conflict, and the second Rhapsody of Dvorak. This latter was new to Boston, and on this first hearing seemed to substantiate its title. It is almost a tone-picture, as the phrase goes, being a series of wandering and yet connected episodes derived principally from a pleasant phrase presented, after a couple of clamorous chords, by a few voices from the wooden wind. Rhythm, time and accent change constantly, and no choir long holds the predominance. But for the strong sense of unity which binds these episodes so that each seems to be in its proper place as a consequent and a cause, one might almost set down the work among improvisations. It has more interest than positive character, perhaps, and will be made welcome as an occasional visitor rather than as a constant friend.

The management of these three works has been already implied in our opening paragraph. It was firm, intellectual, earnest, fair-minded and forceful, with no little delicacy and elasticity, giving much pleasure at the time and in recollection and promising well for the future.

Mme. Nordica sang—with orchestral accompaniment—Salome's large sweet air from Massenet's "Herodiade" and Leonora's great scene in Beethoven's "Fidelio." The former had grace and refinement and the latter had honest strength and sincerity. Mme. Nordica is a dramatic, but not a passionate singer, and she wisely refrained from attempting to put intensity into the Beethoven recitative, and depended chiefly for her effect upon the gentleness and quiet firmness of the air. She was in excellent voice and mood, sang generously and freely and was recalled several times. It was pleasant to see that Mr. Paur, unlike Mr. Nikisch, brought some good manners with him, and escorted his soloist from the anteroom to the platform.

Mr. Kneisel was absent from his place and Mr. Loeffler led the first violins.

The next programme stands thus. Goetz's F major symphony; a serenade by Volkmann, Mr. Schroeder playing the 'cello solo, and Beethoven's overture "Leonora, No. 3."

SATURDAY EVENING, OCTOBER 21, 1893.

PHILHARMONIC CONCERTS,

HERR PAUR TO MAKE HIS BROOKLYN DEBUT NOV. 10.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's announcement for the coming season will be read with interest by thousands of admirers which the organization has won by its fine performances in this city. The orchestra will give, as usual, five public rehearsals and five concerts at the Academy of Music on

HERR PAUR.

Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings, Nov. 10 and 11, Dec. 15 and 16, Jan. 12 and 13, Feb. 9 and 10, and March 30 and 31. The performances are under the auspices of the Philharmonic Society, and all indications lead to the belief they will be quite as successful as usual.

The appearance of the new conductor, Emil Paur, and the exceptional importance of the solo artists, will add much to the attractiveness which these concerts always possess for the musical public. Mr. Paur comes to America with a record of brilliant achievements in the important positions which he has filled in Europe. His last chair was at the Leipzic Opera, where he succeeded Mr. Nikisch four years ago, as he now succeeds him in Boston. He is 38 years of age, a tireless worker, a profound musical student, and an enthusiastic leader. His control over his forces is absolute, and he will tolerate no mediocrity in the performances under his direction.

He made his debut in Boston last week, and won golden opinions with an almost faultless performance. The orchestra at his command is recognized as the equal of any on either side of the Atlantic. There have been practically no changes in its membership for several years, and constant training and association have produced an ensemble impossible under other conditions. Mme. Emma Eames, the young American prima donna, whose brilliant successes in opera are well known in this city, will be the soloist at the first public rehearsal and concert. Mme. Materna, Franz Kneisel and others are expected to appear in the series. The sale of subscription tickets for both series opens at Chandler's, 300 Fulton street, next Thursday morning.

...ston Transcript

MONDAY, OCTOBER 23, 1893.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the second Symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Volkmann: Overture to "Richard III.," Opus 68.
Beethoven: Recitative, "Abscheulicher! wo eilst du hin?" and Aria, "Komm Hoffnung, lass den letzten Stern," from Fidelio."
Dvorak: Slavische Rhapsodie No. 2, in G minor, Opus 45.
Massenet: Recitative, "Celui dont la parole," and Air, "Il est doux, il est bon," from "Hérodiade."
Schubert: Symphony No. 9, in C major.

Mme. Nordica was the singer.

The hall was crowded, the side aisles being filled with people standing; we can hardly remember a season that began so early with full houses. And the large audience was generally enthusiastic, too, especially over Mme. Nordica's singing.

The performance of Volkmann's "Richard III." overture showed both conductor and orchestra in the finest light; never before have we heard so much meaning given this overture. It is essentially a dramatic composition, one in which vehemence of expression and picturesque suggestiveness far outweigh what of musical form and development there may be in it. Mr. Paur takes it in a strongly dramatic way, giving its vehemence and dramatic coloring their full value, but without loss of musical distinctness and coherence. The slow introduction and all the "Bosworth Field" business near the middle of the work produced a very striking effect, and the serener mood of the peroration made a fine contrast with what had preceded it; indeed, Mr. Paur's reading of these closing measures in F-sharp major was exceedingly beautiful and expressive; one could well fancy them a musical rendering of Richmond's,

"Proclaim a pardon to the soldiers fled,
That in submission will return to us:
And then, as we have ta'en the sacrament,
We will unite the white rose and the red—
Smile heaven upon this fair conjunction,"
That long hath frown'd upon their enmity!

In a word, this is the first time we have found the overture otherwise than tiresome and weak; Mr. Paur has shown it to us as a poetically imaginative composition wanting neither in coherency nor dramatic force. The orchestra played it magnificently.

In the Dvorák Slavonic Rhapsody we must confess ourselves as sadly disappointed, after the enthusiastic way we had heard it spoken of by members of the orchestra and others who knew it. We cannot see that the work rises above the general level of a Liszt Hungarian Rhapsody; and, though parts of it have undeniably a certain warm emotional charm—an element not uncommon with Dvorák—this hardly makes up for the absence of Liszt's brilliancy and his peculiar touch of genius. The Czech melodies on which it is founded seem to appeal to one more by their quaint, exotic flavor than by their musical beauty, and the construction of the work is as slight and loose-jointed as may be. One point, however, may be spoken of with genuine enthusiasm: the orchestration. Here Dvorák has even surpassed himself; the scoring is not only rich and euphonious, but varied and full of individual aroma. The performance was admirable.

With the Schubert symphony Mr. Paur came upon more ticklish ground. The great work is familiar to all of us; we have been brought up on it, and know its every turning. The orchestra played for the most part splendidly; here Mr. Paur gave good earnest of what he can do as a disciplinarian. Apart from a slip or two in individual solo instruments, such as cannot be laid to the conductor's charge, the performance left little to be desired in a technical way: vigor and precision of attack, excellence of dynamic balance, and a fine blending of the various voices of the orchestra, were the rule; it was a real pleasure to hear the wind instruments make their entries together so evenly and cleanly. Neither was there any lack of fire and expressiveness. Still, it were stretching a point to call the performance of the glorious work an effective one.

To us, at least, Mr. Paur's reading of each one of the four movements seemed to lack totality of conception; there was an immense deal of attention paid to (would-be) effective details, but very little strong general effectiveness. Mr. Paur follows the favorite modern plan of changing the tempo very often, as the character and expression of the music changes; and it must be admitted that his modifications are not excessive in degree, compared with similar things we have heard here before; in fact, he is rather moderate in this matter than otherwise. But somehow his frequent changes have a disturbing effect upon the listener; they continually rouse you out of the mood into which the music has thrown you; they distract your attention from the composition, instead of riveting it still more firmly upon it. If ever there were a long symphonic composition in which the element of strongly marked and pregnant rhythm predominated, this symphony of Schubert's is that one; it and Beethoven's seventh may be called the "dance symphonies" par excellence. Each movement has its own well defined rhythmic character, and adheres to this character with singular persistency. Of course there are marked rhythmic contrasts; the second theme in the first movement, for instance, is in an utterly different rhythm from the first; a more striking rhythmic contrast than that between the Trio and the Scherzo could hardly be desired. But each theme sticks to and emphasizes its own particular rhythm with great pertinacity throughout its whole development and working out; there is none of that successive presentation of the same theme under various rhythmic aspects that one finds in many more modern compositions. The general aspect of each one of the four movements is one of striking continuity; there is exceedingly little fitfulness of mood, but the music goes on and on, straight toward its goal, with but few interruptions. Now, Mr. Paur's very frequent changes of tempo sadly break up this splendid continuity and make a too merely kaleidoscopic impression: each change, as it comes about, throws cold water upon the enthusiasm aroused by the preceding phrase, instead of egging that enthusiasm on to a higher and over warmer pitch; the whole effect may be described as that of a perpetual beginning over again. We will not say that Mr. Paur's tempo did not in every case (with one important exception) fit the particular phrase to which he applied it to a nicety; take each separate phrase by itself, and Mr. Paur's tempo for it was perfectly comprehensible. But it did sever the bond which bound that phrase to its neighbor, and all

...the last movement, almost the minute of which went incomprehensibly slow. This movement has always stood in our mind as a sort of celestial counterpart of Berlioz's "Ride to the Abyss" in the "Damnation de Faust;" it might be called, by analogy, a Ride to the Empyrean." Apart from the intrinsic beauty of its themes, the enormous effect it produces comes from two characteristics—velocity and persistency. It goes like the wind; it is full of ideal galloping, express-train clickety-click; anything you please that is associated with speed. That persistent violin figure in the accompaniment means speed, and nothing but speed; and, by the way, this same figure is by no means easy to play at Mr. Paur's slow tempo; it takes consummate virtuosity to make a bow "jump" as slow as that! Now, Mr. Paur seems to do all in his power to knock this idea of speed in the head, and to substitute for it the idea of weight—weight of tone, weight of movement, weight of emphasis. We cannot but think this distorts the movement from its true character.

Mme. Nordica sang the air from Massenet's "Hérodiade" in admirable style and with a purity of feeling very different from the oversensuous passionateness some singers are too prone to infuse into the piece; we have often heard the air sung with a fervor of passion that might lead the suspiciously inclined to question whether the young Salomé's feelings toward the Prophet were not an exemplification of one of the most regrettable phases of "curatolatry." Mme. Nordica, on the other hand, sang it with just the right pure expression. In the ever-great "Abscheulicher!" too, she did much that was signally fine; perhaps the scene still overweighs her powers a little—whose does it not?—but she made some exceedingly strong points in it, and her conception of the music is excellent. She was enthusiastically applauded and recalled after both numbers.

Philadelphia Abend-Post.

Dienstag, 24. Oktober 1893.

Boston Symphonie Orcher. Dieses berühmte Orchester wird unter Leitung seines neuen Dirigenten, Herrn Emil Paur, während des fünf Konzerte in der Academy of Music geben, das erste am Donnerstag Abend, den 9. November. Tickets nebst reservirten Sitzen werden für die fünf Konzerte für $3.50, $5 und $7 verkauft. Die $5 und $7 Tickets werden am Montag, den 30. Oktober um 10 Uhr Morgens in der Academy of Music verstetigert und die übrig gebliebenen, sowie die $3.50 Tickets werden am Dienstag, den 31. Oktober zu gewöhnlichen Preisen von 8 Uhr Morgens an verkauft werden. Als Solisten bei diesen Konzerten fungiren Mme. Emma Eames, Herr Max Heinrich, der rühmlichst bekannte Liedersänger und der Violin-Virtuose Herr Franz Kneisel.

...TEMAN'S RECORD.

OCTOBER 23, 1893.

PAUR ADVANCING.

His Second Concert Shows Distinctly Stronger Work.

The programme of Saturday was broad and varied enough to suit any exacting auditor; it contained much of the dramatic element, and the Slavonic vein of the Dvorak rhapsody found a good counterpoise in the Hungarian flavor of Schubert's great symphony in C major. That this dramatic element was always fully brought out cannot be said, but there was not a measure in the concert that was slovenly, and every thought was so clearly expressed that the intention of the composer was always easily followed.

The Volkmann overture ("Richard III.") began somewhat too deliberately; one cannot imagine a phlegmatic Duke of Gloster. From the beginning of the battle, however, all went well, and there was adequate power and vehemence; the fanfares rang out with martial effect, and the shock of combat was portrayed with appropriate fire. The old Scotch tune of "The Campbells are Comin'" was given crisply and established the warlike atmosphere, in spite of its being dragged in by the composer about a century too soon. Not only did Volkmann err in calling this "an old English war song," but he committed the strangest of anachronisms, for the battle of Bosworth was fought in 1485, while the Scotch tune was not written until 1568; but music, heavenly maid, is not to be fettered by dates.

After the overture came the attraction which had crowded the hall to repletion—Madame Nordica. The famous air from Massenet's "Herodiade" ("Il est Doux, il est Bon") suited her style well, yet there was not entire satisfaction in her work, for there seemed to be more of effort in her singing than is usual, and in the high note of the climax there was aberration from pitch, which was also perceptible in the finale of the Beethoven aria given later in the concert. The aria by Leonora from "Fidelio" was, however, sung with much intelligence and its dramatic contrasts well preserved, even if the Materna or Lehmann standard was not attained. Applause, recalls and floral tributes followed the conclusion of the numbers, as a matter of course.

The finest of the Schubert symphonies ended the programme. In every measure the C major symphony shows that Schubert thought vocally; musical ideas come into the mind of a composer through some definite media of tone; thus Schumann thought piano, and one hears the piano even in his great orchestral poems; Beethoven always had the orchestra in his mind's eye, and even his sonatas and string quartettes suggest the orchestra; but Schubert's musical fancies were linked to the human voice, and whether it be a piano work, a string quartette or a symphony, one hears a set of beautiful songs without much thematic development such as would befit an instrumental work. The fact that the development is slight and the themes very striking, may be a full justification for Mr. Paur's omitting the repeat in the performance, before the development. The consensus of modern musical thought is against the repetitions which our forefathers bore with exemplary patience. It may be that in the near future the repeat of the first three divisions (the themes before development) of a sonata-movement may be abolished even in Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven.

The introduction to the symphony was taken quicker than is usual. The horn-player gave his theme without blemish, and the orchestra took it up with good ensemble The "non troppo" of the chief theme seemed to be disregarded, and it went at a flying pace but clearly throughout. The coda of this movement was splendidly played, especially in the important trombone phrases, which cross each other like the clash of swords. Never was a sterner dialogue written between tenor and base trombones; one can recall a time years ago when the phrases were repressed until they became mere horn passages, but it was not so on this occasion. If ever there was a wood-wind symphony this was one, and the oboe is almost continually in the foreground; it was splendidly played in this work, especially in the second and fourth movements. Not less commendable was the clarinette work, which abounds with important phrases, amounting to obbligato passages.

There were some notably fine points of reading in the symphony; the powerful crescendo just preceding the awe-inspiring pause (a startling rest of one measure) in the second movement was well worked up, and the cello work after it was finely given too; the scherzo was brilliant throughout, but the finale was the crowning effect, for here the conductor threw reserve to the winds, and the fanfares which began the movement sounded like the approach of a victorious army, the chief theme was as brilliant as one could wish (the first violins showed their mettle here), and when it came to those mighty four strokes of the full orchestra, that amazing picture of massive power, picturesque because of its very monotony, titanic in its constant reiteration, the climax of the concert was reached. This movement abundantly proved that it is not to be King Log after King Stork, in our orchestral matters, but one could wish such moments of fire and enthusiasm to come more frequently. Perhaps they will, after conductor and orchestra have fully formed acquaintance.

Louis C. Elson.

THE STAR ... BROOKLYN

WEDNESDAY EVENING, OCT. 25, 1893.

PHILHARMONIC CONCERTS.

The concerts to be given at the Academy of Music under the auspices of the Philharmonic Society, will prove a potent attraction to music lovers, and promise to be fully as successful as ever. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, in point of excellence, has few equals among the great orchestras of the present day on either side of the Atlantic. Its appearance under the new conductor, Emil Paur, will add to the interest of the coming season. Mme. Emma Eames, Mme. Lillian Nordica, and Franz Kneisel are some of the soloists already engaged. The dates of the public rehearsals and concerts are Nov. 10 and 11, Dec. 15 and 16, Jan. 12 and 13, Feb. 9 and 10, and March 30 and 31. The sale of subscription tickets for both series opens tomorrow (Thursday) morning at Chandler's, 300 Fulton street.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 25, 1893.

Here is the program of the second Symphony concert:

Overture, "Richard III."..... Volkmann
"Il est doux," from "Hérodiade"..... Massenet
Mrs. Nordica.
Slavonic Rhapsody, No. 2, op. 45..... Dvorák
First time.
"Komm Hoffnung," from "Fidelio"..... Beethoven
Mrs. Nordica.
C major Symphony..... Schubert

There is little to be said about this concert. The dismal overture of Volkmann is familiar here. The rhapsody by Dvorák disappointed expectation; it seems labored and there is little freshness in it; what he had to say, he said well, but he might better have said nothing.

The playing of the orchestra was smoother than at the the first concert; the conductor and the men are better acquainted. Mr. Paur was painstaking and earnest.

Mr. Paur seems to me to be a man of episodes.

He seems to be chiefly anxious concerning mint and anise and cummin.

He might not see the poetry of motion in the flight of a locomotive if he were aware that there was a smutch on any portion of the brass work.

Mrs. Nordica sang the air from "Hérodiade" in excellent manner, though a little more passion would not have been out of place. The air from "Fidelio" was beyond her ability.

* * *

The program of the concert of the 28th is as follows:

Symphony, F major, op. 9..... Goetz
Serenade..... Volkmann
Overture, "Leonore," No. 3..... Beethoven

* * *

Mr. Kneisel's right hand is lame, and the quartet concert announced for to-morrow night is postponed until the 30th.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, OCTOBER 23, 1893.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the second Symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Volkmann: Overture to "Richard III.," Opus 68.
Beethoven: Recitative, "Abscheulicher! wo eilst du hin?" and Aria, "Komm Hoffnung, lass den letzten Stern," from Fidelio."
Dvorak: Slavische Rhapsodie No. 2, in G minor, Opus 45.
Massenet: Recitative, "Celui dont la parole," and Air, "Il est doux, il est bon," from "Hérodiade."
Schubert: Symphony No. 9, in C major.
Mme. Nordica was the singer.

The hall was crowded, the side aisles being filled with people standing; we can hardly remember a season that began so early with full houses. And the large audience was generally enthusiastic, too, especially over Mme. Nordica's singing.

The performance of Volkmann's "Richard III." overture showed both conductor and orchestra in the finest light; never before have we heard so much meaning given this overture. It is essentially a dramatic composition, one in which vehemence of expression and picturesque suggestiveness far outweigh what of musical form and development there may be in it. Mr. Paur takes it in a strongly dramatic way, giving its vehemence and dramatic coloring their full value, but without loss of musical distinctness and coherence. The slow introduction and all the "Bosworth Field" business near the middle of the work produced a very striking effect, and the serener mood of the peroration made a fine contrast with what had preceded it; indeed, Mr. Paur's reading of these closing measures in F-sharp major was exceedingly beautiful and expressive; one could well fancy them a musical rendering of Richmond's,

"Proclaim a pardon to the soldiers fled,
That in submission will return to us:
And then, as we have ta'en the sacrament,
We will unite the white rose and the red—
Smile heaven upon this fair conjunction,
That long hath frown'd upon their enmity!

In a word, this is the first time we have found the overture otherwise than tiresome and weak; Mr. Paur has shown it to us as a poetically imaginative composition wanting neither in coherency nor dramatic force. The orchestra played it magnificently.

In the Dvorák Slavonic Rhapsody we must confess ourselves as sadly disappointed, after the enthusiastic way we had heard it spoken of by members of the orchestra and others who knew it. We cannot see that the work rises above the general level of a Liszt Hungarian Rhapsody; and, though parts of it have undeniably a certain warm emotional charm—an element not uncommon with Dvorák—this hardly makes up for the absence of Liszt's brilliancy and his peculiar touch of genius. The Czech melodies on which it is founded seem to appeal to one more by their quaint, exotic flavor than by their musical beauty, and the construction of the work is as slight and loose-jointed as may be. One point, however, may be spoken of with genuine enthusiasm: the orchestration. Here Dvorák has even surpassed himself; the scoring is not only rich and euphonious, but varied and full of individual aroma. The performance was admirable.

With the Schubert symphony Mr. Paur came upon more ticklish ground. The great work is familiar to all of us; we have been brought up on it, and know its every turning. The orchestra played for the most part splendidly; here Mr. Paur gave good earnest of what he can do as a disciplinarian. Apart from a slip or two in individual solo instruments, such as cannot be laid to the conductor's charge, the performance left little to be desired in a technical way: vigor and precision of attack, excellence of dynamic balance, and a fine blending of the various voices of the orchestra, were the rule; it was a real pleasure to hear the wind instruments make their entries together so evenly and cleanly. Neither was there any lack of fire and expressiveness. Still, it were stretching a point, to call the performance of the glorious work an effective one.

To us, at least, Mr. Paur's reading of each one of the four movements seemed to lack totality of conception; there was an immense deal of attention paid to (would-be) effective details, but very little strong general effectiveness. Mr. Paur follows the favorite modern plan of changing the tempo very often, as the character and expression of the music changes; and it must be admitted that his modifications are not excessive in degree, compared with similar things we have heard here before; in fact, he is rather moderate in this matter than otherwise. But somehow his frequent changes have a disturbing effect upon the listener; they continually rouse you out of the mood into which the music has thrown you; they distract your attention from the composition, instead of riveting it still more firmly upon it. If ever there were a long symphonic composition in which the element of strongly marked and pregnant rhythm predominated, this symphony of Schubert's is that one; it and Beethoven's seventh may be called the "dance symphonies" par excellence. Each movement has its own well defined rhythmic character, and adheres to this character with singular persistency. Of course there are marked rhythmic contrasts; the second theme in the first movement, for instance, is in an utterly different rhythm from the first; a more striking rhythmic contrast than that between the Trio and the Scherzo could hardly be desired. But each theme sticks to and emphasized its own particular rhythm with great pertinacity throughout its whole development and working out; there is none of that successive presentation of the same theme under various rhythmic aspects that one finds in many more modern compositions. The general aspect of each one of the four movements is one of striking continuity; there is exceedingly little fitfulness of mood, but the music goes on and on, straight toward its goal, with but few interruptions. Now, Mr. Paur's very frequent changes of tempo sadly break up this splendid continuity and make a too merely kaleidoscopic impression: each change, as it comes about, throws cold water upon the enthusiasm aroused by the preceding phrase, instead of egging that enthusiasm on to a higher and ever warmer pitch; the whole effect may be described as that of a perpetual beginning over again. We will not say that Mr. Paur's tempo did not in every case (with one important exception) fit the particular phrase to which he applied it to a nicety; take each separate phrase by itself, and Mr. Paur's tempo for it was perfectly comprehensible. But it did sever the bond which bound that phrase to its neighbor, and all

The exception to which we have referred was the last movement, almost the whole of which went incomprehensibly slow. This movement has always stood in our mind as a sort of celestial counterpart of Berlioz's "Ride to the Abyss" in the "Damnation de Faust;" it might be called, by analogy, a Ride to the Empyrean." Apart from the intrinsic beauty of its themes, the enormous effect it produces comes from two characteristics—velocity and persistency. It goes like the wind; it is full of ideal galloping, express-train clickety-click; anything you please that is associated with speed. That persistent violin figure in the accompaniment means speed, and nothing but speed; and, by the way, this same figure is by no means easy to play at Mr. Paur's slow tempo; it takes consummate virtuosity to make a bow "jump" as slow as that! Now, Mr. Paur seems to do all in his power to knock this idea of speed in the head, and to substitute for it the idea of weight—weight of tone, weight of movement, weight of emphasis. We cannot but think this distorts the movement from its true character.

Mme. Nordica sang the air from Massenet's 'Hérodiade" in admirable style and with a purity of feeling very different from the oversensuous passionateness some singers are too prone to infuse into the piece; we have often heard the air sung with a fervor of passion that might lead the suspiciously inclined to question whether the young Salomé's feelings toward the Prophet were not an exemplification of one of the most regrettable phases of "curatolatry." Mme. Nordica, on the other hand, sang it with just the right pure expression. In the ever-great "Abscheulicher!" too, she did much that was signally fine; perhaps the scene still overweighs her powers a little—whose does it not?—but she made some exceedingly strong points in it, and her conception of the music is excellent. She was enthusiastically applauded and recalled after both numbers.

Philadelphia Abend-Post.

Dienstag, 24. Oktober 1893.

Boston Symphonie Orcher. Dieses berühmte Orchester wird unter Leitung seines neuen Dirigenten, Herrn Emil Paur, während des funf Konzerte in der Academy of Music geben, das erste am Donnerstag Abend, den 9. November. Tickets nebst reservirten Sitzen werden für die fünf Konzerte für $3.50, $5 und $7 verkauft. Die $5 und $7 Tickets werden am Montag, den 30. Oktober um 10 Uhr Morgens in der Academy of Music versteigert und die übrig gebliebenen, sowie die $3.50 Tickets werden am Dienstag, den 31. Oktober zu gewöhnlichen Preisen von 8 Uhr Morgens an verkauft werden. Als Solisten bei diesen Konzerten fungiren Mme. Emma Eames, Herr Max Heinrich, der rühmlichst bekannte Liedersänger und der Violin-Virtuose Herr Franz Kneisel.

Boston Evening Record.

OCTOBER 23, 1893.

PAUR ADVANCING.

His Second Concert Shows Distinctly Stronger Work.

The programme of Saturday was broad and varied enough to suit any exacting auditor; it contained much of the dramatic element, and the Slavonic vein of the Dvorak rhapsody found a good counterpoise in the Hungarian flavor of Schubert's great symphony in C major. That this dramatic element was always fully brought out cannot be said, but there was not a measure in the concert that was slovenly, and every thought was so clearly expressed that the intention of the composer was always easily followed.

The Volkmann overture ("Richard III.") began somewhat too deliberately; one cannot imagine a phlegmatic Duke of Gloster. From the beginning of the battle, however, all went well, and there was adequate power and vehemence; the fanfares rang out with martial effect, and the shock of combat was portrayed with appropriate fire. The old Scotch tune of "The Campbells are Comin'" was given crisply and established the warlike atmosphere, in spite of its being dragged in by the composer about a century too soon. Not only did Volkmann err in calling this "an old English war song," but he committed the strangest of anachronisms, for the battle of Bosworth was fought in 1485, while the Scotch tune was not written until 1568; but music, heavenly maid, is not to be fettered by dates.

After the overture came the attraction which had crowded the hall to repletion—Madame Nordica. The famous air from Massenet's "Herodiade" ("Il est Doux, il est Bon") suited her style well, yet there was not entire satisfaction in her work, for there seemed to be more of effort in her singing than is usual, and in the high note of the climax there was aberration from pitch, which was also perceptible in the finale of the Beethoven aria given later in the concert. The aria by Leonora from "Fidelio" was, however, sung with much intelligence and its dramatic contrasts well preserved, even if the Materna or Lehmann standard was not attained. Applause, recalls and floral tributes followed the conclusion of the numbers, as a matter of course.

The finest of the Schubert symphonies ended the programme. In every measure the C major symphony shows that Schubert thought vocally; musical ideas come into the mind of a composer through some definite media of tone; thus Schumann thought piano, and one hears the piano even in his great orchestral poems; Beethoven always had the orchestra in his mind's eye, and even his sonatas and string quartettes suggest the orchestra; but Schubert's musical fancies were linked to the human voice, and whether it be a piano work, a string quartette or a symphony, one hears a set of beautiful songs without much thematic development such as would befit an instrumental work. The fact that the development is slight and the themes very striking, may be a full justification for Mr. Paur's omitting the repeat in the performance, before the development. The consensus of modern musical thought is against the repetitions which our forefathers bore with exemplary patience. It may be that in the near future the repeat of the first three divisions (the themes before development) of a sonata-movement may be abolished even in Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven.

The introduction to the symphony was taken quicker than is usual. The horn-player gave his theme without blemish, and the orchestra took it up with good ensemble The "non troppo" of the chief theme seemed to be disregarded, and it went at a flying pace but clearly throughout. The coda of this movement was splendidly played, especially in the important trombone phrases, which cross each other like the clash of swords. Never was a sterner dialogue written between tenor and base trombones; one can recall a time years ago when the phrases were repressed until they became mere horn passages, but it was not so on this occasion. If ever there was a wood-wind symphony this was one, and the oboe is almost continually in the foreground; it was splendidly played in this work, especially in the second and fourth movements. Not less commendable was the clarinette work, which abounds with important phrases, amounting to obbligato passages.

There were some notably fine points of reading in the symphony; the powerful crescendo just preceding the awe-inspiring pause (a startling rest of one measure) in the second movement was well worked up, and the cello work after it was finely given too; the scherzo was brilliant throughout, but the finale was the crowning effect, for here the conductor threw reserve to the winds, and the fanfares which began the movement sounded like the approach of a victorious army, the chief theme was as brilliant as one could wish (the first violins showed their mettle here), and when it came to those mighty four strokes of the full orchestra, that amazing picture of massive power, picturesque because of its very monotony, titanic in its constant reiteration, the climax of the concert was reached. This movement abundantly proved that it is not to be King Log after King Stork, in our orchestral matters, but one could wish such moments of fire and enthusiasm to come more frequently. Perhaps they will, after conductor and orchestra have fully formed acquaintance.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

THE STANDARD UNION.

BROOKLYN

WEDNESDAY EVENING, OCT. 25, 1893.

PHILHARMONIC CONCERTS.

The concerts to be given at the Academy of Music under the auspices of the Philharmonic Society, will prove a potent attraction to music lovers, and promise to be fully as successful as ever. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, in point of excellence, has few equals among the great orchestras of the present day on either side of the Atlantic. Its appearance under the new conductor, Emil Paur, will add to the interest of the coming season. Mme. Emma Eames, Mme. Lillian Nordica, and Franz Kneisel are some of the soloists already engaged. The dates of the public rehearsals and concerts are Nov. 10 and 11, Dec. 15 and 16, Jan. 12 and 13, Feb. 9 and 10, and March 30 and 31. The sale of subscription tickets for both series opens to-morrow (Thursday) morning at Chandler's, 300 Fulton street.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 25, 1893.

Here is the program of the second Symphony concert:

Overture, "Richard III."..... Volkmann
"Il est doux," from "Hérodiade"..... Massenet
Mrs. Nordica.
Slavonic Rhapsody, No. 2, op. 45..... Dvorák
First time.
"Komm Hoffnung," from "Fidelio"..... Beethoven
Mrs. Nordica.
C major Symphony..... Schubert

There is little to be said about this concert. The dismal overture of Volkmann is familiar here. The rhapsody by Dvorák disappointed expectation; it seems labored and there is little freshness in it; what he had to say, he said well, but he might better have said nothing.

The playing of the orchestra was smoother than at the the first concert; the conductor and the men are better acquainted. Mr. Paur was painstaking and earnest.

Mr. Paur seems to me to be a man of episodes.

He seems to be chiefly anxious concerning mint and anise and cummin.

He might not see the poetry of motion in the flight of a locomotive if he were aware that there was a smutch on any portion of the brass work.

Mrs. Nordica sang the air from "Hérodiade" in excellent manner, though a little more passion would not have been out of place. The air from "Fidelio" was beyond her ability.

* * *

The program of the concert of the 28th is as follows:

Symphony, F major, op. 9..... Goetz
Serenade..... Volkmann
Overture, "Leonore," No. 3..... Beethoven

* * *

Mr. Kneisel's right hand is lame, and the quartet concert announced for to-morrow night is postponed until the 30th.

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL.

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 26, 1893.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

First Appearance of Herr Emil Paur as Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in This City.

The ever-welcome Boston Symphony Orchestra made its first appearance for this season at Infantry Hall last night. The concerts of this unrivalled organization are a prominent feature in the musical life of this city, where—to the credit of Providence be it said—it is heard a greater number of times each year than in any other New England city, save its Boston home. An additional point of interest last night was the fact that a stranger would occupy the place which Mr. Arthur Nikisch has so ably filled for several seasons. We know that Mr. Nikisch had grave faults as a conductor, for we have been assured to that effect by a small coterie of Boston critics in whom all musical knowledge is supposed (by themselves) to be vested; yet he managed, somehow, to leave the impression here and all over the country that he knew pretty thoroughly what he was about at the conductor's desk, and to set a standard that most of those who follow him will find it difficult to equal. So that a very natural curiosity was evident last night to see his successor and to compare both the personality and work of the two men. A fair opportunity was presented, as all the instrumental numbers given last night have been performed here under Nikisch's baton. The programme was as follows:

Ludwig van Beethoven.....
.....Symphony No. 5, in C minor, Op. 67
I. Allegro con brio (C minor).
II. Andante con moto (A-flat major).
III. Allegro (C minor).
IV. Allegro (C major).
Jules Massenet.....
...Recitative and Air, from "Herodiade"
Volkmann..Serenade, No. 3, in D minor, Op. 69
Lugwig van Beethoven.....
.....Recitative and Aria, from "Fidelio"
Cherubini.....Overture, "Anacreon"

Herr Emil Paur, the orchestra's new conductor, brings to his task undoubtedly the equipment of a thorough musician, as well as a high reputation won in the musical centres of the Old World. It is too early to attempt a fair criticism of his work in his present position, for there has not been time yet for him to get thoroughly acquainted with his instrumental forces, or for the players to readily understand his ways and wishes. Impressions only can be recorded, subject to such verification or change as further acquaintance may compel. His manner of conducting is as opposite to that of his predecessor as possible. Nikisch was the embodiment of reserved force, his most emphatic motions hardly disturbing his erect and steady poise, yet seeming to carry every instrument at the tip of his baton. Paur conducts with both hands, head and body. He emphasizes every point with profuse gesticulation, and works up to his climaxes with astounding gymnastics. It is a distraction to the listener to have the conductor so much in evidence. Though the musical ability of the men may be equally great, there was a pleasure in Nikisch's quiet but magnetic manner which his successor cannot afford. Herr Paur seems to drive the players—to over urge them. There was apparent last night a coarseness of tone in the playing of the orchestra never heard before, due undoubtedly to the tremendous energy of the conductor's manner. He seems fond, too, of strong dynamic effects and startling contrasts, and differs widely with Nikisch in the matter of tempo. This was strikingly apparent in the andante of Beethoven's symphony. Without discussing the precise meaning of the Italian phrase (andante con moto) it may be said that the movement, as played last night, was almost slow enough to be called adagio. Yet the effect was undeniably beautiful. In fact, the music is in itself too charming to be spoiled by any sort of treatment, and tempos must always remain a matter of dispute to be settled by each individual's taste and temperament. Herr Paur was cordially received by the audience, and found a pleasant surprise awaiting him at his music desk, which was very handsomely dressed with smilax, pinks and roses.

The playing of the orchestra was of its usual high degree of excellence, except, as stated, for an occasional roughness of tone, which seemed to be caused by the efforts of the men to keep pace in their playing with the constant spurring of their leader. The 'cello solo in Volkman's serenade was delightfully played by Mr. Alwin Schroeder.

The vocal soloist was Madame Lillian Nordica, who never sang better in Providence than last night. Her voice, always a beautiful one, seems to have gained in power within the last year. The aria "Komm Hoffnung, lass den letzten Stern," from Beethoven's "Fidelio" calls for both very high and low notes, but Madame Nordica's superb organ answered unfalteringly to every demand of the score. It is a pleasure to hear, now and then, a singer who can hold her own against an orchestral crescendo without screaming. Power is a valuable thing in a voice, but all kinds of loud noises are not music. It goes without saying that both her numbers were sung as only a truly great artist could sing them. The whole programme was of a highly interesting character, and every number drew liberal applause. The audience was somewhat smaller than usual at a Symphony concert, not more than three-quarters of the seats being taken.

THE EVENING BULLETIN.

PUBLISHED BY THE
PROVIDENCE JOURNAL COMPANY,

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 26, 1893.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

First Appearance of Herr Emil Paur as Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in This City.

The ever-welcome Boston Symphony Orchestra made its first appearance for this season at Infantry Hall last night. The concerts of this unrivalled organization are a prominent feature in the musical life of this city, where—to the credit of Providence be it said—it is heard a greater number of times each year than in any other New England city, save its Boston home. An additional point of interest last night was the fact that a stranger would occupy the place which Mr. Arthur Nikisch has so ably filled for several seasons. We know that Mr. Nikisch had grave faults as a conductor, for we have been assured to that effect by a small coterie of Boston critics in whom all musical knowledge is supposed (by themselves) to be vested; yet he managed, somehow, to leave the impression here and all over the country that he knew pretty thoroughly what he was about at the conductor's desk, and to set a standard that most of those who follow him will find it difficult to equal. So that a very natural curiosity was evident last night to see his successor and to compare both the personality and work of the two men. A fair opportunity was presented, as all the instrumental numbers given last night have been performed here under Nikisch's baton. The programme was as follows:

Ludwig van Beethoven.....
.....Symphony No. 5, in C minor, Op. 67
I. Allegro con brio (C minor).
II. Andante con moto (A-flat major).
III. Allegro (C minor).
IV. Allegro (C major).
Jules Massenet.....
...Recitative and Air, from "Herodiade"
Volkmann..Serenade, No. 3, in D minor, Op. 69
Lugwig van Beethoven.....
.....Recitative and Aria, from "Fidelio"
Cherubini.....Overture, "Anacreon"

Herr Emil Paur, the orchestra's new conductor, brings to his task undoubtedly the equipment of a thorough musician, as well as a high reputation won in the musical centres of the Old World. It is too early to attempt a fair criticism of his work in his present position, for there has not been time yet for him to get thoroughly acquainted with his instrumental forces, or for the players to readily understand his ways and wishes. Impressions only can be recorded, subject to such verification or change as further acquaintance may compel. His manner of conducting is as opposite to that of his predecessor as possible. Nikisch was the embodiment of reserved force, his most emphatic motions hardly disturbing his erect and steady poise, yet seeming to carry every instrument at the tip of his baton. Paur conducts with both hands, head and body. He emphasizes every point with profuse gesticulation, and works up to his climaxes with astounding gymnastics. It is a distraction to the listener to have the conductor so much in evidence. Though the musical ability of the men may be equally great, there was a pleasure in Nikisch's quiet but magnetic manner which his successor cannot afford. Herr Paur seems to drive the players—to over urge them. There was apparent last night a coarseness of tone in the playing of the orchestra never heard before, due undoubtedly to the tremendous energy of the conductor's manner. He seems fond, too, of strong dynamic effects and startling contrasts, and differs widely with Nikisch in the matter of tempo. This was strikingly apparent in the andante of Beethoven's symphony. Without discussing the precise meaning of the Italian phrase (andante con moto) it may be said that the movement, as played last night, was almost slow enough to be called adagio. Yet the effect was undeniably beautiful. In fact, the music is in itself too charming to be spoiled by any sort of treatment, and tempos must always remain a matter of dispute to be settled by each individual's taste and temperament. Herr Paur was cordially received by the audience, and found a pleasant surprise awaiting him at his music desk, which was very handsomely dressed with smilax, pinks and roses.

The playing of the orchestra was of its usual high degree of excellence, except, as stated, for an occasional roughness of tone, which seemed to be caused by the efforts of the men to keep pace in their playing with the constant spurring of their leader. The 'cello solo in Volkman's serenade was delightfully played by Mr. Alwin Schroeder.

The vocal soloist was Madame Lillian Nordica, who never sang better in Providence than last night. Her voice, always a beautiful one, seems to have gained in power within the last year. The aria "Komm Hoffnung, lass den letzten Stern," from Beethoven's "Fidelio" calls for both very high and low notes, but Madame Nordica's superb organ answered unfalteringly to every demand of the score. It is a pleasure to hear, now and then, a singer who can hold her own against an orchestral crescendo without screaming. Power is a valuable thing in a voice, but all kinds of loud noises are not music. It goes without saying that both her numbers were sung as only a truly great artist could sing them. The whole programme was of a highly interesting character, and every number drew liberal applause. The audience was somewhat smaller than usual at a Symphony concert, not more than three-quarters of the seats being taken.

DAILY AND WEEKLY.
BUSINESS OFFICE, 7 Weybosset St.
Telephone 1877-2.
EDITORIAL ROOMS, 25 South Water St.
Telephone 1877-3.

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 26, 1893.

HERR EMIL PAUR.

A LARGE BUT CRITICAL AUDIENCE GREETS HIM IN PROVIDENCE.

He Could Not Arouse Much Enthusiasm. The First of the Series of Boston Symphony Concerts.

Last night the musical people of Providence were well represented at the first of the series of Boston Symphony concerts. There was a very large audience. It was a very critical audience—that is apparently so. For that only can explain the lack of enthusiasm which the audience showed for Herr Emil Paur.

Of course the interest of the audience was in the new director. Reports had come from Boston and from across the water that he was a man of marked individuality, a strong personality, and withal a thorough musician. A Providence audience ought to be very conservative. But that does not atone for the scanty, reluctant applause that was given to the very masterly and vigorous interpretation of the Fifth Beethoven Symphony. Perhaps they thought it was too vigorously given.

The first impression that the new director gives, probably, is that of strength, a decided, positive temperament. This is no romantic, soft featured idol that poses before the public's admiration, but a man of strength, and of marked strength. His conducting is a study. From the time he comes on to the stage till he is gone from your sight he seems surcharged with magnetic strength. He moves quickly and almost awkwardly. In fact, until you are familiar with them his motions seem very awkward. But soon that awkwardness becomes the outspoken manifestation of the man's power, and you feel with the orchestra, every nervous toss of that shaggy head, every impatient sway of that awkward body, and then you appreciate the man's personality.

Played as One Man.

It was evident after the first vigorous attack of the violins of the opening famous four notes of the fifth symphony that Herr Paur had complete control over the orchestra; that he had gathered up, so soon, many of the ragged ends left behind by Mr. Nikisch. The orchestra played like one man and appeared in perfect sympathy with the director.

The familiar fifth symphony had in many places an unfamiliar ring: the tempo had been quickened, the drums and brass made more prominent, and whether this is an improvement is a question. Among many who know the symphony as an old friend the feeling was that it was not in good taste while some of the less conservative welcomed the change as a direct improvement. At all events Herr Paur demonstrated last night that he was a magnificent conductor, that he had a splendid control over his men and that he is not without impulsiveness and passion.

Madame Nordica was the soloist, and sang gloriously. Especially delightful was her singing of Beethoven's recitative and aria from first act of "Fidelio," which Madame Nordica rendered with a dramatic fire and taste that made one long to hear more.

Mr. Alvin Schroeder gave an artistic and masterly 'cello solo, Volkman's serenade in D minor, which brought forth merited applause.

OPENED THE SEASON.

Boston Symphony Orchestra and Nordica Captivate the Audience.

It was like extending the hand of welcome to a treasured friend to sit in Infantry Hall last night and hail the reappearance of that most popular of American musical organizations, the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The greeting given the new conductor, Emil Paur, was most impressive. He scored a big point of favor the moment his genial face and towering form came into view, and throughout the entertainment he was accorded a remarkable amount of notice. He is a decided contrast to the man he succeeded, Mr. Nikisch. His looks, gestures, manner and influence are entirely different. His way of working the orchestra is original and interesting. He seems a figure of joints and springs, and makes motions enough for a whole class in gymnastics. He employs his arms, his head and his body, and while his signals are peculiar and somewhat amusing, his earnestness relieves his agile labors from what might in some cases be regarded as grotesqueness.

One feature of his conducting is the style in which he seems to pull out the varying orchestral effects from the several sections of his big force. He certainly produced some beautiful tones, and every part of his interpreting was exact and luminous. He was spoken of by all as one who would be a much more pleasing leader than was Nikisch.

The orchestra never needs detailed compliment, so well known is the splendid character of its performances. It played Beethoven's Fifth Symphony with magnetic richness of melody and rhythm, and in the overture to "Anacreon" the exquisite violin movements of that composition were finely executed. Herr Alwin Schroeder gave a charming violincello solo as the song of a serenade, and he was, as usual, applauded wildly.

Mme. Nordica sang two arias fascinatingly, receiving three recalls on one and four on the other. Her voice never was in sweeter or more elastic condition, nor did she in Providence ever sing with happier taste.

The second concert will be given on Nov. 22.

THE STANDARD UNION.

WILLIAM BERRI. MURAT HALSTEAD.

THURSDAY EVENING, OCTOBER 26, 1893.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

A HEAVY ADVANCE SALE OF SEATS FOR THE CONCERTS.

The sale of seats for the concerts and rehearsals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which are to take place at the Academy of Music, under the auspices of the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn, opened this morning at Chandler's, 300 Fulton street. From 3 o'clock until 8, when the sale of tickets began, a long line of messenger boys and music lovers formed outside Chandler's, all bent on securing the best possible seats for the series. The advance sale to-day was very heavy.

During the season five concerts will be given on Saturday evenings, and five public rehearsals on the Friday afternoons preceding the concerts. The date of the latter are Nov. 11, Dec. 16, Jan. 13, Feb. 10 and March 31. The soloists will be Mme. Emma Eames, Mme. Lillian Nordica and Franz Kneisel, as well as others. The society anticipate a most successful season.

Philadelphia Abend-Post.

Mittwoch, 25. Oktober 1893.

Boston Symphonie Orchester. Dieses berühmte Orchester wird unter Leitung seines neuen Dirigenten, Herrn Emil Paur, während des fünf Konzerte in der Academy of Music geben, das erste am Donnerstag Abend, den 9. November. Tickets nebst reservirten Sitzen werden für die fünf Konzerte für $3.50, $5 und $7 verkauft. Die $5 und $7 Tickets werden am Montag, den 30. Oktober um 10 Uhr Morgens in der Academy of Music versteigert und die übrig gebliebenen, sowie die $3.50 Tickets werden am Dienstag, den 31. Oktober zu gewöhnlichen Preisen von 8 Uhr Morgens an verkauft werden. Als Solisten bei diesen Konzerten fungiren Mme. Emma Eames, Herr Max Heinrich, der rühmlichst bekannte Liedersänger und der Violin-Virtuose Herr Franz Kneisel.

[32]

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL.

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 26, 1893.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

First Appearance of Herr Emil Paur as Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in This City.

The ever-welcome Boston Symphony Orchestra made its first appearance for this season at Infantry Hall last night. The concerts of this unrivalled organization are a prominent feature in the musical life of this city, where—to the credit of Providence be it said—it is heard a greater number of times each year than in any other New England city, save its Boston home. An additional point of interest last night was the fact that a stranger would occupy the place which Mr. Arthur Nikisch has so ably filled for several seasons. We know that Mr. Nikisch had grave faults as a conductor, for we have been assured to that effect by a small coterie of Boston critics in whom all musical knowledge is supposed (by themselves) to be vested; yet he managed, somehow, to leave the impression here and all over the country that he knew pretty thoroughly what he was about at the conductor's desk, and to set a standard that most of those who follow him will find it difficult to equal. So that a very natural curiosity was evident last night to see his successor and to compare both the personality and work of the two men. A fair opportunity was presented, as all the instrumental numbers given last night have been performed here under Nikisch's baton. The programme was as follows:

Ludwig van Beethoven.....
.....Symphony No. 5, in C minor, Op. 67
I. Allegro con brio (C minor).
II. Andante con moto (A-flat major).
III. Allegro (C minor).
IV. Allegro (C major).
Jules Massenet.....
...Recitative and Air, from "Herodiade"
Volkmann..Serenade, No. 3, in D minor, Op. 69
Lugwig van Beethoven.....
.....Recitative and Aria, from "Fidelio"
Cherubini.....Overture, "Anacreon"

Herr Emil Paur, the orchestra's new conductor, brings to his task undoubtedly the equipment of a thorough musician, as well as a high reputation won in the musical centres of the Old World. It is too early to attempt a fair criticism of his work in his present position, for there has not been time yet for him to get thoroughly acquainted with his instrumental forces, or for the players to readily understand his ways and wishes. Impressions only can be recorded, subject to such verification or change as further acquaintance may compel. His manner of conducting is as opposite to that of his predecessor as possible. Nikisch was the embodiment of reserved force, his most emphatic motions hardly disturbing his erect and steady poise, yet seeming to carry every instrument at the tip of his baton. Paur conducts with both hands, head and body. He emphasizes every point with profuse gesticulation, and works up to his climaxes with astounding gymnastics. It is a distraction to the listener to have the conductor so much in evidence. Though the musical ability of the men may be equally great, there was a pleasure in Nikisch's quiet but magnetic manner which his successor cannot afford. Herr Paur seems to drive the players—to over urge them. There was apparent last night a coarseness of tone in the playing of the orchestra never heard before, due undoubtedly to the tremendous energy of the conductor's manner. He seems fond, too, of strong dynamic effects and startling contrasts, and differs widely with Nikisch in the matter of tempo. This was strikingly apparent in the andante of Beethoven's symphony. Without discussing the precise meaning of the Italian phrase (andante con moto) it may be said that the movement, as played last night, was almost slow enough to be called adagio. Yet the effect was undeniably beautiful. In fact, the music is in itself too charming to be spoiled by any sort of treatment, and tempos must always remain a matter of dispute to be settled by each individual's taste and temperament. Herr Paur was cordially received by the audience, and found a pleasant surprise awaiting him at his music desk, which was very handsomely dressed with smilax, pinks and roses.

The playing of the orchestra was of its usual high degree of excellence, except, as stated, for an occasional roughness of tone, which seemed to be caused by the efforts of the men to keep pace in their playing with the constant spurring of their leader. The 'cello solo in Volkman's serenade was delightfully played by Mr. Alwin Schroeder.

The vocal soloist was Madame Lillian Nordica, who never sang better in Providence than last night. Her voice, always a beautiful one, seems to have gained in power within the last year. The aria "Komm Hoffnung, lass den letzten Stern," from Beethoven's "Fidelio" calls for both very high and low notes, but Madame Nordica's superb organ answered unfalteringly to every demand of the score. It is a pleasure to hear, now and then, a singer who can hold her own against an orchestral crescendo without screaming. Power is a valuable thing in a voice, but all kinds of loud noises are not music. It goes without saying that both her numbers were sung as only a truly great artist could sing them. The whole programme was of a highly interesting character, and every number drew liberal applause. The audience was somewhat smaller than usual at a Symphony concert, not more than three-quarters of the seats being taken.

THE EVENING BULLETIN.

PUBLISHED BY THE
PROVIDENCE JOURNAL COMPANY,

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 26, 1893.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

First Appearance of Herr Emil Paur as Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in This City.

The ever-welcome Boston Symphony Orchestra made its first appearance for this season at Infantry Hall last night. The concerts of this unrivalled organization are a prominent feature in the musical life of this city, where—to the credit of Providence be it said—it is heard a greater number of times each year than in any other New England city, save its Boston home. An additional point of interest last night was the fact that a stranger would occupy the place which Mr. Arthur Nikisch has so ably filled for several seasons. We know that Mr. Nikisch had grave faults as a conductor, for we have been assured to that effect by a small coterie of Boston critics in whom all musical knowledge is supposed (by themselves) to be vested; yet he managed, somehow, to leave the impression here and all over the country that he knew pretty thoroughly what he was about at the conductor's desk, and to set a standard that most of those who follow him will find it difficult to equal. So that a very natural curiosity was evident last night to see his successor and to compare both the personality and work of the two men. A fair opportunity was presented, as all the instrumental numbers given last night have been performed here under Nikisch's baton. The programme was as follows:

Ludwig van Beethoven.....
.....Symphony No. 5, in C minor, Op. 67
I. Allegro con brio (C minor).
II. Andante con moto (A-flat major).
III. Allegro (C minor).
IV. Allegro (C major).
Jules Massenet.....
...Recitative and Air, from "Herodiade"
Volkmann..Serenade, No. 3, in D minor, Op. 69
Lugwig van Beethoven.....
.....Recitative and Aria, from "Fidelio"
Cherubini.....Overture, "Anacreon"

Herr Emil Paur, the orchestra's new conductor, brings to his task undoubtedly the equipment of a thorough musician, as well as a high reputation won in the musical centres of the Old World. It is too early to attempt a fair criticism of his work in his present position, for there has not been time yet for him to get thoroughly acquainted with his instrumental forces, or for the players to readily understand his ways and wishes. Impressions only can be recorded, subject to such verification or change as further acquaintance may compel. His manner of conducting is as opposite to that of his predecessor as possible. Nikisch was the embodiment of reserved force, his most emphatic motions hardly disturbing his erect and steady poise, yet seeming to carry every instrument at the tip of his baton. Paur conducts with both hands, head and body. He emphasizes every point with profuse gesticulation, and works up to his climaxes with astounding gymnastics. It is a distraction to the listener to have the conductor so much in evidence. Though the musical ability of the men may be equally great, there was a pleasure in Nikisch's quiet but magnetic manner which his successor cannot afford. Herr Paur seems to drive the players—to over urge them. There was apparent last night a coarseness of tone in the playing of the orchestra never heard before, due undoubtedly to the tremendous energy of the conductor's manner. He seems fond, too, of strong dynamic effects and startling contrasts, and differs widely with Nikisch in the matter of tempo. This was strikingly apparent in the andante of Beethoven's symphony. Without discussing the precise meaning of the Italian phrase (andante con moto) it may be said that the movement, as played last night, was almost slow enough to be called adagio. Yet the effect was undeniably beautiful. In fact, the music is in itself too charming to be spoiled by any sort of treatment, and tempos must always remain a matter of dispute to be settled by each individual's taste and temperament. Herr Paur was cordially received by the audience, and found a pleasant surprise awaiting him at his music desk, which was very handsomely dressed with smilax, pinks and roses.

The playing of the orchestra was of its usual high degree of excellence, except, as stated, for an occasional roughness of tone, which seemed to be caused by the efforts of the men to keep pace in their playing with the constant spurring of their leader. The 'cello solo in Volkman's serenade was delightfully played by Mr. Alwin Schroeder.

The vocal soloist was Madame Lillian Nordica, who never sang better in Providence than last night. Her voice, always a beautiful one, seems to have gained in power within the last year. The aria "Komm Hoffnung, lass den letzten Stern," from Beethoven's "Fidelio" calls for both very high and low notes, but Madame Nordica's superb organ answered unfalteringly to every demand of the score. It is a pleasure to hear, now and then, a singer who can hold her own against an orchestral crescendo without screaming. Power is a valuable thing in a voice, but all kinds of loud noises are not music. It goes without saying that both her numbers were sung as only a truly great artist could sing them. The whole programme was of a highly interesting character, and every number drew liberal applause. The audience was somewhat smaller than usual at a Symphony concert, not more than three-quarters of the seats being taken.

The [illegible] News

DAILY AND WEEKLY.
BUSINESS OFFICE, 7 Weybosset St.
Telephone 1277-2.
EDITORIAL ROOMS, 25 South Water St.
Telephone 1277-3.

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 26, 1893.

HERR EMIL PAUR.

A LARGE BUT CRITICAL AUDIENCE GREETS HIM IN PROVIDENCE.

He Could Not Arouse Much Enthusiasm. The First of the Series of Boston Symphony Concerts.

Last night the musical people of Providence were well represented at the first of the series of Boston Symphony concerts. There was a very large audience. It was a very critical audience—that is apparently so. For that only can explain the lack of enthusiasm which the audience showed for Herr Emil Paur.

Of course the interest of the audience was in the new director. Reports had come from Boston and from across the water that he was a man of marked individuality, a strong personality, and withal a thorough musician. A Providence audience ought to be very conservative. But that does not atone for the scanty, reluctant applause that was given to the very masterly and vigorous interpretation of the Fifth Beethoven Symphony. Perhaps they thought it was too vigorously given.

The first impression that the new director gives, probably, is that of strength, a decided, positive temperament. This is no romantic, soft featured idol that poses before the public's admiration, but a man of strength, and of marked strength. His conducting is a study. From the time he comes on to the stage till he is gone from your sight he seems surcharged with magnetic strength. He moves quickly and almost awkwardly. In fact, until you are familiar with them his motions seem very awkward. But soon that awkwardness becomes the outspoken manifestation of the man's power, and you feel with the orchestra, every nervous toss of that shaggy head, every magnetic sway of that awkward body, and then you appreciate the man's personality.

Played as One Man.

It was evident after the first vigorous attack of the violins of the opening famous four notes of the fifth symphony that Herr Paur had complete control over the orchestra; that he had gathered up, so soon, many of the ragged ends left behind by Mr. Nikisch. The orchestra played like one man and appeared in perfect sympathy with the director.

The familiar fifth symphony had in many places an unfamiliar ring; the tempo had been quickened, the drums and brass made more prominent, and whether this is an improvement is a question. Among many who know the symphony as an old friend the feeling was that it was not in good taste while some of the less conservative welcomed the change as a direct improvement. At all events Herr Paur demonstrated last night that he was a magnificent conductor, that he had a splendid control over his men and that he is not without impulsiveness and passion.

Madame Nordica was the soloist, and sang gloriously. Especially delightful was her singing of Beethoven's recitative and aria from first act of "Fidelio," which Madame Nordica rendered with a dramatic fire and taste that made one long to hear more.

Mr. Alvin Schroeder gave an artistic and masterly 'cello solo, Volkman's serenade in D minor, which brought forth merited applause.

TELEGRAM, PROVIDENCE

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 26, 1893.

OPENED THE SEASON.

Boston Symphony Orchestra and Nordica Captivate the Audience.

It was like extending the hand of welcome to a treasured friend to sit in Infantry Hall last night and hail the reappearance of that most popular of American musical organizations, the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The greeting given the new conductor, Emil Paur, was most impressive. He scored a big point of favor the moment his genial face and towering form came into view, and throughout the entertainment he was accorded a remarkable amount of notice. He is a decided contrast to the man he succeeded, Mr. Nikisch. His looks, gestures, manner and influence are entirely different. His way of working the orchestra is original and interesting. He seems a figure of joints and springs, and makes motions enough for a whole class in gymnastics. He employs his arms, his head and his body, and while his signals are peculiar and somewhat amusing, his earnestness relieves his agile labors from what might in some cases be regarded as grotesqueness.

One feature of his conducting is the style in which he seems to pull out the varying orchestral effects from the several sections of his big force. He certainly produced some beautiful tones, and every part of his interpreting was exact and luminous. He was spoken of by all as one who would be a much more pleasing leader than was Nikisch.

The orchestra never needs detailed compliment, so well known is the splendid character of its performances. It played Beethoven's Fifth Symphony with magnetic richness of melody and rhythm, and in the overture to "Anacreon" the exquisite violin movements of that composition were finely executed. Herr Alwin Schroeder gave a charming violincello solo as the song of a serenade, and he was, as usual, applauded wildly.

Mme. Nordica sang two arias fascinatingly, receiving three recalls on one and four on the other. Her voice never was in sweeter or more elastic condition, nor did she in Providence ever sing with happier taste.

The second concert will be given on Nov. 22.

THE STANDARD UNION.

WILLIAM BERRI. MURAT HALSTEAD.

THURSDAY EVENING, OCTOBER 26, 1893.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

A HEAVY ADVANCE SALE OF SEATS FOR THE CONCERTS.

The sale of seats for the concerts and rehearsals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which are to take place at the Academy of Music, under the auspices of the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn, opened this morning at Chandler's, 300 Fulton street. From 3 o'clock until 8, when the sale of tickets began, a long line of messenger boys and music lovers formed outside Chandler's, all bent on securing the best possible seats for the series. The advance sale to-day was very heavy.

During the season five concerts will be given on Saturday evenings, and five public rehearsals on the Friday afternoons preceding the concerts. The date of the latter are Nov. 11, Dec. 16, Jan. 13, Feb. 10 and March 31. The soloists will be Mme. Emma Eames, Mme. Lillian Nordica and Franz Kneisel, as well as others. The society anticipate a most successful season.

Philadelphia Abend-Post.

Mittwoch, 25. Oktober 1893.

Boston Symphonie Orchester. Dieses berühmte Orchester wird unter Leitung seines neuen Dirigenten, Herrn Emil Paur, während des fünf Konzerte in der Academy of Music geben, das erste am Donnerstag Abend, den 9. November. Tickets nebst reservirten Sitzen werden für die fünf Konzerte für $3.50, $5 und $7 verkauft. Die $5 und $7 Tickets werden am Montag, den 30. Oktober um 10 Uhr Morgens in der Academy of Music versteigert und die übrig gebliebenen, sowie die $3.50 Tickets werden am Dienstag, den 31. Oktober zu gewöhnlichen Preisen von 8 Uhr Morgens an verkauft werden. Als Solisten bei diesen Konzerten fungiren Mme. Emma Eames, Herr Max Heinrich, der rühmlichst bekannte Liedersänger und der Violin-Virtuose Herr Franz Kneisel.

[32]

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, OCTOBER 29, 1893.

The Third Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the third concert of the Symphony Orchestra, given in Music Hall last evening, was as follows:

...ajor Symphony, op. 9.....Goetz
...enade for string orchestra No. 3, D minor...Volkmann
Overture, "Leonore" No. 3.....Beethoven

Hermann Goetz had the good fortune to die young. He is now called "a composer of great promise," and some would even enroll him among the immortals. He escaped the possibility of disappointing hope.

Goetz is best known abroad as the maker of an opera, "The Taming of the Shrew." For a comedy he wrote music that might fit a tragedy. Perhaps he took life too seriously; at any rate his musical shrew suffers from introspection, and Petruchio is a metaphysician. In the opera there is little lightness, there is little grace; but whenever coquetry approaches passion, the music is more suitable.

There is a motto to this symphony, and it runs as follows: "Into the quiet, holy regions of the heart must thou fly from the stress of life." But what have these lines to do with the music? Goetz might as well have chosen for a motto:

"Eternal silence laughs along the shore,
And spectral negroes bleach upon the floor."

This is absolute music, not programme music, not motto music. What has the pretty, graceful second movement to do with "the holy regions of the heart" or "the stress of life?" Nothing, absolutely nothing. The music is pretty, and that is all.

Burlert once said that the adagio died with Beethoven, an epigrammatic saying, and untrue. For if in certain adagios by Beethoven there is an unearthly beauty, a vision of another world; if there are things never heard by mortals except by Beethoven, there are, nevertheless, adagios of Schumann and Brahms that reach sublime heights. There are beautiful passages in the adagios of Goetz; but there is too much music, and at times the hearer thinks of the learned German who wrote a treatise in 10 volumes and then wrote a supplement in 15 volumes to explain his original theories and conclusions.

The great trouble with the symphony by Goetz is that it is without individuality. It has no cachet. When you hear unfamiliar music, say, by Gounod, to take an example in modern times, you know that the music is by Gounod, even if there is no name attached, even if the music is weak. It is not the music of Saint Saens, it is not the music of Berlioz. It is that of Gounod. Now in this symphony by Goetz, the last movement is Schumann strained through a sieve.

***

In the serenade by Volkmann the solo 'cello sits apart, like a mourner in the wilderness or like the usher in Hood's poem, "A melancholy man." Nor does he discontinue his complaint, even when he hears the sounds of merriment, or when he is invited to join in the dance. The serenade is a singular composition, not without genuine beauty—an agreeable contrast to much of Volkmann's music that might have been written by a sleek, prosperous, excellent professor; that does not reveal the unhappiness of a disappointed, suffering man.

***

The playing of the orchestra was in the main admirable. Mr. Schroeder delivered the solo passages in the serenade in a sympathetic manner. The reading of the overture was dramatic, almost feverish. There were many fine points in it, as, for instance, the mad rush before the first trumpet call. On the other hand, there were moments when the rhythm that should be like a mighty pulse flagged, because there was over-elaboration in a detail.

PHILIP HALE.

NOTES.

The first of the Kneisel Quartette Concerts will be given to-morrow evening in Chickering Hall at 8 o'clock. The programme includes Beethoven's F major quartette, op. 59; Haydn's G minor quartettee; Brahms's F major quintette, op. 88.

It seems that the supper given at the Parker House last week Saturday, after the Symphony, by Mme. Nordica, was not for the Storys, as was reported. In fact, the Storys, though invited, did not put in an appearance at all.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, OCT. 29, 1893.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Beautiful Programme Finely Rendered Last Evening.

In the third Symphony concert in Music Hall last evening, Mr. Emil Paur presented the following programme:

H. Goetz—Symphony in F major, Op. 9.
Volkmann—Serenade for strings, No. 3, in D minor, Op. 69. Violoncello solo, Mr. Alwin Schroeder.
Beethoven—Overture to "Leonore," No. 3, in C major, Op. 72.

Goetz's symphony is a wonderfully beautiful composition, and if it could always be rendered as it was last evening the Symphony patrons would gladly listen to it more frequently. It is one of the best-known of this composer's works, and is particularly admired for the poetic manner in which the themes are developed.

This is especially true in the second movement, the intermezzo, where the flutes and the clarinets are heard in an exquisite phrase with the peculiar introduction of the horns. Mr. Paur's rendering of this movement was excellent. The orchestra was under admirable control, and gave full expression to the conductor's ideas. The finale was given with the same artistic taste, and the brief but brilliant climax was ably rendered.

In Volkmann's serenade for strings, Alwin Schroeder was the 'cellist, and played with his usual skill and good taste. Volkmann is evidently a favorite with Mr. Paur, for it is the second time this composer has been given a place on the programme.

The beauty of this number was finely brought out, and the audience showed its appreciation of the conductor's conception by the heartiest applause. The closing number was Beethoven's overture to "Leonore," No. 3, and formed a fitting termination to a most pleasing concert.

Mme. Emma Eames will be the soloist next week, when the following programme will be given:

Strauss—Symphony in F minor (first time).
Massenet—Aria, from "Le Cid."
Saint-Saens — Symphonic poem, "Le Rouet d'Omphale."
Gluck—Aria, from "Armide."
Brahms—Overture, "Academic Festival."

[illegible]

SUNDAY, OCT. 29, 1893.

CONCERTS AND LECTURES.

Third of the Season's Symphony Offerings.

The third symphony concert given under Mr Paur's direction has strengthened the favorable impression he had already made upon his audiences, and gives assurance that all the promises made in behalf of the Leipsic conductor will be fulfilled. Mr Paur seem now to feel thoroughly at home in his new position, and an excellent understanding seems to be established between leader and orchestra.

Neither of Mr Paur's predecessors so readily gained the good will and esteem of the members of this orchestra. Every member now appears to be devoted to him and to endeavor to faithfully follow his instructions and to do all that is possible to contribute to the success of a performance.

Such evidence of good will is certainly most welcome and should result in Mr Paur being able to raise the orchestra's already very high standard of excellence.

The audiences are also becoming more appreciative of the new director's abilities. The applause at both Friday's rehearsal and last night's concert was much more cordial and general than before.

Although yesterday's program contained little variety and offered slight opportunity for contrast of orchestral effects, the offerings were very enjoyable. The numbers were H. Goetz' symphony in F major, Volkman's serenade for strings, No. 3, in D minor, and Beethoven's No. 3 overture to "Leonora."

The Goetz symphony is a scholarly composition, and considerable originality is shown in the treatment of themes, which are in themselves rather commonplace. The scoring is elaborate, and offers excellent opportunity for displaying the resources and discipline of an orchestra, but it is not a work calculated to win especial favor from an average symphony concert audience.

The second is the most popular of the four movements, and last evening received rather the best interpretation. Especially pleasing was the work of the horns and clarinets, especially pleasing because these instruments have been known to offend in the past. The other movements were played with very good effect, barring, possibly, a slight suggestion of heaviness in interpreting the elaborately ornamented figures of the romanza.

The most enjoyable feature of the program was the thoroughly excellent performance of Valkmann's serenade. A more satisfactory performance of this charming composition has probably never been given by the orchestra, a strong statement to make considering the almost invariable excellence of the work by the string players of this organization.

Much of the enjoyment derived from the interpretation was due to the splendid playing of the solo cello by Mr Alvin Schroeder. His tones were deliciously clear and mellow, giving exquisite effect to the tender, almost mournful melodies of this rarely beautiful work.

There was good reason for the enthusiasm of the audience and the three recalls given director and soloist.

Beethoven's lovely "Leonora" overture received from Mr Paur a faithful and sympathetic interpretation. There was much delicacy of expression in the treatment of the sentimental passages, and the magnificent coda was worked up to with splendid effect.

Mme Emma Eames will be the soloist at the next concert, for which the following program has been arranged: Symphony in F minor, Strauss (first time); aria from "Le Cid," Massenet; symphonic poem, "Le Rouet d'Omphale," Saint-Saens; aria from "Armide," Gluck; overture, "Academic Festival," Brahms.

The Kneisel concerts will be given in Chickering hall on Monday night, Oct 30, Nov 13, Dec 4, Jan 1 and 29, Feb 12, March 5 and 19. The program for the first concert includes two quartets—Beethoven, F major, op 59, and Haydn, G minor—and Brahms' quintet, F major, op 88.

The Boston symphony orchestra will give the second concert in the Cambridge series next Thursday evening. Mme Nordica will be soloist. The program will be as follows: Symphony No. 5, Beethoven; song, "Erlking," Schubert; rhapsodie No. 2, Dvorak; aria "Fidelio," Beethoven; overture "Benvenuto Cellini," Berlioz.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, OCT. 29.

The Symphony Concert.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given in Music Hall last night. The selections were: Symphony in F, op. 9, Goetz; Serenade, Volkmann, of which the 'cello solo was played by Mr. A. Schroeder, and Beethoven's "Leonora" overture, No. 3. It was not a very brilliant programme, nor a specially interesting one. The performances of last night would seem to indicate that Mr. Paur and his orchestra are now in perfect sympathy with each other. On this occasion, as on the others of the season, thus far, the extreme solicitude of the conductor for the most minute attention to details in his readings of the works presented, was again conspicuous. It is, however, open to question if something of spontaneity in effect and something of smoothness in flow is not lost by this excessive elaboration, especially in such a composition as the Beethoven overture, which, under superconscientious care to emphasize every possible point, takes on a somewhat fragmentary aspect, and becomes a collection of detached effects, rather than a closely-knitted and self-consistent whole. Under the treatment to which it was subjected, especially in the changes made in the time, the phrases seemed to be too widely separated, and the connection of one with the other was often severed; and, if we may use the word, the "oneness" of the work was dissipated. Except for this, the interpretation was one of the most brilliant and stirring the work has ever had at these concerts; — intensely theatrical, it is true; but why not? The overture was written for the theatre. We cannot recall as effective a preparation for the trumpet fanfare behind the scene, as that which Mr. Paur made. The climax of the overture was worked up with splendid fire. The playing of the orchestra was magnificent. It has not been heard to such advantage before, in three years. Everything was so clear, so decisive: there was such unity and precision in the overwhelming rush of string tone, and such broad nobility in effect. The symphony was finely read and played, but we must confess that we find all its worth and all its beauties in the first allegro, and the intermezzo. The latter mevement was exquisitely colored. The cello solo in the serenade was gracefully and tastefully played by Mr. Schroeder. The sincerity and the earnestness of Mr. Paur make themselves more and more felt, and with his thoroughly artistic absorption in his work to the avoidance of all posing for effect, intensify the respect that he won for himself at the very outset. The instrumental selections for the next concert are: Symphony in F minor, Strauss [first time]; "Le Rouet d'Omphale," Saint-Saëns; "Academy" Overture, Brahms. Mme. Emma Eames is to be the soloist, and sing an air by Massenet, and one by Gluck.

The postponed Kneisel Quartet concert will take in Chickering Hall, to-morrow night, the programme being: Quintet F, op. 59, Beethoven; Quartet G-minor, Haydn; Quintet F, op. 88, Brahms.

The second of the Symphony concerts at Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, occurs next Thursday evening. Mme. Nordica is the soloist.

[illegible]

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCIV. NO. 121.

SUNDAY, OCTOBER 29, 1893.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The new conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra gave the season's patrons a delightful concert last evening, and it was quite evident that the feeling of satisfaction with regard to the attainments of Mr. Paur was strengthened by his work at this occasion.

A highly pleasing performance of the Goetz symphony in F major, Op. 9 came first on the programme, and it was played with a degree of refinement, grace and expression that commanded the heartiest approval. The dainty intermezzo was given with faultless taste, and its rare beauties were delightfully interpreted.

The Volkmann serenade for strings, No. 3, in D minor, Op. 69, followed, with Mr. Alwin Schroeder as the solo 'cellist. This composition displayed the string band to the best advantage, and Mr. Schroeder surpassed even his own most admirable work in the solo passages. The audience was quick to recognize the merits of both the soloist and the performance of the serenade, and Mr. Paur most courteously shared the applause with Mr. Schroeder.

A splendid performance of the "Leonore," No. 3, overture, ended the programme. Mme. Eames is the soloist next Saturday evening and the symphony will be that by Strauss, in F minor.

The series of Boston symphony concerts had a brilliant opening in Providence upon Wednesday evening, when society had its first general gathering there. Mme. Nordica, in pale green brocade and pink, and Mr. Schroeder were the soloists. When Mr. Pauer stepped upon the platform he found his stand entwined with smilax and trimmed with roses and pinks—a floral greeting of which Boston did not even think. The audience included several Bostonians who are visiting in Providence this week and a New York party arranged by Mrs. William Goddard, her first appearance in society this season.

Mme. Nordica will be the soloist at the second Sanders Theatre concert in Cambridge next Thursday evening, when the programme will include symphony in C minor, No. 5, Beethoven; song, "Erlkonig," Schubert; rhapsodie, No. 2, Dvorak; aria, "Fidelio," Beethoven; overture, Benvenuto Cellini, Berlioz.

The postponed concert of the Kneisel quartet will be given at Chickering Hall tomorrow evening, when Beethoven's F major quartet, op. 59; Haydn's quartet in G minor, and Brahms' quintet, in F major, op. 88, will be played.

Mme. Emma Eames Story, who is the soloist at the Symphony concert on Friday and Saturday of this week, will wear an exquisite imported gown of apricot velvet with black satin trimmings, and rosettes and black gloves at Saturday evening's performance.

PROVIDENCE SOCIAL GOSSIP.

A Pretty Compliment to Herr Paur of the Symphony.

His Music Stand Decked with Smilax and Flowers—Musical Features of the Week—Dinners, Weddings and Dances—Some Good Readings—Charity Work Well Begun.

[FROM OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.]

PROVIDENCE, Oct. 28, 1893. What a week replete with music, dinner and song this has been! There was an occasional glimpse of the drama also, but music has reigned supreme. The dinners commenced on Monday, but the first musical meet occurred on Tuesday afternoon at 4, when the Saturday Morning Club gathered in the music room of the Lincoln school to hear Mr. W. F. Apthorp of Boston analyze the Symphony programme for the following night's concert. Each member had a programme. Mr. Apthorp had the scores, and part of the time illustrated his explanations by presenting the themes upon the piano by which he stood.

He talked more than an hour, and pleasantly impressed the club, so that his future analyses will be well attended. Mr. Louis C. Elson gave them last year, but this season he devotes his afternoons to musical history talks.

Among Mr. Apthorp's listeners were Mrs. M. A. B. Sheldon, Miss Laura Lewis, Miss Caroline M. Jones, Mrs. John Aldrich, Mrs. Albert L. Calder, Miss Cook, Miss Bardeen, Miss Barstow, Miss Madge Gilman, Miss Eleanor Congden, Miss Emily Diman, Miss Barnes, Mrs. George H. Corliss, Miss Maria Corliss, Mrs. John P. Campbell, Mrs. James Coggshall, Mrs. W. F. B. Jackson, Miss Kimball, Miss Alexander, Miss Frances Hoppin, Mrs. J. Herbert Foster, Miss Thurston, Miss Everett, Mrs. G. W. Parks, the Misses Stearns, Mrs. H. A. Hunt, the Misses Talbot, Mrs. Fred A. W. Harris and Miss Knowles.

Many of the members came laden with notebook and pencil, ready to jot down the new musical thoughts which Mr. Apthorp's talk suggested.

All these society folk, and many, many more—in fact, a general outpouring of them, and their first large assemblage in any public place this season—attended the opening of the Boston Symphony concerts on Wednesday evening. It was a display of fall wraps, autumn hats and summer gowns. You didn't look for any one in any particular spot, and were often agreeably surprised to find friends within a chatting distance. The moments to spare previous to the entrance of Mr. Paur were consumed in trying to locate people, because the craze for certain seats and certain sections has not yet reached Providence.

The Goddards, Richmonds, Ameses, Pecks, Sharpes, Howards, Kings, Hoppins, Hazards, Chapins, Congdons, Fosters, Cranstons, Aldriches, Knights, Taits, Allens, Corlisses, Robinsons, Browns were mixed in with the distinctive musical set, which included very prominently Mr. Julien Herreshoff, the brother of Mr. N. B. Herreshoff of Vigilant fame.

Mrs. William Goddard, who was seen in public for the first time this season, wore a superb gown of black satin and white Valenciennes lace.

When Mr. Paur stepped to the front of the platform he found his music stand entwined with [illegible] decorations. This [illegible] Boston had not [illegible] the orchestra and the [illegible]

What [illegible] that would [illegible] one described [illegible] discuss [illegible] wore [illegible] of pale brocade [illegible] satin and lace, [illegible] Providence friends [illegible] der was the [illegible] there were but two [illegible] concert was over [illegible] than to [illegible] home so early several parties were formed to see the last two acts of those

[illegible]

[33]

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, OCTOBER 29, 1893.

The Third Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the third concert of the Symphony Orchestra, given in Music Hall last evening, was as follows:

F major Symphony, op. 9.....Goetz
Serenade for string orchestra No. 3, D minor...Volkmann
Overture, "Leonore" No. 3.....Beethoven

Hermann Goetz had the good fortune to die young. He is now called "a composer of great promise," and some would even enroll him among the immortals. He escaped the possibility of disappointing hope.

Goetz is best known abroad as the maker of an opera, "The Taming of the Shrew." For a comedy he wrote music that might fit a tragedy. Perhaps he took life too seriously; at any rate his musical shrew suffers from introspection, and Petruchio is a metaphysician. In the opera there is little lightness, there is little grace; but whenever coquetry approaches passion, the music is more suitable.

There is a motto to this symphony, and it runs as follows: "Into the quiet, holy regions of the heart must thou fly from the stress of life." But what have these lines to do with the music? Goetz might as well have chosen for a motto:

"Eternal silence laughs along the shore.
And spectral negroes bleach upon the floor."

This is absolute music, not programme music, not motto music. What has the pretty, graceful second movement to do with "the holy regions of the heart" or "the stress of life?" Nothing, absolutely nothing. The music is pretty, and that is all.

Ehrlert once said that the adagio died with Beethoven, an epigrammatic saying, and untrue. For if in certain adagios by Beethoven there is an unearthly beauty, a vision of another world; if there are things never heard by mortals except by Beethoven, there are, nevertheless, adagios of Schumann and Brahms that reach sublime heights. There are beautiful passages in the adagios of Goetz; but there is too much music, and at times the hearer thinks of the learned German who wrote a treatise in 10 volumes and then wrote a supplement in 15 volumes to explain his original theories and conclusions.

The great trouble with the symphony by Goetz is that it is without individuality. It has no cachet. When you hear unfamiliar music, say, by Gounod, to take an example in modern times, you know that the music is by Gounod, even if there is no name attached, even if the music is weak. It is not the music of Saint Saens, it is not the music of Berlioz. It is that of Gounod. Now in this symphony by Goetz, the last movement is Schumann strained through a sieve.

***

In the serenade by Volkmann the solo 'cello sits apart, like a mourner in the wilderness or like the usher in Hood's poem, "A melancholy man." Nor does he discontinue his complaint, even when he hears the sounds of merriment, or when he is invited to join in the dance. The serenade is a singular composition, not without genuine beauty—an agreeable contrast to much of Volkmann's music that might have been written by a sleek, prosperous, excellent professor; that does not reveal the unhappiness of a disappointed, suffering man.

***

The playing of the orchestra was in the main admirable. Mr. Schroeder delivered the solo passages in the serenade in a sympathetic manner. The reading of the overture was dramatic, almost feverish. There were many fine points in it, as, for instance, the mad rush before the first trumpet call. On the other hand, there were moments when the rhythm that should be like a mighty pulse flagged, because there was over-elaboration in a detail.

PHILIP HALE.

NOTES.

The first of the Kneisel Quartette Concerts will be given to-morrow evening in Chickering Hall at 8 o'clock. The programme includes Beethoven's F major quartette, op. 59; Haydn's G minor quartettee; Brahms's F major quintette, op. 88.

It seems that the supper given at the Parker House last week Saturday, after the Symphony, by Mme. Nordica, was not (or the Storys, as was reported. In fact, the Storys, though invited, did not put in an appearance at all.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, OCT. 29, 1893.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Beautiful Programme Finely Rendered Last Evening.

In the third Symphony concert in Music Hall last evening, Mr. Emil Paur presented the following programme:

H. Goetz—Symphony in F major, Op. 9.
Volkmann—Serenade for strings, No. 3, in D minor, Op. 69. Violoncello solo, Mr. Alwin Schroeder.
Beethoven—Overture to "Leonore," No. 3, in C major. Op. 72.

Goetz's symphony is a wonderfully beautiful composition, and if it could always be rendered as it was last evening the Symphony patrons would gladly listen to it more frequently. It is one of the best-known of this composer's works, and is particularly admired for the poetic manner in which the themes are developed.

This is especially true in the second movement, the intermezzo, where the flutes and the clarinets are heard in an exquisite phrase with the peculiar introduction of the horns. Mr. Paur's rendering of this movement was excellent. The orchestra was under admirable control, and gave full expression to the conductor's ideas. The finale was given with the same artistic taste, and the brief but brilliant climax was ably rendered.

In Volkmann's serenade for strings, Alwin Schroeder was the 'cellist, and played with his usual skill and good taste. Volkmann is evidently a favorite with Mr. Paur, for it is the second time this composer has been given a place on the programme.

The beauty of this number was finely brought out, and the audience showed its appreciation of the conductor's conception by the heartiest applause. The closing number was Beethoven's overture to "Leonore," No. 3, and formed a fitting termination to a most pleasing concert.

Mme. Emma Earnes will be the soloist next week, when the following programme will be given:

Strauss—Symphony in F minor (first time).
Massenet—Aria, from "Le Cid."
Saint-Saens — Symphonic poem, "Le Rouet d'Omphale."
Gluck—Aria from "Armide."
Brahms—Overture, "Academic Festival."

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, OCT. 29, 1893.

CONCERTS AND LECTURES.

Third of the Season's Symphony Offerings.

The third symphony concert given under Mr Paur's direction has strengthened the favorable impression he had already made upon his audiences, and gives assurance that all the promises made in behalf of the Leipsic conductor will be fulfilled. Mr Paur seem now to feel thoroughly at home in his new position, and an excellent understanding seems to be established between leader and orchestra.

Neither of Mr Paur's predecessors so readily gained the good will and esteem of the members of this orchestra. Every member now appears to be devoted to him and to endeavor to faithfully follow his instructions and to do all that is possible to contribute to the success of a performance.

Such evidence of good will is certainly most welcome and should result in Mr Paur being able to raise the orchestra's already very high standard of excellence.

The audiences are also becoming more appreciative of the new director's abilities. The applause at both Friday's rehearsal and last night's concert was much more cordial and general than before.

Although yesterday's program contained little variety and offered slight opportunity for contrast of orchestral effects, the offerings were very enjoyable. The numbers were H. Goetz' symphony in F major, Volkman's serenade for strings, No. 3, in D minor, and Beethoven's No. 3 overture to "Leonora."

The Goetz symphony is a scholarly composition, and considerable originality is shown in the treatment of themes, which are in themselves rather commonplace. The scoring is elaborate, and offers excellent opportunity for displaying the resources and discipline of an orchestra, but it is not a work calculated to win especial favor from an average symphony concert audience.

The second is the most popular of the four movements, and last evening received rather the best interpretation. Especially pleasing was the work of the horns and clarinets, especially pleasing because these instruments have been known to offend in the past. The other movements were played with very good effect, barring, possibly, a slight suggestion of heaviness in interpreting the elaborately ornamented figures of the romanza.

The most enjoyable feature of the program was the thoroughly excellent performance of Valkmann's serenade. A more satisfactory performance of this charming composition has probably never been given by the orchestra, a strong statement to make considering the almost invariable excellence of the work by the string players of this organization.

Much of the enjoyment derived from the interpretation was due to the splendid playing of the solo cello by Mr Alvin Schroeder. His tones were deliciously clear and mellow, giving exquisite effect to the tender, almost mournful melodies of this rarely beautiful work.

There was good reason for the enthusiasm of the audience and the three recalls given director and soloist.

Beethoven's lovely "Leonora" overture received from Mr Paur a faithful and sympathetic interpretation. There was much delicacy of expression in the treatment of the sentimental passages, and the magnificent coda was worked up to with splendid effect.

Mme Emma Eames will be the soloist at the next concert, for which the following program has been arranged: Symphony in F minor, Strauss (first time); aria from "Le Cid," Massenet; symphonic poem, "Le Rouet d'Omphale," Saint-Saens; aria from "Armide," Gluck; overture, "Academic Festival," Brahms.

The Kneisel concerts will be given in Chickering hall on Monday night, Oct 30, Nov 13, Dec 4, Jan 1 and 29, Feb 12, March 5 and 19. The program for the first concert includes two quartets—Beethoven, F major, op 59, and Haydn, G minor—and Brahms' quintet, F major, op 88.

The Boston symphony orchestra will give the second concert in the Cambridge series next Thursday evening. Mme Nordica will be soloist. The program will be as follows: Symphony No. 5, Beethoven; song, "Erlking," Schubert; rhapsodie No. 2, Dvorak; aria "Fidelio," Beethoven; overture "Benvenuto Cellini," Berlioz.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, OCT. 29.

The Symphony Concert.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given in Music Hall last night. The selections were: Symphony in F, op. 9, Goetz; Serenade, Volkmann, of which the 'cello solo was played by Mr. A. Schroeder, and Beethoven's "Leonora" overture, No. 3. It was not a very brilliant programme, nor a specially interesting one. The performances of last night would seem to indicate that Mr. Paur and his orchestra are now in perfect sympathy with each other. On this occasion, as on the others of the season, thus far, the extreme solicitude of the conductor for the most minute attention to details in his readings of the works presented, was again conspicuous. It is, however, open to question if something of spontaneity in effect and something of smoothness in flow is not lost by this excessive elaboration, especially in such a composition as the Beethoven overture, which, under superconscientious care to emphasize every possible point, takes on a somewhat fragmentary aspect, and becomes a collection of detached effects, rather than a closely-knitted and self-consistent whole. Under the treatment to which it was subjected, especially in the changes made in the time, the phrases seemed to be too widely separated, and the connection of one with the other was often severed; and, if we may use the word, the "oneness" of the work was dissipated. Except for this, the interpretation was one of the most brilliant and stirring the work has ever had at these concerts; — intensely theatrical, it is true; but why not? The overture was written for the theatre. We cannot recall as effective a preparation for the trumpet fanfare behind the scene, as that which Mr. Paur made. The climax of the overture was worked up with splendid fire. The playing of the orchestra was magnificent. It has not been heard to such advantage before, in three years. Everything was so clear, so decisive: there was such unity and precision in the overwhelming rush of string tone, and such broad nobility in effect. The symphony was finely read and played, but we must confess that we find all its worth and all its beauties in the first allegro, and the intermezzo. The latter mevement was exquisitely colored. The cello solo in the serenade was gracefully and tastefully played by Mr. Schroeder. The sincerity and the earnestness of Mr. Paur make themselves more and more felt, and with his thoroughly artistic absorption in his work to the avoidance of all posing for effect, intensify the respect that he won for himself at the very outset. The instrumental selections for the next concert are: Symphony in F-minor, Strauss [first time); "Le Rouet d'Omphale," Saint-Saëns; "Academy" Overture, Brahms. Mme. Emma Eames is to be the soloist, and sing an air by Massenet, and one by Gluck.

The postponed Kneisel Quartet concert will take in Chickering Hall, to-morrow night, the programme being: Quintet F, op. 59, Beethoven; Quartet G-minor, Haydn; Quintet F, op. 88, Brahms.

The second of the Symphony concerts at Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, occurs next Thursday evening. Mme. Nordica is the soloist.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCIV. NO. 121.

SUNDAY, OCTOBER 29, 1893.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The new conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra gave the season's patrons a delightful concert last evening, and it was quite evident that the feeling of satisfaction with regard to the attainments of Mr. Paur was strengthened by his work at this occasion.

A highly pleasing performance of the Goetz symphony in F major, Op. 9 came first on the programme, and it was played with a degree of refinement, grace and expression that commanded the heartiest approval. The dainty intermezzo was given with faultless taste, and its rare beauties were delightfully interpreted.

The Volkmann serenade for strings, No. 3, in D minor, Op. 69, followed, with Mr. Alwin Schroeder as the solo'cellist. This composition displayed the string band to the best advantage, and Mr. Schroeder surpassed even his own most admirable work in the solo passages. The audience was quick to recognize the merits of both the soloist and the performance of the serenade, and Mr. Paur most courteously shared the applause with Mr. Schroeder.

A splendid performance of the "Leonore," No. 3, overture, ended the programme. Mme. Eames is the soloist next Saturday evening and the symphony will be that by Strauss, in F minor.

The series of Boston symphony concerts had a brilliant opening in Providence upon Wednesday evening, when society had its first general gathering there. Mme. Nordica, in pale green brocade and pink, and Mr. Schroeder were the soloists. When Mr. Pauer stepped upon the platform he found his stand entwined with smilax and trimmed with roses and pinks—a floral greeting of which Boston did not even think. The audience included several Bostonians who are visiting in Providence this week and a New York party arranged by Mrs. William Goddard, her first appearance in society this season.

Mme. Nordica will be the soloist at the second Sanders Theatre concert in Cambridge next Thursday evening, when the programme will include symphony in C minor, No. 5, Beethoven; song, "Erlkonig," Schubert; rhapsodie. No. 2, Dvorak; aria, "Fidelio," Beethoven; overture, Benvenuto Cellini, Berlioz.

The postponed concert of the Kneisel quartet will be given at Chickering Hall tomorrow evening, when Beethoven's F major quartet, op. 59; Haydn's quartet in G minor, and Brahms' quintet, in F major, op. 88, will be played.

Mme. Emma Eames Story, who is the soloist at the Symphony concert on Friday and Saturday of this week, will wear an exquisite imported gown of apricot velvet with black satin trimmings, and rosettes and black gloves at Saturday evening's performance.

PROVIDENCE SOCIAL GOSSIP.

A Pretty Compliment to Herr Paur of the Symphony.

His Music Stand Decked with Smilax and Flowers — Musical Features of the Week—Dinners, Weddings and Dances—Some Good Readings—Charity Work Well Begun.

[FROM OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.]

PROVIDENCE, Oct. 28, 1893. What a week replete with music, dinner and song this has been! There was an occasional glimpse of the drama also, but music has reigned supreme. The dinners commenced on Monday, but the first musical meet occurred on Tuesday afternoon at 4, when the Saturday Morning Club gathered in the music room of the Lincoln school to hear Mr. W. F. Apthorp of Boston analyze the Symphony programme for the following night's concert. Each member had a programme. Mr. Apthorp had the scores, and part of the time illustrated his explanations by presenting the themes upon the piano by which he stood.

He talked more than an hour, and pleasantly impressed the club, so that his future analyses will be well attended. Mr. Louis C. Elson gave them last year, but this season he devotes his afternoons to musical history talks.

Among Mr. Apthorp's listeners were Mrs. M. A. B. Sheldon, Miss Laura Lewis, Miss Caroline M. Jones, Mrs. John Aldrich, Mrs. Albert L. Calder, Miss Cook, Miss Bardeen, Miss Barstow, Miss Madge Gilman, Miss Eleanor Congden, Miss Emily Diman, Miss Barnes, Mrs. George H. Corliss, Miss Maria Corliss, Mrs. John P. Campbell, Mrs. James Coggshall, Mrs. W. F. B. Jackson, Miss Kimball, Miss Alexander, Miss Frances Hoppin, Mrs. J. Herbert Foster, Miss Thurston, Miss Everett, Mrs. G. W. Parks, the Misses Stearns, Mrs. H. A. Hunt, the Misses Talbot, Mrs. Fred A. W. Harris and Miss Knowles.

Many of the members came laden with notebook and pencil, ready to jot down the new musical thoughts which Mr. Apthorp's talk suggested.

All these society folk, and many, many more—in fact, a general outpouring of them, and their first large assemblage in any public place this season—attended the opening of the Boston Symphony concerts on Wednesday evening. It was a display of fall wraps, autumn hats and summer gowns. You didn't look for any one in any particular spot, and were often agreeably surprised to find friends within a chatting distance. The moments to spare previous to the entrance of Mr. Paur were consumed in trying to locate people, because the craze for certain seats and certain sections has not yet reached Providence.

The Goddards, Richmonds, Ameses, Pecks, Sharpes, Howards, Kings, Hoppins, Hazards, Chapins, Congdons, Fosters, Cranstons, Aldriches, Knights, Tafts, Allens, Corlisses, Robinsons, Browns were mixed in with the distinctive musical set, which included very prominently Mr. Julien Herreshoff, the brother of Mr. N. B. Herreshoff of Vigilant fame.

Mrs. William Goddard, who was seen in public for the first time this seaion, wore a superb gown of black satin and white Valenciennes lace.

When Mr. Paur stepped to the front of the platform he found his music stand entwined with smilax, pink roses and carnations. This floral greeting, which even Boston had not thought of, delighted him, the orchestra and the audience.

What impression did he make? Well, that would be difficult to state, because no one described him in just the same way and dismissed him from serious contemplation when Mme. Lillian Nordica, in a court robe of pale brocade green satin, with pink satin and lace, appeared before many Providence friends and sang. Mr. Schroeder was the instrumental soloist, and as there were but two orchestral numbers, the concert was over at 9:30. Rather than return home so early several parties were formed to see the last two acts of "Rosedale."

AMERICAN ART JOURNAL.

Music, Art, Literature, and the Drama.

VOLUME 62. } Whole
NUMBER 2. } No. 1,589.

New York, Saturday, October 28, 1893.

$3 PER ANNUM. FOREIGN, $4.
10 CENTS PER COPY.

Boston's New Conductor.

First Appearance of Emil Paur as Symphony Director—The Matinee Girls Sadly Disappointed.

New York [illegible]

Boston, Oct. 14.—For the sake of art it is a great pity that the personal element should enter so strongly into the public consideration of artistic matters. Rossini wrote music simply that Patti might sing it; Chopin wrote scherzos only that Paderewski might interpret them; Beethoven composed symphonies that conductors might have "readings." Yet there are cases in which the personality of a single man means much, and one of these is in the direction of an important orchestra. Four years ago Wilhelm Gericke laid down the baton of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Arthur Nikisch took it up. Already the fame of the organization had grown so wide that it was regarded as a national rather than a local body. Persons from various cities, including, as a matter of course, the metropolis, flocked to Boston to attend the debut of the new man, and to try to forecast the future of the splendid orchestra over which he was to preside.

SIGNOR LUIGI MEOLA.

Again Bostonians are called upon to sit at the feet of a new conductor. Nikisch is no longer a name to conjure with. His pale, thoughtful face; his silken, pendent hair; his eloquent, conspicuous hands, and his passionate, erratic readings have all taken wings unto themselves and sought the seclusion of the Buda-Pesth Royal Opera. The causes of their flight need not now concern any one. They were not nice.

Of the unavailing efforts of Col. Henry L. Higginson—who is not and never was T. Wentworth Higginson, though many newspapers of high degree have tried to make him so—to secure Dr. Hans Richter, of Vienna, of the doctor's willingness to come, and of the inviolability of his contract, the tale has been told. Emil Paur is the name of the new man who was finally engaged, and whom at yesterday's public rehearsal and to-night's concert all Boston went out to see. The verb "to see" is used advisedly, for even Boston, with all its intellect, is human.

Paur is an Austrian, born at Czernow, in the province of Bukowina. He was a fellow-student of Nikisch and Felix Mottl, at

HERR EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Vienna. He has been conductor at Cassel, glorified by the memory of Spohr, and at Konigsberg, at Mannheim and at Leipsic. In all of these paces he directed the opera. He also appeared as a violinist and a piano virtuoso. Thus much Boston learned about him through the patient industry of the newspaper scribes, for, painful though it be to admit it, no one in Boston had ever heard of him before.

But such information did not go far toward satisfying the heart-hunger of that marvelous production of nature—not unassisted by art—the Boston Symphony matinee girl. Was the new conductor handsome? Was he blessed with a seraphic countenance, suggestive of an oatmeal diet and early death? Was he not at least poetic and esthetic? Did he have soulful hands? And did his clothes fit him? What were twenty thousand "readings," if he were to turn out to be short, rotund and prone to limpness of the collar?

It is not likely that the matinee girl will soon recover from the dreadful shock which struck her emotional centre when Emil Paur stepped upon the stage of the Boston Music Hall for the first time. If ever there was a plain, prosaic, "hofcapelmeister" looking conductor, it is Paur. He is not especially short, nor does he run far toward globularity, but his architecture is severely Doric. His hair is a dingy brown—long, of course—and his face is conspicuous by reason of the prominence of the cheek-bones and the length of his lower jaw. Paur is not pretty to look at.

As for his manner of conducting, it is certainly rigorous. His down beat is full of conscious rectitude, and the relations of the other beats to it are sanctified by the fundamental truth of trigonometry. It is certain that the remark of Little Buttercup about Dick Deadeye may be fairly applied to the new conductor: "He is a little triangular." Alas for the palpitating matinee girl! No more graceful curves that seemed to wave the music out of the air as though they were the summonses of a magician's wand; nothing now but a cold, intellectual, accurately-measured beat, for which, perhaps, the members of the orchestra are in secret profoundly grateful. For a good, intelligible beat, with the weight of head, hands, arms, back, and directorial solemnity behind it, has this one admirable quality: it will keep an orchestra acquainted with the conductor's wishes as to tempo.

Now as to that mighty significant, yet mysterious, matter called "reading." Mr. Paur called upon Boston yesterday afternoon and to-night to judge of his quality through the performance of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, Tschaikowsky's serenade for strings in C major, Opus 48, and Wagner's "Tannhaeuser" overture. No soloist was permitted to obtrude upon the scheme. The conductor himself furnished enough of the personal element. It may be prophesied, with a reasonable amount of assurance, that Mr. Paur's readings will never assume what is called a revolutionary tendency. His conception of the Beethoven symphony was one of which even Carl Zerrahn need not have been ashamed. It was one which could not have aroused very greatly the combativeness of Theodore Thomas, an attentive listener. It was thoroughly respectful and eminently respectable. It permitted Tradition to sit with accustomed squareness on her oaken throne, and it diffused a mild and gentle glow of general comfort.

But there is such a thing as carrying a reading too far, even though it be one whose correctness is indisputable. It is said to be necessary for the sculptor to study anatomy. It is not deemed essential, however, that he should practice the science of dissecting. Neither is it essential that a conductor should so far impose his process of intellectual analysis upon a performance that the articulation of the joints of a symphony should be exposed. Yet this was what Paur did.

That inexorable down beat made fate knock at the door with the arsis of every measure, while every phrase came out with neatly trimmed corners. In the simple, elementary rhythm of the final march this square-cut manner was decidedly in place; in the sensuous andante it was quite as decidedly out. Yet here the splendid quality of the Boston strings came to the conductor's rescue, and gained for him a result which was not his own. On the whole, the performance of the Fifth Symphony was acceptable. To those who are rightly weary of attempts to dramatize Beethoven it must have been a genuine relief. But it was undeniably a cold, calculated correctness that pervaded it, and some hearers must have been reminded of a von Bulow piano recital or a canon by Judassohn.

However, those who were wondering whether there was any real temperament concealed under the somewhat moist exterior, turned with expectancy to the second number, the serenade. Again, weight, force, deliberation, ponderosity. The lovely, languorous, delicately-treated valse came with heavy pulsings and affected ritardandi. Where were all the infinitesimal nuances, the dainty lacework of lights and shades, like sunlight shot through forest boughs, that one Gericke would have scattered through this sinuous scherzando? Was there no lightness in this man? Oh, for a single moment of Gallic volatility, poised on tiptoe, and with an airy kiss blown from fingertips! There is a time to laugh and a time to sing. It is not always time to count three in a bar.

Enough of this serenade. Now for the "Tannhaeuser" overture. Again weight and force, but now also dignity, for the music of the opening measures bears calm, sustained treatment. The end of the Pilgrims' Chorus is reached. The strings slip away into the weird mysteries of the bacchanale. Now, now for more passion. Gradually the agitation of the orchestra grows. There is a grim resolution about the down beat. There is a deep earnestness in the conductor's face. At last! There is a glow under this homely exterior. It is not a flash; not a burst of fire; but it is warmth, and the climax of the overture is reached in a finely-developed, powerfully-accentuated crescendo.

And so we come to the end of this first view of the new man from Leipsic. Final judgment as to his ability cannot now be pronounced. But unless nervousness and anxiety wholly changed the habit of the man, it is safe to say that weight, dignity and correctness, rather than grace, poetry and passion, will prove to be the salient qualities of Emil Paur's conducting. These are by no means qualities to be despised. The classic writers left us a very precious legacy, which is safe from violent treatment in the hands of just such men as Paur. Perhaps the modern romanticists may not seem to be quite so romantic under his beat, but that remains to be proved. From his first concert one would naturally expect to find that his most admirable achievement would prove to be the explication of a Bach fugue.

The attitude of the audiences toward the new conductor was not inspiriting. The applause was of a conservative nature. Perhaps in the future, when Boston is better acquainted with Mr. Paur, he may arouse enthusiasm.

Frank Damosch's Singing Class.

Preliminary Meetings—Instruction to Be Given in Five Halls Each Evening.

Two meetings were held Oct. 13 to make final arrangements for the reopening of the free singing classes which were started by Frank Damrosch last winter and proved a success. The meetings were held in Adelphi Hall, Fifty-second street and Broadway, and Aschenbroedel Hall, 146 East Eighty-sixth street.

Mr. Damrosch and Edward King explained the objects and methods of the classes. Mrs. Crowly was at the meeting in Adelphi Hall, and took a lively interest in the proceedings. There were about 400 people at this meeting, the majority of whom were girls.

"We hope," Mr. Damrosch said, "to get up a great choral union in New York, which will have 3,000 or 4,000 voices, and will become a permanent institution. From what I learned of the latent talent of New York last year, I believe this can be easily accomplished."

As most of Mr. Damrosch's audience was made up of his pupils of last year, his hearers looked pleased with themselves. The men cheered and the girls waved their pocket handkerchiefs.

Mr. Damrosch went on to say that they had $1,000 left over from last year. They could easily get the expenses met by subscription, but he thought the pupils would not like that plan. As they did last year, every pupil would be required to pay 10 cents every Sunday. This would be to meet the expenses of hiring halls, printing music and other incidentals. The teaching would be free.

There will be five classes, each beginning at 3 o'clock every Sunday afternoon. They will meet in Adelphi Hall, Aschenbroedel Hall, Caledonia Hall, Jackson square; Cooper Union, and a hall to be selected this week on the east side. The Cooper Union class will be composed of the pupils who made the most progress last year, and will be taught by Mr. Damrosch himself.

There were about 1,500 people in Aschenbroedel Hall, and to them also Mr. Damrosch made an explanatory speech.—"Sun."

Gounod o Personal Exp ession in Religious Music.

The "Scintilla," published at Venice, gives the following characteristic letter from M. Gounod, who died Wednesday in his 76th year. Says the composer of "Faust": "Art is not the slave of any formula, and the great geniuses have triumphed precisely in freeing themselves from it. I say formula, and not form; the latter being quite another thing. Formula is form without life; it is routine. Art is a word. The part and duty of a word is to find expression and to be sincere. That being agreed on, I recognize and assert strongly that the church has and ought to have its own language, which is distinguished from that of the great geniuses in that it is impersonal,—that is to say, not the prayer of individuals, but of all. It is not a solo, but a unison. Now, however deep, sincere, ardent, powerful be the expression of an individual work, this work cannot become the work of all. That is not its aim nor its intention. But as soon as the church opens the doors of its temples to resources other than voices and the organ, and which come from without—as the orchestra—it recognizes and proclaims by that very fact the right of personal expression in religious music. This is, I think, the truth of the matter."

Guilmant in Pittsburg.

An audience, remarkable for its size and quality, assembled at Carnegie Music Hall on Monday evening to hear the prince of living organists, Alexander Guilmant, play upon the king of instruments. It is doubtful if a similar entertainment ever drew so large an attendance in the two cities, and certainly all were amply repaid. It is equally certain that the ten-thousand-dollar beauty in the Music Hall never revealed its capacities as it did under the masterful touch of Guilmant. His playing is characterized by perfect phrasing and delicate, yet forceful touch, and his pedaling is simply marvelous. In the sixth number, "Canon in B Minor," this was heard to advantage, the staccato, even pizzicato, effects of a string orchestra being wonderfully reproduced. In soft passages Guilmant's deft and intelligent manipulation of the stops and his exquisite touch fairly carried away his hearers and aroused the heartiest applause. His surpassing skill as an improvisatore was revealed in his improvisations on the theme, submitted by Mr. Gittings. "The Portugese Hymn." Altogether, in bringing Mr. Guilmant to this city Mr. Gittings has placed all lovers of

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
MONDAY MORNING, OCT. 30, 1893.

The Symphony Concert.

There was a decided advance all along the line, in the performance of Saturday's programme. Not only was there a clearness and precision to which we have latterly been strangers, but the reserve and pedagogic character which characterized the reading of some of the works of the first two concerts here vanished altogether; some of the movements were given with a dramatic power that was as welcome as it was unexpected. Mr. Paur evidently believes in giving the symphony while the audience is fresh and full of attention, and therefore, as in the first concert, the largest work began the programme.

Goetz has proved to the world that it is not impossible for a genius to starve even in the present generation. His single symphony is much more than an echo of the Schumann works, and it was an interesting novelty in the repertoire of our concerts. When this same symphony was given in Vienna (Feb. 18, 5) the composer was unable to accept an invitation to attend the performance because of his inability to bear the expense of the railroad fare! While he did not absolutely perish by starvation, his poverty undoubtedly hastened his end, and he died in the "fatal thirties" as did Mozart and Schubert, and indirectly from a similar combat with the wolf at the door. It would be folly to rank the symphony in F with the masterpieces of the two preceding concerts, but it is graceful, symmetrical, the composer does not stagger under the large form, and in every way it formed a good selection for the programme.

It began with commendable warmth and vigor, and the brilliancy of the orchestra in the rather intricate development gave augury of an excellent concert, a promise that was abundantly fulfilled. The second movement is full of effects for the wind instruments. This department of the orchestra had already shown its mettle in the second concert, in the Schubert symphony, and now repeated the good impression. The woodwind is better than it has been in a long time, and the horns are decidedly improving, although they are not yet at the standard which they held when the eccentric Reiter (he of the Gypsy locks and ferocious manner) was first horn. However, in this movement, all of the wind instruments did splendid work. There was not the suspicion of a break on any of the brasses, the clarinettes did perfect work, and the flute obbligato (Mr. Molé) was especially brilliant. This movement aroused especial enthusiasm.

The adagio comes in third place in this work, for purposes of contrast, and has a peculiar charm in its horn duet, which was well played, and in its theme for first violins against pizzicati in the deeper strings, which went magnificently. There was a romance in the reading as well as in the orchestral details, and it proved that our new conductor is by no means a one-sided man. The success was continued to the end of the work, and the breadth of the finale was striking. The serenade for Strings (Volkmann, D minor) was, of course, well played, for this part of our orchestra is as fine a body of musicians as can be found anywhere, and Mr. Alwyn Schroeder was the soloist, and won great applause in his work; but the work is too long for what it has to say. It begins with a most characteristic theme, elegiac in character, suggestive of Ossianic plaints or mournful Jeremiads. There are some vidid contrasts made by the introduction of bold folk-themes, which were taken by the orchestra with fine ensemble, but as a whole the work presents an intentional monotony of sorrow which at last becomes irritating as a Mrs. Gummidge, being almost as constantly in tears as that lachrymose female.

The best came last. Beethoven's Leonora overture No. 3 is the most dramatic work of its kind. It lost nothing in the reading or in the performance. If it was theatrical it had the full right to be so. The wild rush of strings picturing the fierce Pizarro springing upon the helpless Florestan, the prompt entrance of the distant trumpet call, the glorious contrast of the theme of thanksgiving following this signal of deliverance, the shading of the second, louder, call, showing that the governor is at the very portals, the flute passages of the finale, the syncopations of the coda (especially clear were these) and the almost deliriously brilliant violin passages of the end, these were some of the points of the performance. There was an occasional freedom in tempo, but no distortion, and, with due gratitude be it spoken, nothing that savored of bombast. If this standard can be maintained we may feel absolutely serene when Daniel goes into the lions' den, and our leader is heard in New York.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Courier.
SUNDAY MORNING, OCT. 29, 1893.

The third Symphony Concert was an agreeably short performance of only three numbers. It was a solo programme, too, its central selection being a sweet and graceful serenade for violoncello, written by Volkmann, and displaying more his melodious and sensuous moods than those strong and stormy phases of temperament which his distinctly orchestral work is wont to show. The player was Mr. Alwin Schroeder, whom to name is to praise, since a performance by him is sure to exhibit a sure but unostentatious mastery of the technique of his instrument, a nice appreciation of the structure of whatsoever composition he chooses and much warmth of sympathy with its interior character. He is never a vehement player, in respect either to tone or emphasis, but his art is true and fine, which is better than power rudely or carelessly manifested. Strictly speaking, the construction of this serenade is such that the 'cello part might be considered in the light of an obligato, rather than as a formal solo. Being written entirely for the string band, and the responses between the violins and the 'cello being frequent, the effect is necessarily different from that of a regular concerto. But the form and treatment suit well with the idea and the result is no less poetic than pleasing.

The symphony which began the evening was that by Goetze, in F, which was heard under Mr. Nikisch's direction in November, 1889. It is not a great composition, if you will, because its thoughts are simple its development unforced and its sentiment natural. It makes no attempt to overwhelm with power, to astonish by strangeness or puzzle by mystery. It used the full standard orchestra and is therewith well content. It shows melodic invention, contrapuntal skill (particularly in the second and last movements), and has so much alternate gaiety and placidity of temper as to make it a general favorite.

The overture, placed at the end of the programme, was Beethoven's "Leonore, No. 3," which surely needs only a mention to have its magnificently dramatic character recalled to any Boston concert goer.

The performance of this programme gave ample assurance that Mr. Paur is to be something more than a formalist or will care for something more than precision. There was no lack of variety in his treatment and the mass of the orchestra was swayed more easily and pliantly than on either of the previous evenings. It must be borne in mind that there was great need of exactitude and obedience to the very inception of the conductor's beat, and that, until these were obtained, it was too soon to attempt the delicacies of phrasing or the refinements of expression. But from the finished fineness of the allegretto in the symphony to the tremendous vigor of the finale in the overture, was a far cry, and that, admirably distinguished as these were, there was no less justice in the fanciful wanderings of the serenade, the smooth sweetness of the adagio of the symphony and the great speed and energy of its last movement. Many minor details of which we cannot now pause to speak, were equally well distinguished in intention and execution, and that the attentive audience felt the growing warmth and breadth of the conducting was made plain by the readiness and earnestness of the applause, which called Mr. Paur forward again and again after the symphony and the serenade. The latter tribute was gracefully shared with Mr. Shroeder, who had deserved well indeed.

Next weeks programme will have one novelty—Richard Strauss's F minor symphony. Saint-Saen's "Rouet d' Omphale" and Brahm's "Academic Festival" overture will also be played, and Mrs. Emma Eames Story will sing from Massenet's "Cid" and Gheck's "Armido."

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

The Kneisel Quartette are to have an unusually successful season judging from the advance sale of tickets. The programme prepared includes many interesting novelties. Musical people find these concerts a rare treat. Mr. Kneisel has entirely recovered from his lameness.

The concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Sanders Theatre are among the chief events of the Cambridge social season and not a few Bostonians who can never hear this superb orchestra too often find their way to this cosy music hall. The programme for the first concert is a fine one and Mme. Nordica has some choice numbers.

MONDAY, OCTOBER 30, 1893.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the third symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Goetz: Symphony in F major, Opus 9.
Volkmann: Serenade for strings, No. 3, in D minor, Opus 36. ('Cello solo: Mr. Alwin Schroeder.)
Beethoven: Oaerture to "Leonore," No. 3, in C major, Opus 72.

The Goetz symphony is an old friend whom one is glad to meet again, especially as such meetings do not come about often. It is a work of highly cultured talent rather than of genius; yet the line separating it from mere Kapellmeister-Musik is sufficiently distinctly drawn. The composer's inspiration flows in a rather tenuous stream, but it is recognizably genuine inspiration, for all that. Goetz was too young, in experience as a composer, if not actually in years, when he wrote it, to impress upon it the stamp of a sharply outlined individuality; he was still in what would have been recognized as his "first period," had he been spared to live and grow in strength and mastery. But it is excellently well written and genial music, albeit one feels that it is not destined to outlive the ages. Except the Intermezzo, there is little in the work that one would care to go to any trouble to preserve; it is all good, but not good enough to take up the room of better things. The Intermezzo, however, is a gem, a bit of real inspiration and not a little originality. Some of us can remember the unbounded enthusiasm it created here when the symphony was first given, some twenty and odd years ago, in the old Harvard Musical days; the more hot-headed were even ready to rank it with the scherze in Gade's B-flat symphony, or the one in his symphony in C minor. And it is saying not a little for it that it still retains its charm. The performance given the work by Mr. Paur and the orchestra was in every respect admirable; it was highly finished, well-shaded, thoroughly artistic playing, giving the clearest idea of just what music is. Particularly one was the way in which Goetz's instrumentation was allowed to retain its true flavor, regardless of consequences. The symphony is scored with classic moderation and a delicacy that reminds one somewhat of Gade, Sterndale Bennett, and others of the Leipzig school; it is a sort of orchestration which, for good or evil, is now a thing of the past, and is, moreover, by no means adapted to produce any very striking effect in places like our Music Hall—especially nowadays that our ears have grown accustomed to more boldly sonorous scoring. But Mr. Paur was content to take the symphony as the symphony was meant and let the effect take care of itself; if the hall was too big, that was the fault of the hall and none of his business; he did not try to "modernize" the instrumentation by over-strenuous playing, to make it vie in effect with any modern thunderings.

The Volkmann serenade brings to our mind the question once more: Why try to dig up the poor old composer from his grave and make him revisit thus the glimpses of the moon—not in complete steel, but as a very diaphanous ghost, the stars dim-twinkling through him? He was a hard and sincere worker during a tolerably long life, and an unkind and too careless world rewarded him with starvation; but, now that he is past apologizing to, what is the need of trying to give him a semblance of posthumous popularity? It does him no good and it bores the rest of the world mightily. Il n' y a que les morts qui ne reviennent pas,—would that this were true! for Volkmann is dead, dead as a door-nail, and not all the king's horses nor all the king's men can galvanize him into life again. Mr. Schroeder played the 'cello very beautifully, indeed the playing of all the strings calls for nothing but commendation.

To Mr. Paur's reading of the great "Leonore" overture we would only apply the pudding test. Fo doubt his conception of the work is amply defensible—on paper or viva voce; but, to the ear, it does not defend itself. It was a thoroughly ineffective and, what was still worse, ineffective at the expense of great seeming effort. The trouble was not only that Mr. Paur's frequent changes of speed broke up the composition into small sections, thus destroying all continuity of impression, but that each change, in itself, seemed too purely voluntary, made with a set and conscious purpose, instead of impressing one as the immediate, uncontrollable expression of a momentary emotion. This constant shifting of the tempo seems to work more ruin in Beethoven than in almost any other composer in the whole list; these sudden fits of più mosso and meno mosso affect one much like Laputan flappers, intended to act as a fillip to the languishing attention of an audience. The born and bred Laputan, immersed in his own lofty musings, needed the application of the flapper, to remind him that conversation was going forward to which it were well for him to attend; but to us, already interested and absorbed in the conversation, as we are, the flapper is a mere unwelcome interruption, calling our attention to nothing but itself. These effects make a mosaic out of a work that in itself is no mosaic at all, but rather a constant organic development, a growing of something stronger and more vital out of something already strong and vital that precedes it; it is this continuous growth that, as much as anything else, gives the work its enormous dramatic interest and impressiveness. Break it up into disjoined sections, and the music loses all its momentum; every section has to make a fresh start for itself, at an incalculable loss of energy. The advocates of this over-elaborate and miscalled "expressive" style of interpreting Beethoven are fond of speaking of the opposite, to our mind more natural, method as "barrel-organ grinding!" To this we would only oppose the suggestion that "interpreting" Beethoven, is at least as apposite a term for what they like so much: for, in listening to a disclosure through the medium of an interpreter, one may get an understanding of its meaning, but the process is so laborious that the native flavor, aroma and fire of it are all but inevitably lost.

The next programme is, "Richard Strauss, symphony in F minor, opus 12; Massenet, aria from "Le Cid; "Saint-Saëns, symphonic poem, "Le Rouet d'Omphale;" Gluck, aria from "Armido;" Brahms, Academic Festival-Overture, opus 86. Mme. Emma Eames will be the singer.

For the first Kneisel Concert, in Chickering Hall tonight, the programme includes two quartets—Beethoven, F-major, op. 59, and Haydn, G-minor—and Brahms's quintet, F-major, op. 88.

BOSTON DAILY TRAVELLER
MONDAY, OCTOBER 30, 1893.

THE THIRD SYMPHONY.

A Charming Programme Ably Rendered.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall Saturday evening. The following programme was given:

Symphony in F major, op. 9.....H. Goetz
Serenade for strings in D minor, op. 69 ..... Volkman
('Cello solo by Mr. Alwin Schroeder).
Overture to "Leonora," No. 3 ...Beethoven

The Goetz Symphony was first performed in this country by the Philharmonic Orchestra at Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, Jan. 8, 1880. Later in the same month the Harvard Orchestra played it in Boston. It has also been played by Gericke in March, 1887, and Nikisch in November, 1889. This symphony shows the hand of the schoiarly composer, for its polyhony is admirable. It is replete with beautiful melodies and is scored in the modern vein. The Intermezzo is the most pleasing and the most original movement of the work. It was delightfully played by the orchestra.

The Adagio comes next in interest and originality, but it is rather prolonged in the working out. The lively poetic theme at the beginning of this movement was too loudly given out by the strings, and its delicacy and sentiment were thus marred. There is contrast in plenty in this movement, but it requires a more delicate touch and a more exacting gradation of dynamics to display its full values in shading than our new conductor has shown thus far in his interpretations. The first movement and the last movement are specimens of the fine musicianship of the composer, and though not particularly melodious at length, are spirited and brilliant in their development. In the last movement one is reminded forcibly of Schumann.

This symphony is of sufficient calibre to cause one to regret that its composer should have died so early in life, which event took place in 1876, in his 36th year, from overwork caused by poverty.

The Volkmann Serenade, which has been heard in Boston several times since its first production by the Philharmonic Orchestra in 1879 is a delightful composition, full of romance, and graceful in its setting for the instruments. The solo was delightfully played by Mr. Schroeder, and the orchestra in its efforts displayed the remarkable delicacy and precision for which it is so justly famous. The audience was enraptured with the performance.

Mr. Paur scored a great success in his conception of the Beethoven overture, and in the magnificent rendering, the result of his masterly conducting of the orchestra in the delineation of his conception was apparent. It was dramatic in the extreme and showed that he is possessed of a musical temperament that must in the course of his career here display some rare qualities and stamp him as a musician of deep emotions. Rarely, if ever, has this noble overture been so wonderfully interpreted in our concert halls. The audience recognized this fact with tremendous applause.

Mr. Paur constantly impresses his listeners that he is a musician earnest and serious in his work, of high musical instincts, and a large degree of feeling, with the ability and determination necessary to have the renderings correspond to his conception and desires. His work shows evidence of virility, and is marked by a most careful effort as regards his ideas of the expression of the piece. His beat is firm and intelligent, and the players respond readily to its indications. As a conductor he is infinitely the superior of his immediate predecessor, and when he shall have gained a better defined gradation of dynamics, and more repose at times, the playing of the orchestra will in its effect approach closely the wonderful perfection that marked its efforts under Mr. Gericke.

Mr. Paur has already gained the highest regard of his critical listeners because of his sterling qualities. The concert on Saturday evening was of a most happy length. Next Saturday evening the programme will present the symphony in F-minor, by Richard Strauss; the Symphonic poem, "Le Rouet d'Omphale," Saint-Saens; and Brahms's "Academic Festival" overture. Mrs. Emma Eames will be the soloist.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

[35]

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
MONDAY MORNING, OCT. 30, 1893.

The Symphony Concert.

There was a decided advance all along the line, in the performance of Saturday's programme. Not only was there a clearness and precision to which we have latterly been strangers, but the reserve and pedagogic character which characterized the reading of some of the works of the first two concerts here vanished altogether; some of the movements were given with a dramatic power that was as welcome as it was unexpected. Mr. Paur evidently believes in giving the symphony while the audience is fresh and full of attention, and therefore, as in the first concert, the largest work began the programme.

Goetz has proved to the world that it is not impossible for a genius to starve even in the present generation. His single symphony is much more than an echo of the Schumann works, and it was an interesting novelty in the repertoire of our concerts. When this same symphony was given in Vienna (Feb. 1875) the composer was unable to accept an invitation to attend the performance because of his inability to bear the expense of the railroad fare! While he did not absolutely perish by starvation, his poverty undoubtedly hastened his end, and he died in the "fatal thirties" as did Mozart and Schubert, and indirectly from a similar combat with the wolf at the door. It would be folly to rank the symphony in F with the masterpieces of the two preceding concerts, but it is graceful, symmetrical, the composer does not stagger under the large form, and in every way it formed a good selection for the programme.

It began with commendable warmth and vigor, and the brilliancy of the orchestra in the rather intricate development gave augury of an excellent concert, a promise that was abundantly fulfilled. The second movement is full of effects for the wind instruments. This department of the orchestra had already shown its mettle in the second concert, in the Schubert symphony, and now repeated the good impression. The woodwind is better than it has been in a long time, and the horns are decidedly improving, although they are not yet at the standard which they held when the eccentric Reiter (he of the Gypsy locks and ferocious manner) was first horn. However, in this movement, all of the wind instruments did splendid work. There was not the suspicion of a break on any of the brasses, the clarinettes did perfect work, and the flute obbligato (Mr. Molé) was especially brilliant. This movement aroused especial enthusiasm.

The adagio comes in third place in this work, for purposes of contrast, and has a peculiar charm in its horn duet, which was well played, and in its theme for first violins against pizzicati in the deeper strings, which went magnificently. There was a romance in the reading as well as in the orchestral details, and it proved that our new conductor is by no means a one-sided man. The success was continued to the end of the work, and the breadth of the finale was striking. The serenade for Strings (Volkmann, D minor) was, of course, well played, for this part of our orchestra is as fine a body of musicians as can be found anywhere, and Mr. Alwyn Schroeder was the soloist, and won great applause in his work; but the work is too long for what it has to say. It begins with a most characteristic theme, elegiac in character, suggestive of Ossianic plaints or mournful Jeremiads. There are some vidid contrasts made by the introduction of bold folk-themes, which were taken by the orchestra with fine ensemble, but as a whole the work presents an intentional monotony of sorrow which at last becomes irritating as a Mrs. Gummidge, being almost as constantly in tears as that lachrymose female.

The best came last. Beethoven's Leonora overture No. 3 is the most dramatic work of its kind. It lost nothing in the reading or in the performance. If it was theatrical it had the full right to be so. The wild rush of strings picturing the fierce Pizarro springing upon the helpless Florestan, the prompt entrance of the distant trumpet call, the glorious contrast of the theme of thanksgiving following this signal of deliverance, the shading of the second, louder, call, showing that the governor is at the very portals, the flute passages of the finale, the syncopations of the coda (especially clear were these) and the almost deliriously brilliant violin passages of the end, these were some of the points of the performance. There was an occasional freedom in tempo, but no distortion, and, with due gratitude be it spoken, nothing that savored of bombast. If this standard can be maintained we may feel absolutely serene when Daniel goes into the lions' den, and our leader is heard in New York.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Courier.
SUNDAY MORNING, OCT. 29, 1893.

The third Symphony Concert was an agreeably short performance of only three numbers. It was a solo programme, too, its central selection being a sweet and graceful serenade for violoncello, written by Volkmann, and displaying more his melodious and sensuous moods than those strong and stormy phases of temperament which his distinctly orchestral work is wont to show. The player was Mr. Alwin Schroeder, whom to name is to praise, since a performance by him is sure to exhibit a sure but unostentatious mastery of the technique of his instrument, a nice appreciation of the structure of whatsoever composition he chooses and much warmth of sympathy with its interior character. He is never a vehement player, in respect either to tone or emphasis, but his art is true and fine, which is better than power rudely or carelessly manifested. Strictly speaking, the construction of this serenade is such that the 'cello part might be considered in the light of an obligato, rather than as a formal solo. Being written entirely for the string band, and the responses between the violins and the 'cello being frequent, the effect is necessarily different from that of a regular concerto. But the form and treatment suit well with the idea and the result is no less poetic than pleasing.

The symphony which began the evening was that by Goetze, in F, which was heard under Mr. Nikisch's direction in November, 1889. It is not a great composition, if you will, because its thoughts are simple its development unforced and its sentiment natural. It makes no attempt to overwhelm with power, to astonish by strangeness or puzzle by mystery. It used the full standard orchestra and is therewith well content. It shows melodic invention, contrapuntal skill (particularly in the second and last movements), and has so much alternate gaiety and placidity of temper as to make it a general favorite.

The overture, placed at the end of the programme, was Beethoven's "Leonore, No. 3," which surely needs only a mention to have its magnificently dramatic character recalled to any Boston concert goer.

The performance of this programme gave ample assurance that Mr. Paur is to be something more than a formalist or will care for something more than precision. There was no lack of variety in his treatment and the mass of the orchestra was swayed more easily and pliantly than on either of the previous evenings. It must be borne in mind that there was great need of exactitude and obedience to the very inception of the conductor's beat, and that, until these were obtained, it was too soon to attempt the delicacies of phrasing or the refinements of expression. But from the finished fineness of the allegretto in the symphony to the tremendous vigor of the finale in the overture, was a far cry, and that, admirably distinguished as these were, there was no less justice in the fanciful wanderings of the serenade, the smooth sweetness of the adagio of the symphony and the great speed and energy of its last movement. Many minor details of which we cannot now pause to speak, were equally well distinguished in intention and execution, and that the attentive audience felt the growing warmth and breadth of the conducting was made plain by the readiness and earnestness of the applause, which called Mr. Paur forward again and again after the symphony and the serenade. The latter tribute was gracefully shared with Mr. Shroeder, who had deserved well indeed.

Next weeks programme will have one novelty—Richard Strauss's F minor symphony. Saint-Saen's "Rouet d' Omphale" and Brahm's "Academic Festival" overture will also be played, and Mrs. Emma Eames Story will sing from Massenet's "Cid" and Gheck's "Armido."

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

The Kneisel Quartette are to have an unusually successful season judging from the advance sale of tickets. The programme prepared includes many interesting novelties. Musical people find these concerts a rare treat. Mr. Kneisel has entirely recovered from his lameness.

The concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Sanders Theatre are among the chief events of the Cambridge social season and not a few Bostonians who can never hear this superb orchestra too often find their way to this cosy music hall. The programme for the first concert is a fine one and Mme. Nordica has some choice numbers.

Boston Transcript
MONDAY, OCTOBER 30, 1893.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the third symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Goetz: Symphony in F major, Opus 9.
Volkmann: Serenade for strings, No. 3, in D minor, Opus 36. ('Cello solo: Mr. Alwin Schroeder.)
Beethoven: Oaerture to "Leonore," No. 3, in C major, Opus 72.

The Goetz symphony is an old friend whom one is glad to meet again, especially as such meetings do not come about often. It is a work of highly cultured talent rather than of genius; yet the line separating it from mere Kapellmeister-Musik is sufficiently distinctly drawn. The composer's inspiration flows in a rather tenuous stream, but it is recognizably genuine inspiration, for all that. Goetz was too young, in experience as a composer, if not actually in years, when he wrote it, to impress upon it the stamp of a sharply outlined individuality; he was still in what would have been recognized as his "first period," had he been spared to live and grow in strength and mastery. But it is excellently well written and genial music, albeit one feels that it is not destined to outlive the ages. Except the Intermezzo, there is little in the work that one would care to go to any trouble to preserve; it is all good, but not good enough to take up the room of better things. The Intermezzo, however, is a gem, a bit of real inspiration and not a little originality. Some of us can remember the unbounded enthusiasm it created here when the symphony was first given, some twenty and odd years ago, in the old Harvard Musical days; the more hot-headed were even ready to rank it with the scherze in Gade's B-flat symphony, or the one in his symphony in C minor. And it is saying not a little for it that it still retains its charm. The performance given the work by Mr. Paur and the orchestra was in every respect admirable; it was highly finished, well-shaded, thoroughly artistic playing, giving the clearest idea of just what music is. Particularly one was the way in which Goetz's instrumentation was allowed to retain its true flavor, regardless of consequences. The symphony is scored with classic moderation and a delicacy that reminds one somewhat of Gade, Sterndale Bennett, and others of the Leipzig school; it is a sort of orchestration which, for good or evil, is now a thing of the past, and is, moreover, by no means adapted to produce any very striking effect in places like our Music Hall—especially nowadays that our ears have grown accustomed to more boldly sonorous scoring. But Mr. Paur was content to take the symphony as the symphony was meant and let the effect take care of itself; if the hall was too big, that was the fault of the hall and none of his business; he did not try to "modernize" the instrumentation by over-strenuous playing, to make it vie in effect with any modern thunderings.

The Volkmann serenade brings to our mind the question once more: Why try to dig up the poor old composer from his grave and make him revisit thus the glimpses of the moon—not in complete steel, but as a very diaphanous ghost, the stars dim-twinkling through him? He was a hard and sincere worker during a tolerably long life, and an unkind and too careless world rewarded him with starvation; but, now that he is past apologizing to, what is the need of trying to give him a semblance of posthumous popularity? It does him no good and it bores the rest of the world mightily. Il n' y a que les morts qui ne reviennent pas,—would that this were true! for Volkmann is dead, dead as a door-nail, and not all the king's horses nor all the king's men can galvanize him into life again. Mr. Schroeder played the 'cello very beautifully, indeed the playing of all the strings calls for nothing but commendation.

To Mr. Paur's reading of the great "Leonore" overture we would only apply the pudding test. Fo doubt his conception of the work is amply defensible—on paper or viva voce; but, to the ear, it does not defend itself. It was a thoroughly ineffective and, what was still worse, ineffective at the expense of great seeming effort. The trouble was not only that Mr. Paur's frequent changes of speed broke up the composition into small sections, thus destroying all continuity of impression, but that each change, in itself, seemed too purely voluntary, made with a set and conscious purpose, instead of impressing one as the immediate, uncontrollable expression of a momentary emotion. This constant shifting of the tempo seems to work more ruin in Beethoven than in almost any other composer in the whole list; these sudden fits of più musso and meno mosso affect one much like Laputan flappers, intended to act as a fillip to the languishing attention of an audience. The born and bred Laputan, immersed in his own lofty musings, needed the application of the flapper, to remind him that conversation was going forward to which it were well for him to attend; but to us, already interested and absorbed in the conversation, as we are, the flapper is a mere unwelcome interruption, calling our attention to nothing but itself. These effects make a mosaic out of a work that in itself is no mosaic at all, but rather a constant organic development, a growing of something stronger and more vital out of something already strong and vital that precedes it; it is this continuous growth that, as much as anything else, gives the work its enormous dramatic interest and impressiveness. Break it up into disjoined sections, and the music loses all its momentum; every section has to make a fresh start for itself, at an incalculable loss of energy. The advocates of this over-elaborate and miscalled "expressive" style of interpreting Beethoven are fond of speaking of the opposite, to our mind more natural, method as "barrel-organ grinding!" To this we would only oppose the suggestion that "interpreting" Beethoven, is at least as apposite a term for what they like so much: for, in listening to a disclosure through the medium of an interpreter, one may get an understanding of its meaning, but the process is so laborious that the native flavor, aroma and fire of it are all but inevitably lost.

The next programme is, "Richard Strauss, symphony in F minor, opus 12; Massenet, aria from "Le Cid;" Saint-Saëns, symphonic poem, "Le Rouet d'Omphale;" Gluck, aria from "Armide;" Brahms, Academic Festival-Overture, opus 86. Mme. Emma Eames will be the singer.

For the first Kneisel Concert, in Chickering Hall tonight, the programme includes two quartets—Beethoven, F-major, op. 59, and Haydn, G-minor—and Brahms's quintet, F-major, op. 88.

The symphony [illegible] concert in the Sanders Theatre [illegible] day night. The fourth in the Music Hall course will be given on Friday afternoon and Saturday night. The programme for Thursday night is made up of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, Dvorák's second rhapsody and Berlioz's "Benvenuto Cellini" overture with Schubert's song, "The Erl-King," and the great aria from "Fidelio" which Mme. Nordica will sing.

BOSTON DAILY TRAVELLER
MONDAY, OCTOBER 30, 1893.

THE THIRD SYMPHONY.

A Charming Programme Ably Rendered.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall Saturday evening. The following programme was given:

Symphony in F major, op. 9.....H. Goetz
Serenade for strings in D minor, op. 69.....Volkman
('Cello solo by Mr. Alwin Schroeder).
Overture to "Leonora," No. 3 ...Beethoven

The Goetz Symphony was first performed in this country by the Philharmonic Orchestra at Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, Jan. 8, 1880. Later in the same month the Harvard Orchestra played it in Boston. It has also been played by Gericke in March, 1887, and Nikisch in November, 1889. This symphony shows the hand of the schoiarly composer, for its polyhony is admirable. It is replete with beautiful melodies and is scored in the modern vein. The Intermezzo is the most pleasing and the most original movement of the work. It was delightfully played by the orchestra.

The Adagio comes next in interest and originality, but it is rather prolonged in the working out. The lively poetic theme at the beginning of this movement was too loudly given out by the strings, and its delicacy and sentiment were thus marred. There is contrast in plenty in this movement, but it requires a more delicate touch and a more exacting gradation of dynamics to display its full values in shading than our new conductor has shown thus far in his interpretations. The first movement and the last movement are specimens of the fine musicianship of the composer, and though not particularly melodious at length, are spirited and brilliant in their development. In the last movement one is reminded forcibly of Schumann.

This symphony is of sufficient calibre to cause one to regret that its composer should have died so early in life, which event took place in 1876, in his 36th year, from overwork caused by poverty.

The Volkmann Serenade, which has been heard in Boston several times since its first production by the Philharmonic Orchestra in 1879 is a delightful composition, full of romance, and graceful in its setting for the instruments. The solo was delightfully played by Mr. Schroeder, and the orchestra in its efforts displayed the remarkable delicacy and precision for which it is so justly famous. The audience was enraptured with the performance.

Mr. Paur scored a great success in his conception of the Beethoven overture, and in the magnificent rendering, the result of his masterly conducting of the orchestra in the delineation of his conception was apparent. It was dramatic in the extreme and showed that he is possessed of a musical temperament that must in the course of his career here display some rare qualities and stamp him as a musician of deep emotions. Rarely, if ever, has this noble overture been so wonderfully interpreted in our concert halls. The audience recognized this fact with tremendous applause.

Mr. Paur constantly impresses his listeners that he is a musician earnest and serious in his work of high musical instincts, and a large degree of feeling, with the ability and determination necessary to have the renderings correspond to his conception and desires. His work shows evidence of virility, and is marked by a most careful effort as regards his ideas of the expression of the piece. His beat is firm and intelligent, and the players respond readily to its indications. As a conductor he is infinitely the superior of his immediate predecessor, and when he shall have gained a better defined gradation of dynamics, and more repose at times, the playing of the orchestra will in its effect approach closely the wonderful perfection that marked its efforts under Mr. Gericke.

Mr. Paur has already gained the highest regard of his critical listeners because of his sterling qualities. The concert on Saturday evening was of a most happy length. Next Saturday evening the programme will present the symphony in F-minor, by Richard Strauss; the Symphonic poem, "Le Rouet d'Omphale," Saint-Saens; and Brahms's "Academic Festival" overture. Mrs. Emma Eames will be the soloist.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

[35]

[illegible]

TUESDAY, OCT. [illegible]

[illegible] Hall: The Kneisel Quartet.

The Kneisel Quartet, assisted by Mr. Max Zach (second viola), gave the first concert of this, its ninth, season in Chickering Hall last evening, the programme being as follows:

Beethoven: Quartet in F major, Opus 59, No. 1.
Haydn: Quartet in G minor, Opus 74, No. 3
Brahms: Quintet in F major, Opus 88.

There was a large audience present and of as enthusiastic temper as we have ever seen at a classical chamber-concert. A warm greeting to the club at the outset, as to old and tried friends, was a matter of course; there was nothing unusual either in the applause that followed each movement of the first Rasoumoffski quartet; it was respectfully appreciative, but not particularly enthusiastic. But with the Haydn quartet the audience began to come up to the boiling-point; and with the Brahms quintet outspoken enthusiasm became the order of the day. This is worth putting on record; for the first Rasoumoffski quartet, though an old concert hack, is also an old favorite—perhaps the best liked here of all the Beethoven quartets—and neither Haydn nor Brahms can claim to be especial favorites with the public; they are not the ones who, as a rule, come in for the lion's share of the applause. Are we to conclude from this that the better portion of our concert-going public—for a quartet concert may always fairly be assumed to attract the cream of any public—has come to appreciate Haydn at his true value, and is already in a fair way to understand Brahms? Not wholly, probably. No doubt the Haydn Quartet would not have called forth such rapturous plaudits if the audience had not really liked it, and the Brahms Quintet, although one of the greatest and withal clearest things the composer has written, would not have been so warmly greeted if the listeners had not at least seen daylight in it; this may be safely assumed. But it is highly probable that the playing had more to do than anything else with the enthusiasm excited by the last two numbers on the programme, compared with the calmer and more contained marks of appreciation bestowed upon the first.

There is a sharply defined boundary line that separates excellent playing from really great playing; and the difference between the two is one which even an average audience is pretty quick to perceive. Any careful observer of concert audiences can notice this. Take an example not long ago: when Paderewski, last season, played Beethoven's sonata in E-flat, opus 31, No. 3, the audience took the first movement and the Scherzo quite calmly, but rose at once to the highest pitch of enthusiasm over the Minuet and Finale. In the same way, when Von Bülow played this very sonata seventeen years before, the audience went positively wild over the Scherzo, but took the other three movements far more quietly. Why? Simply because Von Bülow's playing of the first movement, Minuet and Finale and Paderewski's playing of the first movement and the Scherzo did not rise above the level of what might be called absolutely fine playing; but Von Bülow's playing of the Scherzo and Paderewski's of the Minuet and Finale rose far above this level, reaching that of positive genius, originality, and true greatness. Paderewski's playing of the last two movements and Von Bülow's of the Scherzo marked an epoch in the musical experience of all who heard them; one may even venture to assert that no one present on either of the two occasions had ever imagined before how much there was in the movements in question; the playing threw a wholly new and unsuspectedly brilliant light upon them. And the audience appreciated this at once. Indeed audiences know when playing is magnetic as well as anyone.

Now, last evening, there was just this difference between the way the Quartet played the first Rasoumoffski and the manner in which they played the Haydn and the Brahms. The Beethoven quartet was admirably played, with accuracy, thoroughness of conception, and fine expressiveness; still the performance lacked that magnetic quality which makes playing cross the boundary line between excellence and greatness. But, with the Haydn quartet, the electric sparks began to fly, and, with the Brahms quintet, all the five players, the audience, the whole surrounding atmosphere, were thoroughly charged with electricity. The performance of the latter may take rank with that never-to-be-forgotten performance of the Brahms C minor symphony under Mr. Nikisch some two or three years ago; it showed the great work in its truest, finest and highest light, in a light which could illumine its profoundest depths and make their meaning visible even to the uninitiated. Never has the Kneisel Quartet done finer work.

[illegible]

TUESDAY MORNING, OCT. 31, 1893.

The Kneisel Quartette Concert.

At the first concert of this, the ninth, season of the Kneisel Quartette, the large audience that was brought to Chickering Hall last night was a very flattering evidence of the success attained by the quartette in the past eight years in Boston. Among the audience were Herr Paur and his wife, and the new conductor of the symphony orchestra was evidently interested in the work of the quartette and applauded heartily.

The first number of last night's programme was the Beethoven quartette in F major (op. 59, No. 1). The opening bars of the allegro, in which the 'cello carries the melody to the accompaniment of the violin and second violin, and the fugue-like movement following were given with special delicacy and artistic feeling, and the song of the answering strings in the allegretto vivace following was rendered quaintly and fitly, while the "adagio molto è mesto," merging into the allegro with its Russian theme, was almost faultless in its execution. In many respects the interpretation of the Beethoven quartette was the best of the evening's work. The grand theme of the adagio is so full of beauty, blended with tenderness, that it requires high artistic feeling, as well as skill, to avoid undue haste on the one hand or heaviness on the other; but the golden mean was well kept throughout the movement.

The second number was the Haydn quartette in G minor (op. 74, No. 3). The allegro was taken, perhaps, a trifle too slowly, but the "largo assai" closely following made the fault hardly noticeable; while when the allegretto was taken up with its dainty minuet, rythmic and sedately bright, there was little room for criticism.

In the closing number, Brahms' quintette in F major (op. 88), the quartette was assisted by Mr. Max Zach. This number closely rivalled the Beethoven quartette in the admirably correct interpretation given. All its beauty of color and shading was brought out in a nearly perfect manner, and the rare swing of the allegro, the real dignity of the second movement and the sprightly "presto" of the final movement were equally deserving of strong praise.

Altogether the evening's programme was thoroughly successful, especially in view of the mishap which was recently suffered by Mr. Kneisel, but of which there was no indication in the work of the first violin. The personnel of the audience and the hearty applause given so often during the evening were such as any musical organization might envy.

Boston Daily Globe.

TUESDAY, OCT. 31, 1893.

First Kneisel Quartet Concert.

Messrs Kneisel, Roth, Svecenski and Schroeder of the Kneisel quartet never played better than they did last night, at the opening concert of the season. A thoroughly representative Boston musical audience filled Chickering hall and warmly applauded each member of the organization as he came on the stage. Herr Paur, Mr Lang, Mr Chadwick, Mr Foote, Mr T. Adamowski, Mr Loeffler, Mr Hubbard and others prominent in the musical world were some of the most attentive listeners.

The program was an extremely interesting and somewhat varied one. It consisted of the Beethoven F major quartet, the Haydn G minor quartet and the Brahms quintet in F major. In this last number Mr Max Zach assisted.

The Beethoven quartet was superbly done and was quite the gem of the evening; the adagio movement has certainly never been better given in Boston, and it seems impossible that it could be played more skilfully. The allegro showed a little unsteadiness in some places, but after that the performance was beyond adverse criticism.

The composition itself is so broad and grand in every way that the Haydn number, which came next, seemed almost trifling in comparison, and yet of its kind it is in the very front rank. The largho was enthusiastically applauded.

The quintet, like all of Brahms' music, seemed long and vague. There were many times when the composer appeared to be hunting for some effect he could not quite get, and when he did get it it was nothing but an ordinary waltz tune. Yet the composition was pleasing to many in the audience and was warmly applauded. Brahms has many admirers in Boston. A prominent musician said the other day that the time would come when Brahms would be looked up to as Beethoven and Bach are today. But it is hoped that time is far distant.

The difficult music of the quintet was exquisitely performed.

Boston Journal.

TUESDAY, OCTOBER 31, 1893.

FIRST KNEISEL CONCERT.

The Kneisel Quartet gave the first concert of its ninth season at Chickering Hall last evening. The programme was as follows:

Quartet in F major, op. 59, No. 1.....Beethoven.
Quartet in G minor, op. 74, No 3.....Haydn.
Quintet in F major, op. 88.....Brahms.

The membership of the quartet has not been changed, and hearty applause greeted the players as they appeared. The audience, as usual, was numerous. The number of musicians present was unusually large, and most noticeable among them was Mr. Paur, who frequently showed his approbation of the playing.

The Beethoven number, not the most interesting number by any means, was played well; was played as any number is always played by the Kneisel Quartet. Mr. Kneisel's capabilities as leader were artistically displayed, and the unrivaled balance of the quartette, always preserved, made attractive quite ordinary passages. The third movement of the first number, however, was performed so faultlessly, the sensuous beauty of the melodious adagio was made so apparent that the audience was more than ordinarily stirred; so much so, in fact, that the worth of the final allegro was considerably diminished thereby.

The quartette of Haydn, masterful and throughout pleasing, was perfectly played.

The quintette, one of the most agreeable of Brahms's compositions, gave the most evident pleasure. The additional part, for second viola was played by Max Zach. The tuneful introduction, the melodious alternating theme were given most pleasingly. Repetition did not detract from the delight afforded, and at the end of the opening allegro the greatest enthusiasm of the evening was manifested. In the playing of the second and third movements the admirable technique of the players gave pleasure where the [illegible] of the music failed; but the [illegible] of the presto again [illegible] and the concert closed [illegible]

[illegible] will be given on Nov. 13.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

TUESDAY MORNING, OCT. 31, 1893.

Chickering Hall was filled last evening with a distinguished and brilliant audience at the opening concert of the Kneisel Quartet, which was postponed from last Monday evening. The splendid work of the quartet in the past has placed it among the leading musical organizations of this country, and the delightful rendering of the programme, which was a pleasing and varied one, evoked much enthusiasm.

The first number was Beethoven's quartet in F major. It was the gem of the evening, and was rendered with a perfection of technique and expression, the 'cello work of Mr. Schroeder calling for special mention. Hayden's quartet in G minor was romantic and dainty and delightfully rendered. Mr. Max Zach assisted as second viola in Brahm's quintet. This selection was played with precision and breadth of tone, and at the close the audience showed its pleasure by hearty applause. Last evening's work would seem to indicate a most successful season. The next concert will be Nov. 13 at Chickering Hall.

Baltimore Life,

BALTIMORE, MD., OCTOBER 28, 18[illegible]

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Lovers of high-class music will be grateful to Manager Ford for arranging a series of concerts by the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has found such favor with the musical public of this city in past seasons. Five afternoon concerts will be given at Ford's Opera House, as follows: Tuesday, Nov. 7, Dec. 12, Jan. 9, Feb. 6 and March 27. The orchestra will be accompanied by solo artists of high repute, including Mme. Nordica, Mr. Max Heinrich, Mr. Kneisel and others. The sale of subscription tickets opens at Albert's ticket office next Tuesday.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCIV. NO. 123.

TUESDAY, OCTOBER 31, 1893.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

The opening concert of the season of the Kneisel quartet is to chamber music what the symphony concert first night is to the events of a larger importance.

Last evening Mr. Franz Kneisel and his associates began their ninth season at Chickering Hall, when the programme included Beethoven's quartet in F major, op. 59, No. 1; Haydn's quartet in G minor, op. 74, No. 3, and Brahms' quintet in F major, op. 88.

The audience in both its numbers and the general character of its membership showed that this quartet commands the best patronage of the city's musical circles, and Mr. Kneisel's personal popularity was unmistakably proven by the ovation attending his entrance. The usual standard of excellence was maintained in the evening's work.

BOSTON EVENING RECORD.

MONDAY, OCTOBER 30,

THE SYMPHONY.

There was a decided advance all along the line, in the performance of Saturday's programme. Not only was there a clearness and precision to which we have latterly been strangers, but the reserve and pedagogic character which characterized the reading of some of the works of the first two concerts here vanished altogether; some of the movements were given with a dramatic power that was as welcome as it was unexpected. Mr. Paur evidently believes in giving the symphony while the audience is fresh and full of attention, and therefore, as in the first concert, the largest work began the programme.

BOSTON DAILY TRAVELLER

WEDNESDAY, NOV. 1, 1893.

MUSIC HALL SITE.

A Good Location for the New Edifice Selected.

The new Music Hall will be erected on the northwest corner of West Chester Park and Huntington avenue.

The committee having the undertaking in charge ask that subscribers pay one half their subscription on or before Nov. 15. A second instalment will be asked for May 15, 1894.

As soon as $200,000 is paid in a corporation will be organized, one share of stock being issued for each $100 paid in, and the question of the purchase of land will be submitted to the stockholders, and later the plans for building.

The capital stock will ultimately be $500,000, and a little over $400,000 is now pledged.

The meeting of stockholders to organize and consider plans will be held about Dec. 1.

The work of preparing the plans is in the hands of McKim, Mead & White of new Public Library fame, and they have already put a great deal of work into the design, but nothing is sufficiently settled as to the style of the building to be announced yet.

Boston Transcript

WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 1, 1893.

The Symphony Orchestra will give the second concert in the Sanders Theatre series tomorrow night. The programme includes Schubert's C major Symphony, Dvorák's second rhapsody and Berlioz's "Benvenuto Cellini" overture, Schubert's "The Erl-King" and the great aria in "Fidelio." Mme. Nordica will be the singer. The fourth concerts in the Music Hall will be given on Friday afternoon and Saturday night, following this programme: Strauss, symphony, op. 12; Massenet, aria from "Le Cid;" Saint-Saëns, symphonic poem, "Le Rouet d'Omphale;" Gluck, aria from "Armide;" Brahms, Academic Festival Overture, op. 80. Emma Eames will be the singer.

The programme with which Mr. Paur will make his first appearance in New York with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Music Hall, Nov. 8, is this Symphony: in C minor, No. 5, Beethoven; air from "The Cid," Massenet; Slavonic Rhapsody, No. 2, Dvorák; air from "Armida," Gluck; overture, "Benvenuto Cellini," Berlioz. Miss Eames will be the singer.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 1, 1893.

Here is the program of the third Symphony concert given last night in Music Hall:

Symphony, F major, op. 9.....Goetz
Serenade for string orchestra, No. 3, D minor.....Volkman
Overture, "Leonore," No. 3.....Beethoven

In two respects at least this concert was delightful; the symphony came first, and the concert was over before half past 9.

It may further be said that the orchestra played well as a rule; that Mr. Schroeder did full justice to the solo 'cello passages in the serenade; that few exceptions could be taken to Mr. Paur's reading, except perhaps in the overture. His reading of the overture was dramatic, yes, feverish. Many of his points were well taken, the wild rush, for instance, just before the first trumpet call. On the other hand he would stop occasionally in the fury of his passion to argue in detail concerning the definition of a word of slight importance.

The program as a whole was dull. At the risk of being charged with blasphemy I admit that I was never convinced of the surpassing musical excellence of Hermann Goetz. I heard his opera "Taming of the Shrew" in Dresden several years ago. It was well sung and beautifully put upon the stage; but surely the music written by Goetz for that text might better go with a tale of passion than with a comedy of lightness, coquetry and farcical instances. It seemed to me then that Goetz lacked true dramatic instinct; that he took his task too seriously. As for the symphony, there are fine passages; there is beauty; there is workmanship of good quality and in plenty, but Schumann's voice is heard throughout the symphony. There is no individuality. You never feel like saying, "That sounds like Goetz." Perhaps it was well for him that he died before he was forty, when men foretold an illustrious future for him. Cursed is he who lives long enough to turn the hope of others to a thing of derision.

* * *

Theodore Thomas was at the Symphony concert and was afterward the guest of the St. Botolph Club at the first of the Saturday evening receptions. Arthur Mees was with him.

John A. O'Shea has written a mass which is published in Boston, and will be sung Christmas at the Immaculate Conception.

The program of the fourth Symphony concert includes symphony F minor, Strauss; "Le Rouet d'Omphale," Saint-Saëns; Brahms' "Academic Festival" overture. Emma Eames will sing airs from "Le Cid" and "Armide."

The first Kneisel Quartet concert will be next Monday evening. The first Adamowski Quartet concert will be next Tuesday afternoon. The Lineff Russian Choir will be here Tuesday evening. Mr. Beresford will give a vocal recital Wednesday evening. Mr. de Pachmann will play Thursday afternoon. And the Tavary Opera Company will be at the Globe Theatre for the week. Here's trouble enough.

PHILIP HALE.

First Boston Symphony Program.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under its new conductor, Mr. Emil Paur, will give its first concert in Carnegie Music Hall on Wednesday evening, November 8. Emma Eames will be the singer, making her first appearance in this city in two years. The program is as follows: Symphony in C minor, No. 5, Beethoven; aria from "Le Cid," Massenet; Rhapsodie No. 2, Dvorák; aria from "Armide," Gluck; overture, "Benvenuto Cellini," Berlioz.

[36]

Boston [illegible]

TUESDAY, OCTOBER 31, 1893.

Chickering Hall: The Kneisel Quartet.

The Kneisel Quartet, assisted by Mr. Max Zach (second viola), gave the first concert of this, its ninth, season in Chickering Hall last evening, the programme being as follows:

Beethoven: Quartet in F major, Opus 59, No. 1.
Haydn: Quartet in G minor, Opus 74, No. 3
Brahms: Quintet in F major, Opus 88.

There was a large audience present and of as enthusiastic temper as we have ever seen at a classical chamber-concert. A warm greeting to the club at the outset, as to old and tried friends, was a matter of course; there was nothing unusual either in the applause that followed each movement of the first Rasoumoffski quartet; it was respectfully appreciative, but not particularly enthusiastic. But with the Haydn quartet the audience began to come up to the boiling-point; and with the Brahms quintet outspoken enthusiasm became the order of the day. This is worth putting on record; for the first Rasoumoffski quartet, though an old concert hack, is also an old favorite—perhaps the best liked here of all the Beethoven quartets—and neither Haydn nor Brahms can claim to be especial favorites with the public; they are not the ones who, as a rule, come in for the lion's share of the applause. Are we to conclude from this that the better portion of our concert-going public—for a quartet concert may always fairly be assumed to attract the cream of any public—has come to appreciate Haydn at his true value, and is already in a fair way to understand Brahms? Not wholly, probably. No doubt the Haydn Quartet would not have called forth such rapturous plaudits if the audience had not really liked it, and the Brahms Quintet, although one of the greatest and withal clearest things the composer has written, would not have been so warmly greeted if the listeners had not at least seen daylight in it; this may be safely assumed. But it is highly probable that the playing had more to do than anything else with the enthusiasm excited by the last two numbers on the programme, compared with the calmer and more sentained marks of appreciation bestowed upon the first.

There is a sharply defined boundary line that separates excellent playing from really great playing; and the difference between the two is one which even an average audience is pretty quick to perceive. Any careful observer of concert audiences can notice this. Take an example not long ago: when Paderewski, last season, played Beethoven's sonata in E-flat, opus 31, No. 3, the audience took the first movement and the Scherzo quite calmly, but rose at once to the highest pitch of enthusiasm over the Minuet and Finale. In the same way, when Von Bülow played this very sonata seventeen years before, the audience went positively wild over the Scherzo, but took the other three movements far more quietly. Why? Simply because Von Bülow's playing of the first movement, Minuet and Finale and Paderewski's playing of the first movement and the Scherzo did not rise above the level of what might be called absolutely fine playing; but Von Bülow's playing of the Scherzo and Paderewski's of the Minuet and Finale rose far above this level, reaching that of positive genius, originality, and true greatness. Paderewski's playing of the last two movements and Von Bülow's of the Scherzo marked an epoch in the musical experience of all who heard them; one may even venture to assert that no one present on either of the two occasions had ever imagined before how much there was in the movements in question; the playing threw a wholly new and unsuspectedly brilliant light upon them. And the audience appreciated this at once. Indeed audiences know when playing is magnetic as well as anyone.

Now, last evening, there was just this difference between the way the Quartet played the first Rasoumoffski and the manner in which they played the Haydn and the Brahms. The Beethoven quartet was admirably played, with accuracy, thoroughness of conception, and fine expressiveness; still the performance lacked that magnetic quality which makes playing cross the boundary line between excellence and greatness. But, with the Haydn quartet, the electric sparks began to fly, and, with the Brahms quintet, all the five players, the audience, the whole surrounding atmosphere, were thoroughly charged with electricity. The performance of the latter may take rank with that never-to-be-forgotten performance of the Brahms C minor symphony under Mr. Nikisch some two or three years ago; it showed the great work in its truest, finest and highest light, in a light which could illumine its profoundest depths and make their meaning visible even to the uninitiated. Never has the Kneisel Quartet done finer work.

Boston Journal.

TUESDAY, OCTOBER 31, 1893.

FIRST KNEISEL CONCERT.

The Kneisel Quartet gave the first concert of its ninth season at Chickering Hall last evening. The programme was as follows:

Quartet in F major, op. 59, No. 1..... .....Beethoven.
Quartet in G minor, op. 74, No 3.....Hayden.
Quintet in F major, op. 88.....Brahms.

The membership of the quartet has not been changed, and hearty applause greeted the players as they appeared. The audience, as usual, was numerous. The number of musicians present was unusually large, and most noticeable among them was Mr. Paur, who frequently showed his approbation of the playing.

The Beethoven number, not the most interesting number by any means, was played well; was played as any number is always played by the Kneisel Quartet. Mr. Kneisel's capabilities as leader were artistically displayed, and the unrivaled balance of the quartette, always preserved, made attractive quite ordinary passages. The third movement of the first number, however, was performed so faultlessly, the sensuous beauty of the melodious adagio was made so apparent that the audience was more than ordinarily stirred; so much so, in fact, that the worth of the final allegro was considerably diminished thereby.

The quartette of Haydn, masterful and throughout pleasing, was perfectly played.

The quintette, one of the most agreeable of Brahms's compositions, gave the most evident pleasure. The additional part, for second viola was played by Max Zach. The tuneful introduction, the melodious alternating theme were given most pleasingly. Repetition did not detract from the delight afforded, and at the end of the opening allegro the greatest enthusiasm of the evening was manifested. In the playing of the second and third movements the admirable technique of the players gave pleasure where the spontaneity of the music failed; but the concluding passages of the presto again awakened enthusiasm, and the concert closed amid renewed applause.

The second concert will be given on Nov. 13.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

TUESDAY MORNING, OCT. 31, 1893.

The Kneisel Quartette Concert.

At the first concert of this, the ninth, season of the Kneisel Quartette, the large audience that was brought to Chickering Hall last night was a very flattering evidence of the success attained by the quartette in the past eight years in Boston. Among the audience were Herr Paur and his wife, and the new conductor of the symphony orchestra was evidently interested in the work of the quartette and applauded heartily.

The first number of last night's programme was the Beethoven quartette in F major (op. 59, No. 1). The opening bars of the allegro, in which the 'cello carries the melody to the accompaniment of the violin and second violin, and the fugue-like movement following were given with special delicacy and artistic feeling, and the song of the answering strings in the allegretto vivace following was rendered quaintly and fitly, while the "adagio molto e mesto," merging into the allegro with its Russian theme, was almost faultless in its execution. In many respects the interpretation of the Beethoven quartette was the best of the evening's work. The grand theme of the adagio is so full of beauty, blended with tenderness, that it requires high artistic feeling, as well as skill, to avoid undue haste on the one hand or heaviness on the other; but the golden mean was well kept throughout the movement.

The second number was the Haydn quartette in G minor (op. 74, No. 3). The allegro was taken, perhaps, a trifle too slowly, but the "largo assai" closely following made the fault hardly noticeable; while when the allegretto was taken up with its dainty minuet, rythmic and sedately bright, there was little room for criticism.

In the closing number, Brahms' quintette in F major (op. 88), the quartette was assisted by Mr. Max Zach. This number closely rivalled the Beethoven quartette in the admirably correct interpretation given. All its beauty of color and shading was brought out in a nearly perfect manner, and the rare swing of the allegro, the real dignity of the second movement and the sprightly "presto" of the final movement were equally deserving of strong praise.

Altogether the evening's programme was thoroughly successful, especially in view of the mishap which was recently suffered by Mr. Kneisel, but of which there was no indication in the work of the first violin. The personnel of the audience and the hearty applause given so often during the evening were such as any musical organization might envy.

Boston Daily Globe.

TUESDAY, OCT 31, 1893.

First Kneisel Quartet Concert.

Messrs Kneisel, Roth, Svecenski and Schroeder of the Kneisel quartet never played better than they did last night, at the opening concert of the season. A thoroughly representative Boston musical audience filled Chickering hall and warmly applauded each member of the organization as he came on the stage. Herr Paur, Mr Lang, Mr Chadwick, Mr Foote, Mr T. Adamowski, Mr Loeffler, Mr Hubbard and others prominent in the musical world were some of the most attentive listeners.

The program was an extremely interesting and somewhat varied one. It consisted of the Beethoven F major quartet, the Haydn G minor quartet and the Brahms quintet in F major. In this last number Mr Max Zach assisted.

The Beethoven quartet was superbly done and was quite the gem of the evening; the adagio movement has certainly never been better given in Boston, and it seems impossible that it could be played more skilfully. The allegro showed a little unsteadiness in some places, but after that the performance was beyond adverse criticism.

The composition itself is so broad and grand in every way that the Haydn number, which came next, seemed almost trifling in comparison, and yet of its kind it is in the very front rank. The largho was enthusiastically applauded.

The quintet, like all of Brahms' music, seemed long and vague. There were many times when the composer appeared to be hunting for some effect he could not quite get, and when he did get it it was nothing but an ordinary waltz tune. Yet the composition was pleasing to many in the audience and was warmly applauded. Brahms has many admirers in Boston. A prominent musician said the other day that the time would come when Brahms would be looked up to as Beethoven and Bach are today. But it is hoped that time is far distant.

The difficult music of the quintet was exquisitely performed.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

TUESDAY MORNING, OCT. 31, 1893.

Chickering Hall was filled last evening with a distinguished and brilliant audience at the opening concert of the Kneisel Quartet, which was postponed from last Monday evening. The splendid work of the quartet in the past has placed it among the leading musical organizations of this country, and the delightful rendering of the programme, which was a pleasing and varied one, evoked much enthusiasm.

The first number was Beethoven's quartet in F major. It was the gem of the evening, and was rendered with a perfection of technique and expression, the 'cello work of Mr. Schroeder calling for special mention. Hayden's quartet in G minor was romantic and dainty and delightfully rendered. Mr. Max Zach assisted as second viola in Brahm's quintet. This selection was played with precision and breadth of tone, and at the close the audience showed its pleasure by hearty applause. Last evening's work would seem to indicate a most successful season. The next concert will be Nov. 13 at Chickering Hall.

Baltimore Life.

BALTIMORE, MD., OCTOBER 28, 189

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Lovers of high-class music will be grateful to Manager Ford for arranging a series of concerts by the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has found such favor with the musical public of this city in past seasons. Five afternoon concerts will be given at Ford's Opera House, as follows: Tuesday, Nov. 7, Dec. 12, Jan. 9, Feb. 6 and March 27. The orchestra will be accompanied by solo artists of high repute, including Mme. Nordica, Mr. Max Heinrich, Mr. Kneisel and others. The sale of subscription tickets opens at Albert's ticket office next Tuesday.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCIV. NO. 123.

TUESDAY, OCTOBER 31, 1893.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

The opening concert of the season of the Kneisel quartet is to chamber music what the symphony concert first night is to the events of a larger importance.

Last evening Mr. Franz Kneisel and his associates began their ninth season at Chickering Hall, when the programme included Beethoven's quartet in F major, op. 59, No. 1; Haydn's quartet in G minor, op. 74, No. 3, and Brahms' quintet in F major, op. 88.

The audience in both its numbers and the general character of its membership showed that this quartet commands the best patronage of the city's musical circles, and Mr. Kneisel's personal popularity was unmistakably proven by the ovation attending his entrance. The usual standard of excellence was maintained in the evening's work.

BOSTON EVENING RECORD.

MONDAY, OCTOBER 30,

THE SYMPHONY.

There was a decided advance all along the line, in the performance of Saturday's programme. Not only was there a clearness and precision to which we have latterly been strangers, but the reserve and pedagogic character which characterized the reading of some of the works of the first two concerts here vanished altogether; some of the movements were given with a dramatic power that was as welcome as it was unexpected. Mr. Paur evidently believes in giving the symphony while the audience is fresh and full of attention, and therefore, as in the first concert, the largest work began the programme.

BOSTON DAILY TRAVELLER

WEDNESDAY, NOV. 1, 1893.

MUSIC HALL SITE.

A Good Location for the New Edifice Selected.

The new Music Hall will be erected on the northwest corner of West Chester Park and Huntington avenue.

The committee having the undertaking in charge ask that subscribers pay one half their subscription on or before Nov. 15. A second instalment will be asked for May 15, 1894.

As soon as $200,000 is paid in a corporation will be organized, one share of stock being issued for each $100 paid in, and the question of the purchase of land will be submitted to the stockholders, and later the plans for building.

The capital stock will ultimately be $500,000, and a little over $400,000 is now pledged.

The meeting of stockholders to organize and consider plans will be held about Dec. 1.

The work of preparing the plans is in the hands of McKim, Mead & White of new Public Library fame, and they have already put a great deal of work into the design, but nothing is sufficiently settled as to the style of the building to be announced yet.

Boston Transcript

WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 1, 1893.

The Symphony Orchestra will give the second concert in the Sanders Theatre series tomorrow night. The programme includes Schubert's C major Symphony, Dvorák's second rhapsody and Berlioz's "Benvenuto Cellini" overture, Schubert's "The Erl-King" and the great aria in "Fidelio." Mme. Nordica will be the singer. The fourth concerts in the Music Hall will be given on Friday afternoon and Saturday night, following this programme: Strauss, symphony, op. 12; Massenet, aria from "Le Cid;" Saint-Saëns, symphonic poem, "Le Rouet d'Omphale;" Gluck, aria from "Armide;" Brahms, Academic Festival Overture, op. 80. Emma Eames will be the singer.

The programme with which Mr. Paur will make his first appearance in New York with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Music Hall, Nov. 8, is this Symphony: in C minor, No. 5, Beethoven; air from "The Cid," Massenet; Slavonic Rhapsody, No. 2, Dvorák; air from "Armida," Gluck; overture, "Benvenuto Cellini," Berlioz. Miss Eames will be the singer.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 1, 1893.

* *

Here is the program of the third Symphony concert given last night in Music Hall:

Symphony, F major, op. 9.....Goetz
Serenade for string orchestra, No. 3, D minor.....Volkman
Overture, "Leonore," No. 3.....Beethoven

In two respects at least this concert was delightful; the symphony came first, and the concert was over before half past 9.

It may further be said that the orchestra played well as a rule; that Mr. Schroeder did full justice to the solo 'cello passages in the serenade; that few exceptions could be taken to Mr. Paur's reading, except perhaps in the overture. His reading of the overture was dramatic, yes, feverish. Many of his points were well taken, the wild rush, for instance, just before the first trumpet call. On the other hand he would stop occasionally in the fury of his passion to argue in detail concerning the definition of a word of slight importance.

The program as a whole was dull. At the risk of being charged with blasphemy I admit that I was never convinced of the surpassing musical excellence of Hermann Goetz. I heard his opera "Taming of the Shrew" in Dresden several years ago. It was well sung and beautifully put upon the stage; but surely the music written by Goetz for that text might better go with a tale of passion than with a comedy of lightness, coquetry and farcical instances. It seemed to me then that Goetz lacked true dramatic instinct; that he took his task too seriously. As for the symphony, there are fine passages; there is beauty; there is workmanship of good quality and in plenty, but Schumann's voice is heard throughout the symphony. There is no individuality. You never feel like saying, "That sounds like Goetz." Perhaps it was well for him that he died before he was forty, when men foretold an illustrious future for him. Cursed is he who lives long enough to turn the hope of others to a thing of derision.

* * *

Theodore Thomas was at the Symphony concert and was afterward the guest of the St. Botolph Club at the first of the Saturday evening receptions. Arthur Mees was with him.

John A. O'Shea has written a mass which is published in Boston, and will be sung Christmas at the Immaculate Conception.

The program of the fourth Symphony concert includes symphony F minor, Strauss; "Le Rouet d'Omphale," Saint-Saëns; Brahms' "Academic Festival" overture. Emma Eames will sing airs from "Le Cid" and "Armide."

The first Kneisel Quartet concert will be next Monday evening. The first Adamowski Quartet concert will be next Tuesday afternoon. The Lineff Russian Choir will be here Tuesday evening. Mr. Beresford will give a vocal recital Wednesday evening. Mr. de Pachmann will play Thursday afternoon. And the Tavary Opera Company will be at the Globe Theatre for the week. Here's trouble enough.

PHILIP HALE.

First Boston Symphony Program.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under its new conductor, Mr. Emil Paur, will give its first concert in Carnegie Music Hall on Wednesday evening, November 8. Emma Eames will be the singer, making her first appearance in this city in two years. The program is as follows: Symphony in C minor, No. 5, Beethoven; aria from "Le Cid," Massenet; Rhapsodie No. 2, Dvorák; aria from "Armide," Gluck; overture, "Benvenuto Cellini," Berlioz.

[36]

The Independent
130 FULTON STREET.
NEW YORK, November 2d, 1893.
November 2, 1893.

Music.

BY E. IRENÆUS STEVENSON.

BOSTON has now had six opportunities to mark, observe, discuss and criticise the new director of her Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Emil Paur, the Orchestra's third rehearsal and the third concert occurring last week. Mr. Paur cannot charge the musical journalism of the city with neglecting him in any one matter, from his manner and methods as a leader to his cravats or the size of his boots—not to mention the all-important question as to whether or not he fills the shoes of his two most distinguished predecessors. The comment as to this last metaphoric topic, on the whole seems approving, if not enthusiastic as yet. In fact, Mr. Paur appears at present to be regarded much as was the wife of that plain-spoken gentleman who confessed tearfully that tho he heartily respected her he could not make up his mind if he loved her. The conductor appears to be a man of solid, responsible, earnest and by no means unmagnetic traits, yet inclined to the academic in his work, and withal determined to do his duty according to clear lights. Abstracts of his conversation suggest—tho not strongly—Mr. Gericke's earnestness and musical convictions generally, rather than those of Mr. Paur's immediate predecessor, Mr. Nikisch. The programs so far have represented Beethoven (Symphony No. 5 and the Third "Leonore Overture" and the "Abscheulicher" aria); Tschaikovsky (String Serenata, Op. 48); Wagner (the "Tannhäuser" Overture, the work given with a dramatic chiaroscuro that seems to have excited special comment); Schubert (Symphony in C major); Volkmann (Overture "Richard III"); Dvorak ("Slavonic Rhapsody" No. 2 and Serenade); Goetz (Symphony in F), and some lesser matters—a conservative list. By the by, the new leader was beguiled by an interviewer from the Boston Herald the other day into a long interview, and was written down decidedly as a conservative-minded musician, and of sound common sense on many things besides his immediate responsibilities. He expressed himself judiciously affected toward new scores by new musical lights of greater or lesser effulgence, by remarking that a conductor should be on the alert for newer productions, but not the victim of their novelty as his excuse for presenting works that in great proportion are worthless, however acclaimed. He believes in program-music to the extent that a musician may make a poetical or other idea the basis of a composition; but he sharply disclaimed sympathy with the intrusion of too much detail and realistic depiction. Naturally one would wonder how Mr. Paur regards Richard Strauss, that scintillating sinner in the way of the unqualified development of the minutiæ of realism in program-music; and Mr. Paur observes, as one might expect: "I know very well nearly all his published compositions. . . . I cannot agree with him in such symphonic-poems as 'Death and Glorification,' 'Don Juan' and 'Macbeth.' His earlier works were full of great promise, and it is not to be denied that as to his later ones there are manifestations of genius which, if guided by riper intelligence, may yield fruit in really great works. But that remains to be seen. At present there is too much program in him, for my taste." Mr. Paur is broadly in sympathy with the modern school of lyric drama; an ardent Wagnerist, an admirer of Liszt when Liszt is at his best, of Cornelius, Rubinstein, Dvorak, and Brahms. "Brahms," he observed, "is the single German composer of to-day who possesses qualities of real greatness in the realm of absolute music." In the interpretation of Beethoven's symphonies he is distinctly opposed to the readings which Wagner advocated, and for which Dr. von Bülow (not to mention many another director of distinction) has had a sweet tooth. He does not believe in putting emotional and other ideas into Beethoven's pages that never were written between their lines. He declared that he "could not sympathize with Wagner in his wish to invest some of Beethoven's compositions with scenic suggestions and dramatic developments which need other than musical terms of expression." He continued, as to this: "I feel myself especially fitted to undertake the rendering of Beethoven's works; for my father was an instrumentalist and was closely identified with the musical life of Vienna at the time when Beethoven was exercising a direct influence there. He early called to my attention the distinguishing points of Beethoven's genius, and pointed out the means which the master employed to carry out his artistic purposes. . . . That does not mean, that I think the Beethoven symphonies ought to be rattled off as if by a barrel organ. No; but I believe that Beethoven's ideas, if properly presented, are sufficiently characteristic of themselves, without being colored especially for the occasion." His hearty satisfaction in giving up operatic work for purely concert conducting he strongly intimated, even in view of his uncommon success at Mannheim and elsewhere, which has given him a repute throughout Germany as one of its best operatic directors. Mr. Paur's first concert in New York City with the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be on the evening of November 8th, at the Music Hall; and therewith we shall hear what we shall hear.

Philadelphia Abend-Post.

Donnerstag, 2. November 1893.

Boston Symphonie-Orchester. Am Donnerstage, den 9. November wird das berühmte Boston Symphonie-Orchester unter Leitung seines neuen Dirigenten, Herrn Emil Paur, die Saison mit einem von fünf großen Symphonie-Konzerten eröffnen. In demselben werden die Sopranistin Mme. Emma Eames, der bekannte Liedersänger Herr Max Heinrich (Baß) und der Violinvirtuose Herr Franz Kneisel mitwirken. Subskriptions-Tickets mit reservirten Sitzen für die fünf Konzerte zum Preise von $3.50 bis $7, je nach der Lage, sind jetzt in No. 1221 Chestnut Straße zu haben.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, NOV. 5, 1893.

THE KNEISEL QUARTETTE.

It was certainly an ideal programme which the Kneisel quartette rendered for the hearers of its first concert of the season last Monday evening in Chickering hall. Three of the four greatest composers of chamber music were represented, Beethoven by the first of the Rasoumowsky quartettes, op. 59; Haydn by the G minor quartette, op. 74, No. 3; Brahms by the Quintette in F, op. 88.

Concerning the Haydn number, it is sufficient to record that it is thoroughly characteristic of the master's mature style. But it is worth while to remark in regard to the other works, that each of them represents its author at his very best. A great many people find Beethoven's early quartettes unworthy of studious attention, while others maintain that the later quartettes are enjoyable to so few people that they ought to be practically excluded from concert programmes. Again, Brahms is wholesalely accused of abstruseness and of lack of inspiration. But precisely the two works which were given on Monday command the unanimous suffrage of all who are interested in chamber music, whether as amateurs or as professionals. The programme, then, may be said to have been ideal.

Of its rendering the same adjective might almost be used. The Kneisel quartette has perhaps two superiors in the world,—the Joachim quartette of Berlin, and the Rasé quartette of Vienna. But the superiority of these organizations lies rather in the uniform perfection of their work than in their ability to perform a given task better than our own quartette could do it. The middle parts of the Kniesel quartette are in the hands of players who lack one essential of the perfect quartette player,—namely, ripeness of age. For one cannot be regarded as perfect in this loftiest of all departments of musicianship until he has attained a solidity of musical character which absolutely nothing can shake. Here and there one detects, in following the threads of the musical fabric which our quartette weaves, a slight wavering, a shade of uncertainty which may be attributed simply to the lack of roundness of musical character of which we speak. These imperfections are, however, confined entirely to the middle parts. Whatever slight accidents may happen to Mr. Kneisel and Mr. Schroeder, no record of them need be made. Accidents happen also to Joachim and to Rasé,—and to everything which is not divine.

But when the Kneisel quartette is at its best, when it is perfectly in command of the task before it, its playing is simply ideal. We are glad to bear witness that but little of its playing on Monday evening was not "best." The actual deeds of splendid musical mastery which were performed by the players are too numerous to record. Why, then, mention imperfections which are attributable only to lack of years?

The make-up of the audience was, no less than its enthusiasm, a compliment to the quartette. Mr. and Mrs. Paur, and the leading Symphony orchestra players were present. Mrs. John L. Gardner, Mrs. Fiske-Warren, ex-Governor Long, Mrs. H. A. A. Beach, Mr. George W. Chadwick and many others of social and musical prominence were listeners.

One could hardly imagine a more auspicious opening of this ninth season of the quartette's concerts.

The second concert will take place on Nov. 13.

The programme with which Mr. Paur will make his first appearance in New York with the Boston Symphony orchestra at the Music hall next Wednesday is Symphony in C minor, No. 5, Beethoven; air from "The Cid," Massenet; Slavonic Rhapsody, No. 2, Dvorak; air "Armida," Gluck; overture, "Benvenuto Cellini," Berlioz. Miss Eames will be the singer.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, NOV. 5, 1893.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

An Attractive Programme With Emma Eames as the Soloist.

The fourth Symphony concert was given in Music Hall, last evening, when the following programme was rendered:

Richard Strauss—Symphony in F minor, op. 12.

Massenet—Recitative and aria from "Le Cid."

Saint-Saens—Symphonic poem, "Le Rouet d'Omphale," op. 31.

Gluck—Aria, "Ah! si la liberte," from "Armide."

Brahms—Akademische Fest-Ouverture in C minor, op. 80.

Strauss's symphony is not the most pleasing number which could have been offered, although some of the movements are interesting. The youth of the composer and the combination of the German and French schools in the composition, render it unique, and for that reason entertaining. The development of the themes has a certain originality, and the second movement, the scherzo, is attractive for its daintiness, and the admirable manner in which it was rendered by the orchestra, received hearty approval.

The third movement in C major was the most pleasing of the symphony, with its four strongly characterized themes and striking musical effects. The fourth movement, the finale, contained much that was reminiscent of what had gone before and concluded with a grand apotheosis. The work was ably rendered throughout and given with excellent taste. Mr. Paur's control over his forces is admirable and the orchestra has never been heard to better advantage.

The symphonic poem of Saint-Saens was another exhibition of orchestral skill and the entire number, to the delicate piano notes at the close, was rendered with marked finish.

Brahm's academic festival overture concluded the orchestral numbers.

Mme. Eames was heard in an aria from Massenet's "Le Cid." It is a number which is admirably suited to the wide range of her voice, and she gave it with excellent effect. It is a piece in which she has before been heard in this city, but this time to much better advantage, owing to the artistic accompaniment of the orchestra. Gluck's aria from "Armide" was less brilliant but equally well given, and the audience showed its appreciation by repeated recalls.

There will be no rehearsal or concert next week but on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Nov. 17 and 18.

Under its new conductor, Mr. Emil Paur, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in New York a series of five concerts on Nov. 8, Dec. 14, Jan. 11, Feb. 8 and March 29. The soloists engaged for these performances include Mme. Emma Eames, Mme. Lillian Nordica and Mr. Franz Kneisel.

Among the soloists who will be heard this season with the Symphony Orchestra, will be the contralto Mrs. Katherine Fisk, who met with such a reception at the recent Worcester festival.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will start on the first tour of the season tomorrow. There will be no rehearsal and concert next Friday and Saturday.

EDWARD H. CROSBY.

[37]

The Independent
130 FULTON STREET.
NEW YORK, November 2d, 1893.
November 2, 1893.

Music.

BY E. IRENÆUS STEVENSON.

BOSTON has now had six opportunities to mark, observe, discuss and criticise the new director of her Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Emil Paur, the Orchestra's third rehearsal and the third concert occurring last week. Mr. Paur cannot charge the musical journalism of the city with neglecting him in any one matter, from his manner and methods as a leader to his cravats or the size of his boots—not to mention the all-important question as to whether or not he fills the shoes of his two most distinguished predecessors. The comment as to this last metaphoric topic, on the whole seems approving, if not enthusiastic as yet. In fact, Mr. Paur appears at present to be regarded much as was the wife of that plain-spoken gentleman who confessed tearfully that tho he heartily respected her he could not make up his mind if he loved her. The conductor appears to be a man of solid, responsible, earnest and by no means unmagnetic traits, yet inclined to the academic in his work, and withal determined to do his duty according to clear lights. Abstracts of his conversation suggest—tho not strongly—Mr. Gericke's earnestness and musical convictions generally, rather than those of Mr. Paur's immediate predecessor, Mr. Nikisch. The programs so far have represented Beethoven (Symphony No. 5 and the Third "Leonore Overture" and the "Abscheulicher" aria); Tschaikovsky (String Serenata, Op. 48); Wagner (the "Tannhaüser" Overture, the work given with a dramatic chiaroscuro that seems to have excited special comment); Schubert (Symphony in C major); Volkmann (Overture "Richard III"); Dvorak ("Slavonic Rhapsody" No. 2 and Serenade); Goetz (Symphony in F), and some lesser matters—a conservative list. By the by, the new leader was beguiled by an interviewer from the Boston Herald the other day into a long interview, and was written down decidedly as a conservative-minded musician, and of sound common sense on many things besides his immediate responsibilities. He expressed himself judiciously affected toward new scores by new musical lights of greater or lesser effulgence, by remarking that a conductor should be on the alert for newer productions, but not the victim of their novelty as his excuse for presenting works that in great proportion are worthless, however acclaimed. He believes in program-music to the extent that a musician may make a poetical or other idea the basis of a composition; but he sharply disclaimed sympathy with the intrusion of too much detail and realistic depiction. Naturally one would wonder how Mr. Paur regards Richard Strauss, that scintillating sinner in the way of the unqualified development of the minutiæ of realism in program-music; and Mr. Paur observes, as one might expect: "I know very well nearly all his published compositions. . . . I cannot agree with him in such symphonic-poems as 'Death and Glorification,' 'Don Juan' and 'Macbeth.' His earlier works were full of great promise, and it is not to be denied that as to his later ones there are manifestations of genius which, if guided by riper intelligence, may yield fruit in really great works. But that remains to be seen. At present there is too much program in him, for my taste." Mr. Paur is broadly in sympathy with the modern school of lyric drama; an ardent Wagnerist, an admirer of Liszt when Liszt is at his best, of Cornelius, Rubinstein, Dvorak, and Brahms. "Brahms," he observed, "is the single German composer of to-day who possesses qualities of real greatness in the realm of absolute music." In the interpretation of Beethoven's symphonies he is distinctly opposed to the readings which Wagner advocated, and for which Dr. von Bülow (not to mention many another director of distinction) has had a sweet tooth. He does not believe in putting emotional and other ideas into Beethoven's pages that never were written between their lines. He declared that he "could not sympathize with Wagner in his wish to invest some of Beethoven's compositions with scenic suggestions and dramatic developments which need other than musical terms of expression." He continued, as to this: "I feel myself especially fitted to undertake the rendering of Beethoven's works; for my father was an instrumentalist and was closely identified with the musical life of Vienna at the time when Beethoven was exercising a direct influence there. He early called to my attention the distinguishing points of Beethoven's genius, and pointed out the means which the master employed to carry out his artistic purposes. . . . That does not mean, that I think the Beethoven symphonies ought to be rattled off as if by a barrel organ. No; but I believe that Beethoven's ideas, if properly presented, are sufficiently characteristic of themselves, without being colored especially for the occasion." His hearty satisfaction in giving up operatic work for purely concert conducting he strongly intimated, even in view of his uncommon success at Mannheim and elsewhere, which has given him a repute throughout Germany as one of its best operatic directors. Mr. Paur's first concert in New York City with the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be on the evening of November 8th, at the Music Hall; and therewith we shall hear what we shall hear.

Philadelphia Abend-Post.
Donnerstag, 2. November 1893.

Boston Symphonie-Orchester. Am Donnerstage, den 9. November wird das berühmte Boston Symphonie-Orchester unter Leitung seines neuen Dirigenten, Herrn Emil Paur, die Saison mit einem von fünf großen Symphonie-Konzerten eröffnen. In demselben werden die Sopranistin Mme. Emma Eames, der bekannte Liedersänger Herr Max Heinrich (Baß) und der Violinvirtuose Herr Franz Kneisel mitwirken. Subskriptions-Tickets mit reservirten Sitzen für die fünf Konzerte zum Preise von $3.50 bis $7, je nach der Lage, sind jetzt in No. 1221 Chestnut Straße zu haben.

THE BOSTON TIMES
BOSTON, SUNDAY, NOV. 5, 1893.

THE KNEISEL QUARTETTE.

It was certainly an ideal programme which the Kneisel quartette rendered for the hearers of its first concert of the season last Monday evening in Chickering hall. Three of the four greatest composers of chamber music were represented, Beethoven by the first of the Rasoumowsky quartettes, op. 59; Haydn by the G minor quartette, op. 74, No. 3; Brahms by the Quintette in F, op. 88.

Concerning the Haydn number, it is sufficient to record that it is thoroughly characteristic of the master's mature style. But it is worth while to remark in regard to the other works, that each of them represents its author at his very best. A great many people find Beethoven's early quartettes unworthy of studious attention, while others maintain that the later quartettes are enjoyable to so few people that they ought to be practically excluded from concert programmes. Again, Brahms is wholesalely accused of abstruseness and of lack of inspiration. But precisely the two works which were given on Monday command the unanimous suffrage of all who are interested in chamber music, whether as amateurs or as professionals. The programme, then, may be said to have been ideal.

Of its rendering the same adjective might almost be used. The Kneisel quartette has perhaps two superiors in the world,—the Joachim quartette of Berlin, and the Rasé quartette of Vienna. But the superiority of these organizations lies rather in the uniform perfection of their work than in their ability to perform a given task better than our own quartette could do it. The middle parts of the Kniesel quartette are in the hands of players who lack one essential of the perfect quartette player,—namely, ripeness of age. For one cannot be regarded as perfect in this loftiest of all departments of musicianship until he has attained a solidity of musical character which absolutely nothing can shake. Here and there one detects, in following the threads of the musical fabric which our quartette weaves, a slight wavering, a shade of uncertainty which may be attributed simply to the lack of roundness of musical character of which we speak. These imperfections are, however, confined entirely to the middle parts. Whatever slight accidents may happen to Mr. Kneisel and Mr. Schroeder, no record of them need be made. Accidents happen also to Joachim and to Rasé,—and to everything which is not divine.

But when the Kneisel quartette is at its best, when it is perfectly in command of the task before it, its playing is simply ideal. We are glad to bear witness that but little of its playing on Monday evening was not "best." The actual deeds of splendid musical mastery which were performed by the players are too numerous to record. Why, then, mention imperfections which are attributable only to lack of years?

The make-up of the audience was, no less than its enthusiasm, a compliment to the quartette. Mr. and Mrs. Paur, and the leading Symphony orchestra players were present. Mrs. John L. Gardner, Mrs. Fiske-Warren, ex-Governor Long, Mrs. H. A. A. Beach, Mr. George W. Chadwick and many others of social and musical prominence were listeners.

One could hardly imagine a more auspicious opening of this ninth season of the quartette's concerts.

The second concert will take place on Nov. 13.

The programme with which Mr. Paur will make his first appearance in New York with the Boston Symphony orchestra at the Music hall next Wednesday is Symphony in C minor, No. 5, Beethoven; air from "The Cid," Massenet; Slavonic Rhapsody, No. 2, Dvorak; air "Armida," Gluck; overture, "Benvenuto Cellini," Berlioz. Miss Eames will be the singer.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.
SUNDAY MORNING, NOV. 5, 1893.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

An Attractive Programme With Emma Eames as the Soloist.

The fourth Symphony concert was given in Music Hall, last evening, when the following programme was rendered:

Richard Strauss—Symphony in F minor, op. 12.

Massenet—Recitative and aria from "Le Cid."

Saint-Saens—Symphonic poem, "Le Rouet d'Omphale," op. 31.

Gluck—Aria, "Ah! si la liberte," from "Armide."

Brahms—Akademische Fest-Ouverture in C minor, op. 80.

Strauss's symphony is not the most pleasing number which could have been offered, although some of the movements are interesting. The youth of the composer and the combination of the German and French schools in the composition, render it unique, and for that reason entertaining. The development of the themes has a certain originality, and the second movement, the scherzo, is attractive for its daintiness, and the admirable manner in which it was rendered by the orchestra, received hearty approval.

The third movement in C major was the most pleasing of the symphony, with its four strongly characterized themes and striking musical effects. The fourth movement, the finale, contained much that was reminiscent of what had gone before and concluded with a grand apotheosis. The work was ably rendered throughout and given with excellent taste. Mr. Paur's control over his forces is admirable and the orchestra has never been heard to better advantage.

The symphonic poem of Saint-Saens was another exhibition of orchestral skill and the entire number, to the delicate piano notes at the close, was rendered with marked finish.

Brahm's academic festival overture concluded the orchestral numbers.

Mme. Eames was heard in an aria from Massenet's "Le Cid." It is a number which is admirably suited to the wide range of her voice, and she gave it with excellent effect. It is a piece in which she has before been heard in this city, but this time to much better advantage, owing to the artistic accompaniment of the orchestra. Gluck's aria from "Armide" was less brilliant but equally well given, and the audience showed its appreciation by repeated recalls.

There will be no rehearsal or concert next week but on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Nov. 17 and 18.

.....

Under its new conductor, Mr. Emil Paur, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in New York a series of five concerts on Nov. 8, Dec. 14, Jan. 11, Feb. 8 and March 29. The soloists engaged for these performances include Mme. Emma Eames, Mme. Lillian Nordica and Mr. Franz Kneisel.

Among the soloists who will be heard this season with the Symphony Orchestra, will be the contralto Mrs. Katherine Fisk, who met with such a reception at the recent Worcester festival.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will start on the first tour of the season tomorrow. There will be no rehearsal and concert next Friday and Saturday.

EDWARD H. CROSBY.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, OCT. 29, 1893.

The Symphony audience found itself in a not unusual predicament last night. For it ought to make up its mind as to whether or not it liked Richard Strauss's symphony in F minor, which it had just heard for the first time. So everybody waited for his neighbor and looked furtively for a sign of approbation or disapprobation upon some trustworthily critical face. And, again as usual, the little waiting space after each movement was consumed in this unprofitable delay, and the symphony had to round out its vehement finale in order to extract something like real applause from an audience which had undoubtedly enjoyed the work more than it dared to intimate.

For this composition is independent enough to suit even a constitutional clamorer after something new, and it is full of surprises, the most of which are pleasant ones, although some are most eminent for their rough strength and untrammelled power. Melody it has in profusion—melody always obvious, often brief, generally graceful, sometimes piquant and occasionally sombre, dirge-like or grave as the theme of a chorale. Its rhythms are marked, and in the scherzo they are alternated with almost startling unexpectedness. The tone-color, derived from the full modern orchestra, including the bass tuba but without the fanciful percussion instruments,—is very varied and often exceedingly rich and deep. Sometimes one thinks of Wagner when the extreme high tones of the violins and wooden wind are used, or again when the brass comes rushing and crashing in; but generally the instrumentation smacks of originality. Contrasts of theme and treatment abound, particularly in the scherzo and last movement, in which latter gentle soft measures are confronted by tremendous and dissonant outbursts. The slow movement is of a romantic character and contains no fewer than four distinct themes, most of which are decidedly sentimental, while one is a short, strenuous trumpet call. The general style of composition is rather free than formal, and no movement is so long as to permit a full regulation development of its thematic material. The scherzo is quite fascinating, with its fluttering, fairy-like figures and the march swing of the finale has a triumphal progress and voluminousness.

The other instrumental numbers were old friends—Saint-Saens's "Rouet d'Omphale" and Brahms's "Academic" overture, the latter ending the programme, which had begun with the symphony. The playing was admirable all through the concert, and often rose to something closely akin to real enthusiasm, especially in the stronger movements of the symphony and at the end of the overture. The over-firm accentuation of prominent phrases had been greatly modified, and the orchestra showed their nearer approach to the easy elasticity which marks ideal playing. There was surely no lack of finesse in the "Spinning Wheel," and when fire and force were needed they glowed and swelled.

Between these numbers Mrs. Emma Eames-Story sang two large airs of love, grief and desolation, which were the "Pleurez, mes yeux," from Massenet's "Cid," and "Ah, si la liberte me doit etre ravie," from the "Armide" of Gluck. With such melancholy strains she could not expect to procure popular plaudits, although she did obtain appreciative recalls. But the rich quality and even scale of her voice, her smooth perfected style and her dignified quietude, were remarked with pleasure, and one felt that in choosing such music from her standard and classic repertory, she had paid a compliment to the supposed high taste of her audience. If any one term were to be chosen to express the chief element of her singing, it might be calm elegance; for depth, warmth and passion it certainly did not betray, and the hearer would never guess that the firm, smooth, balanced phrases were meant to illustrate the passion of a heroine bidding her eyes to "weep all their tears," or wondering if the "too fatal foe of her life's happiness" were to hold her enslaved.

There will be no concert next week, but on the following Saturday the programme will consist of Mozart's "Jupiter," and Haydn's D-major symphonies, together with Brahms's double concerto for violin and 'cello, to be played by Messrs. Kneisel and Schroeder.

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

The Kneisel programme was a standard one—Beethoven's quartette in F major, opus 59; Haydn's quartette in G minor, and Brahms's quartette in F major, opus 88, Mr. Zach playing the second viola part. The Adamowski programme had more variety—a quartette in B major, by Haydn; a romance for violin, by Beethoven, played by Mr. Adamowski, and the second quintette of Joseph Miroslaw Weber, which was then to receive its first public reading in this country, but for which was substituted a somewhat familiar quartette by Bazzini, because Mr. Moldauer, who was expected for the second violin part, was not able to assist. The playing at the former concert was altogether admirable and grew in animation and magnetism throughout the evening, ending in quite a blaze of enthusiasm. But at the latter the work was unequal, owing, perhaps, to the change in the programme, even Mr. Adamowski's solo not being up to his standard.

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

There is a general disposition to doubt the sincerity of a goodly part of the regular attendants at the Symphony concerts. It is contended that their presence at these weekly assemblages is more because it is the fashion than because their love of the masters compels them to pay this periodic homage to art. But we are inclined to believe that they who go to hear Beethoven, Schumann, Wagner and the rest of the immortal host in deference to the dictates of fashion rather than to gratify their own likings for high class music are comparatively few. In the first place, the hall is not favorable for the display of dress or even personality to an appreciable extent, as in the case of an opera performance at the great and ingeniously devised Metropolitan Opera House in New York, for a prominent example. Even if there be a large number of the listeners who affect a liking for the best things, in order to keep within the circles that are supposed to reflect the state of musical culture among us, they are harmless; and if they really are bored they are not likely long to continue their "patronage" of the concerts, though their places may be taken by others of the same sort when they retire. Instances of the birth of a real love for the classics among these negative people have not been unknown. Its development has been proven on occasion most unexpectedly. They have been known to leave a concert of the "miscellaneous" order, and a good one in its way, before it was half done, whereas before their tastes had been improved—we will not say cultivated—they would have sat it out to the last note and all through would have worked the encore game without mercy or reason.

All the same, there are doubtless many who talk with great show of learning of the various merits of Brahms, Dvorak, Liszt, and the rest, but who might easily be misled into accepting an overture by Czibulka for one by Mendelssohn or swallowing an alleged suite by Bach that might be a series of dances by Sir Arthur Sullivan. There are not enough of these, however, we sincerely believe, to depreciate seriously the quality of the audiences at the symphony concerts so far as their honest likes and dislikes are concerned and as they may express them. Furthermore it is quite possible to have a good time at the performance of the ninth symphony tonight and tomorrow night to wag your head in sympathetic synchronism with the pulsatile movement of a Strauss waltz. Each has its place even in the same mind, and the cultivated mind at that. The capacity to appreciate each composer at his true worth and the ability to explain admiration or rejection of a high-class composition are given to few people. But the interest in such music may be none the less sincere.

THE SUN.

BALTIMORE, SATURDAY, NOV. 4, 1893.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.—The eighth annual series of concerts by this famous musical organization will commence on Tuesday next, at 3 P. M., at Ford's Grand Opera House, under the leadership of Mr. Emil Paur and the business direction of Mr. C. A. Ellis. The soloists for the first concert will include Lillian Nordica, Max Heinrich and Franz Kneisel. Manager Ellis expresses the utmost satisfaction as to the admirable adaption of Ford's for musical expression. He says the auditorium and sounding-board are equally capacious and successful.

Ford's.....Tuesday.....3 o'Clock.
The First Concert—Eighth Year Series.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

"It will discourse most excellent music." Hamlet.

Soloists—NORDICA!—HEINRICH!—KNEISEL!

EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

Seats reserved, Albert's, 13 N. Charles st., today. Monday and Tuesday up to 2 P. M., for the season or for Tuesday only.
The Concert at 3. Over at 5.
ADMISSION—1ST FLOOR, $1; 2ND FLOOR 50 cts.; 3D FLOOR, 25 cts.
Next Concert—Tuesday, December 12.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCIV. NO. 126.

SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 5, 1893.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Conductor Paur is showing rare good judgment in his programmes for the symphony concerts of the Boston orchestra, and he is gaining especial praise for putting the symphony where it belongs, first on the programme.

Last evening's concert opened with the symphony in F minor, op. 12, by Richard Strauss, which was given a reading quite in keeping with its brilliancy and wealth of orchestral coloring. The dainty scherzo was made a thing of airy grace by the band, and no better work in this class of composition has been heard here in many a day. The broad, strong themes of the final movement were brought out with splendid force by the reading given it, and the audience was led to realize all the beauties of this notable example of modern day writing.

Saint Saens' symphonic poem "Omphale's Spinning Wheel," made the central number in the orchestral selections, and gave a sharply contrasting element to the symphony and the academic overture, by Brahms which ended the programme. The poem was made a tone picture of rare beauty by the performance given it, and the finale developed the fact that Theodore Thomas has a rival in producing pianissimo effects in the person of the new conductor of the Boston orchestra.

The Academic overture was read and played with splendid intelligence, and all of its intricacies were given with charming clearness, making a brilliant ending for the concert.

Mme. Eames was the soloist, and sung the Massenet recitative, "De cet affreux combat," and aria, "Pleurez! pleurez mez yeux!" from "Le Cid," as well as the Gluck aria, "Ah! si la liberte," from "Armide."

Although Mme. Eames lacks the warmth and emotional expression demanded for entire success upon the concert stage, she has much that wins her the commendation of the most critical, and in both the selections named she sang in a delightfully unaffected fashion. The Massenet aria is admirably suited to display her vocal gifts and she gave great enjoyment by her singing of this aria. The severely classical aria of Gluck were given with charming simplicity and directness, its phrasing and delivery quite disarming criticism. The singer was heartily welcomed and as heartily applauded after each of her appearances.

The first of the season's tours of the orchestra will occur during the coming week, and the concerts will be resumed on Saturday, the 18th inst., when Messrs. Kneisel and Schroeder will be the soloists.

Emma Eames Soloist at the Fourth Symphony—Patti Soon to Sing in Boston.

Emma Eames was the soloist at the fourth symphony concert, and in consequence Music hall was uncomfortably crowded at both the Friday afternoon rehearsal and at last night's concert. Miss Eames is a great Boston favorite, alike in social and artistic circles, and the reception accorded her was demonstratively cordial. She sang three numbers, the recitative "De Cet Affreux Combat," and the aria "Pleurez! Pleurez mes Yeux!" from Massenet's opera "Le Cid," and the aria "Ah! Si la Liberte," from Gluck's opera "Armide."

In all of these selections, Miss Eames' rich and powerful voice was heard to excellent advantage, but it is probable that many in the audience would have been pleased to hear her sing something lighter. There is really no reason why a vocal soloist at the symphony concerts should confine herself to the severer class of music.

Miss Eames' voice is of wonderful purity and surpassing strength. It is smooth and clear throughout its extended range. Her execution is admirable, showing the best of schooling and the most artistic development of the rare gift bestowed upon her by nature. Miss Eames sang the recitative with a distinctness and expression that was thoroughly commendable. The arias were both sung with exquisite taste and expression, as well as strong dramatic effect.

A notable feature of the orchestra's offerings was the first performance here of Richard Strauss' symphony in F minor, op 12. This is a very interesting work and contains some of the best and most original efforts of its talented composer. There are four movements and they are treated in a distinctly modern style. The orchestration is very elaborate and some strikingly unique effects are gained.

In the first movement heavy demands are made upon the brasses, with the result that there is at times a harsh grating effect which, in its persistency, is rather displeasing to the ear. The second movement, scherzo, is also full of surprising changes of rhythm, and the melodies are sharply contrasted. The andante is notable for some unique harmonies, particularly a beautiful and impressive trumpet call. The final is brilliantly scored and made rather the most favorable impression of all the movements. A splendid interpretation was given by Mr Paur.

Saint-Saens' exquisite symphonic poem, "Omphale's Spinning Wheel," was the especial treat of the orchestral selections. The dainty and graceful melodies were interpreted with delightful effect and expression. No work of this class has ever received more artistic performance from the symphony orchestra. Brahms' academic festival overture, splendidly played, was the final number of the very brilliant program.

There will be no concert this week. On Nov 17 and 18 the program will be: Symphony in C major (Jupiter), Mozart; double concerto for violin and violoncello, Brahms; symphony in D major, Haydn; soloists, Mr Franz Kneisel and Mr Alwin Schroeder.

The Boston Symphony orchestra will make its first appearance in New York under Mr Paur's leadership Wednesday evening.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, NOV. 6, 1893.

The Symphony Concert.

In these days, when the music of the future seems to be the ultimate aim of every young composer, and when one often hears the assertion that the new school has superseded the old, or will do so shortly, it is good to see that the classical models of musical form can be effectively used in the expression of modern musical ideas. The Strauss symphony showed that the thematic treatment and orchestration of the present day need not be hampered in any degree by the following out of classical traditions.

The symphony as a whole was very enjoyable, in spite of the length of the work. Its themes were all attractive and interesting, the novel character of the scherzo being especially noteworthy. As might be expected, horns and woodwind are frequently called upon to furnish the romantic coloring that is so much used in modern works. It is needless to say that these instruments were played in a thoroughly commendable manner, with the slight exception of a somewhat poor ensemble in the last few measures of the andante.

The first movement was given with clearness and brilliancy that could not fail to arouse admiration, the coda being given with especial animation. The second and third movements were given appropriate readings, but the finale was hardly agitated enough for the molto appassionato that the composer demanded.

Mme. Eames then appeared, and her goings and comings were accompanied by enthusiastic applause. The wonderful richness of her voice was well shown in the mournful pathos of the aria from Le Cid, and she sang the number with a good deal of dramatic feeling. Her phrasing and expression were admirable, both in the Massenet selection and in the aria from Gluck's Armide, which came later in the concert.

The performance of Le Rouet d'Omphale was creditable as to delicacy, but it might have been given with more swing. The programme-music character of the work demands vividness and animation; the figures of the story stand forth in life-like manner, so there must be life in the rendering of the piece. This fervor is what has been customary in such pieces at the concerts of the past few years.

The Academic Overture of Brahms, given with appropriate heartiness and force, ended the concert. It is a fact worthy of notice that with one exception the works were all by living composers. The programme was well calculated to show the different phases of the modern school. The Strauss symphony, besides being of great value intrinsically, is noteworthy in that it shows how modern material can be effectively used in the traditional manner; Massenet's symphonic poem is worthy exponent of the large school of programme music; while the Academic Overture proves that the folk-song can still be worked up by master minds to form great and noble productions.

ARTHUR ELSON.

SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 5 [illegible]

The Fourth Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the fourth symphony concert, given last evening in Music Hall, was as follows:

Symphony in F minor, op. 12.....Richard Strauss
Recitative and aria, "Pleurez! pleurez mes yeux!" from "Le Cid".....Massenet
Symphonic Poem, "Le Rouet d'Omphale".....Saint-Saens
Aria, "Ah! si la liberte," from "Armide".....Gluck
Akademische Fest-Ouverture.....Brahms

Oh, Richard Strauss, son of the Munich horn-player, what do you mean by this symphony in which you speak for an hour?

Or one might put to you the question of Fontenelle to the sonata.

Had you really so much to say that you could not have expressed yourself in a symphonic poem of from 20 minutes to half an hour?

Your symphony is full of surprising things; there are oratorical graces and flourishes; there is the pessimism seen in your "Don Juan;" there is the virility of stormy youth:—but tell us now, in strict confidence, did you write the music because you could not keep it within you, or did you not often cudgel your brains for a fresh thought, while you padded cleverly here and there?

You write a scherzo characterized by ingenious instrumentation and abounding in sharp contrasts; you write an andante that contains beautiful music; and then you write a finale, where by the side of grand passages in melodramatic music, "sneak music," music that might fit the galloping hoofs in "Held by the Enemy."

Your symphony is full of suggestion. To the dreamer it is a delight. But the stern pedagogue might argue with reason, that one of the better waltzes of Johann Strauss would be of greater benefit to the student.

There are forms of music that were once deemed inevitable by all [illegible] are now approved by many; but will another generation of musicians work in these forms? Will the [illegible] and the symphony become enthusiastic over the coming composer? You are a hyper-modern. You have already tried the symphonic poem; you have a gift of making thought in the hearer; but in this symphony you arrest the attention rather by the expression of your thought than by the thought itself.

You are a symbolist in music. Passages in this symphony might illustrate Verlaine, and Ghil, and Gustave Kahn. There are vague ideas, as in the first movement, and I am not prepared to deny that vague ideas full of suggestion are superior to clear ideas of triteness.

Your symphony is so long, so long. Your processions of knights, spectres, strange inhabitants of strange lands, women who would fain join them, but follow far behind, are never ending.

But let us have the symphony again, for you provoke curiosity, and in another mood the hearer might substitute large admiration for moderate rapture.

***

It was a pleasure to hear Mrs. Eames-Story. It was a pleasure to hear a woman who does not suffer from a severe attack of the German vocal mania; who does not court popular applause by pyrotechnical display; who is modest and dignified on the stage, free from grimaces, heedless of familiar faces while she sings. Mrs. Story sang the air from "The Cid" in a sympathetic manner, without any affectation, without a trick. Her delivery was admirable throughout. The simplicity of her treatment of the air from "Armide" was equally worthy of praise. Sophie Arnould said of Rosalie Le Vasseur, who created the part of Armide, "She has the voice of the people;" a bitter speech, for Sophie hated her. She could not have said it of Mrs. Story. It is true that the audience applauded loudly, but the voice of the singer is free from the taint that gave the double meaning to the jest.

***

The orchestra, under Mr. Paur's direction, played exceedingly well. The charming piece by Saint-Saens was given with unusual delicacy; Hercules was allowed his gigantic sway; Omphale nagged him and mocked him to her heart's desire. The symphony was read dramatically, and passion did not rise superior to precision. The orchestra and the leader may well be congratulated on the work of the evening.

PHILIP HALE.

The Symphony rush Friday afternoon was the most terrible crush imaginable, and the concert last evening brought together the most brilliant audience of the season. "Every one was there," about expresses it.

American Art Journal.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 4, 1893.

The Second Symphony Concert confirms first impressions. Mr. Paur has definite ideas, and goes resolutely to work to accomplish them, but in so doing he is not graceful or picturesque. His reading of Schubert's Ninth Symphony (the one the composer probably never heard, it was written so near his death) was not only interesting, but romantic, and in the same direction were Volkmann's Richard Third Overture and Dvorak's Slav Rhapsody, No. 2. The vocalist was Nordica, not up to her highest mark in the tedious Herodiade air, which one hears everywhere, but better in the Fidelio scene. W. F. Apthorp's program analyses are excellent. It would be well if the Music Hall could be better lighted, while people are finding their seats in the afternoon.

Director Paur gave us a novelty at the third Symphony Concert, and one we were glad to hear, the F Symphony, by that lamented young composer, H. Goetz. At first hearing the first movement seemed wearisome, but the others were both fresh and inspiring. Then came Volkmann's Serenade, for strings, Schroeder playing the cello solo. The concert closed with the familiar Leonore Overture, No. 3.

[38]

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, OCT. 29, 1893.

The Symphony audience found itself in a not unusual predicament last night. For it ought to make up its mind as to whether or not it liked Richard Strauss's symphony in F minor, which it had just heard for the first time. So everybody waited for his neighbor and looked furtively for a sign of approbation or disapprobation upon some trustworthily critical face. And, again as usual, the little waiting space after each movement was consumed in this unprofitable delay, and the symphony had to round out its vehement finale in order to extract something like real applause from an audience which had undoubtedly enjoyed the work more than it dared to intimate.

For this composition is independent enough to suit even a constitutional clamorer after something new, and it is full of surprises, the most of which are pleasant ones, although some are most eminent for their rough strength and untrammelled power. Melody it has in profusion—melody always obvious, often brief, generally graceful, sometimes piquant and occasionally sombre, dirge-like or grave as the theme of a chorale. Its rhythms are marked, and in the scherzo they are alternated with almost startling unexpectedness. The tone-color, derived from the full modern orchestra, including the bass tuba but without the fanciful percussion instruments,—is very varied and often exceedingly rich and deep. Sometimes one thinks of Wagner when the extreme high tones of the violins and wooden wind are used, or again when the brass comes rushing and crashing in; but generally the instrumentation smacks of originality. Contrasts of theme and treatment abound, particularly in the scherzo and last movement, in which latter gentle soft measures are confronted by tremendous and dissonant outbursts. The slow movement is of a romantic character and contains no fewer than four distinct themes, most of which are decidedly sentimental, while one is a short, strenuous trumpet call. The general style of composition is rather free than formal, and no movement is so long as to permit a full regulation development of its thematic material. The scherzo is quite fascinating, with its fluttering, fairy-like figures and the march swing of the finale has a triumphal progress and voluminousness.

The other instrumental numbers were old friends—Saint-Saens's "Rouet d'Omphale" and Brahms's "Academic" overture, the latter ending the programme, which had begun with the symphony. The playing was admirable all through the concert, and often rose to something closely akin to real enthusiasm, especially in the stronger movements of the symphony and at the end of the overture. The over-firm accentuation of prominent phrases had been greatly modified, and the orchestra showed their nearer approach to the easy elasticity which marks ideal playing. There was surely no lack of finesse in the "Spinning Wheel," and when fire and force were needed they glowed and swelled.

Between these numbers Mrs. Emma Eames-Story sang two large airs of love, grief and desolation, which were the "Pleurez, mes yeux," from Massenet's "Cid," and "Ah, si la liberte me doit etre ravie," from the "Armide" of Gluck. With such melancholy strains she could not expect to procure popular plaudits, although she did obtain appreciative recalls. But the rich quality and even scale of her voice, her smooth perfected style and her dignified quietude, were remarked with pleasure, and one felt that in choosing such music from her standard and classic repertory, she had paid a compliment to the supposed high taste of her audience. If any one term were to be chosen to express the chief element of her singing, it might be calm elegance; for depth, warmth and passion it certainly did not betray, and the hearer would never guess that the firm, smooth, balanced phrases were meant to illustrate the passion of a heroine bidding her eyes to "weep all their tears," or wondering if the "too fatal foe of her life's happiness" were to hold her enslaved.

There will be no concert next week, but on the following Saturday the programme will consist of Mozart's "Jupiter," and Haydn's D-major symphonies, together with Brahms's double concerto for violin and 'cello, to be played by Messrs. Kneisel and Schroeder.

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

The Kneisel programme was a standard one—Beethoven's quartette in F major, opus 59; Haydn's quartette in G minor, and Brahms's quartette in F major, opus 88, Mr. Zach playing the second viola part. The Adamowski programme had more variety—a quartette in B major, by Haydn; a romance for violin, by Beethoven, played by Mr. Adamowski, and the second quintette of Joseph Miroslaw Weber, which was then to receive its first public reading in this country, but for which was substituted a somewhat familiar quartette by Bazzini, because Mr. Moldauer, who was expected for the second violin part, was not able to assist. The playing at the former concert was altogether admirable and grew in animation and magnetism throughout the evening, ending in quite a blaze of enthusiasm. But at the latter the work was unequal, owing, perhaps, to the change in the programme, even Mr. Adamowski's solo not being up to his standard.

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

There is a general disposition to doubt the sincerity of a goodly part of the regular attendants at the Symphony concerts. It is contended that their presence at these weekly assemblages is more because it is the fashion than because their love of the masters compels them to pay this periodic homage to art. But we are inclined to believe that they who go to hear Beethoven, Schumann, Wagner and the rest of the immortal host in deference to the dictates of fashion rather than to gratify their own likings for high class music are comparatively few. In the first place, the hall is not favorable for the display of dress or even personality to an appreciable extent, as in the case of an opera performance at the great and ingeniously devised Metropolitan Opera House in New York, for a prominent example. Even if there be a large number of the listeners who affect a liking for the best things, in order to keep within the circles that are supposed to reflect the state of musical culture among us, they are harmless; and if they really are bored they are not likely long to continue their "patronage" of the concerts, though their places may be taken by others of the same sort when they retire. Instances of the birth of a real love for the classics among these negative people have not been unknown. Its development has been proven on occasion most unexpectedly. They have been known to leave a concert of the "miscellaneous" order, and a good one in its way, before it was half done, whereas before their tastes had been improved—we will not say cultivated—they would have sat it out to the last note and all through would have worked the encore game without mercy or reason.

All the same, there are doubtless many who talk with great show of learning of the various merits of Brahms, Dvorak, Liszt, and the rest, but who might easily be misled into accepting an overture by Czibulka for one by Mendelssohn or swallowing an alleged suite by Bach that might be a series of dances by Sir Arthur Sullivan. There are not enough of these, however, we sincerely believe, to depreciate seriously the quality of the audiences at the symphony concerts so far as their honest likes and dislikes are concerned and as they may express them. Furthermore it is quite possible to have a good time at the performance of the ninth symphony tonight and tomorrow night to wag your head in sympathetic synchronism with the pulsatile movement of a Strauss waltz. Each has its place even in the same mind, and the cultivated mind at that. The capacity to appreciate each composer at his true worth and the ability to explain admiration or rejection of a high-class composition are given to few people. But the interest in such music may be none the less sincere.

THE SUN.

BALTIMORE, SATURDAY, NOV. 4, 1893.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.—The eighth annual series of concerts by this famous musical organization will commence on Tuesday next, at 3 P. M., at Ford's Grand Opera House, under the leadership of Mr. Emil Paur and the business direction of Mr. C. A. Ellis. The soloists for the first concert will include Lillian Nordica, Max Heinrich and Franz Kneisel. Manager Ellis expresses the utmost satisfaction as to the admirable adaption of Ford's for musical expression. He says the auditorium and sounding-board are equally capacious and successful.

Ford's.....Tuesday.....3 o'Clock.
The First Concert—Eighth Year Series.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

"It will discourse most excellent music."
Hamlet.

Soloists—NORDICA!—HEINRICH!—KNEISEL!

EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

Seats reserved, Albert's, 13 N. Charles st., today. Monday and Tuesday up to 2 P. M., for the season or for Tuesday only.
The Concert at 3. Over at 5.
ADMISSION—1ST FLOOR, $1; 2ND FLOOR, 50 cts.; 3D FLOOR, 25 cts.
Next Concert—Tuesday, December 12.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCIV. NO. 128.

SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 5, 1893.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Conductor Paur is showing rare good judgment in his programmes for the symphony concerts of the Boston orchestra, and he is gaining especial praise for putting the symphony where it belongs, first on the programme.

Last evening's concert opened with the symphony in F minor, op. 12, by Richard Strauss, which was given a reading quite in keeping with its brilliancy and wealth of orchestral coloring. The dainty scherzo was made a thing of airy grace by the band, and no better work in this class of composition has been heard here in many a day. The broad, strong themes of the final movement were brought out with splendid force by the reading given it, and the audience was led to realize all the beauties of this notable example of modern day writing.

Saint Saens' symphonic poem "Omphale's Spinning Wheel," made the central number in the orchestral selections, and gave a sharply contrasting element to the symphony and the academic overture by Brahms which ended the programme. The poem was made a tone picture of rare beauty by the performance given it, and the finale developed the fact that Theodore Thomas has a rival in producing pianissimo effects in the person of the new conductor of the Boston orchestra.

The Academic overture was read and played with splendid intelligence, and all of its intricacies were given with charming clearness, making a brilliant ending for the concert.

Mme. Eames was the soloist, and sung the Massenet recitative, "De cet affreux combat," and aria, "Pleurez! pleurez mez yeux!" from "Le Cid," as well as the Gluck aria, "Ah! si la liberte," from "Armide."

Although Mme. Eames lacks the warmth and emotional expression demanded for entire success upon the concert stage, she has much that wins her the commendation of the most critical, and in both the selections named she sang in a delightfully unaffected fashion. The Massenet aria is admirably suited to display her vocal gifts and she gave great enjoyment by her singing of this aria. The severely classical aria of Gluck were given with charming simplicity and directness, its phrasing and delivery quite disarming criticism. The singer was heartily welcomed and as heartily applauded after each of her appearances.

The first of the season's tours of the orchestra will occur during the coming week, and the concerts will be resumed on Saturday, the 18th inst., when Messrs. Kneisel and Schroeder will be the soloists.

SUNDAY, NOV 5, 1893.

Emma Eames Soloist at the Fourth Symphony—Patti Soon to Sing in Boston.

Emma Eames was the soloist at the fourth symphony concert, and in consequence Music hall was uncomfortably crowded at both the Friday afternoon rehearsal and at last night's concert. Miss Eames is a great Boston favorite, alike in social and artistic circles, and the reception accorded her was demonstratively cordial. She sang three numbers, the recitative "De Cet Affreux Combat," and the aria "Pleurez! Pleurez mes Yeux!" from Massenet's opera "Le Cid," and the aria "Ah! Si la Liberte," from Gluck's opera "Armide."

In all of these selections, Miss Eames' rich and powerful voice was heard to excellent advantage, but it is probable that many in the audience would have been pleased to hear her sing something lighter. There is really no reason why a vocal soloist at the symphony concerts should confine herself to the severer class of music.

Miss Eames'-voice is of wonderful purity and surpassing strength. It is smooth and clear throughout its extended range. Her execution is admirable, showing the best of schooling and the most artistic development of the rare gift bestowed upon her by nature. Miss Eames sang the recitative with a distinctness and expression that was thoroughly commendable. The arias were both sung with exquisite taste and expression, as well as strong dramatic effect.

A notable feature of the orchestra's offerings was the first performance here of Richard Strauss' symphony in F minor, op 12. This is a very interesting work and contains some of the best and most original efforts of its talented composer. There are four movements and they are treated in a distinctly modern style. The orchestration is very elaborate and some strikingly unique effects are gained.

In the first movement heavy demands are made upon the brasses, with the result that there is at times a harsh grating effect which, in its persistency, is rather displeasing to the ear. The second movement, scherzo, is also full of surprising changes of rhythm, and the melodies are sharply contrasted. The andante is notable for some unique harmonies, particularly a beautiful and impressive trumpet call. The final is brilliantly scored and made rather the most favorable impression of all the movements. A splendid interpretation was given by Mr Paur.

Saint-Saens' exquisite symphonic poem, "Omphale's Spinning Wheel," was the especial treat of the orchestral selections. The dainty and graceful melodies were interpreted with delightful effect and expression. No work of this class has ever received more artistic performance from the symphony orchestra. Brahms' academic festival overture, splendidly played, was the final number of the very brilliant program.

There will be no concert this week. On Nov 17 and 18 the program will be: Symphony in C major (Jupiter), Mozart; double concerto for violin and violoncello, Brahms; symphony in D major, Haydn; soloists, Mr Franz Kneisel and Mr Alwin Schroeder.

The Boston Symphony orchestra will make its first appearance in New York under Mr Paur's leadership Wednesday evening.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, NOV. 6, 1893.

The Symphony Concert.

In these days, when the music of the future seems to be the ultimate aim of every young composer, and when one often hears the assertion that the new school has superseded the old, or will do so shortly, it is good to see that the classical models of musical form can be effectively used in the expression of modern musical ideas. The Strauss symphony showed that the thematic treatment and orchestration of the present day need not be hampered in any degree by the following out of classical traditions.

The symphony as a whole was very enjoyable, in spite of the length of the work. Its themes were all attractive and interesting, the novel character of the scherzo being especially noteworthy. As might be expected, horns and woodwind are frequently called upon to furnish the romantic coloring that is so much used in modern works. It is needless to say that these instruments were played in a thoroughly commendable manner, with the slight exception of a somewhat poor ensemble in the last few measures of the andante.

The first movement was given with clearness and brilliancy that could not fail to arouse admiration, the coda being given with especial animation. The second and third movements were given appropriate readings, but the finale was hardly agitated enough for the molto appassionato that the composer demanded.

Mme. Eames then appeared, and her goings and comings were accompanied by enthusiastic applause. The wonderful richness of her voice was well shown in the mournful pathos of the aria from Le Cid, and she sang the number with a good deal of dramatic feeling. Her phrasing and expression were admirable, both in the Massenet selection and in the aria from Gluck's Armide, which came later in the concert.

The performance of Le Rouet d'Omphale was creditable as to delicacy, but it might have been given with more swing. The programme-music character of the work demands vividness and animation; the figures of the story stand forth in life-like manner, so there must be life in the rendering of the piece. This fervor is what has been customary in such pieces at the concerts of the past few years.

The Academic Overture of Brahms, given with appropriate heartiness and force, ended the concert. It is a fact worthy of notice that with one exception the works were all by living composers. The programme was well calculated to show the different phases of the modern school. The Strauss symphony, besides being of great value intrinsically, is noteworthy in that it shows how modern material can be effectively used in the traditional manner; Massenet's symphonic poem is worthy exponent of the large school of programme music; while the Academic Overture proves that the folk-song can still be worked up by master minds to form great and noble productions.

ARTHUR ELSON.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 5, 1893.

The Fourth Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the fourth Symphony concert, given last evening in Music Hall, was as follows:

Symphony in F minor, op. 12.....Richard Strauss
Recitative and aria, "Pleurez! pleurez mes yeux!" from "Le Cid".....Massenet
Symphonic Poem, "Le Rouet d'Omphale".....Saint-Saens
Aria, "Ah! si la liberte," from "Armide".....Gluck
Akademische Fest-Ouverture.....Brahms

Oh, Richard Strauss, son of the Munich horn-player, what do you mean by this symphony in which you speak for an hour?

Of one might put to you the question of Fontenelle to the sonata.

Had you really so much to say that you could not have expressed yourself in a symphonic poem of from 20 minutes to half an hour?

Your symphony is full of surprising things; there are oratorical graces and flourishes; there is the pessimism seen in your "Don Juan;" there is the virility of stormy youth;—but tell us now, in strict confidence, did you write the music because you could not keep it within you, or did you not often cudgel your brains for a fresh thought, while you padded cleverly here and there?

You write a scherzo characterized by ingenious instrumentation and abounding in sharp contrasts; you write an andante that contains beautiful music; and then you write a finale, where by the side of grand passages is melodramatic music, "sneak music," music that might fit the galloping hoofs in "Held by the Enemy."

Your symphony is full of suggestion. To the dreamer it is a delight. But the stern pedagogue might argue with reason, that one of the Lanner waltzes of Johann Strauss would be of greater benefit to the student.

There are forms of music that were once deemed inevitable by all; that are now approved by many; but will another generation of musicians work in these forms? Will the orchestra and the symphony incite the enthusiasm of the coming composers? You are a hyper-modern; you have already tried the symphonic poem; you have a gift of awaking thought in the hearer; but in this symphony you arrest the attention rather by the expression of your thought than by the thought itself.

You are a symbolist in music. Passages in this symphony might illustrate Verlaine, and Ghil, and Gustave Kahn. There are vague ideas, as in the first movement, and I am not prepared to deny that vague ideas full of suggestion are superior to clear ideas of triteness.

Your symphony is so long, so long. Your processions of knights, spectres, strange inhabitants of strange lands, women who would fain join them, but follow far behind, are never ending.

But let us have the symphony again, for you provoke curiosity, and in another mood the hearer might substitute large admiration for moderate rapture.

* * *

It was a pleasure to hear Mrs. Eames-Story. It was a pleasure to hear a woman who does not suffer from a severe attack of the German vocal mania; who does not court popular applause by pyrotechnical display; who is modest and dignified on the stage, free from grimaces, heedless of familiar faces while she sings. Mrs. Story sang the air from "The Cid" in a sympathetic manner, without any affectation, without a trick. Her delivery was admirable throughout. The simplicity of her treatment of the air from "Armide" was equally worthy of praise. Sophie Arnould said of Rosalie LeVasseur, who created the part of Armide, "She has the voice of the people;" a bitter speech, for Sophie hated her. She could not have said it of Mrs. Story. It is true that the audience applauded loudly, but the voice of the singer is free from the taint that gave the double meaning to the jest.

* * *

The orchestra, under Mr. Paur's direction, played exceedingly well. The charming piece by Saint-Saens was given with unusual delicacy; Hercules was allowed his gigantic sway; Omphale nagged him and mocked him to her heart's desire. The symphony was read dramatically, and passion did not rise superior to precision. The orchestra and the leader may well be congratulated on the work of the evening.

PHILIP HALE.

The Symphony rush Friday afternoon was the most terrible crush imaginable, and the concert last evening brought together the most brilliant audience of the season. "Every one was there," about expresses it.

American Art Journal.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 4, 1893.

The Second Symphony Concert confirms first impressions. Mr. Paur has definite ideas, and goes resolutely to work to accomplish them, but in so doing he is not graceful or picturesque. His reading of Schubert's Ninth Symphony (the one the composer probably never heard, it was written so near his death) was not only interesting, but romantic, and in the same direction were Volkmann's Richard Third Overture and Dvorak's Slav Rhapsody, No. 2. The vocalist was Nordica, not up to her highest mark in the tedious Herodiade air, which one hears everywhere, but better in the Fidelio scene. W. F. Apthorp's program analyses are excellent. It would be well if the Music Hall could be better lighted, while people are finding their seats in the afternoon.

Director Paur gave us a novelty at the third Symphony Concert, and one we were glad to hear, the F Symphony, by that lamented young composer, H. Goetz. At first hearing the first movement seemed wearisome, but the others were both fresh and inspiring. Then came Volkmann's Serenade, for strings, Schroeder playing the cello solo. The concert closed with the familiar Leonore Overture, No. 3.

[38]

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, OCT. 29, 1893.

The Symphony audience found itself in a not unusual predicament last night. For it ought to make up its mind as to whether or not it liked Richard Strauss's symphony in F minor, which it had just heard for the first time. So everybody waited for his neighbor and looked furtively for a sign of approbation or disapprobation upon some trustworthily critical face. And, again as usual, the little waiting space after each movement was consumed in this unprofitable delay, and the symphony had to round out its vehement finale in order to extract something like real applause from an audience which had undoubtedly enjoyed the work more than it dared to intimate.

For this composition is independent enough to suit even a constitutional clamorer after something new, and it is full of surprises, the most of which are pleasant ones, although some are most eminent for their rough strength and untrammelled power. Melody it has in profusion—melody always obvious, often brief, generally graceful, sometimes piquant and occasionally sombre, dirge-like or grave as the theme of a chorale. Its rhythms are marked, and in the scherzo they are alternated with almost startling unexpectedness. The tone-color, derived from the full modern orchestra, including the bass tuba but without the fanciful percussion instruments,—is very varied and often exceedingly rich and deep. Sometimes one thinks of Wagner when the extreme high tones of the violins and wooden wind are used, or again when the brass comes rushing and crashing in; but generally the instrumentation smacks of originality. Contrasts of theme and treatment abound, particularly in the scherzo and last movement, in which latter gentle soft measures are confronted by tremendous and dissonant outbursts. The slow movement is of a romantic character and contains no fewer than four distinct themes, most of which are decidedly sentimental, while one is a short, strenuous trumpet call. The general style of composition is rather free than formal, and no movement is so long as to permit a full regulation development of its thematic material. The scherzo is quite fascinating, with its fluttering, fairy-like figures and the march swing of the finale has a triumphal progress and voluminousness.

The other instrumental numbers were old friends—Saint-Saens's "Rouet d'Omphale" and Brahms's "Academic" overture, the latter ending the programme, which had begun with the symphony. The playing was admirable all through the concert, and often rose to something closely akin to real enthusiasm, especially in the stronger movements of the symphony and at the end of the overture. The over-firm accentuation of prominent phrases had been greatly modified, and the orchestra showed their nearer approach to the easy elasticity which marks ideal playing. There was surely no lack of finesse in the "Spinning Wheel," and when fire and force were needed they glowed and swelled.

Between these numbers Mrs. Emma Eames-Story sang two large airs of love, grief and desolation, which were the "Pleurez, mes yeux," from Massenet's "Cid," and "Ah, si la liberte me doit etre ravie," from the "Armide" of Gluck. With such melancholy strains she could not expect to procure popular plaudits, although she did obtain appreciative recalls. But the rich quality and even scale of her voice, her smooth perfected style and her dignified quietude, were remarked with pleasure, and one felt that in choosing such music from her standard and classic repertory, she had paid a compliment to the supposed high taste of her audience. If any one term were to be chosen to express the chief element of her singing, it might be calm elegance; for depth, warmth and passion it certainly did not betray, and the hearer would never guess that the firm, smooth, balanced phrases were meant to illustrate the passion of a heroine bidding her eyes to "weep all their tears," or wondering if the "too fatal fee of her life's happiness" were to hold her enslaved.

There will be no concert next week, but on the following Saturday the programme will consist of Mozart's "Jupiter," and Haydn's D-major symphonies, together with Brahms's double concerto for violin and 'cello, to be played by Messrs. Kneisel and Schroeder.

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

The Kneisel programme was a standard one—Beethoven's quartette in F major, opus 59; Haydn's quartette in G minor, and Brahms's quartette in F major, opus 88, Mr. Zach playing the second viola part. The Adamowski programme had more variety—a quartette in B major, by Haydn; a romance for violin, by Beethoven, played by Mr. Adamowski, and the second quintette of Joseph Miroslaw Weber, which was then to receive its first public reading in this country, but for which was substituted a somewhat familiar quartette by Bazzini, because Mr. Moldauer, who was expected for the second violin part, was not able to assist. The playing at the former concert was altogether admirable and grew in animation and magnetism throughout the evening, ending in quite a blaze of enthusiasm. But at the latter the work was unequal, owing, perhaps, to the change in the programme, even Mr. Adamowski's solo not being up to his standard.

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

There is a general disposition to doubt the sincerity of a goodly part of the regular attendants at the Symphony concerts. It is contended that their presence at these weekly assemblages is more because it is the fashion than because their love of the masters compels them to pay this periodic homage to art. But we are inclined to believe that they who go to hear Beethoven, Schumann, Wagner and the rest of the immortal host in deference to the dictates of fashion rather than to gratify their own likings for high class music are comparatively few. In the first place, the hall is not favorable for the display of dress or even personality to an appreciable extent, as in the case of an opera performance at the great and ingeniously devised Metropolitan Opera House in New York, for a prominent example. Even if there be a large number of the listeners who affect a liking for the best things, in order to keep within the circles that are supposed to reflect the state of musical culture among us, they are harmless; and if they really are bored they are not likely long to continue their "patronage" of the concerts, though their places may be taken by others of the same sort when they retire. Instances of the birth of a real love for the classics among these negative people have not been unknown. Its development has been proven on occasion most unexpectedly. They have been known to leave a concert of the "miscellaneous" order, and a good one in its way, before it was half done, whereas before their tastes had been improved—we will not say cultivated—they would have sat it out to the last note and all through would have worked the encore game without mercy or reason.

All the same, there are doubtless many who talk with great show of learning of the various merits of Brahms, Dvorak, Liszt, and the rest, but who might easily be misled into accepting an overture by Czibulka for one by Mendelssohn or swallowing an alleged suite by Bach that might be a series of dances by Sir Arthur Sullivan. There are not enough of these, however, we sincerely believe, to depreciate seriously the quality of the audiences at the symphony concerts so far as their honest likes and dislikes are concerned and as they may express them. Furthermore it is quite possible to have a good time at the performance of the ninth symphony tonight and tomorrow night to wag your head in sympathetic synchronism with the pulsatile movement of a Strauss waltz. Each has its place even in the same mind, and the cultivated mind at that. The capacity to appreciate each composer at his true worth and the ability to explain admiration or rejection of a high-class composition are given to few people. But the interest in such music may be none the less sincere.

THE SUN.

BALTIMORE, SATURDAY, NOV. 4, 1893.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.—The eighth annual series of concerts by this famous musical organization will commence on Tuesday next, at 3 P. M., at Ford's Grand Opera House, under the leadership of Mr. Emil Paur and the business direction of Mr. C. A. Ellis. The soloists for the first concert will include Lillian Nordica, Max Heinrich and Franz Kneisel. Manager Ellis expresses the utmost satisfaction as to the admirable adaption of Ford's for musical expression. He says the auditorium and sounding-board are equally capacious and successful.

Ford's.....Tuesday.....3 o'Clock.
The First Concert—Eighth Year Series.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

"It will discourse most excellent music." Hamlet.

Soloists—NORDICA!—HEINRICH!—KNEISEL!

EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

Seats reserved, Albert's, 13 N. Charles st., today. Monday and Tuesday up to 2 P. M., for the season or for Tuesday only.
The Concert at 3. Over at 5.
ADMISSION—1ST FLOOR, $1; 2ND FLOOR 50 cts.; 3D FLOOR, 25 cts.
Next Concert—Tuesday, December 12.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCIV. NO. 128.

SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 5, 1893.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Conductor Paur is showing rare good judgment in his programmes for the symphony concerts of the Boston orchestra, and he is gaining especial praise for putting the symphony where it belongs, first on the programme.

Last evening's concert opened with the symphony in F minor, op. 12, by Richard Strauss, which was given a reading quite in keeping with its brilliancy and wealth of orchestral coloring. The dainty scherzo was made a thing of airy grace by the band, and no better work in this class of composition has been heard here in many a day. The broad, strong themes of the final movement were brought out with splendid force by the reading given it, and the audience was led to realize all the beauties of this notable example of modern day writing.

Saint Saens' symphonic poem "Omphale's Spinning Wheel," made the central number in the orchestral selections, and gave a sharply contrasting element to the symphony and the academic overture by Brahms which ended the programme. The poem was made a tone picture of rare beauty by the performance given it, and the finale developed the fact that Theodore Thomas has a rival in producing pianissimo effects in the person of the new conductor of the Boston orchestra.

The Academic overture was read and played with splendid intelligence, and all of its intricacies were given with charming clearness, making a brilliant ending for the concert.

Mme. Eames was the soloist, and sung the Massenet recitative, "De cet affreux combat," and aria, "Pleurez! pleurez mez yeux!" from "Le Cid," as well as the Gluck aria, "Ah! si la liberte," from "Armide."

Although Mme. Eames lacks the warmth and emotional expression demanded for entire success upon the concert stage, she has much that wins her the commendation of the most critical, and in both the selections named she sang in a delightfully unaffected fashion. The Massenet aria is admirably suited to display her vocal gifts and she gave great enjoyment by her singing of this aria. The severely classical aria of Gluck were given with charming simplicity and directness, its phrasing and delivery quite disarming criticism. The singer was heartily welcomed and as heartily applauded after each of her appearances.

The first of the season's tours of the orchestra will occur during the coming week, and the concerts will be resumed on Saturday, the 18th inst., when Messrs. Kneisel and Schroeder will be the soloists.

Emma Eames Soloist at the Fourth Symphony—Patti Seen to Sing in Boston.

Emma Eames was the soloist at the fourth symphony concert, and in consequence Music hall was uncomfortably crowded at both the Friday afternoon rehearsal and at last night's concert. Miss Eames is a great Boston favorite, alike in social and artistic circles, and the reception accorded her was demonstratively cordial. She sang three numbers, the recitative "De Cet Affreux Combat," and the aria "Pleurez! Pleurez mes Yeux!" from Massenet's opera "Le Cid," and the aria "Ah! Si la Liberte," from Gluck's opera "Armide."

In all of these selections, Miss Eames' rich and powerful voice was heard to excellent advantage, but it is probable that many in the audience would have been pleased to hear her sing something lighter. There is really no reason why a vocal soloist at the symphony concerts should confine herself to the severer class of music.

Miss Eames'-voice is of wonderful purity and surpassing strength. It is smooth and clear throughout its extended range. Her execution is admirable, showing the best of schooling and the most artistic development of the rare gift bestowed upon her by nature. Miss Eames sang the recitative with a distinctness and expression that was thoroughly commendable. The arias were both sung with exquisite taste and expression, as well as strong dramatic effect.

A notable feature of the orchestra's offerings was the first performance here of Richard Strauss' symphony in F minor, op 12. This is a very interesting work and contains some of the best and most original efforts of its talented composer. There are four movements and they are treated in a distinctly modern style. The orchestration is very elaborate and some strikingly unique effects are gained.

In the first movement heavy demands are made upon the brasses, with the result that there is at times a harsh grating effect which, in its persistency, is rather displeasing to the ear. The second movement, scherzo, is also full of surprising changes of rhythm, and the melodies are sharply contrasted. The andante is notable for some unique harmonies, particularly a beautiful and impressive trumpet call. The final is brilliantly scored and made rather the most favorable impression of all the movements. A splendid interpretation was given by Mr Paur.

Saint-Saens' exquisite symphonic poem, "Omphale's Spinning Wheel," was the especial treat of the orchestral selections. The dainty and graceful melodies were interpreted with delightful effect and expression. No work of this class has ever received more artistic performance from the symphony orchestra. Brahms' academic festival overture, splendidly played, was the final number of the very brilliant program.

There will be no concert this week. On Nov 17 and 18 the program will be: Symphony in C major (Jupiter), Mozart; double concerto for violin and violoncello, Brahms; symphony in D major, Haydn; soloists, Mr Franz Kneisel and Mr Alwin Schroeder.

The Boston Symphony orchestra will make its first appearance in New York under Mr Paur's leadership Wednesday evening.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, NOV. 6, 1893.

The Symphony Concert.

In these days, when the music of the future seems to be the ultimate aim of every young composer, and when one often hears the assertion that the new school has superseded the old, or will do so shortly, it is good to see that the classical models of musical form can be effectively used in the expression of modern musical ideas. The Strauss symphony showed that the thematic treatment and orchestration of the present day need not be hampered in any degree by the following out of classical traditions.

The symphony as a whole was very enjoyable, in spite of the length of the work. Its themes were all attractive and interesting, the novel character of the scherzo being especially noteworthy. As might be expected, horns and woodwind are frequently called upon to furnish the romantic coloring that is so much used in modern works. It is needless to say that these instruments were played in a thoroughly commendable manner, with the slight exception of a somewhat poor ensemble in the last few measures of the andante.

The first movement was given with clearness and brilliancy that could not fail to arouse admiration, the coda being given with especial animation. The second and third movements were given appropriate readings, but the finale was hardly agitated enough for the molto appassionato that the composer demanded.

Mme. Eames then appeared, and her goings and comings were accompanied by enthusiastic applause. The wonderful richness of her voice was well shown in the mournful pathos of the aria from Le Cid, and she sang the number with a good deal of dramatic feeling. Her phrasing and expression were admirable, both in the Massenet selection and in the aria from Gluck's Armide, which came later in the concert.

The performance of Le Rouet d'Omphale was creditable as to delicacy, but it might have been given with more swing. The programme-music character of the work demands vividness and animation; the figures of the story stand forth in life-like manner, so there must be life in the rendering of the piece. This fervor is what has been customary in such pieces at the concerts of the past few years.

The Academic Overture of Brahms, given with appropriate heartiness and force, ended the concert. It is a fact worthy of notice that with one exception the works were all by living composers. The programme was well calculated to show the different phases of the modern school. The Strauss symphony, besides being of great value intrinsically, is noteworthy in that it shows how modern material can be effectively used in the traditional manner; Massenet's symphonic poem is worthy exponent of the large school of programme music; while the Academic Overture proves that the folk-song can still be worked up by master minds to form great and noble productions.

ARTHUR ELSON.

The Fourth Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the fourth symphony concert, given last evening in Music Hall, was as follows:

Symphony in F minor, op. 12.....Richard Strauss
Recitative and aria, "Pleurez! pleurez mes yeux!" from "Le Cid".....Massenet
Symphonic Poem, "Le Rouet d'Omphale".....Saint-Saens
Aria, "Ah! si la liberte," from "Armide".....Gluck
Akademische Fest-Ouverture.....Brahms

Oh, Richard Strauss, son of the Munich horn-player, what do you mean by this symphony in which you speak for an hour?

Of one might put to you the question of Fontenelle to the sonata.

And you really so much to say that you could not have expressed yourself in a symphonic poem of from 20 minutes to half an hour?

Your symphony is full of surprising things; there are oratorical graces and flourishes; there is the pessimism seen in your "Don Juan;" there is the virility of stormy youth;—but tell us now, in strict confidence, did you write the music because you could not keep it within you, or did you not often cudgel your brains for a fresh thought, while you padded cleverly here and there?

You write a scherzo characterized by ingenious instrumentation and abounding in sharp contrasts; you write an andante that contains beautiful music; and then you write a finale, where by the side of grand passages is melodramatic music, "sneak music," music that might fit the galloping hoofs in "Held by the Enemy."

Your symphony is full of suggestion. To the dreamer it is a delight. But the stern pedagogue might argue with reason, that one of the Dutter waltzes of Johann Strauss would be of greater benefit to the student.

There are forms of music that were once decried inevitable by all that are now approved by many; but will another generation of musicians work in these forms? Will the critics and the symphony hunter the enthusiasm of coming composers? You are a hyper-modern; you have already tried the symphonic poem; you have a gift of awaking thought in the hearer; but in this symphony you arrest the attention rather by the expression of your thought than by the thought itself.

You are a symbolist in music. Passages in this symphony might illustrate Verlaine, and Ghil, and Gustave Kahn. There are vague ideas, as in the first movement, and I am not prepared to deny that vague ideas full of suggestion are superior to clear ideas of triteness.

Your symphony is so long, so long. Your processions of knights, spectres, strange inhabitants of strange lands, women who would fain join them, but follow far behind, are never ending.

But let us have the symphony again, for you provoke curiosity, and in another mood the hearer might substitute large admiration for moderate rapture.

* * *

It was a pleasure to hear Mrs. Eames-Story. It was a pleasure to hear a woman who does not suffer from a severe attack of the German vocal mania; who does not court popular applause by pyrotechnical display; who is modest and dignified on the stage, free from grimaces, heedless of familiar faces while she sings. Mrs. Story sang the air from "The Cid" in a sympathetic manner, without any affectation, without a trick. Her delivery was admirable throughout. The simplicity of her treatment of the air from "Armide" was equally worthy of praise. Sophie Arnould said of Rosalie LeVasseur, who created the part of Armide, "She has the voice of the people;" a bitter speech, for Sophie hated her. She could not have said it of Mrs. Story. It is true that the audience applauded loudly, but the voice of the singer is free from the taint that gave the double meaning to the jest.

* * *

The orchestra, under Mr. Paur's direction, played exceedingly well. The charming piece by Saint-Saens was given with unusual delicacy; Hercules was allowed his gigantic say; Omphale nagged him and mocked him to her heart's desire. The symphony was read dramatically; and passion did not rise superior to precision. The orchestra and the leader may well be congratulated on the work of the evening.

PHILIP HALE.

The Symphony rush Friday afternoon was the most terrible crush imaginable, and the concert last evening brought together the most brilliant audience of the season. "Every one was there," about expresses it.

American Art Journal.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 4, 1893.

The Second Symphony Concert confirms first impressions. Mr. Paur has definite ideas, and goes resolutely to work to accomplish them, but in so doing he is not graceful or picturesque. His reading of Schubert's Ninth Symphony (the one the composer probably never heard, it was written so near his death) was not only interesting, but romantic, and in the same direction were Volkmann's Richard Third Overture and Dvorak's Slav Rhapsody, No. 2. The vocalist was Nordica, not up to her highest mark in the tedious Herodiade air, which one hears everywhere, but better in the Fidelio scene. W. F. Apthorp's program analyses are excellent. It would be well if the Music Hall could be better lighted, while people are finding their seats in the afternoon.

Director Paur gave us a novelty at the third Symphony Concert, and one we were glad to hear, the F Symphony, by that lamented young composer, H. Goetz. At first hearing the first movement seemed wearisome, but the others were both fresh and inspiring. Then came Volkmann's Serenade, for strings, Schroeder playing the cello solo. The concert closed with the familiar Leonore Overture, No. 3.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, OCT. 29, 1893.

The Symphony audience found itself in a not unusual predicament last night. For it ought to make up its mind as to whether or not it liked Richard Strauss's symphony in F minor, which it had just heard for the first time. So everybody waited for his neighbor and looked furtively for a sign of approbation or disapprobation upon some trustworthily critical face. And, again as usual, the little waiting space after each movement was consumed in this unprofitable delay, and the symphony had to round out its vehement finale in order to extract something like real applause from an audience which had undoubtedly enjoyed the work more than it dared to intimate.

For this composition is independent enough to suit even a constitutional clamorer after something new, and it is full of surprises, the most of which are pleasant ones, although some are most eminent for their rough strength and untrammelled power. Melody it has in profusion—melody always obvious, often brief, generally graceful, sometimes piquant and occasionally sombre, dirge-like or grave as the theme of a chorale. Its rhythms are marked, and in the scherzo they are alternated with almost startling unexpectedness. The tone-color, derived from the full modern orchestra, including the bass tuba but without the fanciful percussion instruments,—is very varied and often exceedingly rich and deep. Sometimes one thinks of Wagner when the extreme high tones of the violins and wooden wind are used, or again when the brass comes rushing and crashing in; but generally the instrumentation smacks of originality. Contrasts of theme and treatment abound, particularly in the scherzo and last movement, in which latter gentle soft measures are confronted by tremendous and dissonant outbursts. The slow movement is of a romantic character and contains no fewer than four distinct themes, most of which are decidedly sentimental, while one is a short, strenuous trumpet call. The general style of composition is rather free than formal, and no movement is so long as to permit a full regulation development of its thematic material. The scherzo is quite fascinating, with its fluttering, fairy-like figures and the march swing of the finale has a triumphal progress and voluminousness.

The other instrumental numbers were old friends—Saint-Saens's "Rouet d'Omphale" and Brahms's "Academic" overture, the latter ending the programme, which had begun with the symphony. The playing was admirable all through the concert, and often rose to something closely akin to real enthusiasm, especially in the stronger movements of the symphony and at the end of the overture. The over-firm accentuation of prominent phrases had been greatly modified, and the orchestra showed their nearer approach to the easy elasticity which marks ideal playing. There was surely no lack of finesse in the "Spinning Wheel," and when fire and force were needed they glowed and swelled.

Between these numbers Mrs. Emma Eames-Story sang two large airs of love, grief and desolation, which were the "Pleurez, mes yeux," from Massenet's "Cid," and "Ah, si la liberte me doit etre ravie," from the "Armide" of Gluck. With such melancholy strains she could not expect to procure popular plaudits, although she did obtain appreciative recalls. But the rich quality and even scale of her voice, her smooth perfected style and her dignified quietude, were remarked with pleasure, and one felt that in choosing such music from her standard and classic repertory, she had paid a compliment to the supposed high taste of her audience. If any one term were to be chosen to express the chief element of her singing, it might be calm elegance; for depth, warmth and passion it certainly did not betray, and the hearer would never guess that the firm, smooth, balanced phrases were meant to illustrate the passion of a heroine bidding her eyes to "weep all their tears," or wondering if the "too fatal foe of her life's happiness" were to hold her enslaved.

There will be no concert next week, but on the following Saturday the programme will consist of Mozart's "Jupiter," and Haydn's D-major symphonies, together with Brahms's double concerto for violin and 'cello, to be played by Messrs. Kneisel and Schroeder.

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

The Kneisel programme was a standard one—Beethoven's quartette in F major, opus 59; Haydn's quartette in G minor, and Brahms's quartette in F major, opus 88, Mr. Zach playing the second viola part. The Adamowski programme had more variety—a quartette in B major, by Haydn; a romance for violin, by Beethoven, played by Mr. Adamowski, and the second quintette of Joseph Miroslaw Weber, which was then to receive its first public reading in this country, but for which was substituted a somewhat familiar quartette by Bazzini, because Mr. Moldauer, who was expected for the second violin part, was not able to assist. The playing at the former concert was altogether admirable and grew in animation and magnetism throughout the evening, ending in quite a blaze of enthusiasm. But at the latter the work was unequal, owing, perhaps, to the change in the programme, even Mr. Adamowski's solo not being up to his standard.

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

There is a general disposition to doubt the sincerity of a goodly part of the regular attendants at the Symphony concerts. It is contended that their presence at these weekly assemblages is more because it is the fashion than because their love of the masters compels them to pay this periodic homage to art. But we are inclined to believe that they who go to hear Beethoven, Schumann, Wagner and the rest of the immortal host in deference to the dictates of fashion rather than to gratify their own likings for high class music are comparatively few. In the first place, the hall is not favorable for the display of dress or even personality to an appreciable extent, as in the case of an opera performance at the great and ingeniously devised Metropolitan Opera House in New York, for a prominent example. Even if there be a large number of the listeners who affect a liking for the best things, in order to keep within the circles that are supposed to reflect the state of musical culture among us, they are harmless; and if they really are bored they are not likely long to continue their "patronage" of the concerts, though their places may be taken by others of the same sort when they retire. Instances of the birth of a real love for the classics among these negative people have not been unknown. Its development has been proven on occasion most unexpectedly. They have been known to leave a concert of the "miscellaneous" order, and a good one in its way, before it was half done, whereas before their tastes had been improved—we will not say cultivated—they would have sat it out to the last note and all through would have worked the encore game without mercy or reason.

All the same, there are doubtless many who talk with great show of learning of the various merits of Brahms, Dvorak, Liszt, and the rest, but who might easily be misled into accepting an overture by Czibulka for one by Mendelssohn or swallowing an alleged suite by Bach that might be a series of dances by Sir Arthur Sullivan. There are not enough of these, however, we sincerely believe, to depreciate seriously the quality of the audiences at the symphony concerts so far as their honest likes and dislikes are concerned and as they may express them. Furthermore it is quite possible to have a good time at the performance of the ninth symphony tonight and tomorrow night to wag your head in sympathetic synchronism with the pulsatile movement of a Strauss waltz. Each has its place even in the same mind, and the cultivated mind at that. The capacity to appreciate each composer at his true worth and the ability to explain admiration or rejection of a high-class composition are given to few people. But the interest in such music may be none the less sincere.

THE SUN.

BALTIMORE, SATURDAY, NOV. 4, 1893.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.—The eighth annual series of concerts by this famous musical organization will commence on Tuesday next, at 3 P. M., at Ford's Grand Opera House, under the leadership of Mr. Emil Paur and the business direction of Mr. C. A. Ellis. The soloists for the first concert will include Lillian Nordica, Max Heinrich and Franz Kneisel. Manager Ellis expresses the utmost satisfaction as to the admirable adaption of Ford's for musical expression. He says the auditorium and sounding-board are equally capacious and successful.

Ford's.....Tuesday.....3 o'Clock.
The First Concert—Eighth Year Series.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

"It will discourse most excellent music."
Hamlet.

Soloists—NORDICA!—HEINRICH!—KNEISEL!

EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

Seats reserved, Albert's, 13 N. Charles st., today, Monday and Tuesday up to 2 P. M., for the season or for Tuesday only.
The Concert at 3. Over at 5.
ADMISSION—1ST FLOOR, $1; 2ND FLOOR, 50 cts.; 3D FLOOR, 25 cts.
Next Concert—Tuesday, December 12.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCIV. NO. 128.

SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 5, 1893.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Conductor Paur is showing rare good judgment in his programmes for the symphony concerts of the Boston orchestra, and he is gaining especial praise for putting the symphony where it belongs, first on the programme.

Last evening's concert opened with the symphony in F minor, op. 12, by Richard Strauss, which was given a reading quite in keeping with its brilliancy and wealth of orchestral coloring. The dainty scherzo was made a thing of airy grace by the band, and no better work in this class of composition has been heard here in many a day. The broad, strong themes of the final movement were brought out with splendid force by the reading given it, and the audience was led to realize all the beauties of this notable example of modern day writing.

Saint Saens' symphonic poem "Omphale's Spinning Wheel," made the central number in the orchestral selections, and gave a sharply contrasting element to the symphony and the academic overture by Brahms which ended the programme. The poem was made a tone picture of rare beauty by the performance given it, and the finale developed the fact that Theodore Thomas has a rival in producing pianissimo effects in the person of the new conductor of the Boston orchestra.

The Academic overture was read and played with splendid intelligence, and all of its intricacies were given with charming clearness, making a brilliant ending for the concert.

Mme. Eames was the soloist, and sung the Massenet recitative, "De cet affreux combat," and aria, "Pleurez! pleurez mez yeux!" from "Le Cid," as well as the Gluck aria, "Ah! si la liberte," from "Armide."

Although Mme. Eames lacks the warmth and emotional expression demanded for entire success upon the concert stage, she has much that wins her the commendation of the most critical, and in both the selections named she sang in a delightfully unaffected fashion. The Massenet aria is admirably suited to display her vocal gifts and she gave great enjoyment by her singing of this aria. The severely classical aria of Gluck were given with charming simplicity and directness, its phrasing and delivery quite disarming criticism. The singer was heartily welcomed and as heartily applauded after each of her appearances.

The first of the season's tours of the orchestra will occur during the coming week, and the concerts will be resumed on Saturday, the 18th inst., when Messrs. Kneisel and Schroeder will be the soloists.

Emma Eames Soloist at the Fourth Symphony—Patti Seen to Sing in Boston.

Emma Eames was the soloist at the fourth symphony concert, and in consequence Music hall was uncomfortably crowded at both the Friday afternoon rehearsal and at last night's concert. Miss Eames is a great Boston favorite, alike in social and artistic circles, and the reception accorded her was demonstratively cordial. She sang three numbers, the recitative "De Cet Affreux Combat," and the aria "Pleurez! Pleurez mes Yeux!" from Massenet's opera "Le Cid," and the aria "Ah! Si la Liberte," from Gluck's opera "Armide."

In all of these selections, Miss Eames' rich and powerful voice was heard to excellent advantage, but it is probable that many in the audience would have been pleased to hear her sing something lighter. There is really no reason why a vocal soloist at the symphony concerts should confine herself to the severer class of music.

Miss Eames' voice is of wonderful purity and surpassing strength. It is smooth and clear throughout its extended range. Her execution is admirable, showing the best of schooling and the most artistic development of the rare gift bestowed upon her by nature. Miss Eames sang the recitative with a distinctness and expression that was thoroughly commendable. The arias were both sung with exquisite taste and expression, as well as strong dramatic effect.

A notable feature of the orchestra's offerings was the first performance here of Richard Strauss' symphony in F minor, op 12. This is a very interesting work and contains some of the best and most original efforts of its talented composer. There are four movements and they are treated in a distinctly modern style. The orchestration is very elaborate and some strikingly unique effects are gained.

In the first movement heavy demands are made upon the brasses, with the result that there is at times a harsh grating effect which, in its persistency, is rather displeasing to the ear. The second movement, scherzo, is also full of surprising changes of rhythm, and the melodies are sharply contrasted. The andante is notable for some unique harmonies, particularly a beautiful and impressive trumpet call. The final is brilliantly scored and made rather the most favorable impression of all the movements. A splendid interpretation was given by Mr Paur.

Saint-Saens' exquisite symphonic poem, "Omphale's Spinning Wheel," was the especial treat of the orchestral selections. The dainty and graceful melodies were interpreted with delightful effect and expression. No work of this class has ever received more artistic performance from the symphony orchestra. Brahms' academic festival overture, splendidly played, was the final number of the very brilliant program.

There will be no concert this week. On Nov 17 and 18 the program will be: Symphony in C major (Jupiter), Mozart; double concerto for violin and violoncello, Brahms; symphony in D major, Haydn; soloists, Mr Franz Kneisel and Mr Alwin Schroeder.

The Boston Symphony orchestra will make its first appearance in New York under Mr Paur's leadership Wednesday evening.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, NOV. 6, 1893.

The Symphony Concert.

In these days, when the music of the future seems to be the ultimate aim of every young composer, and when one often hears the assertion that the new school has superseded the old, or will do so shortly, it is good to see that the classical models of musical form can be effectively used in the expression of modern musical ideas. The Strauss symphony showed that the thematic treatment and orchestration of the present day need not be hampered in any degree by the following out of classical traditions.

The symphony as a whole was very enjoyable, in spite of the length of the work. Its themes were all attractive and interesting, the novel character of the scherzo being especially noteworthy. As might be expected, horns and woodwind are frequently called upon to furnish the romantic coloring that is so much used in modern works. It is needless to say that these instruments were played in a thoroughly commendable manner, with the slight exception of a somewhat poor ensemble in the last few measures of the andante.

The first movement was given with clearness and brilliancy that could not fail to arouse admiration, the coda being given with especial animation. The second and third movements were given appropriate readings, but the finale was hardly agitated enough for the molto appassionato that the composer demanded.

Mme. Eames then appeared, and her goings and comings were accompanied by enthusiastic applause. The wonderful richness of her voice was well shown in the mournful pathos of the aria from Le Cid, and she sang the number with a good deal of dramatic feeling. Her phrasing and expression were admirable, both in the Massenet selection and in the aria from Gluck's Armide, which came later in the concert.

The performance of Le Rouet d'Omphale was creditable as to delicacy, but it might have been given with more swing. The programme-music character of the work demands vividness and animation; the figures of the story stand forth in life-like manner, so there must be life in the rendering of the piece. This fervor is what has been customary in such pieces at the concerts of the past few years.

The Academic Overture of Brahms, given with appropriate heartiness and force, ended the concert. It is a fact worthy of notice that with one exception the works were all by living composers. The programme was well calculated to show the different phases of the modern school. The Strauss symphony, besides being of great value intrinsically, is noteworthy in that it shows how modern material can be effectively used in the traditional manner; Massenet's symphonic poem is worthy exponent of the large school of programme music; while the Academic Overture proves that the folk-song can still be worked up by master minds to form great and noble productions.

ARTHUR ELSON.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 5, 1893.

The Fourth Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the fourth Symphony concert, given last evening in Music Hall, was as follows:

Symphony in F minor, op. 12.....Richard Strauss
Recitative and aria, "Pleurez! pleurez mes yeux!" from "Le Cid".....Massenet
Symphonic Poem, "Le Rouet d'Omphale".....Saint-Saens
Aria, "Ah! si la liberte," from "Armide".....Gluck
Akademische Fest-Ouverture.....Brahms

Oh, Richard Strauss, son of the Munich horn-player, what do you mean by this symphony in which you speak for an hour?

Or one might put to you the question of Fontenelle to the sonata.

Had you really so much to say that you could not have expressed yourself in a symphonic poem of from 20 minutes to half an hour?

Your symphony is full of surprising things; there are oratorical graces and flourishes; there is the pessimism seen in your "Don Juan;" there is the virility of stormy youth;—but tell us now, in strict confidence, did you write the music because you could not keep it within you, or did you not often cudgel your brains for a fresh thought, while you padded cleverly here and there?

You write a scherzo characterized by ingenious instrumentation and abounding in sharp contrasts; you write an andante that contains beautiful music; and then you write a finale, where by the side of grand passages in melodramatic music, "sneak music," music that might fit the galloping hoofs in "Held by the Enemy."

Your symphony is full of suggestion. To the dreamer it is a delight. But the stern pedagogue might argue with reason, that one of the Bitter Waltzes of Johann Strauss would be of greater benefit to the student.

There are forms of music that were once deemed inevitable by all treat are now approved by many; but will another generation of musicians work in these forms? Will the oratorio and the symphony incite the enthusiasm of the coming composers? You are a hyper-modern; you have already tried the symphonic poem; you have a gift of awaking thought in the hearer; but in this symphony you arrest the attention rather by the expression of your thought than by the thought itself.

You are a symbolist in music. Passages in this symphony might illustrate Verlaine, and Ghil, and Gustave Kahn. There are vague ideas, as in the first movement, and I am not prepared to deny that vague ideas full of suggestion are superior to clear ideas of triteness.

Your symphony is so long, so long. Your processions of knights, spectres, strange inhabitants of strange lands, women who would fain join them, but follow far behind, are never ending.

But let us have the symphony again, for you provoke curiosity, and in another mood the hearer might substitute large admiration for moderate rapture.

***

It was a pleasure to hear Mrs. Eames-Story. It was a pleasure to hear a woman who does not suffer from a severe attack of the German vocal mania; who does not court popular applause by pyrotechnical display; who is modest and dignified on the stage, free from grimaces, heedless of familiar faces while she sings. Mrs. Story sang the air from "The Cid" in a sympathetic manner, without any affectation, without a trick. Her delivery was admirable throughout. The simplicity of her treatment of the air from "Armide" was equally worthy of praise. Sophie Arnould said of Rosalie LeVasseur, who created the part of Armide, "She has the voice of the people;" a bitter speech, for Sophie hated her. She could not have said it of Mrs. Story. It is true that the audience applauded loudly, but the voice of the singer is free from the taint that gave the double meaning to the jest.

***

The orchestra, under Mr. Paur's direction, played exceedingly well. The charming piece by Saint-Saens was given with unusual delicacy; Hercules was allowed his gigantic say; Omphale nagged him and mocked him to her heart's desire. The symphony was read dramatically, and passion did not rise superior to precision. The orchestra and the leader may well be congratulated on the work of the evening.

PHILIP HALE.

The Symphony rush Friday afternoon was the most terrible crush imaginable, and the concert last evening brought together the most brilliant audience of the season. "Every one was there," about expresses it.

American Art Journal.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 4, 1893.

The Second Symphony Concert confirms first impressions. Mr. Paur has definite ideas, and goes resolutely to work to accomplish them, but in so doing he is not graceful or picturesque. His reading of Schubert's Ninth Symphony (the one the composer probably never heard, it was written so near his death) was not only interesting, but romantic, and in the same direction were Volkmann's Richard Third Overture and Dvorak's Slav Rhapsody, No. 2. The vocalist was Nordica, not up to her highest mark in the tedious Herodiade air, which one hears everywhere, but better in the Fidelio scene. W. F. Apthorp's program analyses are excellent. It would be well if the Music Hall could be better lighted, while people are finding their seats in the afternoon.

Director Paur gave us a novelty at the third Symphony Concert, and one we were glad to hear, the F Symphony, by that lamented young composer, H. Goetz. At first hearing the first movement seemed wearisome, but the others were both fresh and inspiring. Then came Volkmann's Serenade, for strings, Schroeder playing the cello solo. The concert closed with the familiar Leonore Overture, No. 3.

[38]

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 6, 1893.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the fourth symphony concert, given in Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Richard Strauss: Symphony in F minor, Opus 12.
Massenet: Recitative, "De cet affreux combat," and Aria, "Pleurez! pleurez, mes yeux," from "Le Cid."
Saint-Saëns: Symphonic Poem, "Le Rouet d'Omphale," in A major, Opus 31.
Gluck: Aria, "Ah! si la liberté," from "Armide."
Brahms: Akademische Fest-Ouvertüre, in C minor, Opus 80.

Mme. Emma Eames was the singer.

It is not often that a full-fledged symphony, written by a boy of sixteen is published in full score and publicly performed several thousand miles away from home thirteen years after it was composed! No matter what may be thought of the absolute value of this F minor symphony of Richard Strauss's, this much may surely be said of it: that it has had the power to induce an intelligent and experienced conductor to give it before a presumably intelligent and experienced audience as something worth listening to; few boys of sixteen have got so far as this! As for the work itself, it is almost needless to say that it bears many marks of the composer's youthfulness. One feels, in listening to it, that here is a young man, just through with, or still in the midst of, his academic training, anxious to turn what he has learned to practical account, yet ambitious to show that he has artistic aspirations above and beyond mere academic respectability; the former is shown by the immediate and oft-recurring employment of polyphonic, or contrapuntal, devices, the latter by the freedom with which these devices are used and by the generally romantic and emotional character of the themes themselves. Another youthful trait is the evident desire the composer evinces to follow Liszt's not entirely unquestionable advice, "tachez toujours de faire grand!"—always try to do things on a large scale!—advice which, when followed, often results in the young composer's putting all his eggs recklessly into one basket. Of that other youthful trait, the highest and noblest of all, the one which led the late Julius Eichberg to cry out in admiration at the young Berlioz's "Fantastic" symphony: "Oh, glorious youth! with all its illusions still intact, and its whole-souled faith in them!"—of this fine youthful audacity, that does not yet know itself audacious, Strauss has shown little, save in the last movement of his work; but in the finale he does grasp at the thunder with a will, and his daring is well rewarded. With all its turgidity, its excessiveness and indulgence in "stunning" effects, the finale is out and out the best of the four movements; it has the most of real vitality, of convincing force; you feel that it was written in the composer's very heart's blood and that he believed every note of it with a belief profounder and more efficacious than comes from mere intellectual conviction. Here, if anywhere in the symphony, is true inspiration; not of the highest, not even of a very high, kind, but genuine, vital, and of a sort to give the young composer a fulcrum whereon to rest the lever of his cleverness. One may smile at it now and then,—indeed one is impelled to do a good deal of smiling in the course of the whole symphony,—but it is with a kindly and withal sympathetic smile, free from cynicism. Of the other three movements, the Scherzo seems the best; the Andante cantabile, on the other hand, is plainly the weakest; that fourth theme, molto tranquille e dolce, with its skips of a tenth and its wild tossings about from violins to basses in a sort of free, double-counterpoint, bespeaks a lacking, or undeveloped, sense of humor in the composer, blinding his eyes to the difference between sentiment and bathos. Upon the whole, this youthful work gives one a rather regretful feeling as one compares it with what Strauss has since given to the world, and considers into what paths the further development of his talent has led him; how, starting from this point, his technique in composition has developed itself almost solely in the more purely physical direction of orchestration, while it has remained stationary or even retrograded in the higher, intellectual matter of thematic development and coherence of musical structure; how that fine youthful enthusiasm that lent life and vigor to his Finale has not become more sane, but has grown rank and overshadowed almost all else in him. This F minor symphony falls far short of being a great work, but it stands at the beginning of a path that should have led to better and more wholesome things than the "Don Juan," "Francesca da Rimini" and "The Tempest."

Saint-Saëns's winsome "Rouet d'Omphale" was admirably played: with life, delicacy and constant effectiveness. But the stroke of the evening was Brahms's Academic Overture; we have been following Mr. Paur carefully and with unfeigned interest from the beginning of the season, and have found much in him to admire: his artistic honesty, his freedom from affectation of any sort, his singleness of musical purpose, his skill in getting technically fine and exact playing out of his orchestra. And now, with the Academic Overture, he has shown that, beside possessing all these good qualities, "he has it in him!" By "it" we mean the most important, the crowning quality of all, the one which, without the others, does not go far, to be sure, but without which the others have no real artistic significance: Magnetism, vital force, a touch of the divine spark! We suspected him of it in Volkmann's "Richard III." overture, but were not quite sure of our affair; now we are sure of it. Never in our recollection has this overture of Brahms's produced such an effect. Think of it! here was Brahms—and in a not universally admired work, too—played with all due sanity, without any striving after unworthy, meretricious, or merely skin-deep effect yet so played as to be perfectly clear to a general audience and to whirl that audience up to the highest pitch of excitement and enthusiasm! The performance was masterly, and better!

Before speaking more particularly of Mme. Eames's singing, we cannot help dwelling a little on one, as it seems to us, noteworthy feature in her participation in the concert. Here is a young and already famous prima donna—one of a class not noted for self-effacing artistic virtues—coming to sing at a concert at which she knows (or might know) she will be the principal, if not the only, attraction in the eyes of the whole "surplus" of the audience, that all the standing room will be filled with people who have come to hear her, and for little else. And what does she do? She chooses two songs that have nothing to recommend them to an audience save their intrinsic musical value; songs to be sung with all sincerity of artistic purpose, with all purity and nobility of style, for which no singer's ingenuity could [illegible] of extraneous, unworthy effectiveness, songs which even lack some of the most powerful as well as the most artistically legitimate elements of musical effectiveness. Neither of her two selections ends with the least attempt at a climax,—the Massenet piece even closes with an imperfect cadence,—neither of them give the singer any opportunity for vocal display; moreover, neither of them are at all familiar to our public. To be sure, Massenet's "Pleurez! pleurez!" is in a style which has become fairly popular of late years: the public have learned to understand and like that sort of thing. But this can hardly be said of Gluck's "Ah! si la liberté;" it has no merely "popular" side whatever; in fact, there are but few cities in the world where any opera of Gluck's has managed to hold the stage, save by the classic artistic piety of a small portion of the public. Now, when an artist like Mme. Eames chooses two such songs for her first appearance before a large general public, and at a concert, too, where there is no hope of an "encore," it looks very much as if she chose them simply because she found them intrinsically fine music, well worth the singing, without regard for what the audience might think of them; no singer could have chosen either of them with an eye to the applause it might reap. Few operatic prima donnas will consent to take such a course, even when urged thereto; very few, indeed, will take it of their own free will. In this Mme. Eames has shown that she takes herself seriously, as an artist of high aim. This is as it should be; bravissima!

If we cannot quite agree with her admiration for the Massenet song, for, saving the fine outburst of passion near the middle, we can find little in it, we can heartily sympathize with her in choice of the Gluck aria. Massenet wrote his "Cid" when he had already entered upon the downward path of half-hearted composing which has since led his remarkable talent into a slough of third-rateness; the "Pleurez! pleurez!" seems a most indistinct, desultory piece of writing; it is melodically so vague that one recognizes the return of the theme more by the words than by the music—one forgets what the theme was before the thing is half over. But it is expressive, to a certain degree dramatic, in its musical illustration of the text. It needs great singing to make anything out of it at all. Gluck's "Ah! si la liberté," on the other hand, is divinely beautiful, replete with that warmth which even his rather academic rigidity of expression could not wholly hide. Its expression is too measured, too contained, to allow it to appeal very forcibly to most listeners today; but it is genuine, noble music through and through; there is true genius in it. Mme. Eames sang both songs very beautifully indeed; with admirable "school," purity of style, beauty of voice and feeling. In a word, she sang them artistically. In the matter of effectiveness something was undeniably wanting; there were moments, such as the passage, "Tu ne saurais jamais conduire qu'aux chemins glorieux," in the song from "Le Cid," when you were carried away unresisting; but in others one could not but feel that the music could be more forcibly put. We have heard Mme. Eames a good deal, and think we know pretty well what is in her; to our mind what was lacking of supreme effectiveness in her singing last Saturday evening is to be charged to one thing, and to one thing only: to a want of routine. There is a certain power the long habit of being constantly under fire gives a singer or player, which nothing else will give; it is this peculiar power one finds in most "old stagers," and there is no royal road to acquiring it; no amount of practice away from an audience can give it, genius itself cannot anticipate it. It will come from nothing but years of constant—not merely occasional—facing an audience. This routine-power is just what Mme. Eames as yet lacks; all else she seems to have in pretty generous measure. The audience greeted her singing of the Massenet song with the warmest enthusiasm, and she was thrice recalled; the Gluck aria seems to be more caviare to them.

The next programme (for Friday afternoon, Nov. 17, and Saturday evening, Nov. 18, there is no concert this week) is: Mozart, symphony in C major ("Jupiter"); Brahms, double concerto for violin and 'cello; Haydn, symphony in D major. Mr. Franz Kneisel will be the violinist, and Mr. Alwin Schroeder the 'cellist.

[illegible] 6, 1893.

THE FOURTH SYMPHONY.

A Novelty Presented in a Strauss Symphony.

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place Saturday evening at Music Hall. The programme was as follows:

Symphony in F minor, op. 12. ..... Richard Strauss.
Recitative and Aria, Pleurez! pleurez mes yeux, from Le Cid. ..... Massenet
Omphale's Spinning Wheel, Symphonic Poem, op. 31. ..... Saint-Saens
Aria, Ah! sillaliberte, from Armide... Gluck
Academic Festival-overture, op. 80. Brahms

Mrs. Emma Eames was the soloist.

The novelty on the programme was the Strauss symphony, abounding in interest, both as regards its construction and the masterly manner in which the composer wields the orchestra. There is a multiplicity of themes in the work, many of which were original and beautiful. The work is bewildering in the variety of its manner, for it avoids the traditional form in its development, that is in the conservative, consecutive form of the working out. It presents, instead, in the most part, alternating characteristics that produce surprising effects, which, at the same time, keep within the bounds of rational development, although of short duration, often. In the first movement and in the last also, occur, however, some prolonged and complete handling of subjects in a free form that exhibits remarkable resources on the part of the composer as regards knowledge and invention in the matter of the broader forms of composition. It is difficult, however, to speak critically of this long and intricate work at one hearing. The Scherzo is unmistakably original, brilliant and buoyant. The Andante Cantabile also has its beauties, but one's interest flags in the rather tedious length of the movement, for it seems as if the composer could have said all much more briefly and to the point as well. There can be no two opinions among competent musicians regarding the ability of Strauss in the matter of his employment of the orchestra. He is simply a master of orchestral resources. Mr. Paur is to be thanked for the opportunity of listening to this youthful composer's first symphony.

The only question is will this composer develop as he grows older the high classical model of symphonic writing, or will his tendency be toward the free-fantasie mode of composition. With his originality and wonderful resources it is to be hoped that he will take the former path and thereby make an enduring fame. It is an easy matter for a composer of knowledge and inventive skill to make music in the latter form. To rise above the Cappelmeister and succeed in the former, however, calls for more than a remarkable talent; it demands spontaneous genius. The orchestra played the symphony in the most brilliant manner under the exacting baton of Conductor Paur. The most ardent admirer of Mr. Nikisch could not have asked for a more overloud and violent performance on the part of the brass wind at times, or for a more thundering noise than came from the tympani player. If Conductor Paur will but raise such a din at his debut in New York this week he will be sure to please the critics of that city and establish himself solidly in their favor.

The performance of the Saint-Saens poem was a most delightful experience, and Mr. Paur showed that he is possessed of delicate sentiment when he cares to display it. In the Brahms overture the wind instruments often overpowered the strings when the latter should have been more prominent.

Mrs. Eames sang her numbers in an artistic and unaffected manner. At the great climax in the Massenet selection she rose to a fine height. Also the simplicity of her rendering of the aria of Gluck is to be praised. The discriminating critic only wishes that her voice-training had been of the kind that would enable her to present her naturally fine voice at its best, and to serve in prolonging her career upon the stage.

The erratic movements that are painfully apparent to the critical ear in the employment of her voice are not encouraging evidences, however. Mr. Paur conducted the accompaniments with skill and discretion. His work generally on this occasion must have encouraged those most in doubt concerning his ability to feel that he is the right man after all for the position he holds. There will be no concert next Saturday evening. On the Saturday following the programme will embrace Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony; Haydn's symphony in D major, and the double concerto for violin and violoncello by Brahms. Mr. Franz Kneizel and Mr. Alwin Schroeder will be the soloists in the latter piece.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

LE FIGARO

Sonnabend, den 4. November 1893.

Redakteur: EMIL JAEGER.

Inland-Correspondenz.

(Für den „N. Y. Figaro.")

Providence, 1. Nov.

Das erste Concert des Boston Symphonie-Orchesters.

Die Orchestermusik, welche hier in Providence so lange vernachlässigt wurde, findet von Jahr zu Jahr eine bessere Pflege und nicht nur das musikalische Publikum, sondern auch der Laie trägt bereitwillig seine Anerkennung den Bostonern, von denen hier die Rede sein soll, entgegen. Von Jahr zu Jahr wird mehr und mehr in musikalischer Hinsicht geboten und soweit das Repertoir der besseren Conzerte in Betracht kommt, so können sicherlich die Konzerte des Boston Symphonie-Orchesters in gleichem Range mit den Kunstemporien der alten Welt klassifizirt werden.

Es ist eine Thatsache, daß sich die Bostoner in dieser Stadt immer des allseitig freundlichsten Entgegenkommens für gewiß halten können. Die Ansichten in hiesigen musikalischen Kreisen über den neuen Dirigenten sind getheilt. Auf jeden Fall hat Herr Paur ein feines musikalisches Verständniß und Gefühl, und sobald sich die Mitglieder des Orchesters etwas mehr in Paur's Ideen eingelebt haben, wird das Orchester auf einer Stufe stehen, auf welcher es noch nie gestanden hat.

Das Orchester, welches einige Veränderungen zum Besten erhalten hat, gab schon jetzt Zeugniß von einem strikten Zusammenspiel und von dem angenehmen Gefühl der Sicherheit. Die Gesangssolo-Nummern von Frau Lillian Nordica schlossen sich den Nummern des Orchesters ebenbürtig an. Ein verhältnißmäßig zahlreiches Publikum, worunter wir viele hiesige Künstler, Musiker, Kritiker ꝛc. bemerkten, hatte sich zu diesem, dem ersten Konzert des Boston Symphonie-Orchesters, eingestellt.

* *

BROOKLYN LIFE

VOL. VIII. BROOKLYN, N. Y., NOV. 4, 1893. NO. 192.

WE have had one or two good concerts already, but the music season in Brooklyn begins next week, and begins with éclat. Herr Seidl will lead his orchestra at the Academy on Thursday night. On Friday afternoon and Saturday evening Herr Emil Paur, the new director from Leipsic, will direct the rehearsal and concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the same place. Herr Seidl is engaged by the Seidl Society, which has been the sponsor for his enterprises here, and the Boston Orchestra comes "backed" by a wealthy banker in the Hub. With these guarantees the music of the week is certain to be good. Both orchestras are large. We know Herr Seidl and have always enjoyed his work, but the other gentleman has his reputation to make with us. So much of his fame has gone before him that nobody need have any fear in buying his tickets that he is not going to get his money's worth. His interpretation of the Fifth symphony of Beethoven, generally considered a test piece, and of some of Tschaikowsky's music will be waited with interest. The soloist with the Boston orchestra is Mme. Emma Eames. That for the Seidl Society concert will be Frau Materna. Both are well known as singers in opera, Mme. Eames in French and Italian and Frau Materna in German. Herr Seidl's bill is classic. It contains a short symphony by Mozart, an air from the opera "Fidelio," by Beethoven; Liszt's "Spanish Rhapsody," arranged by Herr Seidl for his orchestra; the "Tannhauser" overture by Wagner, the "Siegfried Idyl," by the same composer, and the prelude and finale to Wagner's opera of "Tristan and Isolde."

Boston Daily Globe.

TUESDAY, NOV 7, 1893.

Symphony Orchestra at the Capital.

WASHINGTON, Nov 6—The first of the series of concerts by the Boston symphony orchestra here this winter was given this evening to a large and fashionable audience, which included members of the diplomatic corps and other well-known persons. A generous welcome was given to Mr Paur, the new conductor, who in the opinion of his audience will prove himself a worthy successor to Nikisch, always a great favorite in Washington. Mme Lillian Nordica, the soloist of the evening, met with an enthusiastic reception. The symphony concerts are always eagerly looked forward to by Washingtonians, and never missed by those who can manage to attend them.

DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCIV. NO. 132.

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 9, 1893.

HERR PAUR IN NEW YORK.

Boston Symphony Concert in Carnegie Music Hall.

[Special Dispatch to the Boston Herald.]

NEW YORK, Nov. 8, 1893. Carnegie Music Hall is none too large to hold the subscribers to the Boston Symphony concerts. This fact was clearly demonstrated this evening, when every seat in the house was filled. There were times when exquisite pianissimo passages hushed the audience into absolute silence and again times when, by his wonderfully significant gestures, Herr Paur, the leader, actually seemed to push immense crescendos and sporzandos out of the depths of the orchestra.

Beethoven's fifth symphony took on quite a new, refreshed and refreshing form. Berlioz's Benvenuto Cellini overture was also magnificently played. In the accompaniments Paur kept his men down to the most delicate breath of sound.

Miss Eames, who has rarely sung here in concert, was a welcome addition to the delights of the evening. Her low tones have broadened and strengthened, and her whole voice seems to have grown in elasticity. The air from Massenet's "Cid Pleurer Mes Yeux" was done with care and reserve rather than with dramatic power, but on the one or two climaxes, which she allowed herself, Miss Eames' voice rang out with excellent strength and vibratory quality.

The air from "Nozze di Figaro" was pleasing, but certainly the adjuncts of the dramatic stage help Miss Eames to highe triumphs than she could ever make in the narrower, plainer field of the concert room.

Dvorak's Slavonic rhapsody was the remaining number of the programme. It is one if the least worthy of his compositions and seems empty of ideas, though full of a sort of glamour of strange sounds. Mr. Paur should be commended for the judicious length—by which is meant the shortness—of his programme.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 8, 1893.

Telephone - - - - 1253-18th.

The program of the fourth Symphony concert was as follows:

Symphony in F minor, op. 12.....Richard Strauss
Recitative "De cet affreux combat," and Aria "Pleurez! pleurez, mes yeux!" from "Le Cid."....Massenet
Symphonic poem, "Le Rouet d'Omphale".....Saint-Saëns
Aria, "Ah! si la liberté," from "Armide".....Glück
Akademische Fest Ouverture.....Brahms

Mrs. Eames-Story was the singer.

This was an interesting and excellent concert. The performance of the orchestra, from the technical and from the purely æsthetic point of view, left almost nothing to be desired. Mr. Paur showed himself in the symphony to be a man of passion; passion did not scorn precision, precision was fluid, not metronomic.

The symphony, I am told, was played for the first time at these concerts. Strauss is a hyper-modern. He has the gift of arresting the attention of the hearer. In this symphony he arrests by the expression of the thought rather than by the thought itself. The instrumentation is ingenious, effective. There are noble passages of music, as in the first, third and fourth movements. There is melancholy vagueness, as in the first movement. Vague ideas that suggest are superior to clear triteness. It is a strange work, full of passion, virility; there is mysticism; there is little that is sensuous; there is considerable that is melodramatic; a strong work, superior to the "Don Juan;" but it is long, so long!

Mrs. Eames-Story sang with marked dignity of carriage, with purity of voice and style. Her performance was admirable. The accompaniments were played most sympathetically under Mr. Paur's direction.

* * *

There will be no Symphony concert this week. The program for the concert of the 18th includes Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony, Brahms' double concerto for violin and 'cello, Haydn's symphony in D.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the first concert of its series at Carnegie Music Hall this evening.

The program includes Symphony No. 5 in C minor, Beethoven; aria from Le Cid, Massenet; Slavonic rhapsody No. 2, Dvorák; aria from "The Marriage of Figaro," Mozart, and overture Benvenuto Cellini, Berlioz.

Emma Eames will be the vocal soloist.

THE first of the Kneisel Quartet concerts of the ninth season was given Monday evening, the 30th, in Chickering Hall. The program was as follows:

Quartet, F major, op. 59.....Beethoven
Quartet, G minor.....Haydn
Quintet, F major, op. 88.....Brahms

The second violin in the quintet was played by Mr. Max Zach.

I was unable to hear this concert, as I assisted at the execution of "Faust" at the Globe Theatre, but I am told on good authority that the concert was one of unalloyed pleasure. Mr. Paur was present, and if hearty applause is an index of delight, he appreciated fully the excellence of the ensemble. We have here no concerts of purer musical worth than those given by the Kneisel quartet.

The Musical and Dramatic World

NEW YORK, NOVEMBER 8, 1893.

There is nothing very original in saying that a good conductor does not make a good concert, but I sometimes think that a large class of concert goers makes a grave mistake in attributing every good and bad effect entirely to a conductor. I am more than ever convinced that Herr Paur is a great man in spite of occasional disappointing moments.

At this week's symphony concert a new symphony was presented, by Richard Strauss (in F minor, op. 12). The composer was born in Munich, June 11, 1864, and shows himself an extremist of the modern school. A pupil of Meyer, of Munich, and successor of Dr. von Bülow as Court Director at Meiningen (in 1885). He held a similar position in Munich (in 1886) and later became second Kapellmeister of the Court opera at Weimar (in 1889).

A first hearing of the work left two strong impressions. The first a disappointment at the absence of spontaneity in melodic ideas and the second, admiration at the man's consummate mastery of the resources of the orchestra.

Indeed, there was, under this latter head, but one, and that a faint, regret, viz: In the descending scale the orchestration developed an over-sombre—at times even a muddy-color. In all other respects the work might stand as a model for young writers. The author seems to be in touch alike with both German and French resources. All in all, the work was well performed.

Saint Saens' symphonic poem: "Omphale's Spinning-wheel" (in A. maj. Op. 31), received a most careful reading and Brahm's Academic Festival overture (in C minor, Op. 80) created great and merited enthusiasm.

Mme. Emma Eames was the soloist, contributing a Rec., "De cet affreux combat," and Aria, "Pleurez! pleurez mes yeux!" from Massenet's: Le Cid, and the air, "Ah! si la liberté," from Gluck's Armide.

Her voice and style have broadened somewhat since I heard her last and she is at present, in some respects, well equipped. But either from nervousness or perhaps indisposition, she did not sing, always, in tune.

The quality of her voice is good; sometimes beautiful, but too variable to be entirely successful.

She was recalled several times.

The musical season is decidedly backward, but some good things are promised. At the first Symphony Concert at the Academy on Saturday evening, and at the rehearsal on the previous afternoon, Beethoven's Fifth Symphony will be given. The soloists are Emma Eames and Franz Kneisel.

Philadelphia Abend-Post.

Freitag, 10 November 1893.

Das Boston Symphonie Orchester eröffnete gestern Abend die diesjährige Saison vor gut besetzter Academy of Music. Bei dieser Gelegenheit trat der neue Dirigent Herr Emil Paur zum ersten Male vor das Publikum. Das Programm bot Beethovens C moll Symphonie, die Ouverture zu „Benvenuto Cellini" von Berlioz, Dvoraks slavische G moll Rhapsodie und zwei Lieder der Miß Eames. Es ist wohl nicht angemessen, nach dem ersten Konzert Vergleiche zwischen dem neuen und dem bisherigen Dirigenten anzustellen, um so weniger, da der erste Eindruck unzweifelhaft für den Herrn Nikisch der günstigere war. Paur liefert feine Ausarbeitung des Detail, Nikisch führte dagegen die Tonwerke in großen genialen Zügen vor, deshalb erzielte er auch nachhaltigere Wirkungen. Bei dem gestrigen Konzert ist noch besonders seine Kürze zu erwähnen, die von vielen Besuchern übel vermerkt wurde. Herr Paur hat einen bedeutenden Ruf als Musiker, die gestrige Leistung hat denselben kaum gerechtfertigt. Miß Eames fand für den Vortrag von Arien aus Massenets „Cid" und Mozarts „Figaro" lebhaften Applaus.

BOSTON HOME JOURNAL.

NOVEMBER 11, 1893.

Of course all the world was at the Symphony rehearsal on Friday afternoon and at the concert Saturday evening, not only to hear the fine program offered them by Mr. Paur (whose lack of poetic personality is fast being forgotten by even the matinee girls in his ability as a musician and conductor), but to see and hear Emma Eames. And she was well worth seeing and hearing. Her selections were rendered with a musicianly and artistic appreciation simply surprising in so young a singer. Personally she was a picture in her beautiful gowns on both occasions. The evil fairy we heard of in our childhood as presiding at births to keep one from being too liberally gifted, was absent at hers, I am sure.

THE STANDRAD UNION.

FRIDAY EVENING, NOVEMBER 10, 1893.

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the auspices of the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn, will be given to-morrow evening at the Academy of Music. The public rehearsal takes place at the Academy this afternoon. The soloists at the concert will be Mme. Emma Eames and Franz Kneisel, and the conductor, Emil Paur.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Yesterday afternoon, at the Academy of Music, was given the first public rehearsal of the season, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the new conductor, Emil Paur. More than usual interest centred in the occasion, for the reason that the loss of Nikisch was felt by many to be almost irreparable, and it seemed impossible that any mere man could satisfactorily fill his place. The newcomer is certainly the very opposite in personal appearance of his predecessor; he has the characteristics of the North German, rather than the fascinating darkness and langour of the South; as he stepped forward he reminded one not a little of a New England country school teacher. His rather ungainly build was something of a shock after the sensuous grace of Nikisch; his high forehead and pale blue eyes seemed to indicate the substitution of the reign of the spiritual for that of warmth and color and life; his whole bearing pointed to the practical and ascetic rather than the luxurious. By some this might not be regarded as a fault, but it is certain that under Nikisch the Boston Orchestra became a musical organization approaching perfection, and exercised a charm which few could withstand. It is a hard ordeal through which Mr. Paur is now passing, as he follows a leader so unique and brilliant and so idolized.

Yet, whatever may have been our state of mind as the conductor threaded his way through the ranks of his men, and took his place before them, in a few moments it became evident that the wielder of that baton was not to be despised. It was plain that his heart was in his work, that he was a man of ideas, that his word carried the weight of authority. His method of conducting the first two movements of Beethoven's Symphony in C minor, with which the programme opened, has been severely criticized. One of the best of our judges of music has said that it is questionable whether the musical people of Boston and New York will ever be reconciled to Mr. Paur's conception. He says at length: "His conduct of holding on to the fermate in the pregnant motif of the first movement until the meaning of the context is lost seems utterly indefensible, and explicable only on the theory that it is another illustration of how Wagner's hints may be perverted. In his highly suggestive essay on conducting, Wagner called attention to the dramatic significance of this fermate; he wanted conductors to hold the half-note grimly, with an iron hand. But he did not mean that it should be so unduly prolonged that the consistency of the movement should be disrupted. It was a dramatic effect, more than an exaggerated rubato that he was after. Properly handled, the fermate is a capital vehicle for the development of a climax; but it fails utterly in this respect under the hands of Mr. Paur."

But, however that may be, there was such unmistakable earnestness and affection in the new conductor's treatment of the work that, in a measure, he won the audience over to his side. An audience, as a whole, cares more for the general effect than for absolute correctness of detail, and the general effect of yesterday's interpretation of the great fifth symphony was anything but displeasing. There was but one other purely orchestra number, Brahms' "Academic Festival-Overture," which closed the rehearsal. While this is not a selection which brings out the best resources of an orchestra, it is brilliant and showy, and as such forms a striking finale. The men played with a vim, the conductor led with enthusiasm, and the audience departed amidst the blare of brasses and a general gorgeousness of tone. But previously there had been some charming orchestral effects in the "Volkmann Serenade," which was placed on the programme for the purpose of exhibiting Alwin Schroeder's proficiency on the 'cello. While a worthy member of the orchestra, Mr. Schroeder's solo performance did not manifest any special distinction, and the orchestral accompaniment contributed largely to the enjoyment of the number. The 'cello is a noble instrument, but breadth of style and depth of feeling are necessary to its best interpretation, and these qualities the violoncellist of the occasion possessed only in a measure.

Mme. Emma Eames exhibited her fine soprano in two arias—"Pleurez, mer yeux." from Massenet's "Cid," and "Ah, si ma liberte," from Gluck's "Armide." She sang with taste and feeling, most satisfactorily bringing out the dramatic possibilities of the Massenet aria, and receiving three recalls.

This evening the same programme will be repeated. The next public rehearsal is Dec. 15.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCIV. NO. 135.

SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 12, 1893.

MR. PAUR'S FIRST TOUR.

Mr. Emil Paur has made his first tour in America during the last week, having conducted the first of the season's series of concerts announced by the Boston orchestra in the cities of New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington. Not a little interest was felt in the reception which the Boston orchestra should meet with in the cities named with its new conductor, for it is one thing to meet the demands of an audience inclined to favor a home undertaking, and others having no interest beyond the actual artistic results of a performance.

Mr. Paur's merits as a conductor having been frankly and freely admitted by the Boston public, and it is now a pleasure to be able to add that the cities visited during the tour have confirmed the verdict of the home audiences and shown a practical appreciation of the Boston orchestra under its new conductor by buying all the tickets offered for sale in the several cities.

The concert given on Monday evening in Washington called out an audience limited in numbers only by the size of the hall. The matinee on Tuesday at Baltimore was more largely attended than any before given in that city, and on Wednesday evening the audience at Carnegie Hall, New York, filled that great house to overflowing, every one of the 64 private boxes being fully occupied. The records of former seasons in Philadelphia were more than maintained in the concert given at the Academy of Music on Thursday evening, as the audience numbered over 3500, and hundreds of persons had to receive their money back because they could not gain admittance. The concerts given in Brooklyn Friday afternoon and last evening were attended by equally gratifying results, as both audiences showed a gain over any in that city during last season.

[40]

BOSTON HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCIV. NO. 132.
THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 9, 1893.

HERR PAUR IN NEW YORK.

Boston Symphony Concert in Carnegie Music Hall.

(Special Dispatch to the Boston Herald.)

NEW YORK, Nov. 8, 1893. Carnegie Music Hall is none too large to hold the subscribers to the Boston Symphony concerts. This fact was clearly demonstrated this evening, when every seat in the house was filled. There were times when exquisite pianissimo passages hushed the audience into absolute silence and again times when, by his wonderfully significant gestures, Herr Paur, the leader, actually seemed to push immense crescendos and sporzandos out of the depths of the orchestra.

Beethoven's fifth symphony took on quite a new, refreshed and refreshing form. Berlioz's Benvenuto Cellini overture was also magnificently played. In the accompaniments Paur kept his men down to the most delicate breath of sound.

Miss Eames, who has rarely sung here in concert, was a welcome addition to the delights of the evening. Her low tones have broadened and strengthened, and her whole voice seems to have grown in elasticity. The air from Massenet's "Cid Pleurer Mes Yeux" was done with care and reserve rather than with dramatic power, but on the one or two climaxes, which she allowed herself, Miss Eames' voice rang out with excellent strength and vibratory quality.

The air from "Nozze di Figaro" was pleasing, but certainly the adjuncts of the dramatic stage help Miss Eames to higher triumphs than she could ever make in the narrower, plainer field of the concert room.

Dvorak's Slavonic rhapsody was the remaining number of the programme. It is one of the least worthy of his compositions and seems empty of ideas, though full of a sort of glamour of strange sounds. Mr. Paur should be commended for the judicious length—by which is meant the shortness—of his programme.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 8, 1893.

Telephone - - - - 1253-18th.

The program of the fourth Symphony concert was as follows:

Symphony in F minor, op. 12.....Richard Strauss
Recitative "De cet affreux combat," and Aria "Pleurez! pleurez, mes yeux!" from "Le Cid."....Massenet
Symphonic poem, "Le Rouet d'Omphale".....Saint-Saëns
Aria, "Ah! si la liberté," from "Armide".....Glück
Akademische Fest Ouverture.....Brahms

Mrs. Eames-Story was the singer.

This was an interesting and excellent concert. The performance of the orchestra, from the technical and from the purely æsthetic point of view, left almost nothing to be desired. Mr. Paur showed himself in the symphony to be a man of passion; passion did not scorn precision, precision was fluid, not metronomic.

The symphony, I am told, was played for the first time at these concerts. Strauss is a hyper-modern. He has the gift of arresting the attention of the hearer. In this symphony he arrests by the expression of the thought rather than by the thought itself. The instrumentation is ingenious, effective. There are noble passages of music, as in the first, third and fourth movements. There is melancholy vagueness, as in the first movement. Vague ideas that suggest are superior to clear triteness. It is a strange work, full of passion, virility; there is mysticism; there is little that is sensuous; there is considerable that is melodramatic; a strong work, superior to the "Don Juan;" but it is long, so long!

Mrs. Eames-Story sang with marked dignity of carriage, with purity of voice and style. Her performance was admirable. The accompaniments were played most sympathetically under Mr. Paur's direction.

* * *

There will be no Symphony concert this week. The program for the concert of the 18th includes Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony, Brahms' double concerto for violin and 'cello, Haydn's symphony in D.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the first concert of its series at Carnegie Music Hall this evening.

The program includes Symphony No. 5 in C minor, Beethoven; aria from Le Cid, Massenet; Slavonic rhapsody No. 2, Dvorák; aria from "The Marriage of Figaro," Mozart, and overture Benvenuto Cellini, Berlioz.

Emma Eames will be the vocal soloist.

THE first of the Kneisel Quartet concerts of the ninth season was given Monday evening, the 30th, in Chickering Hall. The program was as follows:

Quartet, F major, op. 59.....Beethoven
Quartet, G minor.....Haydn
Quintet, F major, op. 88.....Brahms

The second violin in the quintet was played by Mr. Max Zach.

I was unable to hear this concert, as I assisted at the execution of "Faust" at the Globe Theatre, but I am told on good authority that the concert was one of unalloyed pleasure. Mr. Paur was present, and if hearty applause is an index of delight, he appreciated fully the excellence of the ensemble. We have here no concerts of purer musical worth than those given by the Kneisel quartet.

The Musical and Dramatic World
NEW YORK, NOVEMBER 8, 1893.

There is nothing very original in saying that a good conductor does not make a good concert, but I sometimes think that a large class of concert goers makes a grave mistake in attributing every good and bad effect entirely to a conductor. I am more than ever convinced that Herr Paur is a great man in spite of occasional disappointing moments.

At this week's symphony concert a new symphony was presented, by Richard Strauss (in F minor, op. 12). The composer was born in Munich, June 11, 1864, and shows himself an extremist of the modern school. A pupil of Meyer, of Munich, and successor of Dr. von Bülow as Court Director at Meiningen (in 1885). He held a similar position in Munich (in 1886) and later became second Kapellmeister of the Court opera at Weimar (in 1889).

A first hearing of the work left two strong impressions. The first a disappointment at the absence of spontaneity in melodic ideas and the second, admiration at the man's consummate mastery of the resources of the orchestra.

Indeed, there was, under this latter head, but one, and that a faint, regret, viz: In the descending scale the orchestration developed an over-sombre—at times even a muddy-color. In all other respects the work might stand as a model for young writers. The author seems to be in touch alike with both German and French resources. All in all, the work was well performed.

Saint Saens' symphonic poem: "Omphale's Spinning-wheel" (in A. maj. Op. 31), received a most careful reading and Brahm's Academic Festival overture (in C minor, Op. 80) created great and merited enthusiasm.

Mme. Emma Eames was the soloist, contributing a Rec., "De cet affreux combat," and Aria, "Pleurez! pleurez mes yeux!" from Massenet's: Le Cid, and the air, "Ah! si la liberté," from Gluck's Armide.

Her voice and style have broadened somewhat since I heard her last and she is at present, in some respects, well equipped. But either from nervousness or perhaps indisposition, she did not sing, always, in tune.

The quality of her voice is good; sometimes beautiful, but too variable to be entirely successful.

She was recalled several times.

The musical season is decidedly backward, but some good things are promised. At the first Symphony Concert at the Academy on Saturday evening, and at the rehearsal on the previous afternoon, Beethoven's Fifth Symphony will be given. The soloists are Emma Eames and Franz Kneisel.

Philadelphia Abend-Post.

Freitag, 10 November 1893.

Das Boston Symphonie Orchester eröffnete gestern Abend die diesjahrige Sassion vor gut besetzter Academy of Music. Bei dieser Gelegenheit trat der neue Dirigent Herr Emil Paur zum ersten Male vor das Publikum. Das Programm bot Beethovens C moll Symphonie, die Ouverture zu „Benvenuto Cellini" von Berlioz, Dvoraks slavische G moll Rhapsodie und zwei Lieder der Miß Eames. Es ist wohl nicht angemessen, nach dem ersten Konzert Vergleiche zwischen dem neuen und dem bisherigen Dirigenten anzustellen, um so weniger, da der erste Eindruck unzweifelhaft für den Herrn Nikisch der günstigere war. Paur liefert feine Ausarbeitung des Detail, Nikisch führte dagegen die Tonwerke in großen genialen Zügen vor, deshalb erzielte er auch nachhaltigere Wirkungen. Bei dem gestrigen Konzert ist noch besonders seine Kürze zu erwähnen, die von vielen Besuchern übel vermerkt wurde. Herr Paur hat einen bedeutenden Ruf als Musiker, die gestrige Leistung hat denselben kaum gerechtfertigt. Miß Eames fond für den Vortrag von Arien aus Massenets „Cid" und Mozarts „Figaro" lebhaften Applaus.

BOSTON HOME JOURNAL.

NOVEMBER 11, 1893.

Of course all the world was at the Symphony rehearsal on Friday afternoon and at the concert Saturday evening, not only to hear the fine program offered them by Mr. Paur (whose lack of poetic personality is fast being forgotten by even the matinee girls in his ability as a musician and conductor), but to see and hear Emma Eames. And she was well worth seeing and hearing. Her selections were rendered with a musicianly and artistic appreciation simply surprising in so young a singer. Personally she was a picture in her beautiful gowns on both occasions. The evil fairy we heard of in our childhood as presiding at births to keep one from being too liberally gifted, was absent at hers, I am sure.

THE STANDRAD UNION.

FRIDAY EVENING, NOVEMBER 10, 1893.

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the auspices of the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn, will be given to-morrow evening at the Academy of Music. The public rehearsal takes place at the Academy this afternoon. The soloists at the concert will be Mme. Emma Eames and Franz Kneisel, and the conductor, Emil Paur.

THE STANDRAD UNION.

SATURDAY EVENING, NOV. 11, 1893.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Yesterday afternoon, at the Academy of Music, was given the first public rehearsal of the season, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the new conductor, Emil Paur. More than usual interest centred in the occasion, for the reason that the loss of Nikisch was felt by many to be almost irreparable, and it seemed impossible that any mere man could satisfactorily fill his place. The newcomer is certainly the very opposite in personal appearance of his predecessor; he has the characteristics of the North German, rather than the fascinating darkness and languor of the South; as he stepped forward he reminded one not a little of a New England country school teacher. His rather ungainly build was something of a shock after the sensuous grace of Nikisch; his high forehead and pale blue eyes seemed to indicate the substitution of the reign of the spiritual for that of warmth and color and life; his whole bearing pointed to the practical and ascetic rather than the luxurious. By some this might not be regarded as a fault, but it is certain that under Nikisch the Boston Orchestra became a musical organization approaching perfection, and exercised a charm which few could withstand. It is a hard ordeal through which Mr. Paur is now passing, as he follows a leader so unique and brilliant and so idolized.

Yet, whatever may have been our state of mind as the conductor threaded his way through the ranks of his men, and took his place before them, in a few moments it became evident that the wielder of that baton was not to be despised. It was plain that his heart was in his work, that he was a man of ideas, that his word carried the weight of authority. His method of conducting the first two movements of Beethoven's Symphony in C minor, with which the programme opened, has been severely criticized. One of the best of our judges of music has said that it is questionable whether the musical people of Boston and New York will ever be reconciled to Mr. Paur's conception. He says at length: "His conduct of holding on to the fermate in the preguant motif of the first movement until the meaning of the context is lost seems utterly indefensible, and explicable only on the theory that it is another illustration of how Wagner's hints may be perverted. In his highly suggestive essay on conducting, Wagner called attention to the dramatic significance of this fermate; he wanted conductors to hold the half-note grimly, with an iron hand. But he did not mean that it should be so unduly prolonged that the consistency of the movement should be disrupted. It was a dramatic effect, more than an exaggerated rubato that he was after. Properly handled, the fermate is a capital vehicle for the development of a climax; but it fails utterly in this respect under the hands of Mr. Paur."

But, however that may be, there was such unmistakable earnestness and affection in the new conductor's treatment of the work that, in a measure, he won the audience over to his side. An audience, as a whole, cares more for the general effect than for absolute correctness of detail, and the general effect of yesterday's interpretation of the great fifth symphony was anything but displeasing. There was but one other purely orchestra number, Brahms' "Academic Festival-Overture," which closed the rehearsal. While this is not a selection which brings out the best resources of an orchestra, it is brilliant and showy, and as such forms a striking finale. The men played with a vim, the conductor led with enthusiasm, and the audience departed amidst the blare of brasses and a general gorgeousness of tone. But previously there had been some charming orchestral effects in the "Volkmann Serenade," which was placed on the programme for the purpose of exhibiting Alwin Schroeder's proficiency on the 'cello. While a worthy member of the orchestra, Mr. Schroeder's solo performance did not manifest any special distinction, and the orchestral accompaniment contributed largely to the enjoyment of the number. The 'cello is a noble instrument, but breadth of style and depth of feeling are necessary to its best interpretation, and these qualities the violoncellist of the occasion possessed only in a measure.

Mme. Emma Eames exhibited her fine soprano in two arias—"Pleurez, mer yeux." from Massenet's "Cid," and "Ah, el ma liberte," from Gluck's "Armide." She sang with taste and feeling, most satisfactorily bringing out the dramatic possibilities of the Massenet aria, and receiving three recalls.

This evening the same programme will be repeated. The next public rehearsal is Dec. 15.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCIV. NO. 135.

SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 12, 1893.

MR. PAUR'S FIRST TOUR.

Mr. Emil Paur has made his first tour in America during the last week, having conducted the first of the season's series of concerts announced by the Boston orchestra in the cities of New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington. Not a little interest was felt in the reception which the Boston orchestra should meet with in the cities named with its new conductor, for it is one thing to meet the demands of an audience inclined to favor a home undertaking, and others having no interest beyond the actual artistic results of a performance.

Mr. Paur's merits as a conductor having been frankly and freely admitted by the Boston public, and it is now a pleasure to be able to add that the cities visited during the tour have confirmed the verdict of the home audiences and shown a practical appreciation of the Boston orchestra under its new conductor by buying all the tickets offered for sale in the several cities.

The concert given on Monday evening in Washington called out an audience limited in numbers only by the size of the hall. The matinee on Tuesday at Baltimore was more largely attended than any before given in that city, and on Wednesday evening the audience at Carnegie Hall, New York, filled that great house to overflowing, every one of the 64 private boxes being fully occupied. The records of former seasons in Philadelphia were more than maintained in the concert given at the Academy of Music on Thursday evening, as the audience numbered over 3500, and hundreds of persons had to receive their money back because they could not gain admittance. The concerts given in Brooklyn Friday afternoon and last evening were attended by equally gratifying results, as both audiences showed a gain over any in that city during last season.

Brooklyn Daily Eagle

SATURDAY EVENING, NOVEMBER 11, 1893.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Yesterday the first appearance of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Brooklyn this season was made at the Academy of Music. The occasion was of extra musical interest because this superb band was to appear under its new leader, Emil Paur, from Leipsic. His reception by the people was cordial, and he seemed to feel it to be so, for he was in good humor—though, for the matter of that he looks like a man who is usually good natured. There is a good deal of the farmer in Mr. Paur, in his appearance, and a bit of it in his readings. His face is that of an honest German agriculturist. His figure has the solidity of the soil with a kind of military expansion of chest and bearing. His music is honest and some affect to find it uninspired. In personality he is the opposite to Mr. Nikisch, his predecessor, though there is not such a terrible amount of difference between the readings of any of the conductors of note that one of them may be entirely condemned, even at the expense of another who may be called the model. Mr. Nikisch was dapper, cold, self conscious and looked like a French artist. Mr. Paur is careless of appearance and does not wear his hair combed. He is never conscious that anybody is looking at him. He is absorbed in his music. There is no grace in the man, and probably he will not be admired by the women as Nikisch was. He is a man's man. The orchestra evidently likes him and he likes his orchestra. After Mr. Schroeder's solo he took him by the hand and led him out to bow; it was a just act and of a kind that will make him well thought of. When he was not on his platform he walked about among his violinists and talked and laughed with them in a big bass voice. He wears no "frills." In leading he is nearly uncouth. He has a bad habit of beating time with his foot as well as with his hands, and he does not keep his head still. Instead of impressing his command on the men by a series of forcible beats, he seems to try to pull the music out of them, his method being eductive. It is nevertheless urgent. There is no mistaking its meaning or his intention that it shall be obeyed. His direction to the different departments, noting their time of entrance, is usually accomplished by a backward throw of the head and a plucking motion of the free hand, sometimes a couple of its fingers extended, and a lift of the baton. There is none of the indistinction of beat that some leaders cultivate; it is as easily followed as that of a country singing master. He is a man of musical culture of high type; but he is not a revolutionist, and his readings are of the faithful sort that regards only the composer. Ought a conductor to be entirely subservient to his task? That depends on whether his own personality is interesting enough to make its obtrusion into the selection tolerable. There are some who can make a theme more beautiful than the author of it had done. Paderewski was such a one. Perhaps De Pachman plays Chopin as well as Chopin did. It is hard to see how Liszt could have improved on the Lisztian readings of Mr. Seidl, and can we believe that Beethoven ever heard his own symphonies performed as Mr. Thomas gives them? A man of marked temperament, then, can add worth to his interpretations, at the same time keeping within the author's meaning in all essentials. No one has yet dared to take many liberties with Beethoven, though Chopin is played around and played at, and cadenced and despoiled of his cadences, as the soloist pleases, and if the soloist is a competent one there are no complaints. Mr. Paur holds his authors in respect. His only aim is to play them right. Sometimes faithfulness involves coldness and calculation, though it cannot be said of this leader that his work lacks force any more than that it lacks intelligence, but there at least is nothing erratic. His tempi are apt to be slow. The opening of the Fifth symphony was decidedly so, especially the fourth note in the introductory phrase that Bies called Fate knocking at the door. This was prolonged surprisingly. The effect of these long notes and continued sounds is to secure repose—but repose should not be indulged in a public place, without pillows. There are no subtleties, either. Mr. Paur is as clear as sunlight. The nearest he came to an impressionist reading was in the close of the second allegro that stands for scherzo. In this passage that has all the poetry and, therefore, mystery of a prose poem of the French decadents, with a hint, too, of the coming passion, his fondness for broad effects and slow tempi was in his favor, and the mystery and preparation deepened until the mind was prepared for the magnificent pæan that closes the work. It brooded, like the muttering of an angered people before it breaks into revolution or has an election, and the change to the major key is a flash of joy and triumph; a singing of hosannas. In the "Academic" overture of Brahms, with its lilting college songs, the orchestra was let out more completely than in the symphony. Then it has more resonance, more life, more enthusiasm. It would be impossible to misuse this orchestra, yet it was a little out of hand in one or two bars of Volkmann's third serenade, that brought Alwin Schroeder into view as soloist, the second violins falling a fraction of a beat behind the first for an instant. But what a magnificent quality of tone those fifty odd strings produce! It was the serenade that displayed them to their fullest. That number has been heard here before; Mr. Bergner played it with the Thomas band. It is popular, and it is delightful. It is one of the works of the lesser writers, but it has purity of sentiment, melodic charm and oddity of treatment, as in the single notes for the solo instrument that the others weave chords around that is characteristic and unforced. In the quaintness of its sentiment it often suggests an Irish "comallyez." It is worth going a long way to hear that eight or ten minutes of string playing. Emma Eames Story was the soloist. She is as delightful to look at as ever and sings freer, better, more brightly than she did when she was last here, although her breathing was not wholly free in the last solo. The applause given to her was as liberal as that extended to the whole orchestra. She should not run when she leaves the stage. There is plenty of time and women cannot run. The Massenet air, "Weep, My Eyes" from the "Cid," sounded melancholy and a little cheap, coming after the Beethoven number and, of course, the name of it is a piece of French hysterics. The idea of addressing your eyes and saying, "Cry now. Go on, shed some tears!" Is it not preposterous artifice? An air from Gluck's "Armide" had the greater simplicity and strength, but was less interesting orchestrally. This evening the programme will be repeated.

The Press

DAILY EDITION.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 9, 1893.

PAUR AT MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA'S NEW LEADER'S FIRST NIGHT HERE.

Like Seidl, Attracted from Leipsic, He Has None of That Master's Graces, but Has Genius.

The first concert of the season in this city given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was an event of more than usual interest in connection with this famous organization. The large audience assembled in Music Hall last evening was attracted not only by the anticipation of renewing acquaintance with these excellent musicians, but had the keener zest of welcoming the reappearance of Miss Emma Eames and of considering the abilities of a new conductor in the person of Emil Paur.

The chief interest was, naturally, in the personality, taste, power and musicianly skill of the leader. Emil Paur quitted the position of conductor at the Stadttheater, Leipsic, a few months ago to accept his new position. From this house, it is curious to note, have come several of our most distinguished leaders. During Anton Seidl's occupation of the conductor's chair at the Leipsic Stadttheater, Arthur Nikisch was his assistant. Herr Seidl was induced to take charge of the German opera at our Metropolitan Opera House, and his successor was Nikisch. When the latter musician was tempted to Boston, Emil Paur was engaged to take his place at Leipsic. Recently Nikisch went to Buda-Pesth, and Boston has secured Paur for the position long and honorably held by his predecessor.

The method of the new leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is distinguished for simplicity, earnestness and decision. Unlike Herr Nikisch, he is neither picturesque, poetic nor handsome. Emil Paur is by no means graceful, and his attitude and motions on the conductor's stand are not engaging to the eye. His beat is angular, jerky and heavy, but it is direct and forceful. It is intended solely as a guidance to his musicians, and is not a concession to the traditions of the audience; but he is thoroughly in earnest, rugged in style and wholly absorbed in his art. His method is direct and unaffected.

His principal object is to keep the instruments in exact rhythm and harmony. In this purpose he is successful. The symphony rehearsals may not be so filled with sentiment this winter as they were in the past; but Herr Paur not only understands the exact spirit of the score, but interprets it honestly, without exaggeration, without new and unauthorized emphasis. We have been so long accustomed to novel readings of the great composers that our interest in symphonies and philarmonics has not been so much to hear Beethoven, Mendelssohn and Wagner as to observe the diverse interpretation placed on the scores of these masters by Thomas, Nikisch, Von Bulow and Seidl. At present we shall have an opportunity under the direct and honest beat of Emil Paur to listen to the score itself without being perplexed by originalities of conception. The new leader of the Symphony Orchestra went to Boston to play the works of great musicians and it was evident to the audience of the Music Hall last night that he intends to accomplish his object.

The programme included Beethoven's Symphony in C minor No. 5, aria from "Le Cid," Massenet; Dvorak's Rhapsody No. 2, aria from "The Marriage of Figaro," Mozart, and the overture of "Benvenuto Cellini," Berlioz.

The performance was entirely successful—Miss Eames, whose excellent art during our last opera season established her name among the chief prima donnas of the day, was welcomed with enthusiasm. She was in good voice, and sang her arias delightfully, with that fine union of vocal beauty and warmth of coloring which were agreeable features of the Metropolitan season. This popular artiste and the new conductor received and fully earned the applause of a critical audience, and the Boston Symphony concerts began with a success that promises to continue throughout the winter.

BOSTON DAILY TRAVELLER

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 13, 1893.

IN THE MUSIC WORLD.

The Symphony Orchestra in New York—Other Matters of Interest.

The large Carnegie Music Hall in New York was filled to overflowing last Wednesday evening by an audience gathered to welcome Conductor Paur and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the occasion being the first of this year's series of concerts to be given by this organization in that city. Conductor Paur was warmly received and throughout the evening was enthusiastically applauded. The enthusiasm exhibited left no doubt respecting a very favorable opinion of Mr. Paur's merits on the part of the audience, both as regards his conducting and his interpretations, and its voice was unanimous in the opinion expressed.

The critics, however, did not seem to agree. It may be interesting for our readers to know what these gentlemen thought of our new conductor.

The writer in the New York Times speaks of Mr. Paur as a scholarly, sound, intelligent and energetic conductor, but to him it seems as if the gods had not made him poetical.

The Tribune finds Mr. Paur's conducting much better in the effect than in its appearance, and regards the playing of the first and second movements of the fifth symphony of Beethoven as tedious, but praises the playing of Dvorak's "Slavonic Rhapsody" No. 2, and the "Benvenuto Cellini" overture of Berlioz, describing it as a most brilliant rendering of these compositions.

The New York Sun comments upon Mr. Paur's attractive personality, his manly appearance, the charm of his lack of self-consciousness, and admires his frank and dignified manner. It says also that Mr. Paur proved himself to be a master in the art of leading an orchestra as well as an interpreter of music, from whose ipse dixit there can be no appeal.

The New York Herald does not like Mr. Paur's conducting. He is very jerky; there is a perceptible hesitation in his attack, and it is difficult to tell upon which beat the accent lay. Mr. Paur has not dramatic instinct; he is of a dreamy, poetic nature; he is desperately in earnest, but he makes one nervous by his unmeaningly emphatic gestures, and he lacks the ability to work up and effect a climax.

The New York Recorder says Mr. Paur looks as if he hailed from the Quaker city; he is very Teutonic, earnest, awkward, angular, sincere, dry, scholarly and absolutely devoid of magnetism; there also are about 500 such conductors in this country and 50,000 in Europe. Sanity, sobriety and solemnity were the three grave qualities of the playing of the orchestra on this occasion. Mr. Paur's readings are more muscular than musical; he is virile, but lacks imagination; he is more pedantic than Gericke, but lacks that conductor's exquisite taste and finesse. Mr. Paur is a great director; he carries out the phrases for you with astonishing patience, but the bloom, the poetry, the profound meanings, where are they? His frigidity would chill Theodore Thomas, even when the latter is below zero.

Perhaps a little later on these gentlemen will be more agreed in their opinions. In the meantime we shall keep right on thinking here in Boston that we have got a conductor whose ability far excels Mr. Nikisch's as well as that of any conductor in New York, and as long as the concerts are crowded with eager listeners the management will be quite content with the prevailing conditions.

In the other cities visited the attendance was phenomenally large. In Baltimore the audience was the largest ever seen at the concerts of this organization. The concert in Washington saw an attendance that was limited only with the size of the hall. At the two concerts given in Brooklyn the attendance was the largest yet seen in that city, while in Philadelphia 3 000 people were crowded into the Academy of Music, and hundreds were turned away unable to gain admittance.

When we consider how hard the times are, this great success away from home is most gratifying, and the financial gain will naturally serve in lessening the great burden Mr. Higginson has to bear in pursuing his noble enterprise.

THE EVENING STAR.

WASHINGTON, D. C.

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 7,

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.—The popularity of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this city was fully demonstrated in the large audience that filled Metzerott Hall last night on the occasion of its first concert this season. Aside from the pleasure of listening to the work of this organization, which for its size can probably not be surpassed by any similar body of musicians, there was in the minds of the audience a curiosity to see the new leader, Mr. Emil Paur, and to judge if he was a worthy successor to those who had preceded him in the development of this band—Henschel, Gericke and Nikisch. That the listeners were kindly disposed to the new director was manifest in the hearty greeting which he received when he first came forward to assume command, and that he satisfied their desires and compelled their admiration was evidenced by the hearty applause that was given at the close of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, with which the program opened.

As this was the chief number of the evening Mr. Paur's ability as a conductor must be judged by his reading of this one of Beethoven's greatest works. No unfavorable criticism can be made, and it is believed that this composition was never heard to such good advantage in this city as last night. He takes the tempo of the andante movement slower than customary, but it enables him to present a finer effect and to show the symmetrical development of the theme. In the Scherzo, in which the originality of Beethoven is shown more than in either of the former movements, the thorough training of the orchestra was manifested as well as the earnestness of the conductor, and the glorious march with which it closed was a triumph both for leader and players. Mr. Paur is an improvement on Nikisch in that he exhibits less self-consciousness, less posing for effect. He is not so graceful, but he is much more earnest and more virile. He seems to feel the music, and he uses his whole body in his work. He covers his entire force with his movements, and his vigor holds them in perfect control. The other orchestral numbers were a Slavonic rhapsody by Dvorak and Berlioz's overture, "Benvenuto Cellini," the first of which contained the peculiarities of its author, but was hardly as satisfying as some of his other works, and the latter, which has been heard here before, was given with good effect.

Mme. Lillian Nordica was the soloist, and she sang for her first number the well-known aria from the "Queen of Sheba," excellently displaying the purity of her voice and the perfection of her method. Her second number was the recitative and aria from Beethoven's Fidelio, a very trying score, in which she acquitted herself nobly, though it needed a bigger, broader organ. A word should be said as to the accompaniment work of the orchestra, which was better than ever before, due no doubt to the experience that Mr. Paur has had in directing opera.

Albaugh's.—Mr. Roland Reed, who is established as one of this country's representative comedians, and from whom good things are always expected, did not disappoint the large audience that assembled at Albaugh's last night. The plot of "Lend Me Your Wife" has no longer the fullest charm of novelty, but this performance affords an abundance of what is fresh and entertaining in the wit of the lines, the flow of spirits and pleasing personality that the star brings into it, and the vivacity with which the various members of the company do all that is before them. The cast works with all the harmony that would be noteworthy in a stock company of long standing. Miss Isadore Rush made an especially agreeable impression through the graces which she brought to the part of Bessie Bunting, the wife who is lent.

New National Theater.—Those excellent actors, Frederick Warde and Louis James, opened a week's engagement in the classical drama at the New National Theater last night. The play was George H. Boker's powerful tragedy, "Francesca da Rimini." The performance presented the sterling qualities which have claimed for it cultured approval in the past. Mr. Warde gives a fine impersonation of the manly and heart-stricken hunchback, while Mr. James' representation of the malicious court jester has a force and smoothness that makes it a masterly study in cynicism. The supporting cast is competent and the mounting of the play is liberal and handsome.

Academy of Music.—Henshaw and Ten Broeck, called the millionaires of fun, appeared last night in the new "Nabobs," on their farewell tour in farce comedy. Mr. Henshaw is evidently quite a versatile comedian, and Sam Collins' nimble legs and grimaces would prove a good foil for him in some circumstances, but they are both handicapped in the "Nabobs."

Harris' Bijou Theater.—The performance at the Bijou last night was one of the best seen at this house during the season. It was that romantic spectacular melodrama, "Fabio Romani, or the Vendetta," and the audience that welcomed it was the largest the Bijou has seen for a long time. The play is strong, full of interest and dramatic effect. The company is excellent and the scenery the best ever seen at this theater. Walter Lawrence in the title role was even better than ever before. Miss Frances Field as Nina, the false wife, was excellent. Between acts 2 and 3 Miss Anita Turnour contributed a serpentine dance that was greatly enjoyed. Again tonight.

Kernan's Lyceum Theater.—The New York Vaudeville Stars opened a week's engagement at Kernan's last night to good business. The show is an out-and-out variety entertainment of a high class. Manning and Griffin, who are justly styled "The Autocrats of Mirth," opened the performance. Then came Lillian Mason, who reaches the popular pulse by singing all the latest songs in a clever manner. McRobie and Evans, in an original travesty, came next, with ten minutes of rollicking fun, and Luciano Tatale in an entirely new and startling act was marvelous. Bryant and Saville, those jovial fun makers, Van Leer and Barton in knock about comedy, Harris and Walters in character sketches, and the great Littlefield in a roaring act, were clever. The Farnum brothers proved themselves daring acrobats, and the roaring afterpiece, "Count or No Count" was a happy ending to a clever show. Again tonight.

Wonderland.—A rooster orchestra is a decided novelty, and yesterday at the Wonderland Theater large audiences listened to a number of fowls perform on stringed instruments, just as if they were used to them. There is also a wrestling bear that gives an interesting bout with his trainer, Signor Delario. The stage performance presents the Waterbury brothers, Helstone and English, top boot dancers, the Barons and a comedy sketch, and Miss Belmont in an exhibition of second sight.

ARTICLE PEELED AWAY

...yesterday's
...aid that the
...gave the best
...dainty pastorale,
...parency of effect
...eorges of England
...esiah" that "one
...ough it," the men
...elicacy and loveli-
...tual refreshment
...the composition.
...e a detailed dis-
...d till the next
...pose manifested
...his men, how-
...admiring recog-

...ozart air, if we

New-York Daily Tribune.

FOUNDED BY HORACE GREELEY.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 11, 1893.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

The Kneisel Quartet, composed of members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, headed by the principal of the violins, Mr. Franz Kneisel, gave its first concert of chamber music last night in the small room set apart for such concerts in the Music Hall. Last year the Club played in Chickering Hall, and through some perversity, not wholly accounted for, its audiences were exceedingly small. The listeners last night were not many, but they were gathered in the name of that which is highest and purest in the musical art, and they carried away what may be described in a spirit of entire reverence as a benediction. For a revelation of perfect loveliness in the province of chamber music no organization in the country holds out a richer promise than the Kneisel Quartet. The playing of the club last night was as near perfection as one could wish, and it was almost as delightful as listening to the music to watch the play of pleasurable emotions on the faces of the listeners. The change to the smaller room was a wise one. Chamber music is designed for the few—it is music for the inner brotherhood. To hear it at its best one must be so intimately associated with the players as to inspire them and catch inspiration from them. The tone from the instruments must come to the perceptions of the listeners unsophisticated and undiluted, saturated, indeed, with all its sensuous charm and warmed with the passion of the players. The playing of Mr. Kneisel and his associates is exquisitely true in intonation, and their readings of the music of the masters are as reverential, as eloquent, as beautiful and truthful as they are lucid and intelligent. Keener pleasure than they provided last night no lover of the classics can ask, and though the lovers of chamber music are comparatively few in number in every community there can be no doubt that before the season is over the audiences at the Kneisel Quartet concerts will test the seating capacity of the hall. The programme last night consisted of the first of Beethoven's Rasoumowski quartets, (op. 59, No. 1), Haydn's quartet in G minor, op. 74, No. 3, and Brahms's beautiful quintet in F Major, op. 88. In this the quartet, Mr. Kneisel, Mr. Roth, Mr. Svecenski and Mr. Schroeder had the help of Mr. Zach, second viola, also of the Boston Orchestra.

The Evening Post.

New York, Thursday, Nov. 9, 1893.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

It is said that the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra hesitated to change from Chickering Hall to Music Hall for fear that, although the first-named hall was always full, there might not be hearers enough to fill the larger auditorium. These fears were shown to be groundless, for at last evening's first concert of the season Music Hall was quite full, and a cordial welcome was given to the famous orchestra and its new conductor, Emil Paur, as well as to the vocalist, Mme. Emma Eames. The reappearance of this favorite singer, and the début of a new conductor, partly accounted for the large audience—an audience that appeared well pleased with the entertainment. Mr. Paur was recalled after each piece—twice after the opening number.

This opening number was Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, a work for which he seems to have a special predilection, for he gave it in Boston, too, at his first concert in America. In interpreting it, is he guided by his own inspiration or does he follow the correct traditions? The second half of this question no one can answer, for the simple reason that we have no traditions as to the correct way of interpreting the symphonies of Beethoven, any more than we have in the case of Mozart or Schubert. The contemporaries of those masters, critical and amateur, were altogether too much above them to trouble about the way they wanted their compositions interpreted; they barely provided them with occasions to conduct them at all. Beethoven, moreover, was deaf in the last decades of his life and unable to control an orchestra as he wished to; and sometimes he made confusion worse confounded by his extraordinary programmes; he did not hesitate, on one occasion, to produce his first four symphonies at one concert, and on another occasion (December 17, 1808) he produced, besides several other long compositions, two of his symphonies, both new—the fifth and the sixth—the consequence being that time could not be found for even a single complete rehearsal! And orchestras in those days were very far indeed from being as good as they are to-day.

In the absence of genuine traditions, the readings of such conductors as Mendelssohn, Lachner, and Hiller were for a long time accepted and copied, until the iconoclastic Wagner appeared with his heavy cudgel, to shatter these fancied traditions. He insisted that in this academic way of reading Beethoven's symphonies the spirit was sacrificed to the letter, or, more definitely, the melody and emotion were sacrificed to the rigidity and dignified regularity of the beat, thus needlessly emphasizing the fact that the symphony is descended from lowly forms of dance music. What Wagner wished to emphasize was those features in which the symphony ceases to be metronomic, like dance music, and becomes emotional. Therefore his first principle was to search everywhere in the harmonic web for the melody and emphasize that; and his second principle was to constantly modify the tempo in accordance with the temporary emotional character of the melody.

In truth, there is nothing so very novel and startling in these principles. They have been followed instinctively by all the great modern pianists—by Liszt, Chopin, Rubinstein, and to-day by Paderewski, and the magic of their art lies largely in this circumstance. The astonishing thing is that it should have remained for Wagner to show that orchestral music should be played the same way to be truly effective and poetic. The greatest of modern conductors have followed his suggestions and are to-day rewarded by boundless popularity.

Mr. Paur has not followed them, and apparently does not believe in them (in which case we advise him to read Wagner, viii., 182-188); and what was the result last evening? A tame, monotonous performance of Beethoven's great work, which made it seem quite as old as it is—eighty-five years. There was no lack of precision, power, or delicacy, all the dynamic marks being most minutely observed by his excellent musicians; but the spirit had fled and the symphony seemed long. Mr. Paur is no doubt an excellent drill-master; his movements lack grace and elegance, but his beat is firm and decisive, and it is said that the orchestra admires him, which is much in his favor. He gave a spirited rather than brilliant performance of Berlioz's "Cellini" overture, but it was in Dvorák's second rhapsody that conductor as well as orchestra were heard to best advantage. And what a delightful composition that rhapsody is! How Slavic in its spirit, yet original and fertile in themes, and what superb bits of color blending and changing like gorgeous sunset tints!

Mme. Emma Eames chose for her numbers Massenet's "Pleurez mes Yeux," and an aria from Mozart's "Figaro." The first of these was best suited to her voice and style. Her voice has retained all its sweetness and purity, but it has gained in volume and power, and will no doubt have more admirers than ever at the coming opera season. She was recalled after each number, but the rules of the society forbid encores.

Baltimore American AND COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER

ONE HUNDRED AND TWENTY YEARS OLD, AND THE OLDEST DAILY NEWSPAPER IN AMERICA.

WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 8, 1893.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

First Concert in Baltimore This Season a Great Success.

The first of a series of five concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Ford's Grand Opera House, before a large and fashionable audience, yesterday afternoon. The advent of this splendid organization is always the occasion for much rejoicing among the musicians and musical people of Baltimore, and the opening concert, of this the thirteenth season, was hailed with great joy, as being the harbinger of the four rare treats which are to follow.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra ranks with the greatest orchestras of the world, and under the guidance of such master leaders, as Mr. Henschell and Mr. Gericke, it has been brought to its present high place as one of five leading bands of the civilized globe. By comparison with that of Henschell and Gericke, the reign of Mr. Nikisch, was unmarked by any special achievement, as this rather effeminate and erratic leader lacked the sterling qualities of his predecessors, and if it had not been for the good seed sown by them in this field of artists, disaster would most likely have overtaken the band.

Baltimoreans were not far behind the dwellers in sister cities in their anxiety and curiosity to see the successor of the eminent poseur; indeed, every one who was interested in the band was likewise deeply interested in its new leader, and all have been upon the qui vive to take the measure of Mr. Emil Paur. Mr. Paur proved himself to be a manly man; he is evidently a man of rugged and fearless nature, and good sense and honesty of purpose beam forth from every feature of his leonine face. Unlike his immediate predecessor, he is totally devoid of affectation and mannerisms, and it is doubtful if he could pose if he would. As a conductor, he is earnest and decisive, even though he may at times be angular and amusing. One defect he has, and one which is reprehensible in a third-rate choir singer, or amateur violinist, that of visibly and audibly indicating the rythm now and then with his foot. In a conductor who has so marked a sense of rythm, and who is so careful to give each cue, it seems a pity to mar such good points by so ridiculous and useless a custom. He is so earnest, however, that he may do it unconsciously.

Paur's reading of the afternoon's work was scholarly and satisfactory, although it seemed as though he took the second movement of the symphony too slow. The work of the band was up to its usual standard, save in one or two places, due, doubtless, to its lack of familiarity with certain methods of a new conductor. The C minor symphony is the one most familiar to all, and from its opening theme, the famous "Fate Knocking at the Gate," through the exquisite andante, which breathes of hope and bliss eternal in its beautiful yet simple melodies, on to the allegro in C minor, which finally ends in C major, producing, as Wagner has said, an effect as if of struggle past and joy triumphant gained; to the oft-repeated C major chord at the close, there is delight following delight, and one is moved to be thankful that Beethoven was inspired to do such noble work.

The other orchestral numbers were the "Slavonic Rhapsody in G Minor" and the overture to "Benvenuto Cellini," the first by Antonin Dvorak, the latter by Hector Berlioz. The Dvorak number is a fantastic, rather uninteresting work of orchestration; but the Berlioz overture is glorious, and was gloriously rendered. Berlioz fully believed in wind instruments, and as closing numbers, many of his works produce superb and stirring effects. To speak in terms of highest praise of the soloist, Mme. Nordica, is indeed a great pleasure. She is a magnificent woman, fair to look upon, and with a noble dramatic voice, which causes every fibre of one's frame to vibrate in unison with each note. Her rendering of the aria from "Reine de Saba," by Gounod, and the recit. and aria from "Fidelio," by Beethoven, were simply superb, and won for her most enthusiastic plaudits and three recalls, and the audience deeply regretted the enforcement of the usual good custom of no encores. Mme. Nordica will always receive an ardent welcome to Baltimore.

The Sun.

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 9, 1893.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Carnegie Music Hall is none too large to hold the subscribers to the Boston Symphony concerts. This fact was clearly demonstrated last evening, when every seat in the house was filled. Herr Paur, the new conductor, was expected with curiosity and looked upon with interest. His personality is indeed most attractive, his appearance manly, of the rugged, leonine sort; a large frame, shaggy head of tawny hair, and a face seamed with emotion, thought, and experience. One of the greatest charms about him is his lack of self-consciousness, but there are numerous other ones, including a frank and at the same time dignified manner. He showed himself to be a master in the art of leading an orchestra, as well as an interpreter of music, from whose ipse dixit there can be no appeal. This is chiefly because of the absolute absence of affectation and the seeking for other than legitimate effects with which a less grandly qualified maestro might attempt to capture admiration and applause. Herr Paur has that true love and reverence for his art that leads its disciples into purity and honesty of expression. A nobility and broad comprehension, like the charity which covers multitudes of sins, seems to fall like a beautiful mantle over all that Herr Paur delineates. His work shows plainly enough that his mind's eye is fixed upon the highest altar of art instead of anything less worthy and more worldly. With all this breadth of treatment, details are watched and polished in the most careful and adroit way. There were times last evening when exquisite pianissimo passages hushed the audience into absolute silence, and again times when by his wonderfully significant gestures, the leader actually seemed to push immense crescendos and sforzandos out of the depths of the orchestra. Beethoven's Fifth Symphony took on quite a new, refreshed, and refreshing form. Berlioz's Benvenuto Cellini overture was also magnificently played. In the accompaniments Paur kept his men down to the most delicate breath of sound. Miss Eames, who has rarely sung here in concert, was a welcome addition to the delights of the evening. Her low tones have broadened and strengthened, and the whole voice seems to have grown in elasticity. The air from Massenet's "Cid," Pleurez mes yeux, was done with care and reserve rather than with dramatic power, but on the one or two climaxes which she allowed herself Miss Eames's voice rang out with excellent strength and vibratory quality. The air from "Nozze di Figaro" was pleasing, but certainly the adjuncts of the dramatic stage help Miss Eames to higher triumphs than she could ever make in the narrower, plainer field of the concert room. Dvorak's Slavonic Rhapsody was the remaining number of the programme. It is one of the least worthy of his compositions and seems empty of ideas, though full of a sort of glamour of strange sounds. Herr Paur should be commended for the judicious length—by which is meant the shortness—of his programme. The concert was over at a few moments before 10 o'clock.

NEW YORK HERALD.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 9, 1893.

HERR PAUR'S DEBUT.

Makes His First New York Appearance as Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Carnegie Music Hall was filled to the doors with an immense audience last evening to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra and to see Mr. Emil Paur make his New York début with the organization.

